At last one of his children, of about eight or nine years old, came to the bishop's house to see if he could get leave to speak with his father; and one of the bishop's chaplains meeting with the boy, asked him what he looked for? The child answered, 'that he came to see his father that was in Lollard's tower: Why, said the priest, thy father is an heretic;' the boy, being of a bold and quick spirit, and well educated by his father answered, 'My father is no heretic, but you are an heretic; for you have Balaam's mark on you.' With that the priest took him by the hand, and led him into the bishop's house, where amongst them, they stripped the child naked, and cruelly whipt him, till he was all over gore blood. Then Cluny, the bishop's sumner, putting on his shirt, and carrying his coat on his arm, led him to the prison with the blood dropping at his heels to his father. At his coming in, the boy fell on his knees, and craved his father's blessing: the father being full of grief to see his child so cruelly dealt with, said, 'Alas William who hath done this to thee?' The boy answered, as I was coming to see you, a priest with Balaam's mark, took me into the bishop's house, where I have been thus used.' Hereupon Cluny violently plucked him from his father and carried him back into the bishop's house, where they kept him three days: and then Bonner minding to appease the poor man for the usage of his child, sent for him out of Lollard's tower to his chamber. Whilst this Jo. Fetty was standing there with the bishop, he spied a great pair of black beads hanging by his bed, and thereupon said to him, 'My lord, I think the hangman is not far off, for the halter (pointing to the beads) is here already.' This much enraged the bishop, yet Fetty spying also a crucifix standing in the window, said, 'my lord, what is that? the bishop answered, it was Christ. Was he handled, said Fetty, so cruelly, as is here pictured? Yea, said Bonner, that he was: and even so cruelly, said Fetty, do you handle such as come before you; for you are to God's people, even as Caiaphas was to Christ.' The bishop was so enraged at this, that he swore he would burn him, or spend all that he had to his gown: yet afterward bethinking himself of the danger that the child was in by reason of their cruel usage of him; he discharged him, bidding him go home, and carry his child with him, which accordingly he did, with an heavy heart for his poor boy, who within fourteen days after died.

Also when Dr Crome was to make his recantation; there came in one of the guard to a tradesman's shop, in Bowlane, where they asked him what news at court! 'the old heretic, said he, Dr Crome hath recanted before the council, and next Sunday will do the same at Paul's cross: hereupon Richard Wilmot apprentice in the same shop, of about the age of eighteen, said, I am sorry to hear that news; for if Crome shall say otherwise than he hath done formerly, it is contrary to the truth of God's word, and contrary to his own conscience which will accuse him before God for it,' He also added further, that what Dr Crome had taught was agreeable to the holy scriptures, wherein God hath revealed his will. 'Well, said the other, it was never merry world since the Bible was translated into English and heretic that caused it to be done (meaning the lord Cromwel) and therefore was rewarded according to his works.' After other such like talk came in the matter of the shop, and with him another young man called Thomas Fairfax, the master asked what was the matter? the queen's servant (whose name was Lewis,) answered, that he had a knavish boy to his man, whom, if he were his, he would rather hang him than keep him. In brief, the business being again rehearsed, Thomas Fairfax spake to Lewis, confirming what the other had said: whereupon Lewis went away in a rage to the court. The next day these two young men were sent for to the lord mayor, and by him, with Chomley the recorder, they were examined a part, and then sent apart to the two counters: their masters hearing of it, made great friends to the lord mayor and recorder for their release, but it could not be obtained without address to the council, who judged them heretics and traitors, and therefore worthy to die: yet at last by much importunity their lives were spared, and they were ordered to be whipped three market days at a cart's tail through the city of London. Yet at last, great friends being made to the privy council, they remitted that, and ordered them to be whipped in the companies hall, before the master and wardens, which was accordingly done, their bodies being stripped naked from the waist upward, and their feet fastened to an iron ring in the midst of the hall; and then two men disguised in visors, coming with two great rods, whipt them so cruelly, that Wilmot could not lie in his bed of six nights after, and could never recover his health again.

There was also one Thomas Green, servant to a printer; who gave to certain honest men a book called antichrist; which his master hearing of, examined him where he had it; he answered, of a Frenchman: then said his master, there is heresy and treason in it, and so sending for Clony, he bade him put him into Lollard's tower, which accordingly he did: but when he had lain there a while, he removed him to the bishop's Coalhouse; and there putting upon his right leg and left arm bolts and fetters, he set him, cross fettered in the stocks, on the morrow he came to him, saying, 'Come, let me shift your hand and leg that you be not lamed' and so he remained six days. Then was he sent for by doctor Store, who examined him about the book: he answered, that going to Newgate to visit some Christian friends that lay there for the testimony of the truth, he met with a Frenchman, who came thither for the like purpose, and after some further acquaintance with him, he bought this book of him. Then Story would have had him to bring forth this Frenchman, but he answered, that he could not do it. Upon this he was returned to the Coalhouse, where he lay in the stocks ten days and nights more.

Then was he again sent for to Dr Story, and whilst he was examining, two other prisoners were brought to him; whereupon his wife [Mrs. Story,] was in a great rage, and swore a great oath, saying, 'It is a pity but an hundred or two of these heretics were put into a house together, and I myself would set fire to them.' Then was Green again returned to the Coalhouse. After long imprisonment and frequent examinations, Dr Story sent for him to Christ's hospital, and commanded him to be stripped, and then calling for two beadles, he caused them to give him almost an hundred stripes; adding moreover, that if he might have his will, he would cut out his tongue; and then he dismissed him.

There was also one Steven Cotten, who was twice whipped by bishop Bonner.

Also one James Harris of Billerica in Essex, being apprehended, and sent up to Bonner, was examined by him, when he had been at church? To whom he answered, that he had not been at church of above a twelvemonth before, but once; and then, through fear, he received the popish sacrament, for which he was heartily sorry, detesting it with all his soul. Then the bishop would have had him shriven himself to a priest, which because he refused to do, the bishop took him into his garden, and there whipped him most cruelly.

Also one Robert Williams, a smith, being apprehended and sent to Bonner, the bishop after examination took him into his garden, and there in an arbor scourged him cruelly with rods.

There was in Collingborow, a poor shaved man, who because he would not receive the sacrament at Easter, was apprehended and sent to Salisbury, to Dr Geffery the chancellor, who cast this poor creature into a dungeon, and afterwards caused him to be cruelly whipt by two beadles.

CHAP. LXIII.

The Story of divers worthy Servants of Christ, who escaped burning by the death of Queen Mary.

RICHARD WHITE and John Hunt being apprehended, and examined by the major of Marlborow, were sent to Salisbury, and kept a long time in Lollard's tower; and at last were brought before bishop Capon, and other commissioners, and there examined of their faith, and they made a stout and zealous profession of the same, from which they could not be removed neither by frowns nor flatteries; so that at length, at the sessions they were condemned, and with other malefactors were delivered over to Sir Anthony Hungerford, the high sheriff, to be executed: but the evening after, Mr Clifford, son in law to Sir Anthony, came to him, exhorting and intreating him earnestly in no case to have a hand in the death of those two innocent persons. Sir Anthony hearing him, went strait to justice Brown to ask his advice, what he should do in the matter. justice Brown told him, that if he had not a writ from above for their execution, he could not answer it, but if he had he must then do his office. The sheriff hearing this, took his horse the next day, and went out of town, leaving these men in prison. The chancellor, Dr. Geffery, hearing of his departure, rode after him, and overtaking him, told him that he had delivered over into his hands two condemned men and wondred that he went away before he had executed them according to his office; the sheriff answered, that he was no babe which was to be taught of him what belonged to his office. 'If you have, said he, a writ to discharge me for the burning of them; I know what I have to do: Why, said the chancellor, did not I give you a writ under my hand for it? Well, said the sheriff, that is not a sufficient discharge for me: if I have not a writ from the superior powers, I will not burn them for any of you all.' Dr Geffery hearing this, returned home, and presently fell sick upon it.

Not long after came down a writ from above to the under sheriff, for their execution; but he being a godly man, cast the writ into the fire, saying, 'I will not be guilty of these mens blood.'

Within four days after the chancellor died: about which time Richard White and John Hunt being in a low and dark dungeon, were going to prayer, but on a sudden, knowing no reason for it, they burst both out into a great weeping, so that they could not speak a word; and the next morning they understood that just at the same time the chancellor died. Presently after the bishop died also: so that these two holy men continued in prison till queen Mary's death, and by that means it pleased God to deliver them.

In the time of queen Mary's sickness, one Coxe a promoter, taking the constable, and some others with him, went to the house of Mr William Living, a minister in Shoe lane, and there searching amongst his books, found a book of astronomy made by Johannes de sacro Bosco, wherein were many figures: Coxe taking this book, and Mr. Living, and his wife, carried them away to Darbishire's house, the bishop of London's chancellor; and by the way, carrying the book open, he said, 'I have found him at length; it is no marvel though the queen be sick, when there are such conjurers in corners, but now I trust he shall conjure no more.'

Darbishire examined him, and told him that he was a schismatic, and a traitor; to whom Mr Living answered, 'I would be sorry that were true, but I know I am no traitor, for I have always taught obedience according to the tenor of God's word; and when tumults have been raised, I have suppressed them by God's word. But, said the the chancellor, you deny the church of Rome, and therefore Cluny take him away, and put him into the Coalhouse.'

Then did Cluny violently hale and draw him, and carrying him to his house, there robbed him of all his money, his psalter and New Testament, &c. After which he carried him to the coalhouse, and there put both his arms and legs into the stocks, saying, that except he gave him forty shillings he would put a collar of iron about his neck also. 'I am never able to pay so much, said Mr. Living, and so he was left in the stocks.

At evening a kinswoman of his brought him his supper, who seeing how miserably he was used, told Cluny that she would give him ten groats to let him at liberty: Cluny took her money and so let him out to eat his supper, but presently after set him in the stocks again. Within a few days he was removed into Lollard's tower, and there put into the stocks.

His wife also was sent to Lollard's tower; but the queen's sickness being mortal, upon the request of friends, giving sureties to be forthcoming, they were released; by which means it pleased God, that they escaped death.

It was known that some of Mr Living's books were at the house of one John Lithals, in Southwark; whereupon a constable, and some of the queen's servants went to that house, breaking open his doors and chests, and seizing upon the books; and afterwards, watching for Lithal's coming home, they apprehended him, and carried him to Darbishire's house, by whom he was examined, and after sent to Lollard's tower. By the way Cluny, and another dragged him into Paul's church, and there would have had him hear mass, which he refused: whereupon they carried him forthwith to Lollard's tower, and hanged him by the hands and feet in the stocks, where he lay three days, and three nights, till he was so lame that he could neither stir nor move. Then Cluny coming to him, he profered him some gold, and money which he had about him to release him out of the stocks, which Cluny accepted of, and so let him out. After he had lien there about three weeks, Bonner being sick at Fulham, many of his neighbours came to the chancellor, and made great suit for the release of Mr Lithal, and the queen's disease increasing upon her, they obtained their request, and he was released.

Edward Grew, minister at a town called Broke, was by the malice of his adversaries enforced to fly from his habitation; and though very aged, yet to travel up and down for the keeping of a good conscience. At last, notwithstanding his circumspection, he was apprehended, and carried to Colchester castle, where he remained a prisoner till the coming in of queen Elizabeth of happy memory, by which means he was released.

William Brown, minister of little Stanham, in Suffolk, for preaching a bold sermon against the mass, was persecuted by one Robert Blomefield, constable, who fetching the under sheriff for his assistance, in the night time they brake into the minister's house, and apprehended him, and the next day he should have been carried to the council: but it pleased God suddenly to strike the said Blomefield with sickness, so that he could not go with him. Then did the under sheriff send him prisoner to Ipswich, and from thence he was removed to Bury jail, and so at last he was sent to the council, by whom he was committed to the Fleet, where he lay divers months; but it pleased God to put such answers into his mouth when he was examined by the council, that at last they dismissed him, and he returned to his former charge: but when he still refused to say or to be present at mass, he was put out of his place, himself and wife being constrained to fly and hide themselves from the fury of their adversaries; till at last, not long before queen Mary's death, it pleased God to deliver this good man, by taking him to himself.

But a terrible hand of God followed Blomefield, his persecutor, both by sickness, and a consumption of his estate; so that being rich before, he became poor; also his eldest son, and his wife, died of a pining disease. Then he sought to repair his estate by marrying a rich widow, yet all would not do: his body was full of botches and sores, and shortly after he died, being wasted both in body and estate; so that he died much worse than nothing.

There was one Elizabeth Young, who to preserve her conscience from pollution, left the land, and fled to Embden: yet after a while, came back again, and brought with her divers good books, which she dispersed abroad amongst God's people; for which at last she was apprehended, and often examined before the inquisitors of heretical pravity: they asked her why she would not go to mass? She answered, because her conscience would not suffer her, and she had rather that all the world should accuse her than her own conscience. Then they called her traitorly whore, and heretic, and such like vile names, threatening to rack her, and burn her, and so returned her to prison, charging her keeper, that she should one day have bread, and the other day water; which when she heard, she said, 'If you take away my meat, I trust that God will take away my hunger.'

Afterwards they examined her about the sacrament; to which she answered, That when she received the sacrament in spirit and faith, she received Christ: to which a doctor answered 'Ah whore, in spirit and faith, whore; hark thou ill favoured whore how I believe;' and so he told her how he believed about transubstantiation: to which she answered, and I Sir have told you how I believe: whereupon he replied, 'ah ill favoured whore; nothing but spirit and faith, whore?' After divers other examinations, two women suing for her release, she was at last discharged and set free.

There was dwelling in Bedfield, in the county of Suffolk, an aged woman of sixty years old, called Elizabeth Lawson, who being apprehended for an heretic, because she would not go to church to hear mass, was cast into a dungeon; where having lien a while, she was removed first to Norwich, and then to Bury jail, and remaining constant in the truth, was at last condemned to be burnt. Then did the high sheriff take her home with him to his house, and assayed by all means both fair and foul to pervert her; but when nothing would prevail, he returned her to prison, and there she continued almost three years: during which time her son, and many others were burnt: whereupon she would often say, 'Good Lord, what is the cause that I may not yet come to thee with others of thy children? Well, good Lord, thy blessed will be done, and not mine.'

At last queen Mary dying, she was delivered out of prison, and not long after resigned her soul to God.

This is very observable, that before her imprisonment she was much troubled with the falling sickness, but after she was cast into prison, she never had a fit more, but was in good health, and enjoyed much joy and comfort in her soul.

There was dwelling in the town of Seale in Kent, one William Watt's, who being apprehended by his popish enemies, was carried before the bishops and justices at Tunbridge, who laboured very much to withdraw him from the truth; but when by no means they could prevail, they committed him prisoner to the constable, who carried him to an alehouse, where the constable drank so liberally, that at last he fell asleep. Watt's his wife seeing this, persuaded her husband to go his ways, for as much as God hath made way for his escape: But William Watt's would by no means be persuaded thereunto, Whilst they were reasoning the case together, a stranger over hearing them, said to him, 'father, go thy ways in God's name, and tarry no longer; the Lord hath opened the way for thee.' Upon this Watt's went his way and his wife returned to her house at Seale: but whilst she was telling some friends of her husband's great deliverance, he came in amongst them; which when his wife saw, she was much troubled, and persuaded him by all means to haste away before search should be made after him: he answered, that he would first eat some meat, and pray with his family, which accordingly he did, and then went and hid himself in an holly bush hard by. But no sooner was he gone out of doors, but in came the constable, and many more with him, searching all the house, breaking open chests, and piercing the featherbeds, so that he made much spoil in the house: but it pleased the Lord to hide his servant, and to deliver him from the danger. His wife was carried to the stocks, where she lay two days before she was freed.

In

In London was one Dabney a painter, a godly man, who being apprehended by an apparitor, was carried to Bonner; but when they came thither, they were bid to ſtand ſtill a while, becauſe the biſhop was buſy in examining of others; and before he had finiſhed with them, a meſſenger came in haſte, deſiring the biſhop to prepare himſelf ſpeedily, for that the general proceſſion tarried for him: then were all other buſineſſes laid aſide; the biſhop and his family haſting away to accompany the proceſſion, by reaſon whereof, Dabney was left alone: he ſeeing this, went down into the court, and there walked up and down in a melancholy poſture; the porter ſeeing him thus to walk alone, and thinking him to be ſome citizen that came about buſineſs, aſked him, if he would go forth; Yes, ſaid he, with a good will, if you will let me out: with that the porter opened the wicket, and let him depart. After this, much ſearch was made for him, but the Lord preſerved him from the danger.

Mr Alexander Whinſhurſt, a godly miniſter, being informed againſt to Bonner, he ſent forth one of his ſlies to apprehend him; who, after ſearch, meeting with him, took him, and carried him towards the biſhop's houſe: and as they went through Paul's church, Mr Whinſhurſt eſpied Dr Chadley walking there, who having been of his antient acquaintance in Oxford he intreated him, that for old acquaintance ſake, he would prevail ſo far, that he might be examined before Dr Martin, rather than any other: the doctor in ſcorn anſwered him with the words of Chriſt, 'When thou waſt young thou girdeſt thyſelf, and wenteſt whither thou wouldeſt; but being aged other men ſhould gird thee, and lead thee whither thou wouldeſt not.

Then was he carried to Story and Cooke, who laboured by all means, both fair and foul, to pervert him from the truth; but he carried himſelf very reſolutely before them, not ſhrinking at all from his former profeſſion.

Hereupon they ſent him to Clunie's houſe in Pater Noſter-row, by whom he was committed to Lollard's tower; but the Lord pleaſed ſo to order it, that when he came thither, Cluny and his family were very buſy, ſo that he was left alone in his hall; only there was another woman whoſe huſband was in trouble, about whom ſhe ſtaid to ſpeak with Cluny.

She ſeeing Mr Whinſhurſt ſtand there, ſaid to him, 'Alas! good Sir, if you pleaſe you may eſcape the hands of your cruel enemies; for as much as they be all abſent that ſhould look to you, whereby God hath opened the way for your deliverance, and therefore loſe not the opportunity if you be wiſe.' At theſe words he looked about him, and went out of doors, walking but a leiſurely pace, ſo that he might have been eaſily taken again, if any had looked after him; but it was God's will that he ſhould thus eſcape the fury of his adverſaries.

There was one Boſom's wife, who living at Richmond with her mother, was much called upon to go to church, and at length, through importunity, ſhe aſſented thereto; but when ſhe came to church, ſhe behaved herſelf in every thing contrary to that which others did; when they kneeled, ſhe ſtood; when they turned forwards, ſhe turned backwards, &c.

This her carriage was ſo public, that the church-warden and conſtable came, and attacked her in the queen's name, commanding her and her mother to meet them the next day at Kingſton: and accordingly the next morning they went thitherward, and meeting the officers at the ferry by the way, they ſaluted them by their names. The officers had no power to ſpeak unto them, but went their ways; but afterwards they ſtamped and ſtared, and were much vexed that they had thus let them go.

The woman ſeeing that they regarded them not, went back again; and the good woman retired herſelf to London, by which means the Lord mercifully delivered her from their cruelty.

There was dwelling at Windonham in Norfolk, the Lady Anne Knevet, being near an hundred years old, who all the time of Queen Mary kept herſelf from their popiſh church, neither ſuffered any of their papiſtical traſh to be adminiſtered in her houſe; but had the Engliſh ſervice daily performed, which was uſed in King Edward's days. For this ſhe and her family were many times threatened by meſſengers, that the biſhops would viſit her 'ere long; to whom ſhe ſtill anſwered, That if his lordſhip ſent word before hand, his entertainment ſhould be accordingly. But God, by his merciful providence, ſo overawed their hearts, that ſhe lived in ſafety all that troubleſome time: yea, though there were ſometimes preſent at her ſervice great enemies to the truth, and ſuch as had much authority; yet coming in, they would kneel down amongſt the reſt at prayer, and had no power to trouble her for the ſame.

This good lady was much given to hoſpitality, and entertained into her houſe many of the perſecuted members of Jeſus Chriſt; and though they were never ſo poor, they were looked upon by her as friends to the goſpel, and not ſuffered to depart without meat and money.

Alſo the lady Elizabeth Vane was a great harbourer and ſupporter of the afflicted martyrs and confeſſors of Chriſt, for which ſhe was oftentimes in great danger, and yet God mercifully delivered her.

There was in Suſſex one Mrs Roberts, a godly and virtuous gentlewoman, who all the time of Queen Mary's reign, was earneſtly addicted to the truth, and never went to their popiſh ſervice, nor would pollute her conſcience with hearing their idolatrous maſs: and not far from her, there dwelled Sir John Gilford, a juſtice of peace, who was as fervent on the contrary to promote popery: he hearing of her, firſt ſent his wife to tempt her by fair words, and gentle perſuaſions to go to church, and to obey the queen's laws as others did; but ſhe, conſtantly adhering to the truth, would by no means be perſuaded to defile her conſcience with their idolatrous ſervice.

Then did Sir John Gilford ſend his officers and ſervants to carry her by force to church; but by the way as they carried her, ſhe, through anguiſh and grief of ſpirit, fell into a ſwoon, ſo that they were forced to carry her home again.

Afterwards Sir John went himſelf to her houſe, reſolving, whatever came of it, to have her to church: but, behold the good providence of God! juſt as Sir John Gilford was going up the ſtairs to her chamber, he was taken with ſuch violent and terrible pains of the gout, that he could go no further; and ſo was fain himſelf to be carried home, proteſting and ſwearing, that he would never trouble this gentlewoman any more: and ſo, through God's mercy, ſhe eſcaped the danger.

There was alſo in Nottinghamſhire, one Mrs Lacy, a very holy woman, againſt whom, through the malice of her adverſaries, a proceſs was ſent forth and ſhe was driven to ſuch ſtraits, that ſhe was forced to hide her Bible, and ſome other good books in a dunghill. She had one of her own brothers a juſtice of peace, but he being a papiſt, ſhewed her little favour: yet, though kindred failed, God did not fail her; for before ſhe was apprehended, it pleaſed God that Queen Mary died; and ſo ſhe eſcaped the danger.

There was in Norfolk one Croſman's wife, a good woman, who being taken notice of for her not coming to church, the conſtable of the Hundred came to apprehend her. She had a young child that juſt at that time was crying very hard; but it pleaſed God, that as the conſtable came in with his company, the child gave over crying, and the mother having notice of the danger, ſlipped with the child in her arms, into a corner behind the chimney; the child continued quiet all the time that they were ſearching the houſe, and when they could not find her they departed: and ſo the poor woman, through God's merciful providence, eſcaped the danger.

There was at the town of Stoke in Suffolk, a great number of godly people, with whom, by reaſon of their number and unanimity, the biſhops were afraid to meddle. They kept conſtantly to their private meetings, and came not at all to the popiſh ſervice: yet at laſt an order was ſent to them, that within ſixteen days after Eaſter, they ſhould all receive the popiſh ſacrament, or elſe ſtand to the peril that would follow.

Hereupon theſe godly people meeting together, conſidered what to do, and reſolved that none of them would receive it: only there was one John Foxe that was very urgent with his wife to obey the order, and prevailed with the priest to come and give it her the seventh day after Easter; but the day before she went to the meeting and with tears declared how violently her husband had dealt with her: they bade her be of good chear, for they would make their earnest prayers unto the Lord both for her and her husband, and accordingly they did so; and thro' God's mercy they found success; for the very next day John Foxe came of his own accord unto them, and confessed and bewailed his rashness and inconsiderateness, promising, through God's help, to be more strong in the faith, to the great comfort both of them and his wife.

About half a year after, the bishop of Norwich sent his apparitors amongst these good people, straitly charging them to go to church the Sunday following, or else presently to appear before the commissary, to render an account of their absence: but they, having notice before hand of the apparitor's coming, kept themselves out of the way, to avoid the summons: and so not being at church at the time appointed, nor appearing before the commissary, he first suspended them, and three weeks after excommunicated them: and when an officer was appointed to apprehend some of them, they absented themselves out of the town, and so escaped the danger all queen Mary's time.

No less wonderful was God's mercy to the private congregation in London, whom he preserved all Queen Mary's reign, notwithstanding all the malice and searchings of their adversaries, and the strictness of the laws against them. First when they were to have met in Blackfriar's, at Sir Thomas Carden's house, privy watch was set for the apprehending of them; but through the Lord's vigilant eye over them, the mischief was prevented, and they escaped the danger.

Also, when they were met about Aldgate, some spies were sent to discover them; but it pleased God, that Thomas Simpson the deacon, espying them, bad them presently disperse themselves, which if they had not done, they had been all taken, the constable coming presently after to search for them.

Another time, about the great conduit in Cheapside, as they passed through a little alley into a clothworker's chamber, where they were to meet together, they were espied by some of their adversaries, and the sheriffs were presently sent for to apprehend them; but they being privily warned of the danger, presently departed, one of the Bishops Sumner's looking on, but having no power, or else fearing to meddle with them.

At another time, they publicly assembled together in a ship at Billingsgate, that belonged to a godly man of Ley, where, though the people took notice of them, yet, thro' God's mercy, they were freed from danger. Yea, twice or thrice, they assembled together in another ship, between Ratcliff and Redriff, where they had prayers, preaching, and the sacrament administered; and though many took notice of it, yet non meddled with them.

At another time, being met together at an honest cooper's house in Pudding lane; whilst they were there, the bishop's officer came into the house, and having talked a while with the goodman of the house, went away again, having no power to meddle with them.

Another eminent danger they escaped in Thames-street, near the water, where being met together in the night, they were discovered, and the house beset that none should escape; but there being an honest mariner amongst them, he seeing no other way to avoid the danger, slipt out at a back door, and swam to a boat, and bringing it thither, took all these good people, and making oars of his shoes, conveyed them away from the danger.

Sometimes some were sent to spy out their doings, and to take their names; but when they came thither, God hath so wrought upon them, that themselves have been caught, and have asked them forgiveness for their wicked purpoles against them.

We have heard before of the extreme danger that they were in at the taking of Mr Rough their minister, and Mr Simpson their deacon, if God by a dream had not warned Mr Rough, to charge Mr Simpson to lay aside that book wherein all their names were contained.

This congregation began presently after Queen Mary entered into her reign, and were sometimes more, sometimes less; sometimes two hundred in number: and towards the latter end of Queen Mary they much increased. They had also divers ministers first Mr Scamler, then Mr Foule, then Mr Rough, then Mr Bernher, and lastly Mr Bentham, who in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was made bishop of Coventry and Lichfield. This Mr Bentham escaped wonderfully, when the last seven martyrs (mentioned before) were burned in Smithfield: the occasion and manner was this; when these prisoners were brought forth of Newgate, a proclamation was made, in the king and queen's name, straitly commanding that none should pray for them nor speak to them, nor once say, God help them; notwithstanding which, this godly company resolved to go to, and comfort the prisoners; and accordingly, as they were guarded with bills and glaves, they press'd towards them and forcing their guard from them, they embraced and kiss'd them, carrying them in their arms (whereas they might as easily have conveyed them away) to the place where they were to suffer. Then giving way to the officers, these martyrs were led to the stake, and the forementioned proclamation was again published, notwithstanding which Mr Bentham inflamed with zeal and Christian charity, when he was set to them turning to the people, with a loud voice said, 'We know that these are the people of God, and therefore we cannot chuse but wish well to them, and pray to God to strengthen them;' and so turning to them, he prayed to Almighty God to strengthen them. whereupon all the people, with one consent, said, Amen; which did so confound the officers, that they knew not whom to accuse, or whom to apprehend.

Not long before Queen Mary's death, the city of Calais in France which had been two hundred and eleven years in the possession of the English, was taken by the bloody duke of Guise, who put multitudes of persons of all ages and sexes to the sword. At which time there were many godly persons in that town; and the Lord, whose wakeful eyes of providence do continually watch over his so ordered, that few or none at all of those that favoured Christ and his gospel, in that terrible massacre miscarried: and, amongst others that escaped after a wonderful manner, there was one John Thorpe, and his wife, a godly couple, who, lying sick at that time, were cast out into the fields, in a hopeless and helpless condition also, a young infant that sucked upon the mother, was taken in the fields and born away by the soldiers; yet, behold the admirable providence of God! they were by strangers fetched to a place almost a mile off; and, being recovered the next day, as they travelled towards England, they chanced into the same inn, where they found their young child, and so came all over in safety.

In the second year of Queen Mary, there was one Edward Bennet, dwelling at Queenhithe, who was desired to carry a New Testament to a godly man that was prisoner in Newgate; but as he went in, the keeper discovered it, and thereupon carried him before Chomley the recorder, who, after examination, committed him to the Compter in Woodstreet, where he continued twenty five weeks. Then Dr Story coming to examine other prisoners, Bennet, looking out at a grate, desired him to be good to him, and to help him out of prison: 'Yea, said Story, thou hast been with me before, and dost not believe in the sacrament, and therefore I will help thee out;' and so he took him, and delivered him to Cluny, to be put into the bishop's coal house, and there he lay in the stocks for a week.

Then Bonner sent for him, and examined him, and finding him constant in the truth, sent him back again, saying, that shortly he should go to Fulham and be whipt. Afterwards they sent Dr Cranmer's recantation to him, hoping thereby to draw him to recant; but he answered, that his faith was not founded on any man's books, but upon his that had redeemed him.

Two or three days after, he, with five more, were sent for to come to the bishop's chappel to mass; at the end whereof those five were returned to prison, and afterwards burned: but Bennet being behind, and walking towards the gate, the porter opened it for company to go out; and so Bennet going out amongst them, escaped.

Afterwards, he being amongst those that were apprehended at Iſlington. Bennet with ſeven more was left behind; yet he went after the reſt to the biſhop's houſe, and knocked at the gate to come in: the porter ſaid that he was none of the company; 'Yes, ſaid he, but I am.' and knocked again: but the porter not opening the door one of the congregation that ſtood by ſaid, 'Edward thou haſt done well; do not tempt God; go thy way.' And to he, taking this warning as ſent of God, departed, and thereby eſcaped the danger.

There was in the town of Shakerley, in Lancaſhire one Jeffery Hurſt, who by his father was bound apprentice to a ſailor; and when he came out of his time, having a great mind to get knowledge, he learned to read and write, and afterwards got him a bible, and other good books, whereby he attained a good meaſure of knowledge in the ſcriptures. Then he married the ſiſter of Mr George Marſh, of whoſe martyrdom we have heard before, by whoſe ſociety he much bettered his knowledge, and was careful to walk anſwerable thereunto. But in the firſt year of Queen Mary, he abſtaining from their idolatrous ſervices, was taken notice of, and often reproached for a lollard and heretic; and at laſt they lay in wait to apprehend him, which he having notice of, was compelled to leave wife, child and all, and to fly into Yorkſhire: yet divers times he returned by night to viſit and comfort his wife, and uſually brought with him ſome good miniſter or other; at which time, about twenty honeſt perſons uſed to repair to his houſe, and ſo they ſpent the night in prayer, preaching, and ſometimes adminiſtering the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper; and ſo away before the day brake leſt he ſhould be diſcovered.

Not far from his houſe there dwelt one Juſtice Leland, who having notice one time of J Hurſt's coming home, took a prieſt and ſome others with him, to ſearch his houſe for him; but it pleaſed God that J. Hurſt had notice of their coming, and ſo hid all his books in a great tub and then crept himſelf under it, and they covered him with ſtraw; only in his chamber window he willingly left a part of the Bible, and Tindal's New Teſtament in Engliſh and another book or two. When the juſtice and his company came into the houſe, they made a diligent ſearch for him and his books, breaking open his cheſts and boxes &c. At laſt they found theſe books in his chamber window; then the juſtice aſked the prieſt what books they were? he told him that one was Tindal's Teſtament, which was plain hereſy, and none worſe than it: and for the other books they were not fit to be looked on, for they might do much harm. Then the juſtice aſked his mother (an aged woman of about ſixty) and one of his brothers, where Jeffery was? They anſwered, they could not tell. Then he ſwore by God's body he would have him, and if his mother would not tell where he was, he would lay her in Lancaſter dungeon.

But to be brief, he bound the mother and brother in an hundred pound bond, to bring in Jefferey within fourteen days, and ſo departed.

When the time came, Jefferey and his ſiſter went to the juſtice, who cauſed a maſs to be ſung, and bad Jefferey firſt to go and ſee his Maker, and then he would talk further with him: Jefferey anſwered, 'Sir, my Maker is in heaven; and ſure I am that by going to your maſs I ſhall get no edification; and therefore pray you have me excuſed.' The juſtice replied, by God, I ſhall find you an heretic, but I will not loſe the maſs for all your prating; and ſo he went into the chappel. When maſs was ended, he ſent for them, and cauſed his prieſt to read a long ſcroll unto them about the ſeven ſacraments: after which the juſtice threatened them; yet at length he ſuffered them to depart, putting in ſureties to appear again at three weeks end, and then to go to Lancaſter jail. But it pleaſed God that four days before the time appointed, news came down of the queen's death, whereby they eſcaped.

Not long after this, Juſtice Leland, ſitting in his chair, and talking with his friends, fell down ſuddenly, and died, never ſo much as once ſtirring after.

There was living in Kent one Thomas Wood, a baker, who being convented before Dr Kennel chancellor, Dr Chadſey, and ſome others; at his appearance they aſked him why he came not to church, and whether he had received the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar? he anſwered, that he had not, neither durſt receive it as they adminiſtered it.

Kenall. 'Thou heretic, what's the reaſon that thou daſt not receive it?'

Wood. 'There are three cauſes why I dare not do it: 1. Becauſe ye eat and drink up all alone; whereas Chriſt ſaith, 'Eat ye; drink ye all of this,' &c. 2. Becauſe ye hold it up to be worſhipped, contrary to God's command, 'Thou ſhalt not bow down nor worſhip.' 3. Becauſe ye adminiſter it in a ſtrange tongue, contrary to St Paul's rule.'

Kenall. 'Thou heretic, are not theſe words plain enough, 'This is my body?' wilt thou deny the ſcripture?'

Wood. 'I will not deny the ſcripture; God forbid; Chriſt ſaith, 'I am the Vine; I am the Door; the Rock is Chriſt:' all which are figurative ſpeeches, wherein one thing is ſpoken, and another thing is underſtood.'

Kenall. 'Theſe heretics will not learn: art thou wiſer than the queen and her counſel, and all learned men of the realm?'

Wood. 'St Paul ſaith, The wiſdom of the wiſe of this world is fooliſhneſs before God:' and, 'If a man will be wiſe, he muſt become a fool that he may be wiſe.'

Kenall. 'Doſt not thou believe, that after the prieſt hath ſpoken theſe words, 'This is my body,' that there remains no more bread and wine, but the very fleſh and blood of Chriſt, as he was born of the Virgin, and did hang upon the croſs.'

Wood. 'I pray you, Mr Chancellor, give me leave to aſk you another queſtion: when God commanded Ezekiel to ſhave off his hair, and to burn a third part in the fire, and this, ſaith he, is Jeruſalem? I pray you, was it hair that was burnt, or Jeruſalem?'

Kenall. 'It did ſignify Jeruſalem.'

Wood. 'Even ſo the words of Chriſt, 'This is my body,' are to be underſtood &c.

Chadſey. 'I will prove that Chriſt is here preſent under the form of bread and wine, but not in quantity and quality.'

Kenall. 'Yes, here preſent in quantity and quality.'

Chadſey. 'He is here preſent under a form, but not in quantity and quality.' Yes, ſaid the one; No, ſaid the other. Whereupon the contention grew ſo hot between the doctors, that they foamed again: and Dr Kenall, in a great rage, roſe up and departed the church.

Then ſaid Wood, 'Behold, good people, they would have us to believe that which they do not believe themſelves, nor can agree upon. This cauſed all the people to give a great ſhout; and thus, as God delivered Paul by dividing his judges, the phariſees and ſadducees, between themſelves, ſo he delivered this his ſervant by dividing theſe doctors between themſelves.

Mr Thomas Horton, a godly miniſter in the reign of Queen Mary, flying, amongſt many others, beyond ſea, made it a great part of his work to travel between Germany and England, to procure means for the relief of the poor exiles which lived in baniſhment for the truth's ſake: and one time, as he paſſed between Maſtrick and Cullen, he fell into the hands of ſome rovers, who led him away with them; but being in great danger, the Lord was pleaſed wonderouſly to deliver him out of the hands of theſe bloody villains, whoſe name be praiſed for the ſame.

There was one Thomas Sprat, ſometime a ſervant to Mr Brent, a juſtice in Kent, who becauſe his maſter was a cruel perſecutor of the truth, left his ſervice, and went to Calice, from whence he often uſed to come into England, together with one William Porrege, about their neceſſary affairs; and about the fourth year of the reign of Queen Mary it fell out, that they landing at Dover, were travelling on foot towards Sandwich; and as they were upon the way, they met with Mr Brent, and the two Blachendens, with their ſervants, being ten or twelve horſemen; and though Thomas Sprat eſpying Mr Brent, was much diſmaid, ſaying to his friend, 'Yonder is Mr Brent, the Lord deliver us out of his hands; but ſeeing there is no remedy, let us go forwards:' and ſo ſhadowing his face with his cloak, they went on. Mr Brent hear-

ed them not; but one of his servants looking better upon them, said to his master, Yonder goes Thomas Sprat: at which words they all stopped their horses, and called to Thomas Sprat to come to them. 'They call you, said W. Porrege, and therefore there is no remedy but we must be taken;' and thereupon persuaded him to go to them, for that there was no means of escaping, themselves being on foot upon those plain downs, and the other on horse back; yet Sprat would not go: whereupon they called him again, and Mr Brent said, 'Ah sirrah, why come you not when you are called?' his companion likewise still moved him to go, seeing there was no way for him to fly away: No, said Sprat, I will not go to them; and with-al ran away. They seeing that, set spurs to their horses, and rode after him; but before they overtook him, he gat to an hedge, and made shift to scramble through it; yet they were so near him, that they struck at him with their swords: then they rode to the end of the hedge, and so pursued him; but before they came to him, he was gotten to a steep hill, which they could not ride down; and so getting to a wood, he escaped, notwithstanding all their diligence.

Then did two of them question with William Porrege, asking him whence he came, and how he came into Sprat's company? he answered, that they came from Calais, and happened into the same passage-boat, and that they were going to Sandwich; and so without any more ado let him depart; wherein God's goodness did also marvelously appear, for that one of the Blachenden's knew this Porrege, but as God would have it, he was following the chace of Sprat, till the other had dismissed him: and thus the Lord wonderfully delivered these his servants from this danger.

There was also one John Cornet, apprentice to a minstrel at Colchester, who being sent to a wedding in a town called Roughedge, at the request of some, sang a song against the mass, and misproceedings of the queen, for which he was accused by a priest, and first imprisoned by the constable, and afterwards sent to the earl of Oxford, who caused him to be put into irons and chains, and to be so manacled, that the blood sprang out at his finger-ends. In this case his master forsook him; and his mother, instead of relieving, fell a cursing of him; yet it pleased God so to order it, that the earl, instead of sending him to bishop Bonner, as his manner was, who would certainly have burned him, commanded him to be sent back to Roughedge, and there to be whipped till blood followed, and so to be banished the town for ever, which was done accordingly, and thereby he escaped further danger.

There was also one Thomas Brice, who being in the house of John Scale, in the town of Hortin-g, the bailiff, with some others, came into the house to search for him; and though they knew his stature, and what apparrel he wore, yet the Lord so blinded them, that when he stood before them, and they asked for him, yet they knew him not; and he, before their faces, quietly took up his bag of books and departed, and they had no power to lay hands on him.

And at another time, he, with one Springfield, being in an house in Gravesend, a promoter dogged them thither, and had so beset the house, and all the way to the water side, that it had been impossible for them to escape, but that the Lord stirred up an hostler in the same house to convey them by a back and private way to the water side, a mile off the town; by which means, thro' God's gracious protection, they were delivered.

CHAP. LXIV.

The great troubles, and wonderful deliverance of the Lady Katharine, dutchess dowager of Suffolk: who was the only daughter and heir to the Lord William, baron of Willoughby and Eresby, and the last wife of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk.

IN the first year of Queen Mary's reign, Steven Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, knowing this good dutchess to be no friend of his, intended first to work his revenge upon her husband, Richard Berty, Esq; for whom he sent an attachment by the sheriff of Lincolnshire, whom he straitly charged immediately to attach the said Richard, and without taking bail, to bring him up to London. Mr Berty having a clear conscience, and not knowing wherein he had offended the queen, could not conjecture what should be the cause of this strange process, except it were some quarrel for religion. Yet the sheriff out of respect to him, notwithstanding the strait charge adventured to take bond of him for his appearing before the bishop on Good Friday following. And accordingly Mr Berty, at the time appointed made his appearance at Winchester house in Southwark which the bishop being informed of, came forth in a great rage to him, asking him how he durst so arrogantly set light by two former processes of the queen's? Mr Berty answered that he now perceived that whereas he thought it before great extremity to be attached at the first, having shewed no contumacy: yet now he gathered by his lordship's words, that he had formerly sent some ordinary processes for him which yet never came to his hands.

Winchester. 'Yea marry, I have sent two sub pœna's, and that by no worse a man than by Mr Solicitor, which I know came to your hands, and therefore I will make you an example to all others for your obstinacy.

Berty. 'I never received any, and therefore I humbly desire your lordship to suspend your displeasure, and the punishment, till you know the truth, and then if I have deserved it, I refuse not double punishment.

Winchester. 'Well, I have set this day apart for devotion, according to the holiness of it, and therefore I enjoyn you in a thousand pound bond, not to depart without leave, and to appear again to morrow by seven o'clock.

Accordingly Mr Berty appeared at the time appointed; whereupon the bishop said to him, 'It is the queen's pleasure that you shall presently pay four thousand due to her father, from Dr Charles, late husband to your dutches, whose executrix she was.

Berty. 'If it please your lordship, that debt is estalled, and according thereto truly answered.

Winchester. 'Tush, the queen will not be put off with estalments in the time of Kett's government (so in scorn he called the governmet of king Edward.)

Berty. 'The estallment was appointed by king Henry the VIII. and by special commissioners confirmed by king Edward, which the lord treasurer, being another executor, undertook to discharge.

Winchester. 'If that be true, I will shew you favour; but Mr Berty, I must admonish you of another thing, because I mean you well; I hear ill of your religion; and pray you is your lady now as forward to set up mass, as she was lately to pull it down, when she caused a dog in a rochet to be carried with her, which she called by my name? Or doth she now think her lambs as safe as she did when she saw me vail my bonnet to her out of my window in the tower; at which time she said, that it was merry with the lambs, when the wolf was shut up. And at another time when my lord her husband invited me amongst other lords to dinner, desiring every lady to chose him whom she liked best, and so place themselves together; your lady taking me by the hand, said, that seeing she might not sit by her husband whom she liked best, she had chosen me whom she loved worst.

Berty. 'My lord, of the device of the dog she was neither the author, nor allower: for her words she can answer herself; and for the mass, she hath from learned men be taught to abhor it, and therefore if she should outwardly allow it, she should be a false Christian to Christ, and a masquing subject to her prince. You knew my lord, one judgment reformed, is better than a thousand transformed temporizers.

Winchester. 'Yea marry, deliberation is good, if she were to come from an old religion to a new; but she is to return from a new one to an old one; when I was her ghostly father, she was as earnest a papist as any.

Berty. 'To this, my lord she told a friend lately, that religion went not by age, but by truth, and therefore she was to be turned by argument, not by compulsion.

Winchester. 'Pray you, do you think it possible to persuade her?

Berty.

Berty. 'I trust you shall find no fruits of infidelity in her.'

Then did the bishop persuade Mr Berty to take pains in her conversion promising him large favours thereupon, and so dismissed him.

When Mr Berty was returned home, he and his dutchess had frequent informations from their friends, that the bishop intended to call her to an account for her faith, and therefore they devised how by the queen's license, they might go beyond sea, for which they had good occasion, there being great sums of money due to Dr Charles from the emperor, and divers others. And therefore in pursuance thereof, Mr Berty made such friends to the queen that he obtained her license to pass and repass at his pleasure. And accordingly in the first year of queen Mary's reign, he went beyond sea, leaving his dutchess behind him, who yet by agreement betixt them, followed ere long; the manner whereof followeth.

She dwelt at this time in her house called the Barbican; and when she was to go, she acquainted none of her servants with it, but one old gentleman; neither did she take any but the meanest of her servants with her, fearing lest the best would not run so dangerous an adventure She took also her young daughter, being but a year old.

As she departed from her house between four and five o'clock in the morning, an herauld that lay in her house, hearing some noise, rose up, and with a toren in his hand came down, so that she fearing to be discovered, was forced to leave most of her child's necessaries behind her, and commanded her servants to haste away to the Lion Key taking with herself only two women, and her child. She was no sooner out of doors, but the herauld followed; whereupon she stepped into the Charterhouse gate, that he could not see her; yet the herauld finding the bundle of her child's cloaths, fell to ransacking of them, and she in the mean time hasted away, knowing the place only by name where she should take boat. Her servants also having divided themselves, none but one of them knew the way thither. Thus she, attired in a mean habit, and they that were with her, took their way into Finsbury fields: where, by the especial providence of God near Moorgate, she and all her company met together: and so they went directly to Lion Key. There a barge was ready for her, but the morning was so extream misty that the stearsman feared to adventure out, but that they urged him thereunto.

Not long after, the council was informed of her departure, whereupon some of them came presently to her house to search out the manner of her escape, and to inventory her goods: and withal they appointed searchers to apprehend and stay her: so that the fame of her departure was at Leigh, a town at the land's end, before she got thither.

When she arrived there, the old gentleman before spoken of, had her privately to a merchant's house, near Leigh, naming her mistress White, there she stayed till she had made some new provision for her child in the room of that left behind her at the Barbican.

When the time came that she was to take ship, she was again almost discovered: but through God's merciful providence, escaped that danger also: and being twice carried into the seas, almost within the sight of Zealand, by contrary winds, was both times driven back to the place whence she came; and at her last return, the searchers suspecting that she might be in that ship, examined her servant that came to provide some fresh victuals, who framed his tale in such a simple manner of a mean merchant's wife that was a shipboard, that they ceased to search any further: and so at last, through God's merciful providence, she arrived safely in Barbant, where she met with her husband, who apparelled her and her women like the Netherlandish frowns, and so they travelled together towards Cleveland: and coming to Santon, they took a house therein to shroud themselves, till they had resolved whither to retire for their further safety.

About five miles from this place, was Wesell, an hanse town in the duke of Cleves dominion, to which place many Walloons were fled for religion, and had for their minister, one Francis de Rivers, who having formerly been in England, had received some courtesies from this good dutchess: him therefore did Mr Berty make use of to obtain leave of the magistrates for their private living there: but ere this could be effected, there was a muttering in Santon, that they were greater personages then they gave themselves out to be; so that the bishop and magistrates resolved together, suddenly to apprehend and examine them, both of their condition and religion; but God's wakeful eye of providence stirred up a gentleman of Santon to give Mr Berty secret notice of this their purpose; whereupon taking only his wife, child, and two women, he walked about three o'clock in the afternoon in the month of February, as it were but to take the air, purposing that night to get to Wesell; and the better to conceal his intention, they went on foot, and left the rest of their family at Santon.

They had not gone above an English mile, before there fell a mighty rain, which dissolved the frost and ice, and so made the ways deep and slippery, which proved extream tedious to these new lacquies, never before accustomed to such walks; and so their march being but slow, they were overtaken by the night, which caused them to send their women to some villages which they passed by, to hire them a cart to ride in for the ease of their wearied limbs, but none could be gotten, so that in the mean time Mr Berty was forced to carry the child, and the dutchess his cloak and rapier.

At last near seven o'clock in the dark night they came to Wesell, seeking, after such a tedious journey to repose and refresh their wearied limbs in an inn. But going from inn to inn, through the whole town, they all refused to entertain them, though they profered large money for the same: the inholders suspecting Mr Berty to be a Lanceknight, and the dutches to be his trull. In the mean time the poor babe cried bitterly: the dutchess wept as fast, the weather was extream cold, and the heavens rained as fast as the clouds could pour.

Mr Berty destitute of all worldly succour and relief for him and his, in this their deplorable condition, resolved to have his dutchess, with her infant, into the porch of the great church, and so to buy some coals, food and straw for their repose that night, or at least till he could procure some better lodging.

Mr Berty at this time could speak little Dutch and could meet with none that could speak either English, French, Italian or Latin, till at length passing towards the church porch, he heard two boys talking in Latin together: whereupon stepping to them he promised them two stivers to bring him to a Waloon's house; and so, through God's goodness, he at last happened upon the house where monsieur de Rivers supped that night, who had procured the protection of the magistrates for them.

At the first knocking the good man of the house came to the door, asking Mr Berty what he was? He told him that he was an English gentleman, that desired to be brought to monsieur de Rivers his house: the man wished him to stay a while, and so going back to his guests, told monsieur de Rivers that he thought that the English gentleman, whom a little before he was speaking of, had sent his man to speak with him: monsieur de Rivers going to the door, and seeing Mr Berty, his dutchess and infant in that lamentable case with rain, mire and dirt, and in apparel so unlike to that which he had formerly seen them in England, was so overwhelmed with sorrow and tears, that for a good while he could neither speak to them, nor they to him: yet at last they saluted each other, and he brought them into the house, into which they entred, God knows, full joyfully. Mr Berty changing his apparel with the good man of the house, the dutches with his wife, and their infant with the child of the house.

A few days after monsieur de Rivers helped them to hire a fair house in the town, where discovering themselves more freely, they lived in such a good fashion as their present condition would afford The discourtesy which the inn keepers had shewed them at their first coming to town was presently spoken of all abroad, insomuch as a godly minister, the Sabbath following openly reproved their incivility towards strangers, shewing, that not only princes sometimes are entertained in the habit of private vate perſons, but angels alſo in the ſhape of men, &c. Whilſt they thus paſſed the time in ſome content after their tedious travels, hoping that they had found a reſting place, they had private notice give them by Sir. John Maſon, queen Mary's embaſſador in the Netherlands, that a deſign was laid for their apprehenſion, and carrying back into England, by the lord Paget; and the plot was this, the duke of Brunſwick being to paſs by that city with ten companies of ſoldiers to aſſiſt the houſe of Auſtria againſt the king of France, was ſuddenly to apprehend and carry them away from Weſell. Mr Berty being informed of this, was fain preſently to take his dutches and his child, and to fly into the Palatinate, where he found protection in Winebeim, till the means which he brought with him out of England was almoſt ſpent, and they began to faint under their heavy burdens, being almoſt out of heart and hope in this their diſtreſſed condition. At which time it pleaſed God wonderfully to provide for them by a way and means that they never dreamed of.

In the firſt part of my marrow of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, you may in the life of John a Laſco, read, that he being driven out of England in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, after many troubles and adventures, returned into Poland, his native country, where he found great favour with the king; and underſtanding the condition of Mr Berty and his dutches, whom he had known in England, he made report thereof to the king of Poland, and the palatine of Vilna, who preſently wrote to them to come into Poland, offering them great kindneſs if they would accept of their invitation. Yet conſidering that hereby they ſhould remove further from their native ſoil, and from all their acquaintance, into a far country; and at their arrival there, it might be, they ſhould not find their entertainment anſwerable to their toil and hazard in their journey; they knew not well what to do: whereupon they adviſed with Mr Barlow, ſometimes biſhop of Chicheſter, who was then in the palatinate, deſiring him to go before them to Poland, and by him they ſent letters to the king, and palatine of Vilna, returning them many thanks for their kind profers; by him they alſo preſented them with ſome jewels which were all the remainder of thoſe which they had brought out of England: deſiring the king under his broad ſeal, to aſſure them of that which by his letters he had ſo honourably profered to them.

Mr Barlow arriving ſafely with his letters, by the aſſiſtance of the palatine of Vilna, eaſily procured what they deſired. Whereupon the dutches, with her huſband and family began their journey towards Poland, in April anno Chriſti 1557.

By the way they met with many dangers: one was occaſioned by a captain of the Lantgrave's, who for a ſpaniel of Mr Bertye's, quarreled with them and with his horſemen fet upon them by the way, thruſting their bore-ſpears through the wagon, wherein the women and children were, yet through God's mercy, none of them were hurt. Mr Berty had only four horſemen with him, and in the brabble the captain's horſe were ſlain under him Preſently a rumour was ſpread all over the country, that the Lantgrave's captain was ſlain, which exceedingly incenſed the common people againſt them, it being reported that they were Walloons which had done it. The dutches underſtanding the danger that they were in, perſuaded her huſband to leave them, and by the ſwiftneſs of his horſe to recover ſome town for his ſafety, till they came to him. Mr Berry attempting this, was eagerly purſued by the countrymen; and the captain's brother, who thought, that according to the report, the captain had been ſlain indeed; and in the purſuit they came ſo near unto him, that he had certainly been murdered, but that, as God would have it, ſpying a ladder that leaned againſt a window, he left his horſe, and ran up the ladder, whereby he got into a cock loft on the top of the houſe, where, with his rapier and dagger, he defended himſelf for a ſpace: and it pleaſed God that the burgomaſter, and another magiſtrate that could ſpeak Latin came to the houſe, and perſuaded him to ſubmit himſelf to the order of the law. Mr Berty knowing himſelf to be clear, and the captain to be alive, was content to yield himſelf to them upon condition that the magiſtrate would promiſe him ſafety, and to protect him from the rude multitude: this the magiſtrate promiſed, whereupon he delivered up his weapons and himſelf into his hands, and was committed to ſafe cuſtody till the truth of his cauſe ſhould be tried.

Then did Mr Berty preſently write to the Lantgrave, and to the earl of Erbagh, declaring his caſe unto them. The next morning the earl of Erbagh came to the town, whither the dutches alſo with her waggon was now come. The earl having heard of the dutcheſs before, went to her, and carried himſelf with much civility and reſpect towards her: whereupon the townſ-men ſeeing how ſubmiſſively the earl behaved himſelf, and by this time underſtanding the captain to be alive, both they and the other authors of that ſtir began to ſhrink away, making all the friends they could to Mr Berty and the dutches, that they would not report their doings after the worſt ſort. And thus, thro' God's merciful providence, eſcaping this great danger, they proceeded on in their journey, and through the ſame good hand of providence arrived at laſt in ſafety in Poland, where, by the king they were entertained with all curteſy and humanity; and the king alſo placed them ſafely and honourably in the earldom of Crozan, in which place they had abſolute power of government, the ſame which the king himſelf formerly had, ſo that it proved to them as a quiet haven after a tempeſtuous ſea, and there they lived with much honour and comfort till the death of queen Mary.

CHAP. LXV.

The troubles of many of thoſe which fled for Religion in Queen Mary's days beyond the Seas, eſpecially at Frankford.

MANY godly perſons, miniſters, and others, ſeeing the change of religion by queen Mary, and the ſtorm of perſecution ariſing, that they might reſerve themſelves for better times, fled beyond ſea, and June 27. 1554 Edmund Sutton, William Williams, William Whittingham, and Thomas Wood, with their companies, arrived at Frankford, which were the firſt Engliſhmen that deſired to make there abode their.

The ſame night of their arrival came to them Mr Valeran Pullen, one of the miniſters of the French church, and told them that he had obtained of the magiſtrates a church for all ſuch as ſhould come out of England for the goſpel's ſake, eſpecially from Glaſtenbury, who were Frenchmen. To which they anſwered, That they had great cauſe to praiſe God who had ſtirred up the hearts of the magiſtrates to ſhew ſuch favour to the French; but ſeeing few of them who were already, or ſhould hereafter come from England, underſtood the French tongue, it would not be convenient for them to join themſelves to that church.

Hereupon the next day the conferred with Mr Morellio, another miniſter of the French church, and with Mr Caſtalio, an elder of the ſame, both of them godly and learned men, by whoſe advice they concluded that a ſupplication ſhould be drawn up and preſented to the magiſtrates to know whether they would ſuffer, both ſuch as were already come, and ſuch others as might repair thither from England, to remain ſafely within their city. This ſupplication was ſubſcribed by Mr Sutton, Mr Whittingham, and the reſt of the Engliſh; as alſo by Mr Morellio, Caſtalio, and one Adrian a citizen, with whom they lodged.

The magiſtrates granted this requeſt: whereupon July 8. by the advice of Morellio and Caſtalio, who ſhewed themſelves fathers to all Engliſh men ſo long as they lived, addreſs was made to Mr John Glawberge, one of the chief ſenators, for a place or church, where they and all other their countrymen, might have God's word truly preached, and the ſacraments ſincerely adminiſtred in the Engliſh tongue. He promiſed them kindly his furtherance, and accordingly moved it to the whole ſenate, and July 24. it was granted that they ſhould have liberty to preach and adminiſter the ſacraments in the church, which the Frenchmen had, each other day in the week, and upon Sabbath days at different hours: but withal it was required that the Engliſh ſhould agree with the French in doctrine and ceremonies, that ſo they might give no offence to them. They were alſo required to approve and ſubſcribe the ſame confeſſion of faith, which the French men had then preſented, ſented, and were about to publiſh in print, which was accordingly done by all the aforenamed, and by ſome others which by this time were come to them.

Thus far God's mercy did greatly appear to them. But Satan envying their peace and welfare, when they had withdrawn themſelves from the reach of their common enemies the papiſts, ſhortly after he ſet them at diſcord amongſt themſelves, raiſing up a perſecution where they leaſt expected it, as in the proceſs of the ſtory you ſhall find.

Theſe holy men having obtained ſo much favour of the magiſtrates, began to conſult what form of ſervice they ſhould uſe: for (it was told them) that they were not bound ſo ſtrictly to the French ceremonies, but if one allowed of the other, it was ſufficient.

Hereupon the Engliſh Service Book was peruſed, and by generall conſent it was concluded, That anſwering the miniſter aloud, the Litany, Surplice, and many other things ſhould be omitted, becauſe they might prove ſcandalous to thoſe reformed churches.

It was further agreed, That the miniſter, inſtead of the Engliſh confeſſion, ſhould uſe another form more ſuitable to that ſtate and time, after which a pſalm was to be ſung; and then the miniſter, after prayer to proceed to his ſermon, at the end whereof a form of prayer was preſcribed for all eſtates, and in particular for England, which was to be concluded with the Lord's prayer; and then the miniſter was to rehearſe the articles of the faith, and ſo to diſmiſs the people with a bleſſing.

It was alſo concluded that ſundry things ſhould be omitted in the adminiſtration of the ſacraments. All which being agreed on, they proceeded to chooſe the miniſter and deacons, and ſo entered their church. July 29.

Then they thought good forthwith to advertiſe their brethren, and countrymen diſperſed, of this ſingular mercy of God to them, the like whereof could not as yet be obtained in any other place, and to deſire them, that laying aſide worldly reſpects, they would repair thither, that they might altogether with one heart and mouth, lament and bewail their former ſins; and alſo to give thanks to their heavenly Father, who had given them ſuch a church in a ſtrange land: theſe letters were ſent to Straſborough, Zurick, Desburg and Embden, Aug. 2.

Alſo becauſe they conceived that the church could not long continue in good order, without diſcipline, there was a form of government drawn up, and agreed on, unto which all that were preſent ſubſcribed.

Shortly after the Engliſh at Strasborough returned this anſwer, that they had conſidered the contents of their letter, and perceived that the principal effect was, that they might have one or two ſent them to take the chief charge of their church; for which end they might get Dr Poinet, Dr Cox, Dr Bale, or Mr Scory, or any two of them; and if they diſliked this, they would appoint one from Stratsborough, and another from Zurick, to come to them. Mr Grindall alſo at the ſame time wrote to Mr Scory at Embden, perſuading him to be the ſuperintendent of that church at Frankford, who in two ſeveral letters to his private friends, profered his ſervice to that congregation. But before the receipt of his letters, the church had written to Mr Knox at Geneva, to Mr Haddon at Straſborough, and to Mr Lever at Zurick, whom they elected for their miniſters, and advertiſed Mr Scory by a general letter of the ſame.

Sept. 16. Theſe of Frankford wrote again to the Engliſh at Zurick, in this form. 'Grace, mercy and peace; after long expectation of your anſwer to our letter, we thought fit once more to put you in remembrance, and as formerly, ſo now again we earneſtly require on God's behalf, that you would ſeriouſly weigh and conſider this call of God, and the neceſſity of this congregation: we have throughly learned your eſtate, and alſo made you acquainted with ours; and we heartily wiſh that we might together bewail our ſins, pray for our brethren who are under the tyranny of antichriſt; and to inſtruct and edify one another. Finally to ſpend the time of our perſecution together, and to redeem theſe days which are ſo evil. If you ſtay there for the improvement of your learning, ſurely you might ſo benefit yourſelves here, that you ſhould have no cauſe to repent: you cannot here lack the ſociety of learned men, and for their works which are in print, you may here be abundantly furniſhed with them. But we need not, brethren, be large in reaſoning, for we know that God's ſpirit that worketh in your hearts, will prevail more with you than any arguments of ours; not doubting but the ſame Holy Spirit knocks at the door of your conſciences, not only to move you to hearken to our requeſt, but alſo to avoid the offence and ſcandal which will be given to our poor brethren in England, whoſe expectations cannot otherwiſe be ſatisfied. Remember, brethren, that we write as thoſe who altogether ſeek our Father's honour, the diſcharge of our duty, and the comfort of our afflicted countrymen. The ſame ſweet Father grant, for his mercy's ſake, that we may aſſemble together to promote the building of his temple, and to hinder falſe workmen and underminers; and diligently, in our ſeveral places, to endeavour to promote this work, till it come to perfection. Farewel in Chriſt. From Frankfort, Sept. 16. 1554.

To this letter, they that ſtudied at Zurick returned this anſwer:

'Being placed here in quietneſs, with many and great advantages to our ſtudies, we have by this our letter returned anſwer to your earneſt requeſt, which was, that to diſcharge our duty and conſcience, and to increaſe and inſtruct your congregation with our pains and preſence, we would remove from hence to you; urging it upon our conſciences, in regard of that great need which you have of us; and for the further encouragement of us, you have ſignified and aſſured us, that with you we may, and ſhall uſe the ſame order of ſervice in God's worſhip, as was laſt ſet forth by King Edward VI. Wherefore, for the better enabling us to underſtand your requeſt, and for the charitable performance of duty upon both parts, we have ſent unto you Mr Richard Chambers, our beſt friend, a charitable man, and one that is tenderly affected to the church of Chriſt; intreating him to travel to you, and with you for us, that this buſineſs moved by writing may be fully debated betwixt you; and we all agree to, and ſhall perform whatſoever he ſhall ſay and promiſe in our names to you. We beſeech you therefore, in the name of God, conſcientiouſly to conſider both your ſtate and ours: and if you ſhall conclude with the ſaid Mr Chambers for our coming to you, then let him not lack your charitable help in neceſſary proviſion for our continuance with you. Thus beſeeching God that your doings may tend to his glory, and the ſpeedy comfort of his afflicted church, we wiſh you all health, and increaſe of true knowledge in Chriſt our Lord and Saviour. From Zurick, Oct. 7. 1554.'

October 13. following, they wrote alſo another letter to the ſame purpoſe, concluding thus:

'Dear brethren, conſidering that we are not only all of one nation, but alſo members of the ſame myſtical body of Jeſus Chriſt our head; we ought therefore, eſpecially in this time of our exile, and worthily deſerved affliction, by all means poſſible to aid and comfort one another, beſeeching God, for his mercy's ſake, to aſſuage his wrath, to give us repenting hearts, to grant patience to our brethren in England, and mercifully to look down upon his vineyard that is miſerably ſpoiled and trodden under foot; and after theſe fatherly chaſtiſements, to return us to our native homes, and to enable us to work fruitfully in the ſame. If, upon the receipt of theſe our letters, you ſhall without cloak or forged pretence, only ſeeking Chriſt's honour, advertiſe us by your letters, that our being there is ſo needful as you have already ſignified, and that we may as freely and uprightly ſerve God (whereof private letters received from Frankfort make us much to doubt), as the order laſt taken in the church of England permitteth and preſcribeth, for we are fully reſolved to admit and uſe no other; then about Eaſter next, (for before we cannot) God proſpering us, and no juſt cauſe intervening, whereby our purpoſes may be diſappointed, with one conſent we agree to join ourſelves to you, and moſt willingly to perform ſuch ſervice there, as our poor condition and calling will permit. In the mean ſpace, we ſhall moſt entirely beſeech God ſo to aſſiſt you with his holy ſpirit, that your doings may may help to confound papistry, set forth God's glory, and shew such light in the face of the world, that both the wicked may be ashamed, having no just cause to reproach; and also our weak brethren confirmed and won to the truth. From Zurick, Oct. 13. 1554.'

Oct. 14. following, Mr Whitehead came to Frankfort, and by the request of the congregation, took the place upon him for a time, and preached upon the epistle to the Romans.

Not long before, Mr Chambers had conference with the church at Frankfort, in the behalf of the English students at Zurick, and saw that they could not assure him the full use of the English service book, without hazarding their church; whereupon he returned to Zurick whence he came: and about the same time, Mr Knox, coming from Geneva, was chosen their minister; and so the business rested for a while. Yet shortly after they wrote again to them at Zurick in this manner:

'We have recived two letters from you, one dated Oct. 13. sent us from Strasburg; the other of the 27th of the same, sent us by our dear friend Mr Chambers, and have conferred with him at large touching the contents thereof; and whenas, after divers assemblies, and long debates, Mr Chambers perceived that we could not in all points warrant the full use of the service book, which seemeth to be your full scope and aim, and also conscientiously weighing the great benefit offered to our whole nation in this city; he not only rejoiced greatly at the same, but also promised to travel with you, in persuading you to the furtherance thereof.

As touching the substance of the book, we desire the observation of it as much as you, so far as God's word commands: but for the unprofitable ceremonies, as well by his consent, as by ours, they are not to be used. And though they were tolerable, as some of them are not, yet being in a strange commonwealth, we could not be suffered to use them: and surely it were better that they should never be practised, than that they should prove the subversion of our church, which would be much hazarded by the use of them. If a larger door be opened there for the same, than to us, upon your persuasions, you shall find that we will not draw back; for this is very necessary, if we wish the comfort and gathering together of our dispersed brethren. If any think that the not using the book in all points will increase our godly fathers and brethrens bands in England, or will tend to the dishonour of the laws of our late sovereign of famous memory, King Edward VI. he seemeth little to weigh the matter, or else hindered by ignorance, knoweth not that even they themselves, upon consideration of circumstances have altered many things; and if God had not in these wicked days prevented, would have altered more: and we doubt not but in our case they would have done the like. These few lines touching our communication we have written to you, referring the rest to the prudence of our good friend Mr Chambers, who can testify that we have shewed ourselves conformable in all things which are in our power, and most desirous of your companies, as we formerly wrote to you. God's spirit move your hearts to do that which shall be most for his glory, and the comfort of your brethren. Frankfort, Nov. 15. 1554.

Nov. 23. the English at Strasburg wrote also these letters to the English at Frankfort.

'When we consider what inward comfort it would be for the faithful people of England, now dispersed for the gospel's sake, and wandering in strange countries, as sheep without shepherds, to be gathered together in one congregation, that with one heart, one mind and mouth, they might glorify God. We have always, and still do think it our duties, not only to desire, but also to labour the effecting of it: and now understanding the good will of the magistrates of Frankfort towards you, and others of our dispersed countrymen, who also have granted a church, wherein we with others may serve God; and not doubting of their further friendship in permiting us freely to use our religion, according to that godly order set forth and received in England. We do not only bless God for this great mercy, but also think it not fit to refuse so friendly an offer, or to let slip so good an occasion. Therefore not doubting their good furtherance, nor distrusting your good conformity and readiness in reducing the English church with you to the former perfection which it last had in England, so far as possibly it can be attained, lest by much altering the same, we should seem to condemn the chief authors thereof; who, as they now suffer, so are they ready to confirm that fact with the price of their blood; and should also give occasion to our adversaries to accuse our doctrine of imperfection, and us of mutability; and should cause many godly to doubt of that truth wherein they have formerly been persuaded; and to hinder their coming hither, which before they had purposed. For the avoiding of these, and obtaining the other, moved hereunto in conscience, and provoked by your gentle letters, we have thought fit to send over unto you our beloved brethren, the bringers hereof, to travel with the magistrates and you concerning the premises, whose wisdom, learning, and godly zeal, as they are known to you, so their doings in this business shall be fully approved of by us. And if they obtain that which we trust will not be denied at any hand, we intend God willing to be with you February the first next, there to help to set in order, and establish that church accordingly, and so long to remain with you as shall be necessary, or till just occasion shall call some of us away: and we doubt not but our brethren of Zurick, Embden, Duesborough, &c. will do the same, as we have requested them by our letters; hoping that you by yours will make the like request: farewel. Strasburg, Nov. 23. 1554.

This letter being read to the congregation, Mr Grindal declared the occasion of their coming, which was chiefly for establishing the English service book; not that they meant (as they said) to have it so strictly observed, but that such ceremonies and things which the country could not bear, might well be omitted, so that the substance and effect thereof might be retained.

Then Mr Knox and Mr Whittingham asked, what they meant by the substance of the book?

They answered, that they had no commission to dispute of those things, only they requested the congregation to answer these three queries.

1. What parts of the book they would admit?
2. Whether they would allow them a several church?
3. What assurance they might have for their quiet habitation?

To the first answer was made, That what they could prove to be consistent with the word of God, and the country could permit, that should be granted them.

For the second they answered, That they understood by the magistrates, that the time was unseasonable to move for such a thing, till the council brake up at Ausburg.

To the third they answered, That a general grant was made, at their first coming thither, to the whole English nation, and the freedom of the city was offered to all such as were desirous of it, in as ample a manner as they could require, which to them was sufficient.

They also by these messengers wrote back this letter to them at Strasburg.

'As it was ever most true, so at this time we find it fulfilled, fulfilled, that whereſoever God hath laid a foundation to build his glory upon, there he continues till he hath perfected his own work. All thanks and praiſe therefore be to him who hath ſo moved your hearts as not to neglect the furtherance of the ſame: and as the work is of great excellency, ſo the adverſaries neglect not craftily to undermine it, or at leaſt by falſe reports, and diſgracing the work begun, to diſcourage the labourers, which ſhould travel in the finiſhing of it. But truth ever cleareth itſelf; and as the ſun diſpels the clouds, ſo miſreports by trial are confounded. Our brethren ſent from you can teſtify our anſwers to the particulars of your letters, to whom we have agreed in all things which ſeemed expedient for the ſtate of this congregation. As for ſuch ceremonies, as the order of the country will not bear, we neceſſarily forbear; yet with as little alteration as may be poſſible, (according as you deſire in your letters) ſo that no adverſary can be ſo impudent, as either to blame our doctrine of imperfection, or us of inconſtancy, except he be wilfully ignorant, rather ſeeking how to find fault, than to amend things amiſs. Neither do we diſſent from them who are ſpending their bloods for the doctrine whereof they have made a moſt worthy confeſſion: and yet we think not, that any learned or godly man will ſtand in defence of thoſe ceremonies to death, which even the book confeſſeth may upon occaſions be altered and changed. And if the not full uſing of the book cauſe any godly perſon to doubt of the truth which they formerly embraced, or retard their coming hither, ſurely either they were not well inſtructed, who for the breach of a ceremony will neglect ſuch a ſingular benefit, or elſe things have been miſrepreſented to them by falſe brethren, who ſpare not every where to ſow ſome poor reaſons to hinder ſo worthy an enterpriſe. And whereas ye write, that the firſt of February next ye will come to help to ſet in order and eſtabliſh this church, as we willingly deſire it for your company's ſake, and that you might ſee our godly order here obſerved; ſo we cannot but ſignify, that if ye take ſuch a journey for the eſtabliſhing of ceremonies, it will tend more to your charges, than to any general profit, except ye reſolve to ſtay longer with us than two months, as you write to our countrymen at Denſborough and Embden, &c.

The reſt we refer to our brethren, Mr Chambers and Mr Grindall, who by their diligent enquiry have learned ſo much of our eſtate as we wrote unto you in our former letters; that is, that we have a church freely granted to preach God's word purely, and to adminiſter the ſacrament ſincerely, to execute diſcipline truly; and as for the book, we will practiſe it ſo far as God's word warranteth, and the ſtate of this country will permit. Farewel. Frankfort. Dec. 3.

Preſently after the receipt of this letter, the divines of Straſburg returned this anſwer:

'Grace, mercy, and peace; we have received your letter, and therewithal an anſwer to certain articles, by which we perceive, as alſo by the report of Mr Chambers and Mr Grindall, your eſtate; but ſeeing the time ſerves not for the preſent to move the magiſtrates for thoſe requeſts, the obtaining whereof was the principle cauſe of our ſending to you, we cannot agree to any general meeting at any cerain time, either to remain with you, or otherwiſe; but when you ſhall find the time convenient to move the magiſtrates for the quiet habitation for all comers, eſpecially for the ſtudents, and for a ſeparate church, wherein the book may be uſed, in ſuch a manner as no reaſonable man ſhall juſtly blame, and that we may have aſſurance thereof under the magiſtrates hands; upon this information we ſhall conſult what is farther to be done on our part, hoping that God will direct us ſo as may be moſt for his glory in the end, whatſoever may be judged of it for the preſent. Straſburg, Dec. 13. 1554.

Your loving friends, James Haddon, Edwin Sands, Edmund Grindal, &c.

Hereupon Mr Knox, Mr Whittingham, and others, tranſlated the Engliſh ſervice book into Latin, and ſent it to Mr Calvin at Geneva, requeſting his judgment thereupon, and declaring to him that ſome of their countrymen went about to force them to the uſe of it, and would admit no other, ſaying, That it was moſt abſolute, and that if ever they came into their own country, they would endeavour to eſtabliſh it there again.

Mr Calvin having peruſed it, returned this anſwer, 'I find in the Engliſh liturgy many tolerable follies, by which word I mean, that there is not that purity which is to be deſired: theſe things, though they could not at firſt be amended, yet ſeeing there was no manifeſt impiety in them, they were for a ſeaſon to be tolerated.' Theſe letters bore date from Geneva, Jan. 20. 1555.

Theſe letters being read in the congregation at Frankfort, many which before were for all the parts of the book, were wholly alienated from it. Whereupon it was concluded, that Mr Knox, Mr Whittingham, Mr Fox, and Mr Cole, ſhould draw forth ſome order fit for their ſtate and time, which being finiſhed, was tendred to the congregation, being the ſame with that uſed at Geneva: this was well liked by moſt, only ſuch as were for the Engliſh ſervice book could not abide it. Hereupon, Feb. 6. a liturgy was framed, part taken out of the Engliſh book, and other things added as the ſtate of the church required; which, by the conſent of the congregation was to be continued till the laſt of April following; and if any contention ſhould ariſe in the mean time, the matter was to be determined by theſe five notably learned men, viz. Calvin, Muſculus, P. Martyr, Bullinger, and Viret; which agreement being put in writing, all gave their conſents to it, and hereupon the holy ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper was comfortably adminiſtered.

This happy concord continued till March 13. following; at which time Dr Cox, and ſome others, coming out of England to Frankfort, began to break the order agreed upon; firſt, in anſwering aloud after the miniſter, contrary to the church's determination, ſaying, That they would do as they had done in England, and that they would have the face of an Engliſh church there. Yea, the Sabbath following, one of that company, without the conſent of the congregation, went up ſuddenly into the pulpit, and read the litany, Dr Cox and the reſt anſwering aloud, thereby breaking the order of that church. Hereupon Mr Knox began to preach in the afternoon, he having gone over ſo much in Geneſis, was come to the ſtory of Noah; and in the proceſs of his ſermon he ſaid, 'As ſome things ought to be kept ſecret, ſo ſuch things as tend to the diſhonour of God, and the diſturbance of his church, ought to be diſcloſed and openly rebuked; and ſo ſhewed, that, after long trouble and contention, a godly agreement was made amongſt them, which that very day had been very ungodly broken; which thing, ſaid he, became not the proudeſt of you all to have attempted: adding further, That as by the word of God we muſt ſeek our warrant for the eſtabliſhing of religion, without which warrant nothing ought to be obtruded upon Chriſtians; ſo ſeeing in the Engliſh book there are ſome things ſuperſtitious, impure, and imperfect, which I undertake to prove before all men, I will not therefore conſent that they ſhall be received of this church: and in caſe any will go about to burthen our free congregation therewith, ſo often as I come into this place, my text offering juſt occaſion, I will not fail to ſpeak againſt it. He alſo affirmed, that amongſt many other things which provoked God's anger againſt England, ſlackneſs in reforming religion when they had opportunity was one, and therefore now they ought to be the more circumſpect how they laid their foundation: and whereas ſome were not aſhamed to ſay, that reformation was perfected in England, he proved the contrary by the want of a good diſcipline, as appeared by the troubles which good Mr Hooper had ſuſtained in King Edward's time about the rochet, &c. As alſo, that ſome men were permitted to hold three, four, or five benefices, to the ſcandal of the goſpel, and to the ſtarving of many poor ſouls.

This ſpeech of his was much ſtomached by ſome, eſpecially ſuch as had been pluraliſts in England, who ſharply ly reproved him ſo ſoon as he came out of the pulpit: and the Tueſday following was appointed to ſpeak more fully about theſe buſineſſes: at which time doctor Cox and his company made earneſt requeſt to be admitted to have voices in the congregation: to this ſome anſwered, that this could not be granted, till the matters in controverſy betwixt them were firſt determined, and till they ſhould ſubſcribe to their diſcipline, as others had before them, &c.

But Mr Knox intreated that they might be ſatisfied in their requeſt, unto whom ſome others adhered, by which means they became the greater part, and ſo were admitted members of the church; which was no ſooner done, but Dr Cox forthwith forbade Mr Knox to meddle any more in that congregation.

Hereupon the next day Mr Whittingham went to Mr Jo. Glauburge (who had procured the church for them) and complained to him, that certain newly come out of England, had forbidden their miniſter, who was appointed to preach that day, and intended to ſet up an order, which, he doubted, would not be well taken; which he thought fit to acquaint him with, leaſt any inconvenience ſhould fall out.

Hereupon he preſently ſent and commanded that there ſhould be no ſermon that day; and ſending for monſieur Valeran, the French miniſter, commanded him that two learned men ſhould be appointed of either part; and that he and they ſhould conſult and agree upon ſome good order, and make report to him thereof accordingly. Upon this Dr Cox and Mr Lever of the one ſide, and Mr Knox and Mr Whittingham on the other ſide, were appointed to decide the controverſy, and Mr Valeran was appointed to ſet down in writing what they agreed upon: but when they came to ſpeak of the morning ſervice, and Dr Cox ſaid, 'I will have it thus,' they could not agree, and ſo brake off.

Then did the congregation draw up a ſupplication, preſenting it to Mr Glauburge, and intreating him that it might be conſidered of by the ſenators: the tenor whereof was this:

'Let it not moleſt you (moſt grave and worthy ſenators) that your affairs are interrupted with a few words. But leaſt we ſhould trouble you with prolixity, the matter briefly is this: when your great humanity had through the providence of God, granted us a church, we undertook forthwith (as became us) to conſult about orders, and to draw up a liturgy; and becauſe we found in the prolix and ceremonious book of England, many things, to ſpeak the leaſt of them, not ſo perfect; we thought fit to reduce it to the perfect rule of the ſcriptures, and to accommodate ourſelves to the example of the church wherein we live, and to which we have ſubſcribed. But when this proved offenſive to ſome of our countrymen (although the greateſt part agreed thereto) as declining from the decrees of our elders, we were for a few months put to no ſmall trouble: but at length when it could not be otherwiſe, for peace ſake, we gave place to them, and ſuffered them to pick out of their book the beſt things, upon this condition, that the ſame ſhould continue without alteration, at leaſt till the laſt of April, at which time, if any new contention ſhould ariſe, that then the whole matter ſhould be referred to theſe five worthy men, Calvin, Muſculus, Bullinger, Martyr, and Viret. What need many words? The condition was willingly accepted, and confirmed by both parties, which alſo was drawn up in writing; and thanks were given to God, with great joy, every one thinking that day to be the end of all diſcord; they alſo received the holy communion as the token and ſeal of their mutual agreement, which had been omitted for the ſpace of three months. Mr Valeran joined with us herein, and was a further of concord, and a witneſs of this our agreement. But now lately ſome of our countrymen came to us, who have endeavoured by all means to obtrude that large volume of ceremonies upon us, to break the covenant, and to overthrow the liberty of our church, granted by your benevolence; which alſo they enterpriſe under the name of your defence, abuſing the authority of your name to the ſatisfying of their luſts. We here omit many things that would make for our cauſe, and remit them to our brethren, by whom (moſt honourable ſenators) you may underſtand the cauſe of our contention, and ſo may know eaſily what to judge of the whole matter.

What manner of book this is for which they ſo earneſtly contend, you may conſider by the epiſtle which Calvin lately wrote to us, in which he hath ſignified his mind plainly, both of the book, and of the uprightneſs of our cauſe.

We could have pointed out to you the fooliſh and fond things of the book, but paſſing over others, we ſhall inſtance only in this one; within theſe three years aroſe a great conflict between the Engliſh biſhops, and the biſhop of Glouceſter [Mr Hooper] a man worthy of perpetual memory, whom we now hear to be burnt. This man being made biſhop by king Edward the VI. according to this book, there was obtruded upon him by other biſhops, a rochet, and a biſhop's robe; this man being learned, and having been long brought up in Germany, becauſe he refuſed thoſe proud things that are admired by fools, was caſt into priſon; and at length, being overcome by their importunity, he was compelled to his ſhame, to give place to their impudency, to the common grief and ſorrow of all godly minds.

But happily you will ſay, wherefore ſpeak we of theſe things which appertain not to us? Yea verily, we think it concerns you much, for if theſe men, armed with your authority, ſhall do what they liſt, this evil in time ſhall be eſtabliſhed by you, neither ſhall there be any end of this controverſy in England. But if it ſhall pleaſe your honours to moderate between us, that this whole matter may be referred to thoſe five men above mentioned, not we alone that are preſent, but all poſterity; yea our whole Engliſh nation, and all good men, to the perpetual memory of your names, ſhall be bound unto you for this great benefit. We might have enlarged this narration, for we want not other reaſons, but we fear that you would want time, by reaſon of your ſerious buſineſs; therefore we leave the reſt to the conſideration of your wiſdoms.

March 22 Mr Glauburge came to the Engliſh church, and ſhewed the congregation, that it was commanded by the magiſtrates (when by his means the church was granted) that they ſhould agree with the French church both in doctrine and ceremonies: and that they underſtood that their falling from that order had cauſed much contention amongſt them; therefore he ſtraitly charged and commanded, that from thenceforth they ſhould not diſſent from that order; for if they did, as he had opened the church doors for them, ſo he would ſhut them again, and that ſuch as would not aſſent thereto, ſhould not ſtay in that city; willing them preſently to conſult hereof, and give him an anſwer before he departed.

Hereupon Dr Cox ſpake to the congregation, ſaying, I have read the French order, and do think it good and godly in all points, and therefore deſire you to obey the magiſtrates commandment about it; upon which ſpeech the whole congregation aſſented, and a report was made thereof to Mr Glauburge by Dr Cox, Mr Lever, and Mr Whittingham before he departed. Dr Cox alſo requeſted him, that notwithſtanding their ill behaviour, he would be pleaſed to ſhew them his accuſtomed favour and goodneſs, which he moſt gently and lovingly promiſed.

At the next meeting of the congregation that order was put in practice to the comfort and rejoicing of the moſt part. Yet ſuch as would fain have had the Engliſh ſervice book, left not the matter thus. For ſeeing Mr Knox to be in great credit with the congregation, they endeavoured by a moſt cruel, barbarous and bloody practice to diſpatch him out of the way, that thereby they might attain their end of bringing in their ſervice book.

They had amongſt them a book of his, called, An Admonition to Chriſtians, written in Engliſh; wherein by occaſion he ſpake of the emperor, of Philip his ſon, and Mary queen of England. This they preſented to the magiſtrates; who, upon the receipt of it, ſent to Mr Whittingham, and aſked him what manner of man their miniſter Mr Knox was? He anſwered, that to his knowlege he was a learned, wiſe and godly man. Then ſaid one of the magiſtrates, ſome of your countrymen have accuſed him to us of high treaſon, againſt the emperor's majeſty, his ſon, and the queen of England: here is the book, and the places which they have turned down, the true and perfect ſenſe whereof, we command you (ſub pœna pacis) to bring to us in Latin at one o'clock in the afternoon.

This he did accordingly, at which time, having conferred amongſt themſelves, they commanded that Mr Knox ſhould preach no more, till their pleaſure were further known. The words concerning the emperor were theſe, ſpoken by him in the pulpit in a town in Buckinghamſhire, in the beginning of queen Mary's reign: 'O England, England, if thou wilt obſtinately return into Egypt; that is, if thou contract marriage, confederacy or league with ſuch princes as do maintain and advance idolatry, ſuch as the emperor, who is no leſs an enemy to Chriſt than was Nero; if for the pleaſure and friendſhip, I ſay, of ſuch princes, thou return to thine old abominations uſed in the times of popery, then aſſuredly (O England) thou ſhalt be plagued, and be brought to deſolation by the means of thoſe whoſe favour thou ſeekeſt, and by whom thou art drawn to fall from Chriſt, and to ſerve antichriſt.'

But the magiſtrates abhorring this bloody deſign, when certain of Mr Knox's enemies followed them, to know what ſhould be done with him, they ſhewed evident ſigns of diſliking their unnatural ſuit; and withal ſent for Mr Williams, and Mr Whittingham, willing them that Mr Knox ſhould depart the city, leaſt they ſhould be forced to deliver him, if the emperor's council (which then lay at Auſpurg) ſhould upon the like information ſend for him.

March 25. The night before Mr Knox's departure, he made a moſt comfortable ſermon at his lodging, to about fifty perſons then preſent, about the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, and of the unſpeakable joys prepared for the elect, which in this life ſuffer trouble, and perſecution for the teſtimony of his bleſſed name. The next day he was brought three or four miles on his way, by ſome of thoſe perſons, who with great heavineſs of heart, and plenty of tears committed him to the Lord.

And the ſame day one Adulphus Glauburg, a doctor of law, and nephew to Mr John Glauburg the ſenator, whom Dr Cox and his party had won to them, ſent for Mr Whittingham, and told him that three doctors, thirteen batchelors of divinity, and ſome others had obtained of the magiſtrates, the full uſe of the Engliſh book, and therefore he commanded him not to meddle any further to the contrary; 'For, ſaith he, it is fully concluded of that ſo it ſhall be.' And ſuppoſing that Mr Whittingham would oppoſe it what he might, the next day he ſent for him again, and before Dr Cox and others he renewed the ſame charge. Mr Whittingham anſwered, That if it were ſo concluded, he would willingly obey; not doubting but that it might be lawful for him and ſome others, to join themſelves to another church. But Dr Cox beſought the lawyer that that might not be permitted: Mr Whittingham anſwered, that it would be too great cruelty to force men contrary to their conſciences to obey their diſordered doings; adding, that if it would pleaſe the magiſtrates to give him and others the hearing, they would diſpute the matter againſt all the contrary part, and doubted not to prove, that the order which they ſought to eſtabliſh, ought not to be admitted in any reformed church, the lawyer anſwered, that there ſhould be no ſuch diſputation, commanding him again to deal no further in that matter.

The congregation hearing of the tyrannical dealing of this doctor, they ſent Mr Gilby with ſome others to Mr John Glauburg, by whoſe command they had received the French order, to mind him of the ſame, and to ſhew him that certain lately come in amongſt them, had ſought to overthrow their church by bringing in the Engliſh ſervice book; to which he anſwered, that he was informed that both parties had conſented thereto, and thereupon he had referred the whole buſineſs to his couſin the lawyer. Then he enquired for Mr Whittingham, whereunto they anſwered, that he was ſtraitly charged by his couſin to meddle no more in that matter. Upon this anſwer he gently intreated Mr Gilby and the reſt to be contented, and he would ſee that nothing ſhould be uſed, but what ſhould be tolerable, with which anſwer they departed.

But March 28. Dr Cox aſſembled the Engliſh miniſters, and told them, that the magiſtrates had allowed them the uſe of the Engliſh book, and therefore he thought it requiſite that a biſhop, ſuperintendent, or paſtor together with elders and deacons, ſhould be choſen. To which Mr Chriſtopher Goodman anſwered, that he thought fit that they ſhould firſt agree upon ſome godly order for the church, and to have the conſent of the congregation thereto, that ſo it might appear that they deſpiſed not their brethren, to this it was anſwered, that for the order it was already agreed upon, for other order than was contained in the Engliſh book they would not have; and ſo nothing was further done.

Then did the oppreſſed congregation deſire Mr Whittingham to go to Baſill and Geneva, where it pleaſed the Lord to ſtir up the magiſtrates hearts to grant them churches, and ſo at his return it was thought good by ſuch as determined to go away, to endeavour a reconciliation before their departure, as Mr Calvin had counſelled them; and the rather, for that ſome of Dr Cox's company had ſtiled publicly their departure to be a ſchiſm: whereupon they wrote this enſuing letter to the paſtor and whole congregation.

'For as much as, through God's mercy, we have obtained a church in another place, we thought good to advertiſe you of the ſame; and to the intent that ſlanderous reports may ceaſe, as alſo that if any offence be taken or given, the ſame may come to trial, we deſire that you for your part would appoint two arbiters, and we ſhall appoint other two, who hearing the matters, may determine where the fault reſteth, at which time we undertake to defend our departure againſt the ſlanderous reports of ſome that unlearnedly term it a ſchiſm. This, brethren, we thought good to ſignify to you, judging it to be the only means for peace; whereof, how deſirous we are, our tedious journey may be a ſufficient proof, being perſuaded that hereby ſtrife may be ended, charity revived, friendſhip continued, God's glory advanced, and our brethren edified, farewel, Aug. 17. William Williams, Will. Whittingham, Anthony Gilby, Chriſtopher Goodman, Tho. Cole, John Fox, Tho. Wood, Will. Kethe, Jo. Kelke, Jo. Hilton, Chriſtopher Soothous, Nic. Purſon, Jo. Eſcot. Tho. Crafton, Will. Walton, Laurence Kent, Jo. Hellingham, Ant. Carrier.'

This letter was read publicly in the congregation by the paſtor, but anſwer they could get none, ſave this, that ſince they were minded to depart, they might depart at their pleaſure; but for the reference, or ſatisfaction, they would aſſent to neither: whereupon not many days after, the oppreſſed church departed from Frankford, to Baſil, where Mr. Fox, with ſome other of them ſtaid, the reſt went to Geneva, where they were received with great favour and courteſy, both by magiſtrates, miniſters and people; and ſhortly after entring their church that remained at Frankford, after that by their violent proceedings they had driven theſe godly brethren away, they preſently after fell out amongſt themſelves, and had ſuch continual bickerings and contentions, as could by no means be pacified, till at the end of queen Mary's reign the church was diſſolved, and they returned into their own native country again. The large and full diſcourſe whereof, it being not pertinent to my ſcope, who ſo pleaſes to read, may find it in a book called, A Diſcourſe of the Troubles at Frankford. Printed anno Chriſti 1575. and reprinted 1642.

CHAP. LXV.

God's Judgments upon the Perſecutors of his Church and Children.

FROM the firſt general plantation of the goſpel in this kingdom under king Lucius, there was never any king or queen of England, in whoſe reign ſo much Chriſtian blood was ſhed: as in four years ſpace, during the reign of queen Mary: under whom there ſuffered, one archbiſhop, four biſhops, twenty one divines, eight gentlemen, eighty four artificers, one hundred huſbandmen, ſervants, and labourers, twenty ſix wives, twenty widows, nine virgins, two boys, and two infants; in all two hundred ſeventy ſeven. Sixty four more were perſecuted for their faith, and profeſſion; whereof ſeven were whipped, and ſixteen periſhed in priſon, and were buried in dunghills; many lay in captivity, and condemned, but were delivered and ſaved by the happy entrance of our glorious queen Elizabeth: beſides thoſe many who were forced to fly the land, and live in exile.

But as queen Mary was prodigal of the lives of her beſt ſubjects, and a perſecutor of the goſpel, ſo God followed her with his plagues, both in her life and death; for while whilſt ſhe lived, nothing proſpered which ſhe took in hand. I ſhall only inſtance in ſome few particulars.

Firſt, The faireſt and greateſt ſhip which ſhe had, called Great Harry, was burnt by lightning from heaven; the Chriſtian world at that time not affording ſuch another.

Then would ſhe needs marry Philip king of Spain, thereby ſubjecting England unto ſtrangers; yet do what ſhe could, ſhe could never ſet the Engliſh crown upon his head.

Then did ſhe attempt the reſtitution of abbey lands, and had all the aſſiſtance that the pope could afford her therein yet ſhe was finally croſſed of her deſires about them.

Then did God plague her, and her land with a grievous famine, ſo that many of her poor ſubjects were fain to live upon acorns.

Then did ſhe loſe Calice which had been in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, during the reign of eleven kings, viz. from king Edward the third's time, with which loſs ſhe was ſo affected and afflicted, that ſhe told ſome of her courtiers, that if they opened her body when ſhe was dead, they ſhould find Calice written in her heart.

Again, never had woman worſe ſucceſs in her child birth than ſhe. For if ſhe was with child, and did travel, why was it never ſeen? If ſhe was not with child, why was the kingdom ſo abuſed? ſome in the pulpit returning thanks for her ſafe delivery, and taking upon them to tell that it was a ſon, and a goodly prince.

Then God having thus croſſed her in her hopes of children, which above all things ſhe moſt deſired, he alſo bereft her comfort and honour, by withdrawing from her the company and affection of her huſband, by whoſe marriage ſhe had promiſed to herſelf ſuch a world of felicity and content; ſo that now ſhe could neither enjoy him whom ſhe had married, nor have liberty to marry another. And when all theſe hands of God would work nothing upon her to cauſe her to repeal her bloody laws, or to abſtain from her bloody perſecution of the ſaints of God; the Lord ſtruck her with a lingring and pining ſickneſs, whereof ſhe died; having only reigned five years, and five months; a ſhorter reign than any of the kings of England enjoyed ſince the conqueſt, Richard the third only excepted.

The two laſt years of her reign, as there was in them moſt violence and bloodſhed for religion's ſake, ſo were they moſt grievous for temporal calamities; for beſides the loſs of Calice, and the fruitleſs attempt upon Breſt in Brittany, which proved both chargeable and diſhonourable; the land was alſo grievouſly afflicted with horrible tempeſts, mortal diſeaſes, plagues and famines. In the former of which years, hot burning agues, and other ſtrange diſeaſes took away much people; ſo that between October the twentieth, and the laſt of December, there died ſeven aldermen in London, whereof five had been the lord mayors of the city. The ſame year wheat was ſold for four marks the quarter. Malt for two pound four ſhillings the quarter. Peas at two pound ſix ſhillings eight pence. Whereas after the next harveſt, wheat was ſold for five ſhillings a quarter: malt at four ſhillings eight pence; and in ſome places a buſhel of rie was exchanged for a pound of candles which came to four pence.

In her fifth year near Nottingham was a marvellous tempeſt of thunder, which beat down all the houſes, and churches in two towns, caſt the bells out of the churchyard, and ſome ſheets of lead were carried four hundred foot off into the fields, writhen as if they had been of leather. Trees were torn up by the roots, and carried twelvefcore feet off. Divers men were ſlain, &c.

Alſo the ſame year in the harveſt time was a great mortality; ſo that much corn was loſt in the fields for want of workmen to gather it, whereby a great ſcarcity enſued. Sir Richard Baker.

In the next place let us conſider the Lord's dealing with the chiefeſt of thoſe who were inſtruments of cruelty: and firſt to begin with Steven Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter. We have before heard of his wretched and woful death, about the midſt of Queen Mary's reign, and therefore we will not again ſpeak of it: only I will add this, That being, upon his death bed, put in mind of Peter's denying his Maſter, he anſwered, 'I have denied Chriſt with Peter, but I never repented with Peter.'

Alſo Morgan biſhop of St Davids, who ſat upon the condemnation of the bleſſed martyr biſhop Ferrar, whoſe place he unjuſtly uſurped; preſently after, he was ſtricken with ſuch a ſtrange hand of God, that the meat which he did eat would not go down, ſometimes vomiting it up at his mouth, ſometimes through his noſtrils, after an horrible manner; and ſo he continued to his death.

Mr Leyſon alſo being high ſheriff at his burning, having ſet away Mr Ferrar's cattle into his own grounds, many of them would never eat any meat, but lay bellowing and roaring till they died.

Juſtice Morgan, who ſat upon the condemnation of the Lady Jane Grey, not long after fell mad, continually crying out, 'The Lady Jane, the Lady Jane; take away the Lady Jane;' and ſo continued till he died.

Dr Dunnings, the bloody chancellor of Norwich, that had condemned many of the faithful ſervants of Chriſt, was, in the midſt of his rage, ſuddenly ſtricken by the revenging hand of God as he ſat in his chair, and ſo died.

Berry, commiſſary of Norfolk, another bloody perſecutor, four days after Queen Mary's death, having made a great feaſt, at which he had one of his curteſans, and then going to church in the afternoon, where he adminiſtered the ſacrament of baptiſm, as he returned homewards, with an heavy groan he fell down to the ground, and never ſtirred afterwards.

Biſhop Thornton, ſuffragan of Dover, a cruel perſecutor of the holy and harmleſs ſaints of God: as he was upon a ſabbath-day looking upon his men that played at bowls, was ſuddenly ſtricken with the dead palſy, and being carried to his bed, was wiſhed to remember the Lord; Yea, ſaid he, ſo I do, and my Lord Cardinal alſo; and ſo died after a deſperate manner.

Another ſuffragan that ſucceeded him in that place, having been before Bonner's inſtrument in perſecuting the ſaints, going to Cardinal Pool, in his chamber at Greenwich, to receive his bleſſing, as he went from him, fell down the ſtairs and brake his neck.

John Cooper of Watſam, in the county of Suffolk, a very honeſt man, and one that harboured ſuch as were perſecuted for the truth, had a couple of bullocks, which one William Fenning, his popiſh neighbour, deſired to buy; Cooper told him, that he kept them for his own uſe, and therefore would not ſell them. Hereupon this Fenning went and accuſed him of treaſon, for praying, That if God would not take away Queen Mary, that then the devil would. This wicked accuſation, though it was altogether falſe, yet Fenning ſuborned two knights of the poſt to ſwear to it; whereupon John Cooper was hanged, drawn, and quartered, all his goods ſeized on and his wife and nine children were turned out of doors, being deſtitute of all means of ſubſiſtence.

But ſhortly after God's revenging hand purſued one of thoſe falſe witneſſes, called Grimwood; for as he was at harveſt work, ſtacking of his corn, his bowels ſuddenly fell out, and he immediately died miſerably.

The parſon of Crondal in Kent, being preaching upon Whitſunday, told his people, that he had received the pope's pardon from Cardinal Pool, whereby he ſtood now as clear in conſcience as when he was firſt born, and therefore he cared not now if he ſhould die the ſame hour. The words were ſcarce out of his mouth, when ſuddenly he fell down dead in the pulpit, and never ſpake word more.

A little before Queen Mary's death, died Dr Capon, biſhop of Saliſbury, a great perſecutor of the ſaints; and about the ſame time Dr Jefferey his chancellor (of whoſe perſecutions we have heard before); as he was in the midſt of his buildings, ſuddenly being ſtruck by the hand of God, yielded up his ghoſt. Wherein this is further obſervable, that juſt at that time he had appointed to call before him almoſt an hundred godly perſons, and to examine them by inquiſition; which miſchief was by this means prevented.

Mr Woodroffe, ſheriff of London, uſed much to rejoice at the torments of the poor ſaints of Chriſt; and ſo cruel was he, that when Mr Rogers was carried in a cart from Newgate to Smithfield, by the way his children were brought to ſee him, and the people made way for their coming to the cart; but Mr Woodroffe commanded his men to break the car-man's head for ſtaying the cart: but ſhortly after, vengeance overtook him, he being ſtricken with a deadneſs all one ſide of his body, ſo that he was not able to turn himſelf in his bed, in which manner he languiſhed till he died.

Ralph Lardin, the betrayer of George Eagles, was afterwards arraigned and hanged. As he ſtood at the bar he ſaid publicly, 'This is juſtly fallen upon me, for that I betrayed the innocent blood of that good and juſt man George Eagles, who was condemned through my means, and I ſold his blood for a little money.'

The like vengeance of God fell upon Richard Potto and Juſtice Browne, both cruel perſecutors of the ſaid George Eagles.

Mr Swingfield, a deputy in Thames-ſtreet, hearing that Mrs Angel a midwife, and a good woman, was at a woman's labour in Crookedlane, he took three other with him, and beſet the houſe, and apprehended her, and carried her to Bonner's officers, by whom ſhe was caſt into Lollard's tower. This Mrs Angel was great with child, and by reaſon of the fright, and a fall which ſhe caught in her apprehenſion, ſhe fell the next day in labour, and was delivered in that priſon, having no woman with her to help her in her extremity. But within ten weeks after, Deputy Swingfield, and the other three that came with him to apprehend her, all four died.

There was one Burton, bailiff of Crowland in Lincolnſhire, who in the days of King Edward was a ſeeming zealous proteſtant; but as ſoon as Queen Mary came to the crown, he turned papiſt, and endeavoured to perſuade his neighbours to ſet up the maſs; but they being not forward therein, this Burton on the Sabbath went to church, and when the curate was beginning to read the Engliſh ſervice, he went to him, and ſaid, 'Sirrah, will you not ſay maſs? buckle yourſelf to it you knave; or, by God's blood, I'll ſheath my dagger in your ſhoulder.' The poor curate being affrighted herewith, betook himſelf to the maſs. But ſhortly after this, Burton, with one of his neighbours, rode together upon the Fen-bank, a crow took her flight over his head with her uſual note, and voiding her excrements, they fell on his noſe, and ran down his beard, withal, yielding ſuch an horrible ſtink, that cauſed him to fall a vomitting in a moſt violent manner; whereupon haſting home, he gat him to bed, but could eat nothing, the ſtink and vomiting ſtill continuing, which made him with oaths and fearful execrations, to curſe the crow that had poiſoned him; and ſo he continued in extreme pain till his death.

As we have heard before of James Abbes martyr, that was burnt at Burry; as he went towards the ſtake ſome poor people met him, craving his alms, and becauſe he had no money to give them, he plucked off his apparel to his ſhirt, and diſtributed it amongſt them, withal exhorting them to be ſtrong in the Lord, and, as faithful followers of Chriſt, to ſtand ſtedfaſt in the truth of the goſpel, which, ſaid he, with God's aſſiſtance, I will now in your ſight ſeal with my blood. But whilſt he was thus exhorting them, there came one of the ſheriff's men, who hearing him, cried out aloud to the people, moſt blaſphemouſly ſaying, 'Good people, believe him not, he is an heretic and a madman, and out of his wits; believe him not, for it is hereſy which he ſpeaketh.' And as Abbes continued his godly exhortation, ſo this wicked wretch belched forth his blaſphemous exclamation till they came to the ſtake, at which the conſtant martyr was burned. But as ſoon as the fire was kindled, the fearful ſtroke of God's juſtice fell upon this wretch, who immediately before the people fell diſtracted, wherewith a little before he had charged the bleſſed ſervant of Chriſt, and pulling off his cloaths in a furious manner, he ſaid, 'Thus did James Abbes the true ſervant of God, who is ſaved, but I am damned;' and ſo he ran about the town, ſtill crying out, that James Abbes was a good man, and was ſaved, but he was damned. Hereupon his maſter cauſed him to be bound, cloathed, and kept in a dark room; but as ſoon as the company was departed, he tore off his clothes, ſtill raging and crying out, 'James Abbes was the true ſervant of God, and is ſaved, but I am damned:' and thus he continued to his death.

One Clerk, an open enemy to the goſpel, and to all the true preachers of it, hanged himſelf in the tower of London.

One Troling Smith, a great papiſt, fell down in the ſtreet ſuddenly, and died.

Dale, a promoter and perſecutor, was eaten of lice and died.

Cox, an earneſt proteſtant in King Edward's days, and in Queen Mary's a papiſt and promoter, going well to his bed, was found dead in the morning.

Alexander, the keeper of Newgate, a cruel enemy to thoſe that lay there for religion, and one that uſed to go to Bonner, Story, Chomley, &c. crying out, 'Rid my priſon, rid my priſon; I am too much peſtered with theſe heretics:' he died a miſerable death, his body being ſo ſwoln that he was more like to a monſter than a man, his entrails alſo were ſo rotten, that none could abide the ſtink of him.

His ſon James, to whom he left a great eſtate, ſoon waſted it all, jeeringly ſaying, 'Ill gotten, ill ſpent:' and as he went along Newgate market, he ſuddenly fell down and died.

John Peter, ſon in law to this Alexander, an horrible blaſphemer, who uſed upon every occaſion to ſay, 'If it be not ſo, I pray God I may rot 'ere I die:' he was alſo very cruel to the poor ſaints in priſon; but God met with him for all, for his body roted away by piece-male, whereby he died.

Juſtice Leland, the perſecutor of Jefferey Hurſt, died ſuddenly.

Robert Baulding, as he was apprehending Will. Seaman martyr, was ſtricken with lightning, whereupon he pined away, and died.

Robert Blomefield, the perſecutor of William Browne, ſhortly after conſumed away and died.

Dr Foxford, chancellor to biſhop Stokeſly, a cruel perſecutor, died ſuddenly.

Paul, town clerk of London, a bitter enemy to the profeſſors of the goſpel, hanged himſelf.

The very next day after the death of Queen Mary, died Cardinal Pool, and it was thought that he took an Italian pill which cauſed it.

At Brightwell in Barkſhire, one Laver ſaid, that he ſaw that ill-favoured knave Latimer, when he was burnt at Oxford, and that he had teeth like an horſe. But the Lord ſuffered not this ſcorn and contempt of his ſervant to go unpuniſhed; for that very day, and about the ſame hour that Laver ſpake theſe words, his ſon wickedly hanged himſelf.

William Swallow, the cruel tormentor of George Eagles, was ſhortly after ſo plagued by God with ſickneſs, that the hair of his head, and the nails of his fingers and toes came off, and his eyes were ſo cloſed up, that he could ſcarcely ſee: his wife alſo was taken with the falling ſickneſs, which ſhe was never before troubled with.

Bloody Bonner, though he died in his bed, yet lay under the ſpiritual judgment of impunitency; and as he had been a perſecutor of the light, and a child of darkneſs, ſo in darkneſs, at midnight, his carcaſe was tumbled into the earth: and as he himſelf had been a murderer, ſo he was laid amongſt thieves and murderers, a place by God's judgment fitly appointed him.

I ſhall add but one ſtory more, and I have done, and that is of Dr Williams, chancellor of Gloceſter, a great perſecutor of the ſaints, who, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when commiſſioners were ſent down for the reſtoring of religion in that city, was invited to dinner by Mr Jennins dean of Gloceſter, and was requeſted by him, after dinner, to ride forth with him to meet the commiſſioners which were near at hand, 'No, ſaid Williams, I will never ſee them.' The dean therefore going without him, Williams returned home, and preſently one poſted after the dean, and told him that the chancellor was at the point of death. The dean preſently meeting with the commiſſioners, told them this ſtory, who haſted to Gloceſter to viſit and comfort the chancellor: but before they could get to him, he had breathed forth his laſt, and thereby verified his own word, that he would never ſee them.

THE

LIFE AND DEATH

OF OUR BLESSED

LORD AND SAVIOUR

JESUS CHRIST.

IN the 6th month after John, firnamed the Baptift, was conceived, the angel Gabriel (who had in time foretold to Daniel, the coming of the Meffias, by a definite number of weeks) was fent by God to Nazareth in Galilee, to the bleffed Virgin Mary, that was betrothed to Joſeph, of the ſame tribe of Judah with herſelf, and of the ſtock of David, who, after ſalutations, declared unto her that ſhe ſhould bring forth the Son of God, and ſhould call his name JESUS: and having more fully taught her of the admirable manner of her conception, to be performed by the power of the Holy Ghoſt overſhadowing her, with great faith ſhe ſaid, 'Be it to the hand maid of the Lord according to thy word.' Luke i. 26, 28.

Chriſt being thus conceived, the mother of our Lord went into the hill country, with haſte into a city of Juda (to wit, Hebron, a city of the prieſts, ſituate in the mountains of Judea, Joſh. 21. 10, 11.) where, when ſhe entered into the houſe of Zacharias the prieſt, and had ſaluted her couſin Elizabeth, ſhe, perceiving the child to ſpring in her womb, was filled with the Holy Ghoſt, and declared that Mary was bleſſed which believed, and confirmed that thoſe things ſhould be performed that were told her of the Lord: to whom for an anſwer the bleſſed Virgin (imitating that ſong of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 1.) rehearſed that divine hymn, 'My ſoul doth magnify the Lord, &c.' After which Mary tarried with her about three months. Luke i. 36. 59.

Not long after, Joſeph finding his betrothed wife Mary with child was willing to put her away privily: but being warned of God in a dream, and informed that ſhe had conceived by the Holy Ghoſt, and ſhould bring forth her ſon Jeſus, who ſhould ſave his people from their ſins, he taketh his wife. Mat. i. 18, 24.

When the time of Mary's delivery drew near, there came forth a command from Auguſtus, that all the Roman world ſhould be taxed, which taxing was firſt made, when Cyrenius was governor of Syria, Luke ii. 1. whereupon Joſeph went up from Galilee, from the city of Nazareth into Judea, into the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, becauſe he was of the houſe and lineage of David, that he might be taxed with Mary his wife, being great with child. Luke ii. 4, 5.

During their abode there, Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God in the fulneſs of time was born of the bleſſed Virgin Mary at Bethlehem, Matth. i. 25. and ii. 1, 5. Gal iv. 4. in the four thouſandth year of the world (ſaith the learned primate of Ireland, Dr Uſher) whom Mary rolled in ſwadling cloathes, and laid him in a manger, becauſe there was no room in the inn. Luke ii. 7.

Chriſt being thus born, his nativity was revealed by an angel of the Lord to ſhepherds that were keeping their flock by night in the neighbouring fields, which word, a multitude of the heavenly hoſt receiving, prayed for glory to God, peace to the earth, and good will to men; when they were departed, the ſhepherds making haſte to Bethlehem, found Mary and Joſeph, and the child lying in the manger, and they publiſhed that which was told them concerning the child, and ſo returned praiſing, and glorifying God. Luke ii. 8, 20.

The eighth day after his nativity the child was circumciſed, and his name was called Jeſus, which was ſo appointed by the angel Gabriel, before he was conceived in the womb. Luke ii. 21.

Preſently after, the wiſe men from the eaſt being guided by a new and extraordinary ſtar, came to Herod to Jeruſalem, and there, having learned that the birth-place of Chriſt was Bethlehem of Judea, they went thither, and entering into the houſe which was pointed out to them by the ſtar that ſtood over it, they found the little child and Mary his mother, and falling down they worſhipped him, and opening their treaſures, they offered unto him, gold, frankincenſe, and myrrh. Then being warned of God in a dream that they ſhould not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way. Matth. ii. 1, 12.

The fortieth day after her delivery, Mary went up to Jeruſalem to the temple, both that ſhe might preſent him to the Lord according to the law of the firſt born; and and alſo that ſhe might offer for herſelf a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons (ſhe being ſo poor that ſhe could not offer a lamb) according to the law concerning women that had lain in. Luke ii. 22, 23, 24, 27. with Levit. xii. 2, 3, 4, 6, 8.

When his parents, Joſeph and Mary brought the child Jeſus into the temple, to do for him according to the law, there came in at the ſame time Simeon of Jeruſalem, to whom it was revealed by God that he ſhould not die before he had ſeen the anointed of the Lord, whom he took in in his arms, and praiſed the Lord, adding propheſies, both concerning Chriſt and his mother. At the ſame inſtant came Anna, a propheteſs, the daughter of Phanuel, who alſo acknowleged the Lord openly, and ſpake of him to all that looked for redemption in Jeruſalem. Luke ii. 25, 28.

Thus when Joſeph and Mary had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth, Luke ii. 39.

Some time after, the angel of the Lord appeared unto Joſeph in a dream, warning him to fly into Egypt, thereby to provide for the life of the child, and to eſcape the malicious deſigns of Herod, who having by the wiſe men heard that one was born king of the Jews, ſought to deſtroy him: and accordingly Joſeph, when he awaked, took the young child and his mother by night, and went into Egypt, where he remained until the death of Herod. Matth. ii. 13, 14, 15.

But Herod, thinking that the young child had ſtill been at Bethlehem (being further provoked by the wiſe mens not returning to him) that he might deſtroy Him amongſt the reſt, ſent forth ſome of his ſoldiers, who killed all the children which were in Bethlehem, and in all the coaſt thereof from two years old and under, according to the time of the ſtar firſt ſeen in the eaſt, concerning which he had enquired of the wiſe men. Matth. ii. 16.

After the death of Herod, who had ſought the life of the young child Jeſus, the angel of the Lord appeared again to Joſeph in a dream whilſt he was in Egypt, commanding him that he ſhould return with the young child and his mother into the land of Iſrael, for that he that ſought his life was dead: and accordingly when Joſeph awaked, he performed what was by the angel enjoyned him Matth. ii. 19. 20, 21.

But when he was come back into the land of Iſrael, he heard that Archilaus reigned in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he therefore feared to go thither: and being warned of God in a dream, he departed into the parts of Galilee (which Tetrarchy Herod had given by Will to Antipas) and there dwelt in the city of Nazareth, from whence Jeſus took the name of Nazarene. Matth. ii. 22, 23. and the primitive Chriſtians of Nazarenes. Act. xxiv. 5.

When Jeſus was twelve years old, at the feaſt of the paſſover, he was brought to Jeruſalem by his parents, Joſeph and Mary; and when the ſeven days of unleavened bread were ended, his parents returning home, Jeſus ſtaid behind them. But ſo ſoon as they miſſed him, they ſought him three days, and at laſt found him in the temple ſitting in the midſt of the doctors hearing them, and aſking them queſtions, ſo that all that heard him were aſtoniſhed at his underſtanding and anſwers. Luke ii. 41, 47.

Then went Jeſus down with his parents to Nazareth, and was obedient to them Luke ii. 51. and during his minority, followed his father's trade of a carpenter, eating his bread in the ſweat of his brows, as appears by the ſpeeches of his fellow citizens. 'Is not this the carpenter, the ſon of Mary?' Mark vi. 3.

The thirtieth, and the laſt jubilee falling in the thirtieth year of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and in the beginning of his goſpel, John, his forerunner proclaimed in the wilderneſs: 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make his paths ſtrait. Mark i. 1, 2. and opening the acceptable year of the Lord, or the time of his divine pleaſure, in which, our good God vouchſafed to manifeſt that Great One to the world, Iſa. lxi. 2. Luke iv. 19. For in the thirteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caeſar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, his brother Philip Tetrarch of Ituræa, and the region of Trachonitis, and Lyſanias Tetrarch of Abilene, under the prieſthoods of Annas, and Caiaphas, came the word of the Lord unto John the ſon of Zacharias in the deſert, Luke iii. 12. according unto whoſe command this Nazarite, both prieſt and prophet of the Lord, did baptize in the deſert of Judea, in which there were many cities which are mentioned, Joſh. xv. 16. preaching the baptiſm of repentance for the remiſſion of ſins Matth. iii. 1. Mark i. 4. Luke iii. 3. endeavouring that Chriſt that came after him might be made known to Iſrael. John i. 7, 8, 13. which that he might more certainly know, this ſign was given him of God, that upon whom he ſhould ſee the Holy Ghoſt deſcending and remaining, he ſhould thereby know that it was he that ſhould baptize others with the Holy Ghoſt, John i. 23. Its moſt probable (ſaith the learned Dr Uſher) that this his miniſtry began on that moſt convenient day, the tenth of the ſeventh month (about the nineteenth day of our October) which was both penitential, being joined with ſolemn faſt, in which whoſoever did not afflict his ſoul, ſhould be cut off from his people, and alſo expiatory, in which the high prieſt went into the holy of holies to expiate the ſins of the people with blood that was offered: and that ſame day in which by the ſound of trumpet the jubilee was commanded to be proclaimed over all the land, Levit. xxv. 9.

So John Baptiſt, the preacher of repentance and remiſſion of ſins, to be attained by the blood of Chriſt that was to come, paſſing through every region round about Jordan, lifted up his voice like a trumpet, ſaying, 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand:' whereupon there went out to him Jeruſalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan (eſpecially that huge multitude which returned from Jeruſalem, the feaſt of tabernacles being ended about the beginning of our November) and were baptized of him in Jordan, confeſſing their ſins. Matth. iii. 2, 3. 5, 6. Mark i. 5.

And when all the people were baptized, Jeſus came alſo from Nazareth of Galilee to Jordan to be baptized of John. Luke iii. 21. Matth. iii. 13. Mark i. 9. which office John denied at firſt to perform as ſtanding in need himſelf to be baptized of Chriſt; but the Lord urging that thus it behoved that all righteouſneſs ſhould be fulfilled, he baptized him. Matth. iii. 14, 15. Jeſus then beginning to be about thirty years old. Luke iii. 23.

At this time there was made a moſt illuſtrious manifeſtation of the bleſſed Trinity: for the Son of God in the human nature that he aſſumed, aſcending out of the water and praying, the heavens were opened, and the Holy Ghoſt was ſeen in a bodily ſhape like a dove, deſcending upon him, and the voice of the Father was heard from heaven ſaying, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleaſed. Matth. iii. 16. 17. Mark i. 10. 11. Luke iii. 21, 22.

Jeſus being now full of the Holy Ghoſt, returned from Jordan, and was driven by the Spirit into the deſert, where for forty days and nights, being tempted by the devil, he remained amongſt wild beaſts, not eating any thing, and when the days were ended he was an hungry. Luke iv. 1, 2. Matth. iv. 1, 2. Mark i. 12, 13. Satan taking this opportunity, ſet upon him with a threefold temptation, all which being ended, he departed from him for a ſeaſon. Matth iv. 3, 11. Luke iv. 3, 13. and the angels came and miniſtred unto him. Matth. iv. 11. Mark i. 13. After which Jeſus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. Luk iv. 14. John the Baptiſt, the next day after Chriſt's coming to him, when the Jews from Jeruſalem ſent ſome prieſts and Levites of the ſect of the Phariſees to him, as he was baptizing at Bethabara by Jordan, to aſk him who he was, he profeſſed clearly that he was not the Chriſt; he denied alſo that he was Elias, or that prophet (foretold by Moſes. Deut. xviii. 15. the ſame indeed with Chriſt. Act. iii. 22. and vii. 37. but by the Jews thought to be another), he told them alſo that he was, 'The voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, make ſtrait the way of the Lord:' and then added the teſtimony of Chriſt, 'I baptize with water, but there ſtands one among you whom ye know not, he it is who cometh after, and is preferred before me, whoſe ſhoe latchet I am not worthy to unlooſe, John i. 19, 28. with chap v. 33.

The next day John ſeeing Jeſus coming to him, ſaith, 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the ſins of the world.' This is he of whom I ſpake, there comes one after me that is preferred before me, for he was before me, &c. and I ſaw him, and teſtify that this is the Son of God. John i. 29, 34.

The day after, John ſtood and two of his diſciples with him, and ſeeing Jeſus walking, ſaid, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' which, when the two diſciples heard, they followed Jeſus, and tarried with him that day, for it was about the tenth hour. One of theſe was Andrew, who brought his brother Simon to Jeſus, and then Jeſus ſaw him, he ſaid, 'Thou art Simon, ſon of Jonas; thou ſhalt be called Cephas.' John i. 35, 42.

The next day Jeſus going into Galilee, commanded Philip (which was of Bethſaida, the city of Andrew and Simon Peter) to follow him. Philip finding Nathaniel under a fig-tree, brought him to Jeſus, who declared him truly to be an Iſraelite in whom there was no guile. John i. 43, &c. withal hinting, that himſelf was that ladder of heaven foreſhewn to Jacob in his dream, Gen. xxviii. 12. upon which the angels of God were ſeen aſcending and deſcending, John ii. 1, 11.

On the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee to which Jeſus was invited, together with his mother and diſciples, where he turned water into wine, the beginning of his miracles: and his glory being hereby made manifeſt, his diſciples believed in him, John ii. 1, 11.

After this he went down to Capernaum, he, his mother, and brethren (or kinſmen) and his diſciples, and tarried there not many days. John ii. 12. And thus we are come to Chriſt's entering upon his public miniſtry, whoſe acts ſhall be ſet forth according to four diſtinct paſſovers out of the harmony, of the four goſpels contrived by Dr. Richardſon, biſhop of Ardah in Ireland, and recorded by the primate Dr. Uſher: in which this is ſingular, that ſaint Matthew only is found not to obſerve the order of time which is conſtantly obſerved by the other three Evangeliſts; excepting only the parentheſis of John's being caſt into priſon by Herod. Luke iii. 19, 20.

The firſt paſſover of the miniſtry of Chriſt. John ii. 13. from which the firſt year of the ſeventieth, and laſt week of Daniel began, in which the covenant is confirmed with many. Dan. ix. 27. with Matth. xxvi. 28.

JESUS went to Jeruſalem to the paſſover, and going to the temple he ſcourged out them that bought and ſold there: and for a ſign of his authority, he declared unto them that the temple of his body ſhould be diſſolved by the Jews, and be raiſed again by himſelf. John ii. 13, 14. 19.

He wrought miracles, and many believed on him, but he did not commit himſelf to them becauſe he knew what was in man. John ii. 23, 24, 25.

He inſtructed Nicodemus, the diſciple that came to him by night, in the myſtery of regeneration, and about faith in his death, and the condemnation of unbelievers. John iii. 1. 21. Then leaving Jeruſalem, he went into the land of Judea with his diſciples, ver. 22. There he tarried and baptized (viz. that the hands of his diſciples, who had been before baptized, either by himſelf (or by John.) At this time John baptized in Ænon for he was not yet caſt into priſon. John iii. 23, 24. There aroſe a queſtion between ſome of John's diſciples and the Jews about purifying, verſe 25. Then did John inſtruct his diſciples, who told him of Jeſus in a way of emulation, concerning himſelf, and his office, and of the excellency of Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God, giving this notable and laſt teſtimony of him before his impriſonment, ver 26, &c. For preſently after, Herod the Tetrach caſt John into priſon for reprehending his inceſt with his brother Philip's wife, and other evils done by him, Mark vi. 17, 20. Matth. xiv. 3, 4, 5.

Jeſus hearing that John was caſt into priſon, and that the phariſees had heard that there were many made diſciples by him, and baptized, viz. by the hand of his diſciples, he left Judea, (having ſtaid there about eight months) and went into Galilee, John iv. 1, 2, 3. Matth. iv. 12. But in his way he muſt needs go through Samaria, where he brought the Samaritan woman near the city Sychar, and the citizens thereof, to the knowlege and acknowlegement of him, four months before the harveſt (or the paſſover) about the middle of the ninth month called Ab. John iv. 5, &c.

Jeſus having ſtaid two days in Sychar he went onward in his journey into Galilee, John iv. 43. This was his ſecond return from Judea into Galilee after his baptiſm, and being received of the Galileans who had ſeen what things he had done at Jeruſalem, he preached with great fame in their ſynagogues, John iv. 45. Luke iv. 14, 15. Mark i. 14, 15.

In Cana of Galilee he healed the ſon of a nobleman that lay ſick, John iv. 46, 54. he wrought miracles alſo in Capernaum, and afterwards came unto Nazareth where he had been brought up; and entring into the ſynagogue (as his cuſtom was) he expounded to them the prophecy of Iſaiah concerning himſelf: the citizens at firſt wondering, but afterwards being filled with wrath, they thruſt him out of the city, and endeavoured to have caſt him down headlong from a hill; but he, paſſing through the midſt of them went his way, Luke iv. 16, 30.

Jeſus then leaving Nazareth dwelt at Capernaum, and there ſo taught them on the Sabbath days that they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine, Luke iv. 31, 32. Mark i. 21, 22. Alſo at the ſynagogue in Capernaum, he caſt out an unclean ſpirit, commanding him that he ſhould not tell who he was, Luke iv. 33, 37. Mark i. 23, 28 After which he aroſe and went out of the ſynagoge into the houſe of Simon and Andrew, where he healed Simon's wife's mother that lay ſick of a fever, Luke iv. 38, 39. Mark i. 29, 30, 31. Matth. viii. 14, 15.

About ſun-ſet Jeſus healed all the ſick folk which were brought to him, and caſt out devils, commanding them to hold their peace, Luke iv 40, 41. Mark i. 32, 33, 34. Matth. viii. 16, 17 In the morning he went into a deſert place to pray, and when Simon and others ſought, and would have ſtaid him, he anſwered, that he muſt preach to other cities alſo, Luke iv 42, 43, 44. Mark i. 25, 39.

Then Jeſus went through all Galilee, and taught in their ſynagogues, and caſt out devils, Luke iv. 44. Mark i. 39. and as he ſtood by the lake of Genazereth a great multitude preſſed upon him: he entred therefore into Simon's ſhip, and taught the multitude from thence, Luke v. 1, 4. and when he had left ſpeaking, at his command there was a great draught of fiſhes taken; at which Simon Peter and Andrew, James and John being aſtoniſhed, he commanded them to follow him, and he would make them fiſhers of men, Luke v. 4, 11. Mark i. 16, 20. Matth. iv. 18. 22.

Then Jeſus went through all Galilee, teaching in their ſynagogues, and healing every diſeaſe; and his fame went through all Syria, and a great multitude followed him, Matth. iv. 23, 24, 25.

In a certain city Jeſus healed a leper, who, though he was forbidden, yet publiſhed it: and they came to him from every place to hear him, and to be healed; inſomuch as he could no more openly enter into the city, but was in deſert places, and prayed, Luke v. 12, 16. Mark i. 40, 45. Matth. viii. 1, 4.

Then again Jeſus entred into Capernaum, his own city after ſome days, and taught them at home, and before the ſcribes and phariſees, and a great multitude; he forgave ſins to one ſick of a palſy, who was let down through the roof of a houſe, and healed his diſeaſe to the aſtoniſhment of them all, Luke v. 17, 26. Mark ii. 1, 12. Matth. ix. 1, 8.

Then went Jeſus forth again by the ſea ſide, and all the multitude came unto him, and he taught them, and as he paſſed by, he ſaw, and called, Levy, or Matthew, ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom, Luke v. 27, 28. Mark ii. 13. 14. Matth. ix. 9.

Jeſus in the houſe of Levi defended both himſelf and his diſciples for eating with publicans, and excuſeth and vindicates them againſt the phariſees for their not faſting, Luke v. 29, 39. Mark ii. 15, 22. Matth. ix. 10, 13. And it came to paſs on the ſecond Sabbath after the firſt (i. e. the firſt Sabbath of the new year, inſtituted after their coming out of Egypt, and beginning from the month Niſan, or Abib) Jeſus going through the corn fields, cleared his diſciples from the charge of the phariſees, becauſe they plucked the ears of corn; and explained the doctrine of the Sabbath, Luke vi. 1, 5. Mark ii. 23, 28. Matth. xii. 1, 8.

The ſecond paſſover of the miniſtry of Chriſt, from which the ſecond year of the ſeventieth week of Daniel begins.

AFTER this was the feaſt of the Jews, and Jeſus went up to Jeruſalem, and healed on the Sabbath day a man that had an infirmity thirty eight years, who lay at the pool of Bethesda: and made a moſt divine apology to the Jews, who ſought to kill him becauſe he ſaid that 'God was his Father,' John v. 1, 47.

Afterwards he went from thence and entred into a ſynagogue and taught, and healed one that had a withered hand: whereupon the phariſees went forth, and ſtraightways, with the Herodians, took counſel how they might deſtroy him, Luke vi. 6, 11. Mark iii. 1, 6. Matth. xii. 9, 14.

But Jeſus when he knew this, withdrew himſelf to the ſea, and healed the multitudes that followed him, ſtraitly charging them that they ſhould not make him known, and commanded his diſciples that a ſmall ſhip ſhould wait on him, becauſe of the multitude that thronged him, Mark iii. 7, 12. Matth. xii. 15, 21.

And it came to paſs in thoſe days that he went into a mountain to pray: and when it was day, he choſe twelve, whom he called apoſtles, who are ſpecified by name, Luke vi. 12, 16. Mark iii. 13, 19.

And he came down with them from the mountain, and ſtood in a plain, where a great multitude came to him and he healed them all, Luke vi. 17, 18, 19.

After this they went into an houſe, and the multitude came together again ſo that they could not ſo much as eat bread, and when his kinſmen heard of it they went to lay hold on him, for they ſaid, 'He is beſide himſelf, Mark iii. 19, 20, 21.

When Jeſus ſaw the multitude, he went up into a mountain, and when he was ſet, his diſciples came unto him: and then he preached that long, and excellent ſermon, firſt to the apoſtles, and afterwards to all the people, Luke vi. 20, 49. Matth. v and 6, and 7.

Now when he had ended all his ſayings in the audience of the people he entred into Capernaum, where he healed the centurion's ſervant that lay ſick of the palſy, ready to die, Luke vii. 1. 10. Matth. viii. 5, 13.

The day following he went into the city of Naim, and raiſed one that was dead, and carrying out to his burial, which was the only ſon of a widow: whereupon his fame ſpread abroad, Luke vii. 11, 17.

John the Baptiſt, being yet in priſon, and being moved with the relation of his diſciples concerning the fame, and deeds of Jeſus, ſent two of them unto him, ſaying, 'Art thou he that was to come, or ſhall we look for another?' and when they were returned with his anſwer, Chriſt gave a large teſtimony of John. After which he upbraided ſome of the cities for their ingratitude, and yet willingly ſubmitted to the ſole good pleaſure of his Father, who hid his Son from ſome, and revealed him to others, Luke vii. 18, 35. Matth. xi. 2, 30.

Then Simon the phariſee, deſired him that he would eat with him, and as they were at meat he defended againſt Simon, and abſolved the woman, a ſinner, that waſhed his feet with her tears and wiped them with the hair of her head, both kiſſing, and anointing them, Luke vii. 36, 50.

It came to paſs afterwards that he went from city to city preaching, and his diſciples were with him, and certain women miniſtred unto him, Luke viii. 1, 2, 3.

Then they brought unto him one that had a devil that was both blind and dumb, and he healed him, and zealouſly defended himſelf againſt the phariſees and ſcribes that came down from Jeruſalem, that blaſphemed him, ſaying, 'He caſteth out devils through Beelzebub, Mark iii. 22, 30. Matth. viii. 22, 37.

Then ſaid ſome of the Scribes and Phariſees to him, 'Maſter, we would ſee a ſign of thee,' to whom, when he had ſharply rebuked them, he would give no other ſign but that of Jonas. Matth. viii. 38, 45.

Whilſt Jeſus ſpake to the people, it was told him that his mother and brethren ſtood without deſiring to ſee, and to ſpeak with him: but Jeſus anſwering, ſhewed them whom he accounted for his mother, and brother, and ſiſter. Luke viii. 19, 20, 21. Mark iii. 31, 35. Matth. xii. 46, 50.

The ſame day Jeſus went out of the houſe and ſat by the ſea-ſide, and great multitudes were gathered unto him, ſo that he went into a ſhip, and ſat, and taught the multitude many things, by the parable of the ſower, and by divers other parables. Luke viii. 4. 18. Mark ix. 1, 31. Matth. xiii. 1, 53.

Alſo the ſame day when it was evening, he ſaid unto them, 'Let us lanch forth unto the other ſide of the lake:' and when he had given an anſwer to ſome that would follow him, and ſent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ſhip, and by the way there aroſe a great tempeſt, but he rebuked the wind, and calmed the ſea, and ſaved his diſciples. Luke viii. 22, 25. Mark iv. 45, 41. Matth. viii. 18, 27.

When they came to the other ſide into the country of the Gadarenes, or Gergaſenes, which was on the oppoſite ſhore to Galilee, and when he was gone on land, there met him two poſſeſſed with devils, very fierce (Mark and Luke mention but one) out of whom Jeſus caſt the devils, and ſuffered them to go into the herd of ſwine; whereupon the Gadarenes deſired him to leave their coaſts. Then did the poſſeſſed perſons importune him that they might abide with him; but he denied their requeſt, and ſent them back to publiſh about Decapolis what great things Jeſus had done for them: after which he paſſed over again by ſhip to the other ſide, and from thence went unto his own city (Capernaum.) Luke viii. 26, 36. Mark v. 1, 16, 17, 20. Matth. viii. 28, 33, 34.

And it came to paſs that when Jeſus was returned, the people received him gladly, for they waited for him, and he was by the ſea ſide. Luke viii. 40. Mark v. 21. and there came to him the diſciples of John, ſaying, 'Why do we and the Phariſees faſt oft, but thy diſciples faſt not?' to whom he gave anſwer. Matth. ix. 14. 17.

Whilſt Jeſus yet ſpake, behold there came Jairus, one of the rulers of the ſynagogue, beſought him greatly for his only daughter, being about twelve years old, who lay at the point of death: and as he was going, even at Jairus door, a woman that had an iſſue of blood twelve years was ſuddenly healed by touching the hem of Jeſus garment: and the daughter of Jairus being now already dead, was reſtored to life by his word only: and he ſtraitly charged them that no man ſhould know it. Luke viii. 41, 56. Mark v. 22, 43. Matth. ix. 18, 16.

When Jeſus was departed thence, two blind men followed him, whoſe eyes he opened, ſtraitly charging them (but to no purpoſe) that no man ſhould know it. Matth. ix. 27. 31.

As they went out, behold, they brought unto him a dumb man poſſeſſed with a devil, and when the devil was caſt out, the dumb ſpake, and the multitude marvelled: but the Phariſees blaſphemed. Matth. ix. 32, 33, 34. 35.

Then went Jeſus round about all the cities, and villages, teaching, and healing their diſeaſes. Then went he into his own country, and his diſciples followed him, and he taught in their ſynagogues on the Sabbath days, and was again contemned of them and called the Carpenter: yet were they aſtoniſhed at his doctrine. Mark vi. 1, 6. Matth. xii. 54, 58. and he went round about their villages teaching. Mark vi. 6.

Jeſus was moved with compaſſion towards the multitude when he ſaw the great harveſt, and the few labourers, and thereupon commanded his diſciples that they ſhould 'pray the Lord that he would ſend forth labourers.' Matth. ix. 35, 38.

Then ſent Jeſus the twelve apoſtles by two and two, having ſufficiently inſtructed them with commands and power to preach, and to heal diſeaſes. Luke ix. 1, 5. Mark vi. 7, 11. Matth. x. 1, 42.

And it came to paſs when Jeſus had made an end of commanding his diſciples, that he departed thence to teach and preach in the cities, and the twelve departed, and went through the towns preaching the goſpel, and healing every where. Luke ix. 6. Matth. xi. 1, 12, 16.

About this time (November 7th.) Sejanus was killed: after whoſe death, Tiberius Cæſar ſoon knew that all the crimes which he had charged upon the Jews, were feigned by by himſelf: wherefore he commanded the governors of all the provinces, that in every town they ſhould ſpare that nation, except very few that were guilty perſons: but that they ſhould alter none of their cuſtoms, and ſhould make much account of them as lovers of peace, and their cuſtoms as conducing to public tranquillity.

About this time alſo was John Baptiſt beheaded. Mark vi. 17, 28. Matth. xvi. 6. 11, 12. and when his diſciples heard of it, they came, and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jeſus. Mark vi. 29.

The fame of Jeſus went abroad, Herod the Tetrarch, and others, hearing it, declared their opinions about him, and Herod deſired much to ſee him. Luke ix. 7, 8, 9. Mark vi. 14.

The apoſtles returning, told Jeſus what things they had done. Luke ix. 10. Mark vi. 30.

When Jeſus had heard of the death of John, and of the deeds of the apoſtles, he ſaid unto them, 'Come ye yourſelves apart into a deſert place, and reſt a while:' for by reaſon of the multitude they had not leiſure to eat: he therefore, taking the twelve with him, went by ſhip privately into a deſert place, of the city called Bethſeda: but when the multitude heard it, they followed him on foot out of all cities, and out went him, and he taught and healed them. Luke ix. 10, 11. Mark vi. 31, 32. Matth. xvi. 13, 14.

Then Jeſus went up into a mountain, and there ſat with his diſciples, and the paſſover was nigh. And when it was evening, he fed above five thouſand men, beſides women, and children, with five barley loaves, and two little fiſhes, and there remained twelve baſkets full of fragments. And when the Jews (ſeeing his miracles) would have made him a king; Jeſus conſtrained his diſciples to go before him unto the other ſide, oppoſite to Bethſeda, towards Capernaum: and he himſelf went into a mountain to pray: and when they had gone about five and twenty or thirty furlongs, in the fourth watch of the night, Jeſus went to them, walking upon the ſea, and would have paſſed by them: but they being affrighted, he told them who he was, rebuked Peter and ſaved him from ſinking, ſo that they were amazed: and they drew to ſhore and came to the land of Genazeret: and when he came out of the ſhip, as ſoon as it was known, they brought their ſick that they might touch the hem of his garment, and they were preſently made whole. John vi. 1, 21. Luke ix. 12, 17. Mark vi. 35. 56. Matth. xvi. 15, 36.

The next day after that Jeſus was paſſed over, the people which ſtood on this ſide the ſea, took ſhipping and came to Capernaum ſeeking Jeſus, to whom he preached in the ſynagogue of Capernaum about the Bread of Life, and affirmed to the Jews that murmured, that he was that Bread of Life. From that time many of his diſciples went back, but the apoſtles would not go away, notwithſtanding he called one of them a devil. John vi. 22, 27.

The third paſſover of the miniſtry of Chriſt, John vi. 4. From which the third year of the ſeventieth week of Daniel began.

THE Scribes and Phariſees which came from Jeruſalem, came to Jeſus, and when they ſaw ſome of his diſciples to eat with defiled, that is, unwaſhen hands, they found fault, becauſe they did not walk after the tradition of the elders, to whom Jeſus anſwered concerning traditions, that they fruſtrated the commands of God that they might keep the traditions of men: and he taught the people, which he alſo expounded to his diſciples at home, that nothing which enters into a man, but that which cometh from within, that defileth a man. Mark vii. 1, 23. Matth. xv. 1. 20.

Then he aroſe from thence and went into the borders of Tyre and Sydon, and he could not be hid. For a Canaaniti{ſ}h woman, a Gentile, a Syrophœnician by nation, came to him, earneſtly beſeeching him for her daughter, that was vexed with a devil; whom, when he had commended for the greatneſs of her faith, he caſt the devil out of her daughter. Mark vii. 24, 30. Matth. xv. 21, 28.

And again departing from the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the ſea of Galilee, through the midſt of the coaſt of Decapolis, and they brought unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his ſpeech, whom he healed, and charged him that he ſhould tell no man, but all in vain. Mark viii. 31, 37.

Then went he up into a mountain and ſat there, and healed many, ſo that the multitude wondered. Matth. xv. 29, 30, 31.

In thoſe days, when there was a very great multitude that had remained with him three days, he fed four thouſand men, beſides women and children, with ſeven loaves, and a few little fiſhes, and there remained ſeven baſkets full of fragments. Mark viii 1, 9. Matth. xv. 32, 38.

And ſtrait way Jeſus entered into a ſhip with his diſciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha, or the coaſts of Magdala. Mark viii 10. Matth. xv. 39.

And the Phariſees came to him, requiring a ſign from heaven, who after he had deeply ſighed, he denied any ſign but that of Jonas, to thoſe hypocrites, who knew how to diſcern the face of the ſky, but the ſigns of the times: and leaving them, he entered again into a ſhip and paſſed to the other ſide. Mark viii. 11, 12, 13. Matth. xvi. 1, 4.

And when his diſciples were come to the other ſide, they had forgotten to take bread, and they had but one loaf with them in the ſhip. Then Jeſus ſaid unto them, 'Take heed of the leaven of the Phariſees and Sadducees, and of the leaven of Herod:' and they reaſoned amongſt themſelves becauſe they had forgotten to take bread: but Jeſus rebuking them that they had forgotten the miraculous multiplication of the loaves, gave them to underſtand that he ſpake not of the leaven of bread, but of their doctrine. Mark viii. 14, 21. Matth. xvi. 5, 21.

Then came Jeſus to Bethſaida, and they brought to him a blind man, whom he led out of the town, and anointed his eyes with ſpittle, and he recovered his ſight, and Jeſus forbade him to tell it. Mark viii. 22, 76.

And Jeſus went with his diſciples into the towns of Cæſarea Philippi: and it came to paſs as he was alone praying, and was now in the way, that he aſked his diſciples, 'Whom do men ſay that I am?' When they had anſwered, he ſaid unto them, but 'whom do ye ſay that I am?' And when Peter anſwered, he pronounced him happy, annexing promiſes, and forbade his diſciples to tell any man that he was the Chriſt. He alſo foretold his death and reſurrection, and called Peter Satan, becauſe he rebuked him for ſo ſaying. Then he preached to his diſciples, and to the multitude, of the croſs, which every one muſt bear that would follow him, and at length foretold his tranſiguration. Luke vii. 18, 27. Mark viii. 27, 28. Matth. xvi. 13, 28.

And it came to paſs about eight days after theſe things (or ſix intermediate days) that he was tranſfigured in an high mountain. And when they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they ſhould tell no man what they had ſeen till he was riſen from the dead: and they kept it cloſe, queſtioning one with another, 'what the riſing from the dead ſhould mean,' and they aſked him, why do the Scribes ſay that Elias muſt firſt come; and they received an anſwer by which they underſtood that Jeſus ſpake of John Baptiſt, as that Elias. Luke vii. 28, 36. Mark ix. 1, 13. Matth. xvii. 1, 13.

And it came to paſs the next day when they were come down from the hill, and were come to his diſciples, he ſaw a great multitude about them, and the Scribes queſtioning with them: and ſtrait way when all the multitude ſaw him, they were greatly amazed, and running to him, ſaluted him: and as he was aſking about their queſtioning with his diſciples, the father of a lunatic child anſwered him, that it was about his child that had an unclean ſpirit, both deaf and dumb, and that his diſciples could not caſt him out. Then Jeſus having caſt out the ſpirit, reſtored the child to his father whole: and being at home, he ſhewed his diſciples the reaſon why they could not caſt out this devil. Luke vii. 37, 42. Mark ix. 14, 29. Matth. xvii. 14, 21.

And they departed thence and paſſed through Galilee, and he would not that any man ſhould know it: and he taught his diſciples concerning his death and reſurrection: but they underſtood not that ſaying, and being exceedingly ſorry, ſorry, were afraid to aſk him, Luke vii. 43, 44, 45. Mark ix. 30, 31, 32, Matth. xvii. 22, 23.

When they were come to Capernaum they aſked Peter about Jeſus his paying tribute money. And when Jeſus was come into the houſe, he prevented Peter, telling him, that he ſhould find a piece of money in a fiſhes mouth, and bade him pay that for tribute both for himſelf and for Jeſus, Matth. xvii. 24, 27.

At Capernaum Jeſus aſked his diſciples what it was that they diſputed of among themſelves by the way, at which, when they were ſilent at the firſt, they afterwards told him that it was, who ſhould be the greateſt in the kingdom of heaven: then Jeſus taking a child, and ſetting him in the midſt, taught them that they ſhould have humility even as a child. He alſo warned the world of offences, admoniſhing us to take heed that neither hand, foot, nor eye make us to offend. That little ones are not to be deſpiſed. How our brother ſinning againſt us, is to be reproved, as alſo to be bound and looſed by the church: and to be forgiven to ſeventy times ſeven times, as he ſhewed in that parable of the two debtors to the king, Luke vii. 46, 47, 48. Mark ix. 33, 37. Matth. xviii. 1, 35.

Then ſaid John to him, 'we ſaw one caſting out devils through thy name,' whom Jeſus taught that he was not to be forbidden, and again warned them not to offend little ones, and to take heed again that neither hand, foot, nor eye cauſe them to offend, Luke vii. 49, 50. Mark ix. 38, 40.

After theſe things Jeſus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Jewry, becauſe the Jews ſought to kill him. Now the feaſt of tabernacles was at hand: and Jeſus went not up to the feaſt, as his brethren would have him do, who as yet believed not on him: but he went up after them, not openly, but as it were in ſecret, John vii. 1, 10.

And it came to paſs that when the time was come that he ſhould be received, he ſet his face to go to Jeruſalem, and he ſent meſſengers before his face, and they went into a village of the Samaritans to make ready for him, but they would not receive him, wherefore they went into another city, and Jeſus rebuked his diſciples who would have commanded fire to come down from heaven upon them, Luke vii 51, 56.

And as they were paſſing in the way, Jeſus gave an anſwer particularly to ſome that would follow him, Luke vii. 57, 62.

After theſe things Jeſus ſent ſeventy diſciples by two and two into every city and place where he himſelf would come, giving them inſtructions, and arming them with power, Mark x. 1, 16.

The multitude enquiring after Jeſus at the feaſt, and murmuring concerning him, Jeſus in the midſt of the feaſt, taught in the temple: and they wondring at his doctrine, he anſwered, 'that his doctrine was not his own but his that ſent him:' He alſo anſwered many things to them who reproached, and objected againſt him, and officers were ſent to apprehend him. In the laſt and great day of the feaſt, Jeſus crying out concerning faith in him, there was a diviſion concerning him amongſt the people: but the officers which were ſent, and Nicodemus defended both his perſon and cauſe before the phariſees that ſpake againſt him, John vii. 11, 53.

Then went Jeſus unto the mount of Olives, and early in the morning he ſat and taught in the temple, where, being not willing to condemn the woman that was taken in adultery, he warned her to ſin no more. As he was teaching in the treaſury of the temple, he affirmed that he was the light of the world, and defended his bearing record of himſelf. He taught many things concerning the Father himſelf, and told them whither he goes, and who he is: alſo of their father Abraham: of the ſervitude of ſin and of the devil: of himſelf, that he had not a devil as they ſuppoſed: that whoſoever kept his ſayings ſhould not taſte of death, concluding with theſe words, before Abraham was, I am; whereupon they took up ſtones to throw at him: but Jeſus hid himſelf and went out of the temple, going through the midſt of them, and ſo paſſed by, John viii. 1, 59.

As Jeſus paſſed on the way, he ſaw one begging that was blind from his youth, who being made to ſee, after many examinations both of himſelf, and of his parents, he was caſt out of the ſynagogue, who afterwards meeting Jeſus, he worſhipped him, John ix. 1, 41.

Then preached Jeſus that he is the door of the ſheep, and the good Shepherd: as alſo concerning thieves, and hirelings: and there was again a diviſion amongſt the Jews for thoſe ſayings, John x. 1, 21.

At this time the ſeventy returned to him with joy, whom Jeſus further warned and inſtructed: and rejoicing in ſpirit, he told them privately that their eyes were happy, Luke x. 17, 24.

Then came to him a certain lawyer, aſking him, what he muſt do to inherit eternal life? Jeſus ſent him to the law, and by the parable of the man that fell amongſt thieves, taught him who was his neighbour, Luke x. 25, 37.

Afterwards it came to paſs, that as he went, he came to a certain town, and was received into the houſe of Martha, ſhe herſelf miniſtring to him, whilſt Mary heard the words of Jeſus, for which ſhe was preferred before Martha, Luke x. 38, 42.

And it came to paſs as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceaſed, one of his diſciples ſaid unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John taught his diſciples: whereupon he, the ſecond time preſcribed to them the Lord's prayer: uſing arguments alſo to ſtir them up to conſtancy in prayer, and for the confirmation of their faith in obtaining their ſuits, Luke xi. 1, 13.

Then caſt Jeſus a devil out that was dumb, and the multitude marvelled, and he confirmed againſt ſome blaſphemers, that he did not caſt out devils through Beelzebub, Luke xi. 14, 26.

When Jeſus had ſpoken theſe things, a certain phariſee deſired him that he would dine with him: and wondring that Jeſus had not firſt waſhed, he was ſeverely reprehended, with the reſt of the phariſees, by Jeſus for their outward holineſs, or ſimulation, and for their inward wickedneſs, covetouſneſs and pride: and he pronounced a wo likewiſe to the lawyers, Luke xi. 37, 54.

In the mean time when there was gathered together an innumerable company, Jeſus ſaid to his diſciples, 'Take heed of the leaven of the phariſees which is hypocriſy: and fear not them which kill the body, Luke xii. 1, 12.

And one of the company ſaid to him, Maſter ſpeak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me: to whom Jeſus ſaid, who made me a judge? And upon this occaſion he preached againſt covetouſneſs in the parable of the rich man that would build great barns: as alſo againſt all anxious, diſtruſtful, and unprofitable carking about the neceſſaries of this life; commanding them rather to ſeek the kingdom of God: and to be like them that wait for the coming of their Lord as becomes every faithful and wiſe ſteward: telling them that he would ſend the fire of diviſion into the earth, and upbraided them that they could not find out that that was the appointed time, Luke xii. 13, 59.

There were preſent at that ſeaſon ſome that told him of the Galileans, whoſe blood Pilate had mingled with their ſacrifices, from which occaſion he preached repentance, and propounded to them the parable of the fig-tree, that had no fruit, Luke xiii. 1, 9.

As he taught in one of their ſynagogues on the Sabbath day, behold, there was a woman that had a ſpirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together; whom Jeſus healed, and defended his deed againſt the ruler of the ſynagogue that was full of indignation. Then did he likken the kingdom of heaven to a grain of muſtard ſeed, and to leaven, Luke xiii. 10, 21.

Then went he through all the cities, and villages teaching, and journeying towards Jeruſalem, to wit, to the feaſt of dedication, Luke xiii. 22.

As

As he went, one said to him, are there few that shall be saved? To whom he answered, commanding to strive to enter in at the strait gate, Luke xiii. 23. 30.

On the same day some of the pharisees came to him, saying, Get thee out, and depart hence, for Herod will kill thee; to whom he gave a resolute answer, Luke xiii. 31. 35.

And it came to pass as he went into the house of one of the chief pharisees to eat bread, there was one present that had a dropsy, whom he healed, and defended the deed though it was done on the Sabbath day. He also spake a parable to them that were bidden, and instructed him that had invited him. Luke xiv. 1, 14.

And when one of them that sat at meat with him heard these things, he said unto him, 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God: to which Jesus answered and propounded to them the parable of the great supper, and of the several excuses that those that were invited, made. Luke xiv. 15, 24.

And there was a great multitude that went with him, and he turned and preached unto them, that life itself is to be laid down for Christ. He also propounded to them the parables of the man that was about to build a tower, and of the kings going to war. Luke xiv. 25, 35.

And there came to him all the Publicans and sinners for to hear him, and the Scribes and Pharisees murmured, whereupon he spake unto them the parables of the lost sheep, of the groat, and of the prodigal son. Luke xv. 1, 32.

He also told his disciples the parable of the unjust steward accused to his Lord: together with the application of the same: and the Pharisees, that were covetous, when they heard these things, derided him. Then preached he against them, and taught many other things, and declared the parable of the rich man faring deliciously, and of Lazarus the beggar. Luke xvi. 1, 31.

Moreover he said to his disciples, 'Wo to them by whom offences come,' and taught, that a brother sinning against a man is to be forgiven. Luke xvii. 1. 14.

Hereupon his disciples said to him, 'Lord encrease our faith,' to whom he answered concerning the power of faith; and by the parable of the servant coming from the plough and straight way ministring, he shewed that they are unprofitable servants when they have done all, having done no more than what was their duty. Luke xvii. 5. 10.

And it came to pass as he went to Jerusalem, that he passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, and as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten lepers, who, as they were going according to his command, to the priests, they were cleansed, of whom one of them came back to Jesus to give him thanks, and he was a Samaritan. Luke xvii. 11, 19.

The Pharisees asking Jesus when the kingdom of God would come? he answered, 'That the kingdom of God would not come with observation:' but that it is within: and further said to his disciples, that according to the days of Noah and Lot, so shall be the day in which the Son of man shall be revealed: but that he was first to suffer many things. Luke xvii. 20, 37.

Then spake he to them a parable that they should always pray, by the example of the widow interceeding to the unjust judge: whereas God is a righteous revenger. Luke xviii. 1, 8.

He spake also to some that persuaded themselves that they were just, and despised others, the parable of the Pharisee, and Publican praying in the temple. Luke xviii. 9, 14.

And it was at Jerusalem the feast of the Dedication, and it was winter, and Jesus walked in the temple of Solomon's porch: then came the Jews round about him and said unto him, 'How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou beest the Christ, tell us plainly?' which he avouched by his works, saying, 'I and the Father are one:' whereupon they again took up stones to stone him. And he defending himself to be God by the scriptures, and his works, they sought again to take him, but he escaped out of their hands. John x. 22, 39.

Then he went again beyond Jordan where John at first did baptize, and there he abode, and many resorted to him; and as he was wont, he taught them, and healed them and many believed on him there, Luke xviii. 40, 41, 42, Mark x. 1, 19. Matth. xix. 1, 2.

Then came to him the pharisees tempting him, saying, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? Jesus denied it, and gave an answer to the pharisees objecting the bill of divorce which Moses commanded: he answered his disciples also who said, that then its better for a man not to marry, Mark x. 2, 12. Matth xix. 3 12.

At this time they brought unto him little children that he should lay his hands upon them, and pray, and his disciples forbade them; for which, being rebuked by Jesus, he laid his hands upon them and blessed them, and then departed from thence. Luke xviii. 15, 16, 17. Mark x. 13, 16. Matth. xix. 13, 14, 15.

Jesus going from thence, as he was in the way, there met him a young man, one of the rulers, very rich, saying unto him, 'Good Master, what must I do to inherit eternal life?' And Jesus having spoken concerning the title that he gave him, sent him to the commandments, and he replying, that he had observed them, Jesus loved him: but bidding him to sell all that he had, and give it to the poor, he went away sorrowful. Luke xviii. 18, 30. Mark x. 17, 31. Matth. xix. 16, 30.

Then Jesus inveighed bitterly against covetous rich men: and when Peter said, 'Behold we have left all to follow thee,' he made notable promises to all such, whereof some were peculiar to the apostles: adding withal, 'that many which were last should be first, and the first should be last,' which he declared by a parable of labourers in a vineyard: For many were called but few chosen. Luke xviii. 28, 29, 30. Matth. xix. 27, &c. Mark x. 23. &c

Lazarus of Bethany being sick, his sisters sent to tell Jesus thereof, who as soon as he heard it, tarried two days in the place where he was: but afterwards he said to his disciples, 'Let us go again into Judea:' they said to him, 'the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again?' Jesus answering, said unto them, Lazarus sleepeth, (meaning that he was dead.) Let us go to him (said Thomas) that we may die with him. John xi. 1, 6.

Jesus came nigh to Bethany, and found that Lazarus had been buried four days: and Mary hearing of it, came quickly to him out of the town, where Martha also met him, and Jesus seeing her weep, he wept also, and coming to the grave, he bade them remove the stone, and giving thanks to his father, called Lazarus out of the grave, whereupon many believed on him: but some went to the Pharisees and told them what things Jesus had done. John ii. 17. 54.

Hereupon the Pharisees called a council, where Caiaphas prophesied concerning Jesus, and from that day they consulted together that they might put him to death, commanding that if any one knew where he was, they should give them notice that they might take him. Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews, but went unto a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples. John xi. 54.

After this they went up to Jerusalem, and as they were in the way, Jesus went before them, and they were afraid, and he again took the twelve, and began to tell them what things should happen unto him, but they understood none of those things. Luke xviii. 31, 34. Mark x. 32, 33, 34. Matth. xix. 17, 18, 19.

Then came to him James and John, the sons of Zebedee, and their mother, desiring that they might sit, the the one on his right hand, and the other on his left; but he repelled them with his answer, and when the rest were displeased with their request, he admonished them all, that he that would be great and first amongst them, must be the minister and servant of all. Mark x. 35, 45. Matth. xix. 20, 28.

And it came to pass when Jesus came nigh to Jericho, a certain blind man sat begging by the way side, and asking who it was that passed by, and hearing that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he (though he was rebuked) earnestly implored his mercy, and being called by Jesus, he received his sight, and followed him, glorifying God. Luke xviii. 35, 43.

Then Jesus entered, and passed through Jericho, and espying eſpying Zacheus in a ſycamore-tree, he ſaid unto him, I muſt abide at thy houſe to day, Luke xix. 1, 10.

And as Jeſus went out of Jericho, a great multitude followed him: and he reſtored ſight to two blind men, whereof Bartimeus was one, and they followed him, Mark x. 46. 52. Matth. xix. 29. 34.

Being come nigh to Jeruſalem, becauſe they thought that the kingdom of God ſhould immediately appear, as he went forwards, he told the parable of the noble man that went into a far country, who gave to his ten ſervants ten pounds to occupy therewith till he returned, and when he came back, knowing which had gained moſt by trading, he rewarded each of them according to the proportion of their gain, Luke xix. 11, 27.

Now the paſſover was at hand, and many went out of the country up to Jeruſalem before the paſſover, that they might purify themſelves, John xi. 55. 56, 57.

And Jeſus, ſix days before the paſſover, came to Bethany, and they made him a ſupper, and Lazarus ſat with him, and Mary anointed his feet, and wiped them with the hairs of her head, whom Jeſus defended againſt Judas: and much people came thither, not only for Jeſus ſake, but that they might ſee Lazarus: but the chief prieſts conſulted how they might put Lazarus to death, becauſe many of the Jews believed by reaſon of him, John xii. 1, 11. Mark xi. 1, 7. Matth. xxi. 1, 7. Luke xix. 28 35.

After this Jeſus went before, aſcending up to Jeruſalem; and it came to paſs that when he was nigh to Bethphage, and Bethany, at the mount of Olives (the 29th day of our March) he ſent two of his diſciples for an aſs colt that was ty'd. Matthew mentions the dam alſo: and they brought the colt unto Jeſus, and caſt their garments on the colt, and ſet him thereon, and much people that came to the feaſt, met him, many caſting their garments in the way, and others cut down branches of the trees and ſtrewed them in the way, and when he was come unto the decent of the mount of Olives, the company that went before and that followed, cried, 'Hoſanna to the Son of David; then ſaid ſome of the phariſees to him, Maſter, rebuke thy diſciples: Jeſus anſwered them; and the phariſees thereupon ſaid amongſt themſelves, perceive ye not that we prevail no thing? Behold the world is gone after him, John xii. 12, 18. Luke xix. 36, 40. Mark xi. 8, 9, 10. Matth. xix. 8, 9.

When Jeſus was come nigh, ſeeing the city, he wept over it, foretelling the utter deſtruction thereof, John xii. 19. Luke xix. 41, 42, Mark xi. 10, 11.

And when he was entred into Jeruſalem, all the city was moved ſaying, who is this? And Jeſus entred into the temple of God, and caſt out thoſe that bought and ſold in it, and healed both blind, and lame in it: and juſtified the children who cried, Hoſanna, in the temple, againſt the prieſts, and ſcribes that were diſpleaſed at it. He alſo taught daily in the temple, thoſe that heard him being very attentive: but the chief prieſts and elders of the people ſought to deſtroy him, Luke xix. 45, 46. Mark xi. 11. Matth. xxi. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

Some Greeks of thoſe that came to worſhip at the feaſt, deſired to ſee Jeſus, and he anſwered them that told him: alſo by preaching of his paſſion, and calling upon his Father he received an anſwer from heaven, which ſome thought to be thunder, others an angel: and ſpeaking again of the lifting up of the Son of man from the earth, he anſwered them that aſked him, 'who this Son of man was?' Then going from thence, he hid himſelf from them: and when it was evening, he went with his diſciples unto Bethany: and though he had done ſo many miracles amongſt them, yet did they not believe, that the word of Iſaias might be fulfilled. Yet nevertheleſs many of the rulers believed on him, but did not confeſs him for fear of the Phariſees. Jeſus crying out therefore, preached concerning faith in him. John xii. 20, 50. Mark ii. 17.

On the morrow when he came from Bethany, he was an hungry, and ſeeing a fig-tree that had only leaves on it, he curſed it, and it ſtraitway withered. Then they came to Jeruſalem, and entring into the temple, he again caſt out thoſe that ſold and bought there, and would not that any ſhould carry a veſſel through the temple; and crying out, he taught concerning faith in himſelf: but the chief prieſts ſought how they might deſtroy him: for they feared him, becauſe all the people were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine: and when evening was come Jeſus went out of the city, Mark xi. 12, 19. Matth: xxi. 18, 19.

And when they returned in the morning, as they paſſed by the fig-tree, they ſaw that it was dried up by the roots, which Peter ſhewing to Jeſus, he preached unto them of the power and virtue of faith, but eſpecial in prayers. And they came again into Jeruſalem, and as he was walking in the temple and teaching, the chief prieſts, elders, and ſcribes came unto him ſaying, by what authority doſt thou theſe things? Jeſus anſwered by aſking them concerning John's baptiſm. He alſo ſpake unto them the parable of the two ſons, aſking them, which of the two did the will of his father? and applied it unto them. As alſo the parable of the vineyard let out to huſband men, and of their killing the heir of the vineyard, together with the application thereof: and from that hour they ſought to take him: but they feared the people, for they took him for a prophet. Again he propounded to them the parable of the marriage of the king's ſon, and the refuſals, and excuſes of ſome that were bidden, and the wickedneſs and puniſhments of others, eſpecially of him that had not on the wedding garment. Then went the phariſees, and took counſel how they might entangle him in his talk: wherefore they ſent out unto him their diſciples, with the Herodians ſaying, Is it lawful to give tribute to Ceſar, or not? Theſe being aſtoniſhed at his anſwer, left him, and went their way, Luke xx. 1, 8, 9, 19, 20, 40. Mark xi. 20, 33, and 12, 1, 12, 13, 37. Matth. xxi. 19, 46, and 22. 1, 46.

The ſame day there came to Jeſus the Saduces, aſking him of the woman that had ſeven brethren to her huſbands, which of them ſhould be her huſband in the reſurrection, and when the multitude had heard his anſwer whereby he proved the reſurrection, they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine: then a phariſee that was a lawyer, tempted him, aſking which was the great commandment in the law? to whom he anſwered, and aſked the phariſee whoſe ſon Chriſt is? and no man was able to anſwer him a word, neither durſt any man from that day forth, aſk him any more queſtions, Luke xx. 41, 44.

Then ſpake Jeſus to the multitude, and to his diſciples concerning the ſcribes and phariſees, denouncing eight woes againſt them: and turning his ſpeech to the city of Jeruſalem, he accuſed her of cruelty, and obſtinacy, and foretold her deſolation, Luke xx. 45, 46, 47. Mark xii. 38, 30, 40. Matth. xxiii. 1, 39.

And as Jeſus ſat over againſt the treaſury he ſaw a widow caſting in two mites, whom he preferred before them that caſt in more, Luke xxi. 1, 4. Mark xii. 41, 44.

When he was gone out of the temple his diſciples ſhewed him the ſtately buildings, and ſtones of it, whereupon he foretold the ruin thereof, Luke xxi. 5, 36. Mark xiii. 1, 37. Matth. xxiv. 1, 51.

And as he ſat on the mount of Olives over againſt the temple, his diſciples aſked him when theſe things ſhould be, and what ſhould be the ſign of his coming, and of the end of the world? To whom he at large anſwered concerning the ſigns of them both: and warned them to watch, and be ready, becauſe they knew not the hour when the Lord would come, and he taught the ſame thing by the parable of the ten virgins: as alſo by the parable of the talents delivered to the ſervants to trade withal; and deſcribed the judgment of this world (perhaps as a type of that) by ſetting the ſheep on the right hand, and the goats on the left, and giving ſentence upon each of them. By day he taught in the temple, but at night he went into the mount of Olives: and all the people came unto him early in the morning, and he taught them in the temple, Matth. xxv. 1, 46. Luke xxi. 37, 38.

And it came to paſs when Jeſus had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he ſaid unto his diſciples, Ye know that after two days is the paſſover, and the Son of man ſhall be betrayed to be crucified: about which time they conſulted together in the palace of the high prieſt, that they might kill Jeſus: but they ſaid, not on the feaſt day, leſt there be an uproar amongſt the people, Mark xiv. 1, 2. Matth. xxvi. 1, 5.

As Jeſus was in the houſe of Simon the leper, he defended a woman that poured an alabſter box of ointment on his head, as he ſat at meat, againſt his diſciples that murmured mured at it, and foretold his burial, Mark xiv. 3, 9. Matth. xxvi. 6, 13.

Then entred Satan into Judas, who offered himself and covenanted to betray him, Luke xxii. 1, 3. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Matth. xxvi. 14, 15, 16.

The fourth and last Passover, in which Christ (our passover) was sacrificed, 1 Cor. v. 7 and so an end was put to all the Legal Sacrifices which prefigured this only one. The fourth, or middle year of the last week of Daniel now beginning, Dan. ix. 27.

IN the first day of unleavened bread, when the passover was slain (April 2.) his disciples asked him where they should prepare it? Then he sent Peter and John into the city, telling them that there should meet them a man bearing a pitcher of water, by following of whom, they should find a guest-chamber ready furnished by the good man of the house, Mark xiv. 12, 16. Matth. xxvi. 17, 18, 19.

And in the evening he went thither with the twelve, and when they had sat down and eaten, Jesus said, I have greatly desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer: and he commanded them to divide the cup amongst themselves: saying, I will not any more eat of the passover, or drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come; then said he, one of you shall betray me, and they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto him one by one, Is it I? and he answered, It is he that dippeth his hand with me in the dish: and to Judas, asking is it I? he answered, Thou hast said, Luke xxii. 14, 18. Mark xiv. 17, 18. 21. Matth. xxvi. 21, 25.

Also whilst they were eating, Jesus instituted the sacrament of his body and blood in bread and wine, after he had supped, adding, I will not henceforth drink of the fruit of the vine, till I shall drink new with you in the kingdom of my Father? But, behold, saith he, the hand of him that betrays me, is with me at the table, then they began to enquire amongst themselves if any among them should do this, Luke xxii. 19, 23. Mark xiv. 22, 25. Matth. xxvi. 25, 26.

There was also a strife amongst them which of them should be accounted greatest: when supper was ended, Jesus arose and laid aside his garments, and took a towel and girded himself therewith, and began to wash, and wipe his disciples feet, and Peter's also, who at first denied it, but afterwards desired it. This being done, Jesus sat down again, saying, I have shewed you an example, that as I have done, you might likewise wash one anothers feet: he that will be greatest amongst you, let him be the least: yet he added, I do not speak of you all; for I know whom I have chosen. When he had said these things he was troubled in spirit and testified, saying, One of you shall betray me: his disciples therefore looking one upon another, were uncertain of whom he spake; Peter therefore beckened to the beloved disciple that he should ask who it was: Jesus answered, he it is to whom I shall give a sop after I have dipped it, and he gave the sop to Judas, and said unto him, what thou dost, do quickly. Judas having received the sop went out immediately; and it was night, John xiii. 2, 38. Luke xxii. 24, 30.

When Judas was gone out, Jesus said, now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him: and he told them of his sudden departure, and exhorted them to the mutual love one of another. He said also, Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired you, that he might winnow you as wheat: but I have pray'd for thee: and do thou strengthen thy brethren; and when Peter, too confidently, said, I will lay down my life for thee, he answered, the cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice. Then said he unto them, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and he that hath not a sword, let him buy one: some answering here are two swords, he said, It is enough, Luke xxii. 31, 38.

Then did Jesus comfort them against the sorrow which they conceived for his death; and to the questions of Thomas, Philip, and Judas (who is also Lebbæus, surnamed Thaddæus, another of the sons of Alphæus, and brother of James) he answered every one particularly, promising them that the Holy Ghost should be their teacher: and left his peace with them: and again admonished them of his approaching death, and of the joyful fruit thereof: adding, arise, let us go hence: and when they had sung an hymn, they went out towards the mount of Olives, John xvi. 1, 31. Mark xiv. 26. Matth. xxvi. 30.

In the way as they were going, by the parable of the vine, and the branches, he exhorted them to bring forth fruit, and to remain in the love of God towards them, and mutually to love one another, and to abide patiently the hatred of the world, which hates Christ himself: and that they should not be offended for persecutions, John xv. 27. And again he comforted them against sorrow for his death by the promise of sending them the Comforter, the spirit of truth, whose office against the world, and towards them he describeth. And admonisheth them that 'yet a little while and they shall not see him:' and they not understanding what that meaned, he explained it unto them: and told them that their aforesaid sorrow should be turned into joy, by the example of a woman bringing forth a man child: as also by the promise of his returning to them, by the love of the Father towards them, and by his ready hearing of their petitions, that they should make in his name. And when he said, 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world,' and again, 'I leave the world and go unto the Father,' his disciples answered, Lo, now thou speakest plainly: we believe thou camest from God: to this Jesus replied, that the time was now come that they should be scattered every one to his own, and that himself should be left alone, and at last concluded with a most divine prayer to the Father for the mutual illustration of his own, and the Father's glory: as also for the apostles, and the whole company of believers. John xvi. 1, 33. and xvii. 1, 26.

When Jesus had spoken these things, he went with his disciples (as he was wont over the brook Cedron, to the mount of Olives. Then said Jesus unto them, 'all ye shall be offended because of me this night. But after I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee:' and when Peter said, 'Though all men should be offended, yet will not I;' Jesus said, 'To day, even this night before the cock-crow thou shalt deny me thrice:' but both he and all the disciples replied, 'Though we should die with thee, yet we will not deny thee. John xviii. 1. Luke xxii. 39. Mark xiv. 27, 31. Matth xxvi. 31. 35, 36.

Then came they to a place called Gethsemane, where was a garden into which Jesus entered, and his disciples, unto whom he said, 'Pray ye that ye enter not into temptation: sit here, while I go and pray yonder'. And he took Peter, and the two sons of Zebedee with him, and began to be very sorrowful, and he said unto them, 'Tarry here and watch,' and going from them about a stone's cast, he kneeled down and prayed that the cup might pass from him: and there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening him. Then he returned and finding his disciples sleeping, he reprehended and admonished them: and then went the second time, and prayed more earnestly, and being in an agony, his sweat was as drops of blood: and coming again, he found them sleeping for sorrow, for their eyes were heavy: and therefore he again admonished them, and they knew not what to answer. Then left he them, and went away again and prayed the same words: after which coming to his disciples, he said unto them, 'Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold the time is come, and the son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners: arise, let us be going: behold he is at hand that doth betray me.' Luke xxii. 46. Mark xiv. 32, 42. Matth. xxvi. 36. 46.

While Jesus yet spake, behold Judas (who knew the place, because Jesus often resorted thither with his disciples) with the chief priests, Pharisees, captains of the temple, and elders of the people, and officers, and a band sent from them, came thither with lanthorns, and torches, and a great multitude with swords and staves. And Judas had given them a sign, saying, 'Whomsoever I shall kiss, the same is he, and he straight way kissed Jesus: to whom Jesus said, 'Wherefore art thou come? Betrayest thou the son of man with a kiss?' John xviii. 23. Luke xxii. 47, 48 Mark xiv. 43, 44, 47. Matth. xxvi. 47. 56. But Jesus knowing all things that should come unto him, went out, and said unto them, whom seek ye, they said unto him, Jesus of Nazareth, Jesus said unto them, 'I am he:' and they went backwards and fell to the ground. He aſked them again, and anſwered them as at firſt: adding, 'If ye ſeek me, let theſe go away. John xviii. 4. 9. Then they took him; and when thoſe that were about Jeſus ſaw what would follow, they ſaid to him, 'Lord ſhall we ſmite with the ſword?' And Peter ſtruck off the right ear of Malchus. To whom Jeſus ſaid, 'Put up thy ſword: cannot I pray, and have more than twelve legions of angels? Shall not I drink of the cup that my Father hath given me? Suffer you thus far:' and he touched his ear and healed him. And Jeſus ſaid unto them, 'Do you come as out againſt a thief with ſwords and ſtaves? But this is your hour, and the power of darkneſs.' Then all his diſciples left him and fled, and a certain young man (of their company) being laid hold of, left his linen cloth, and fled from them, John xviii. 10. 11 Luke xxii. 49, 50, 51. Mark xiv. 48, 52. Matth. xxvi 57 75.

Then they bound Jeſus, and brought him, firſt to Annas the father in law of Caiaphas, who ſent him bound to Caiaphas the high prieſt, who formerly had propheſied, that it was 'expedient that one man ſhould die for the people.' There were all the chief prieſts, and elders, and ſcribes of the people gathered together. Then Caiaphas aſked Jeſus concerning his diſciples, and his doctrine: Jeſus anſwered 'I ſpake openly to the world, aſk them that heard me?' then one of the officers ſmote him with a ſtaff: to whom he ſaid, 'If I have well ſpoken, why ſmiteſt thou me?' then all the council ſought falſe witneſſes againſt him, and found none. At laſt two witneſſes came, but their teſtimony agreed not. Caiaphas then ſaid, 'Anſwereth thou not to what they witneſs againſt thee?' But Jeſus held his peace. Then he adjured him to tell whether he were the Chriſt, and Jeſus anſwered, 'I am: and ye ſhall ſee the ſon of man ſitting at the right hand of the power of God, and coming in the clouds of heaven.' Wherefore they judged him guilty of death for this blaſphemy. Then did they mock him, and ſpit upon him, and cruelly beat him with buffets and ſtaves: and covering his face, they ſaid, 'Propheſy who ſmote thee?' and many other things ſpoke they againſt him reproachfully. John xviii. 12. 27. Luke xxii. 54. 65. Mark xiv. 53. 72. Matth. xxvi. 57. 75.

Peter followed afar off that he might ſee the end; and ſo did another diſciple that was known to the high prieſt, and went with Jeſus into the palace, but Peter ſtood without at the door: then that other diſciple ſpake to her that kept the door, and brought him in. And as Peter was warming himſelf at the fire (for it was cold) the maid that kept the door aſked him, and affirmed that he was one of his diſciples, but he denied it, or that he knew him, or knew what ſhe ſaid. A little after he went out into the porch, and the cock crew. And as he was going out another maid ſaw him, and ſaid to the by-ſtanders, 'This fellow was alſo with Jeſus of Nazareth;' alſo another ſaid, 'Thou art alſo one of them:' then he again denied it with an oath: and about an hour after, they that ſtood by ſaid, 'Thy ſpeech bewrayeth thee:' and the couſin of Malchus amongſt the reſt ſaid, 'Did not I ſee thee in the garden with him?' and while he yet ſpake, the cock crew the ſecond time: then the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter, and he remembering the words of Jeſus, went out, and wept bitterly. John xviii. 25. &c. Luke xxii. 55, &c. Mark xiv. 66. &c. Matth. xxvi. 69, &c.

As ſoon as it was day, the elders of the people and the chief prieſts, and the ſcribes, came together, and led him into their council, ſaying, 'Art thou the Chriſt:' Jeſus ſaid unto them, 'Ye will not believe, nor anſwer me, nor let me go.' Yet he ſaid, that he was the Son of God: to which they replied, what need we any further witneſs. Luke xxii. 66, 67.

Then ſtraitway in the morning the whole multitude of them aroſe, and led him bound to Pontius Pilate, the governor: from Caiaphas to the hall of judgment (April 3d) But they went not into the judgment hall leſt they ſhould be defiled that they could not eat the paſſover: and Jeſus ſtood before the governor. Pilate therefore came forth unto them, and ſaid, 'What accuſation bring you againſt this man?' they anſwered, 'If he were not a malefactor, we would not have delivered him up unto thee:' and they accuſed him, ſaying, 'We found this man perverting the nation, and forbidding to pay tribute unto Cæſar, ſaying, that he himſelf is Chriſt a king;' and when he was accuſed of the chief prieſts and elders, he anſwered nothing. Then ſaid Pilate, 'Heareſt thou how many things they witneſs againſt thee?' But he anſwered him not a word, ſo that Pilate marvelled. Then ſaid Pilate to them, 'Take ye him, and judge him according to your law:' but they replied, 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death?' Pilate then entered into the judgment hall again, and calling Jeſus, ſaid unto him, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?' Jeſus anſwered, 'Sayeſt thou this of thyſelf, or did others tell it thee of me?' Pilate ſaid, 'Am I a Jew? thine own nation, and the chief prieſts have delivered thee unto me: what haſt thou done?' Jeſus anſwered, 'My kingdom is not of this world.' Pilate therefore ſaid unto him, 'Art thou then a king?' Jeſus anſwered, for this cauſe came I into the world, that I might bear witneſs unto the truth.' Then ſaid Pilate to him, 'What is truth?' And when he had ſaid this, he went out again to the Jews, and ſaid unto them, 'I find in him no fault at all.' And they were the more fierce, ſaying, 'He ſtirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning in Galilee to this place.' Pilate hearing of Galilee, aſked him if he were a Galilean? and when he knew that he belonged to Herod's juriſdiction, he ſent him to Herod, who was in Jeruſalem in thoſe days. When Herod ſaw Jeſus he was exceeding glad; but being deceived of his hopes of ſeeing a miracle, and Jeſus not vouchſafing any anſwer, either to him, or to the chief Prieſts and Scribes that vehemently accuſed him, after he had ſet Jeſus at naught, and mocked him, he ſent him back to Pilate, arrayed in a gorgeous robe; and Herod and Pilate were made friends that very day. John xviii. 28. 40. Luke xxiii 1. 16. 25. Mark xv. 1. 5. Matth. xxvii. 11. 26.

Then Pilate, when he had called the chief prieſts and the rulers, and the people, he ſaid unto them, 'Neither I nor Herod find any fault in him, nor any thing worthy of death; I will therefore chaſtiſe him and releaſe him.' For he was of neceſſity (according to the cuſtom), every feaſt, to deliver to the people one priſoner, whomſoever they would. And the multitude crying out aloud, began to deſire that he would do unto them as he ever had done. Then ſaid Pilate, 'Ye have a cuſtom that I ſhould releaſe one unto you at the Paſſover: will ye therefore that I releaſe unto you the king of the Jews, or Barabbas?' For he knew that the chief prieſts had delivered him up of envy: but they ſtirred up the people that they ſhould rather deſire Barabbas, who was a notable thief, who lay bound for inſurrection and murder in the city. When Pilate was ſet down on the judgment ſeat, his wife ſent to him, ſaying, 'Have thou nothing to do with that juſt man; for I have ſuffered many things in my dream by reaſon of him this day.' Pilate therefore ſpake unto them again, being willing to releaſe Jeſus, 'Which of them will ye that I releaſe unto you? They all cried out, ſaying, 'Not him but Barabbas. Pilate replied, 'What then will ye that I ſhall do unto him whom ye call king of the Jews?' and they all cried out again, 'Crucify him.' Pilate ſaid unto them the third time, 'Why? what evil hath he done? I find no cauſe of death in him; I will therefore chaſtiſe him and let him go.' But they cried the more earneſtly, 'Crucify him;' and were very inſtant, with loud voices, deſiring the ſame. Mark xv 6 15.

Then Pilate took Jeſus and ſcourged him, and the ſoldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and clothed him with purple, ſaying, 'Hail king of the Jews,' and beat him with ſtaves. Pilate therefore went forth again unto them, and ſaid unto them, 'Behold, I bring him forth unto you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him.' Then Jeſus came forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the robe; and Pilate ſaid unto them, 'Behold the man!' When the chief prieſts and officers ſaw him, they cried out, ſaying, 'Crucify him! Crucify him!' Pilate replied, 'Take ye him and crucify him, for I find no fault in him.' Then ſaid the Jews, 'He ought to die, becauſe he made himſelf the Son of God.' When Pilate heard that, he was the more afraid, and went again into the judgment hall, and ſaid to Jeſus, 'Whence art thou?' But Jeſus gave him no anſwer.

Then

Then said Pilate to him, 'Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee?' Jesus answered, 'Thou couldest have no power, unless it were given thee from above.' From thenceforth Pilate sought to release him; but the Jews cried out, 'Then art thou not Cæsar's friend.' When Pilate heard this, he sat on the judgment seat, in the place called the Pavement, and it was the preparation of the Passover, and about the sixth hour: then said he to the Jews, 'Behold your king!' The chief priests answered, 'We have no king but Cæsar.' When Pilate therefore saw that he prevailed nothing, but rather a tumult was made, he took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see you to it.' And all the people answered, and said, 'His blood be upon us and our children.' Then Pilate being willing to content the multitude, released unto them Barabbas: and when he had scourged Jesus, he delivered him over to their will, that he might be crucified. John xix. 1. 16. 17. 30.

Then the soldiers of the governor, when they had led Jesus into the hall called Prætonium, they called together the whole band; and when they had stripped him, they put upon him a scarlet robe, and platted a crown of thorns and put it on his head, and a reed in his right hand, and bowing the knee, they mocked him, saying, 'Hail, king of the Jews.' And when they had spit on him, they took the reed, and smote him on the head; and when they had mocked him, they took off the purple, and put his own cloaths on him, and led him out to crucify him. Matth. xxvii. 27. 31. Mark xv. 16. 17.

Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests, confessing his sin unto them; and casting the silver pieces into the temple, went and hanged himself: and they bought with them the Potters field that the prophecy might be fulfilled. Matth. xvii. 5. &c.

And Jesus came forth carrying his cross; but as they were leading him, they found one Simon of Cyrene, as he came out of the country, whom they took, and compelled to carry the cross after Jesus: there were also two thieves that were led with him to be crucified. And there followed a great multitude of people, and of women that lamented, to whom Jesus turned, and foretold the lamentable destruction of Jerusalem. And when they were come unto the place called Calvary, but in the Hebrew Golgotha, they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrhe, and vinegar mingled with gall, and when he had tasted it, he would not drink it; and they crucified him there (and it was the third hour), and two thieves with him, one on the right hand, and the other on the left. And Jesus said, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do?' And Pilate wrote a superscription in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and put it on the cross; which, at the request of the chief priests, Pilate would not alter. And after they had crucified him, they divided his garments into four parts, to every soldier that was employed in his execution a part, and cast lots for his seamless coat, whose it should be, that the scripture might be fulfilled; and sitting down, they watched him there, and the people stood beholding him: but they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, and saying, 'Oh! thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself: if thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross.' Likewise also, the chief priests and rulers, with the people, and scribes and elders, mocking and scoffing, said amongst themselves, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save. If he be the king of Israel; if that Christ be the chosen of God, let him come down from the cross, and we will believe him; he trusted in God, let him deliver him now if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God.' The soldiers also mocked him, and coming to him, offered him vinegar, saying, 'If thou be the king of the Jews, save thyself.' The thieves also that were crucified with him cast the same in his teeth; and one of them continuing his railing against him, the other being converted rebuked him, and said unto Jesus, 'Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.' To whom Jesus answered, 'To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' And there stood by his cross the mother of Jesus, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene. When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple whom he loved standing by, he said to his mother, 'Behold thy Son!' and to the disciple, 'Behold thy mother.' And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over all the land, or country, until the ninth hour; and about the ninth hour, Jesus cried out with a loud voice, 'Eli, Eli, lamma sabacthani?' and some that stood by said, he calleth Elias. Luke xxiii. 26. 38. Matth. xxvii. 32. 50. Luke xxiii. 44. 45. 46.

After this, when Jesus knew that all things were accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, said, 'I thirst.' Now there was set there a vessel full of vinegar, and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop or a reed, and put it to his mouth, saying, with the rest, 'Let alone, let us see if Elias will come to save him, and take him down.' But Jesus, when he had received the vinegar, said, 'It is finished.' And then again he cried with a loud voice, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit;' and bowing his head he gave up the ghost. And when the centurion saw that he so cryed out, and gave up the ghost, he glorified God, saying, 'Truly this is a just man; truly this is the Son of God. Mark xv. 38. 42.

And behold the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent, and the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. And the centurion, and they that stood over against, and they that watched Jesus, when they saw the earthquake, and the things that were done, feared greatly, saying, 'Truly this was the Son of God.' And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things that were done, smote their breasts, and returned: and his acquaintance, and the women which followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Less, and mother of Joses, and Salome, who also when he was in Galilee followed him, and ministered unto him, and many other women that came up to Jerusalem with him. Luke xxiii. 47. 48. 49. Matth. xxvii, 51. 56.

The Jews therefore, that the bodies should not remain on the cross on the Sabbbath (for that Sabbath was an high day), because it was the preparation, besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken down. The soldiers therefore came and brake the legs of the two thieves, but not of Jesus, because he was already dead. Yet one of them with a spear pierced his side, and there came out blood and water, and these things were done that the scriptures might be fulfilled. John xix. 31. 37.

And when the even was now come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, there came Joseph of Arimathea, a rich man, and an honourable councellor, who also looked for the kingdom of God, a good and a just man, and one who had not consented to the counsel and deed of them; being a disciple, but secretly, for fear of the Jews, came boldly to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus: Pilate marvelled that he was already dead, and calling the centurion, asked him, and when he knew it, he gave the body to Joseph. There came also Nicodemus (which at first came to Jesus by night), and brought a mixture of myrrhe and aloes, about a hundred pound weight; and they took the body of Jesus, and wrapped it in a linen cloth with the spices, as the manner the Jews was to bury. And Joseph laid it in his own new sepulchre, which he had hewen out of a rock, wherein yet never man was laid, and which was in a garden in the place where Jesus was crucified, rolling a great stone to the door of the sepulchre; and Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of Joses, who came with him from Galilee, beheld where they laid him, sitting over against the sepulchre; and they returned and prepared spices and ointments, and rested the Sabbath day, according to the commandment. John xix. 38. 42. Luke xxiii. 50. 56 Mark xv. 42. 47. Matth. xxvii. 57. 61.

The next day [April 4.] the Pharisees betought Pilate, that he would command the sepulchre to be made sure until til the third day, adding their reaſon, which, when he had yielded to, they went and made the ſepulchre ſure, ſealing the ſtone, and ſetting a watch.

In the end of the Sabbath, or when the Sabbath was now paſt [April 5th] when it dawned towards the firſt day of the week, in the morning very early whilſt it was yet dark, came Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Salome, bringing ſpices which they had bought, that they might ſee the ſepulchre, and anoint Jeſus: and they ſaid, who ſhall roll away the ſtone from the door for us? and when the ſun was riſen, coming to the ſepulchre they ſaw the ſtone rolled away: for behold there was a great earth-quake: for the angel of the Lord came down from heaven and rolled away the ſtone, and ſat upon it: and they went in, but found not the body of the Lord Jeſus: and it came to paſs, as they were much perplexed thereat, behold two men came to them in ſhining raiment; their countenances were as lightening, and their garments white as ſnow. Matthew and Mark mention but one angel: and the keepers for fear did ſhake, and became as dead men. And when the women were afraid and bowed their faces to the earth, the angels ſaid to them, 'fear not ye, I know that ye ſeek Jeſus that was crucified: but why ſeek ye the living amongſt the dead? He is not here: he is riſen as he is ſaid, come and ſee the place where the Lord was laid, and remember what he ſaid, whilſt he was in Galilee with you ſaying, The Son of man muſt be delivered into the hands of ſinful men, and be crucified, and the third day riſe again: but go ye quickly, and tell his diſciples, and Peter, that he is riſen from the dead, and behold he goes before you into Galilee, there ye ſhall ſee him, behold, I have told you.' Then the women remembred the words of Jeſus, and they departed quickly out of the ſepulchre with fear and wonder, and great joy, and ran to tell his diſciples: but they ſaid nothing to any man as they went; for they were afraid. And when the women told theſe things to the eleven, and to all the reſt, their words ſeemed to them as idle tales. But Mary Magdalene telling Peter, and the other diſciple whom Jeſus loved, 'They have taken away the Lord and we know not where they have laid him;' Peter and that other diſciple went out, and came to the ſepulchre; but that other diſciple did out run Peter, and came firſt to the ſepulchre, and when he ſtooped down, he ſaw the linen cloaths lying, but went not in. Then came Peter following him, and went into the ſepulchre, and ſaw the linen cloaths ly, and the napkin that was about his head not lying with them, but wrapped together in a place by itſelf: then went in that other diſciple, and ſaw and believed, and Peter went unto his own home, wondring at what was done; for as yet they knew not the ſcriptures, that he muſt riſe again from the dead. And the diſciples went to their own home. But Mary Magdalene ſtood without at the ſepulchre weeping, and whilſt ſhe wept, ſhe ſtooped down in the ſepulchre and ſaw two angels in white, ſitting, the one at the head, the other at the feet, where the body of Jeſus had lain; and they ſaid unto her: 'woman why weepeſt thou? She ſaid, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him;' and when ſhe had thus ſaid, ſhe turned back, and ſaw Jeſus, but knew not that it was he. And Jeſus ſaid to her, why weepeſt thou? Whom ſeekeſt thou? ſhe, ſuppoſing that it had been the gardiner, ſaid, if thou haſt born him hence, tell me where thou haſt laid him, and I will take him away; Jeſus ſaid to her, touch me not, but go and tell my brethren ſaying, I go, &c. And ſhe came and told his diſciples, and thoſe that had been with him, as they were weeping, and mourning, that ſhe had ſeen the Lord, and that he had ſaid theſe things to her; but they believed her not. And as the women went from the ſepulchre (perhaps Mary Magdalene was abſent) that they might tell his diſciples, behold Jeſus met them, and ſaid unto them, all hail, and they came and held him by the feet, and worſhipped him. Then ſaid Jeſus to them, be not afraid, go and tell my brethren that I go into Galilee, there they ſhall ſee me. John xx. 1, 2, 18. Luke xxiv. 1, 12. Mark xiv. 1, 11. Matth. xxviii. 1, 8, 9, 10.

Now when they were going, behold the watch went into the city, and ſhewed to the chief prieſts all the things that were done; and when they were aſſembled with the elders, they took counſel, and gave large money to the ſoldiers that they ſhould ſay, That his diſciples came and ſtole him away whilſt they ſlept; and if it come to the governor's ears (ſaid they) we will perſuade him, and ſecure you. So they took the money, and did as they were taught; and this ſaying is commonly reported amongſt the Jews to this day. Matth. xxviii. 11, 15.

And two of them went into the country that ſame day to a village ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, called Emaus; and as they journeyed, Jeſus went along with them; and they, telling what things were done concerning Jeſus of Nazareth, how he was crucified, and that he roſe again, &c. Jeſus ſhewed them out of the ſcriptures that it behoved Chriſt to ſuffer, and to enter into his glory. And in the village, when he had taken bread, and given thanks, and broken it, he was known to them, their eyes being opened, though he appeared in another form, and he vaniſhed out of their ſight. And they roſe up that ſame hour, and returned to Jeruſalem to the eleven, who ſaid to theſe two, 'The Lord is riſen indeed, and hath appeared unto Simon.' Then they told, them what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread; but neither believed they them Luke xxiv. 13. 35. Mark xiv. 12. 13.

Whilſt they yet ſpake, it being eveing, in the firſt day of the week, the doors being ſhut where the diſciples were gathered together for fear of the Jews, came Jeſus himſelf and ſtood in the midſt of them and ſaid, 'Peace be unto you:' but they were affrighted ſuppoſing that they had ſeen a ſpirit; but he upbraided them with their unbelief, and hardneſs of heart, becauſe they had not believed thoſe that had ſeen him ſince he was riſen: and he ſaid unto them, 'Why are you troubled? ſee my hands and my feet: a ſpirit hath not fleſh and bones:' and he ſhewed them his hands and his feet and his ſide: and while they yet believed not for joy, and wondred, he ſaid unto them, 'Have ye here any meat?' and he did eat a piece of broiled meat and an hony-comb: and his diſciples rejoiced that they had ſeen the Lord. And he ſaid unto them, 'Theſe are the words that I ſpake unto you, while I was yet with you: that all things muſt be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moſes, and in the prophets, and in the Pſalms of me.' Then he opened their underſtandings that they might underſtand the ſcriptures, and ſaid unto them, 'Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Chriſt to ſuffer, and to riſe from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remiſſion of ſins ſhould be preached in his name among all nations, and ye are witneſſes of theſe things. And behold I ſend the promiſe of my Father among you: but tarry ye at Jeruſalem till ye have received power from on high. He ſaid again unto them, peace be unto you: as my Father ſent me, ſo ſend I you. Go ye unto all the world and preach the goſpel to every creature: he that believes and is baptized, ſhall be ſaved: but he that believe not ſhall be damned. And theſe ſings ſhall follow them that believe: in my name they ſhall caſt out devils: they ſhall ſpeak with new tongues: they ſhall take up ſerpents: and if they drink any deadly thing it ſhall not hurt them: they ſhall lay their hands on the ſick, and they ſhall recover.' And when he had ſaid theſe things, he breathed on them, and ſaid, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt: whoſe ſins ye remit, they are remitted to them, and whoſe ſins ye retain, they are retained.' Thus Jeſus appeared five times in the firſt day of his reſurrection. John xx. 19, 23. Luke xxiv. 36. 49. Mark xiv. 14, 18.

But Thomas called Dydimus was not with them when Jeſus came, and the reſt of the diſciples told him. 'We have ſeen the Lord:' but he very confidently profeſſed that he would not believe it. After eight days (April the 12th) Thomas being then preſent with the reſt, Jeſus came, the doors being ſhut, and ſtood in the midſt, and ſaid unto them, peace be unto you, and abundantly ſatiſfied Thomas his unbelief, John xx. 24, 29. Luke xxiv. 16, 26.

Then the eleven diſciples went into Galilee unto the mountain that he had appointed them. And when they ſaw him, they worſhipped him, but ſome doubted: and when Jeſus came unto them, he ſaid, 'All power is given unto me both in heaven and earth, go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them, &c. and lo I am with you to the end of the world. Matth. xxviii 16. 20. After that, Jesus was seen of above five hundred brethren at once: and after that to James 1 Cor. xv 6, 7.

Afterwards Jesus shewed himself to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias; or at least to seven of them as they were fishing: for they having fished all night, and caught nothing, in the morning, Jesus unknown unto them, stood upon the shoar, and bid them cast their net on the right side of the ship, and they caught an hundred fifty and three great fishes: and Jesus said unto them, come and dine; and none of them durst ask him, who art thou? knowing it was the Lord. When they dined, he warned Peter thrice of his pastoral charge, as he loved Jesus, and forewarned him what kind of death he should die. And to Peter's question concerning John, he gave an answer that was not rightly understood of the brethren, John xxi. 1, 24.

Last of all he appeared to his disciples in Jerusalem, and led them out as far as Bethany, and he lift up his hands, and blessed them. And it came to pass that as he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven. Luke xxiv. 38, 50. Matth. xxviii. 19

This Jesus Christ was promised to Adam in paradise presently after his fall in those words, 'The seed of the woman shall break the serpent's head;' but whether he should come of Jew or Gentile, not a word was told him After this Abraham (the Hebrew) was given to understand that of his seed should come the Messiah; but of what tribe, nothing was revealed. To Jacob indeed it was shewed, that of the tribe of Judah should Shiloh come, but whether male, or female, nothing certain David was assured that a son of his should sit upon his throne for ever; but till Isaias, it was not known that he should be born of a pure virgin; that a woman should compass a man. Isa. vii 14. Behold a virgin, that famous virgin (the original sets it forth with an accent) spoken of Gen. iii. 15. 'shall conceive and bear a son' The very place of his birth was not set forth till Micah did it. Mic. v. 2. Not the just time till Daniel foretold it. Dan. ix. 24. Thus by degrees, and piecemeal (as it were) God spake of old to the fathers by his servants the prophets. Heb. i. 1. Every age almost brought forth some new thing touching the babe of Bethlehem (lapt up in the swathbands of the holy scriptures) either in express and evident terms and testimonies, or else in mirrors, and miracles, lastly John Baptist (Fibula legis & gratiæ as one calls him) the buckler of the law, and gospel, pointed him out with his finger, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' &c

Now this Jesus Christ is the most excellent person in the world; the fairest amongst men; worth ten thousand of us, as the people said of David. 2 Sam. xviii 3. Look upon him as he is described, Heb i 1, 2 3. For his nobility, he is God's own Son; for his riches, he is heir of all things; for his wisdom, he made the world; for his eminency, He is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person; for his might, he upholdeth all things by the word of his power: for his merits he hath by himself purged our sins; for his preferment, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on High. Trap's Treat

The quality and kind of Christ's death is remarkable for three characters which were engraven on the death of the cross, which he died on.

1. For the painfulness of it. The nature of that death was painful; for death itself is painful; no man pays that debt with ease When Asa dies he cries, ah my feet. When David dies he complains, O my cold body. When the Shunamite's child dies, he cries, ah my pained head. When Uzzah dies, he cries, oh my leprous skin. Life is a precious pearl; but there are three things besides, which made Christ's death painful.

1. Violence. It's painful to die of any violent disease but when five deaths do all concur, and strive which of them shall dispatch the poor man soonest, this must needs be more painful Such was Christ's death, which made him complain, Psal. xxii. 16. 'They pierced my hands and my feet, and John xix 34. One of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith there came out blood, and water.' Here are five deaths that invaded a living man; death on each hand, and on each leg, and death on his side though this last, came a little too late. Now a violent death it must needs be, when strong and great nails did pierce the most nervous parts of his body, his hands and his feet.

2. Slowness, four leisurely violent deaths seized on him. Blood is the life of the living creature: then look how long his blood was coming out, his life was dropping out as long. 'Tis a great aggravation for a man to be long a dying and yet cannot die, to have his torment quick, and yet his death slow is an image of hell, where men seek death, and yet cannot find it. Christ's slow death was divided into four quarters. Death at each hand, and at each foot made his pain the greater. The weight of his body did hang upon these four tormenting nails, his pierced hands and feet, as if death had delighted to hold Christ long at sea, and to deny him it's last sad service. Christ had been before dying a terrible death in the garden when he was boiled (as it were) in a bloody sweat: and two circumstances shew that the two thieves death was nothing in slowness of torment comparable to Christ's death.

1 The sad and direful preparations to Christ's death, as he was the night before in a soul death when those Thromboi haimatos, as it were drops, or great hail stones of blood, frozen, or hardned, together (as Stephanus thinks) through extream terror: when he was scourged and crowned with thorns.

2 He was so weakned in body thereby, that he was not able to bear his own cross: which made him complain. Psal. xxii. 17. 'I may tell all my bones, my strength is dried up like a potsherd:' so that Christ began to die the night before, and continued dying twenty four hours, the Lord's anger and curse being on him, and then bodily pain, with the curse of the law all this time wrought upon him, and Christ, in bearing the pains of the second death, did suffer that which all the elect should have sustained in their souls for ever. Isa. liii. 6 'The Lord laid upon him the iniquity of us all:' and though Christ died but one death for all the elect, yet in the extremity of the pain, it was many deaths to him.

3 Many degrees of life were taken from him. Consider how much of life Christ had, and the removing it by violence must be so much the more painful. Now life natural had in Christ a sweet and a peaceable dwelling: the possession of life was with exceeding delights: it was planted beside the glorious God head personally, and so had sweet company, and that made it pleasant. It had not been so much to take away the life of a common man whose life is not privileged with grace, and the grace of a personal union with God.

The second character that was engraven on Christ's death, was, that it was shameful, and reproachful. Now shame is, first, fundamentally in the cause: sin, and sin acted by men against the law of God is the only foundation of shame: Exod. xxxii. 25. 'Aaron made the people naked to their shame. So 2 Sam. xiii. 13. Shame and sin are near a kin. And thus Christ was no more capable of shame than he was of sin. He came out of the womb cloathed with the white robe of innocency, and he never contracted one black spot on that fair robe of the highest image of God from the womb to the grave, and therefore there was no shame fundamentally in Christ.

2. There is shame formally in sin: and that, first, in being ashamed actively. Secondly In bearing of shame passively. In the former consideration, because sin is a shameful thing in itself. Jer. xi. 13. There is an internal blushing, and shame rising from sin; the conscience of the sinner (if it be not cauterized) thinking ill of sin, and esteeming itself base in doing it. Rom vi. 21. 'What fruit had you in those things whereof you are now ashamed?' So Christ thought ill of sin, and esteemed the creature base in sinning. 2. Christ our Lord being our surety, though he could not be ashamed of any sin he did himself; yet being made a sin for us, he did bear the shame of our sin: and thus he was not free from shame passively, as it is a punishment of sin. Isa. l. 6. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from shame and spitting, Heb xii 2. He endured the cross, despising the shame.' So then in these respects Christ did bear our shame.

1. In that though he was the Lord of glory, 'and thought it no robbery to be equal with the Father;' yet he abased himself to become man: yea, the lowest of men, a ſervant. Phil ii. 6, 7, 8 Matth. xx. 28. Iſa. xlix. 7.

2. All the tokens of reproach and ſhame were on his ſufferings: As,

1 In geſtures: they put a crown of thorns on his head; and a reed for a ſceptre in his hand to mock his kingly power They ſaluted him with mocks, and bowing the knee to him.

2. In words. They cried out, 'Hail, king of the Jews;' they ſcorned his propherical dignity, when they blindfolded him, ſaying, 'Prophely who it is that ſmote thee.' And to deride his prieſt hood, they put a robe on him: and when he was on the croſs offering himſelf as our prieſt in a ſacrifice to God, all that paſſed by, wagged their heads, and ſhot out their lips, ſaying, 'He truſted in God, let him deliver him,' &c. Then did they ſpit in his face, which in the law was a great ſhame. Deut. xxv. 9, 50 Job xxx 10.

3. His death was ſhameful, the death of a thief, and robber: ſo it is called, Chriſt's reproach. Heb. xiii. 13 'Let us go forth bearing his reproach.' It was a ſhameful thing to ſee the Lord of glory, bearing his own croſs on his back, and all the children, and baſe ones of the city wondring at him, and crying out upon him. This is called the reproach, or ſhame of Chriſt. Heb. xi. 26. Pſal. xxii 7

4 They ſhamed him in pulling off his garments, and ſcourging him As, Jer xiii. 26. They brought him bound to Pilate as if he had been a common thief Matth. xxvi 2 Hence Iſa. liii 3. 'He was deſpiſed, and rejected of men: and we hid as it were our faces from him.' He had all ſhame put upon him: he was branded as the greateſt thief of the three: he went out at the gate of life, bleeding, pained, curſed, ſhamed, forſaken deſpiſed and mocked. Even the ſun ſeemed to be aſhamed to ſee its Creator in ſo painful and ſhameful a condition, and therefore hid its head.

The third character which was engraven on Chriſt's death, was the curſe of God. Now the curſe that Chriſt was made, Was,

1 The Lord's pronouncing him a curſe, Deut. xvi. 23. 'Curſed is he that hangeth on a tree;' which Paul applies to Chriſt. Gal. iii 10. 13. This was indeed a ceremonial curſe; but had a ſpecial relation to Chriſt, who was under a real, and moral curſe.

2 God's devoting and ſetting him apart in his eternal counſel for ſuffering the puniſhment of ſin.

3. The diſhonour that was put upon him; and ſo was Chriſt under a curſe. Pſal. xxii. 7. 'He was a worm and no man,' Iſa. liii. 3. 'The leaſt of men:' the contempt and refuſe of men. Acts iv. 11, 'The ſtone, rejected by the builders' Hanging is the death of the pooreſt, and baſeſt of men: and thus was Chriſt uſed. Acts v. 30. 'Whom ye ſlew and hanged on a tree. Acts ii. 23. 'Whom by wicked hands ye have crucified and ſlain' Hanging is more than ſlaying: it is putting him to a baſe death that is curſed of God and man: and this to be inflicted on a king lineally deſcended of the blood royal, the kingly tribe of Judah the only man on earth that by birth and law had title to the crown of Judea, was the worſt that men or devils could do.

The LIVES of the FATHERS, AND OTHER EMINENT DIVINES.

The Life of IGNATIUS, who died Anno Chriſti, 111.

IGNATIUS ſaw Chriſt in the fleſh, being about 12 years old at his crucifixion: the occaſion of his apprehenſion was this, Trajan returning from the Parthian war, commanded gratulatory ſacrifices to be offered in every city; and when he came to Antioch, Ignatius was required to be preſent at thoſe ſacrifices; but he, before Trajan's face did ſharply reprove their idolatry: for which cauſe he was delivered to ten ſoldiers to be carried to Rome. He was paſtor at the church at Antioch next after the apoſtle Peter.

As he paſſed through Aſia ſtrictly guarded with that troop of ſoldiers, he confirmed the congregations through every city where he came, preaching the word of God to them, and giving them wholeſome exhortations; eſpecially charging them to avoid the hereſies lately ſprung up, and which at that time overflowed the church: requiring them ſtedfaſtly to cleave to the traditions of the apoſtles, and to their doctrine.

When he came to Smyrna where Polycarp was biſhop, he wrote an epiſtle to the church at Epheſus, making mention of Oneſimus their paſtor; and another he wrote to the church of Magneſia on the river Meander, wherein he forgetteth not Dama their biſhop: Another he wrote to the church at Trallis whoſe paſtor at the time he mentioneth to be Polybius, to which epiſtle he prefixed an exhortation to them not to refuſe martyrdom, leſt thereby they ſhould loſe the hope that was laid up for them: for which end he uſeth theſe expreſſions:

'From Syria,' ſaith he, 'even till I came to Rome, I had a battle with beaſts, as well by ſea as by land, night and day, being bound amongſt ten cruel leopards, (ſo he called the ten ſoldiers that guarded him) which, the more benefits they received at my hands, became ſo much the worſe to me: but I, being exerciſed, and now well acquainted with their injuries, am taught every day more and more to bear the croſs, yet hereby am I not juſtified. Would to God I were once come to the beaſts that are prepared for me, which I wiſh alſo to fall upon me with all their violence: whom alſo I will provoke, that without delay they ma, devour me, and not abſtain from me, as they have from some others, whom for fear they have left untouched: and if they be unwilling to it, I will compel them to fall upon me: pardon me, I pray you, I know well how much this will avail me. Now I do begin to be a disciple of my master Christ, I neither regard things visible, so I may gain Christ.' Ignis, crux, Bestiarum conflictationes, ossium distractiones, &c. i. e. Let fire, cross, breaking of my bones, quartering of my members, crushing my body, and all the torments that man and the devil can invent fall upon me, so I may enjoy my Lord Jesus Christ, &c.

Writing to Polycarp, whom he knew to be a holy man, he commends to him the congregation at Antioch, praying him to be careful of the business there, and especially for the election of a godly bishop in his room; thereby proving himself to be a sincere and right pastor, taking such care of his flock, not only whilst he lived, but even after his death. When his martyrdom approached, he said, Frumentum Dei sum: dentibus ferarum molar, & mundus Dei panis inveniar: I am God's corn; when the wild beasts have ground me to powder with their teeth, I shall be his white bread. He was so humble, that he disdained not to learn of any: he suffered martyrdom the eleventh year of Trajan at Rome, Anno Christi 111. His usual saying was, Amor meus crucifixus est. My love is crucified, meaning either Christ the object of his love: or that his affections were crucified to the world, as Gal. vi. 14.

Nicephorus reports, that when Ignatius was a child, our Saviour would take him up in his arms, and shew him to his disciples. It may be, he was one of those little children that were brought to Christ that he should touch them; or that little child whom Jesus took, and set in the midst of his disciples to learn them humility: he saw Christ after his resurrection, as himself writes in one of his epistles, Ergo vero, & post resurrectionem in carne eum vidi, &c. Truly I did see him after his resurrection in the flesh, and do believe that it is he, &c.

He used to say, Nihil præstantius est pace bonæ conscientiæ: that there is nothing better than the peace of a good conscience.

'That good and wicked men are like true and counterfeit money, the one seems to be good, and is not, the other both seems and is good.

'That the lyons teeth are but like a mill, which though it bruiseth, yet wasteth not the good wheat, only prepares and fits it to be made pure bread. Let me (saith he) be broken by them, so I may be made pure manchet for heaven.

'Parents ought to afford these three things to their children; correction, admonition and instruction, both in human arts, and God's word: all which preserves them from idleness and folly, gives them wisdom, and learns them subjection and obedience to their superiors.

'Other graces are but parts of a Christian's armour: as the shield of faith, the sword of the Spirit, &c. But patience is the panoply or whole armour of the man of God: the enemy foils us without it; but we foil him by it.

'Grace flowing from the blessed Spirit of God, makes the soul like a fountain whose water is pure, wholesome and clear: for grace beautifies, cleanseth, and so saveth the whole man.'

He wrote divers epistles, to St. John: to the Ephesians: to the Magnesians: to the Trallians: to the Romans: to the Philadelphians: to Polycarp, &c. Concerning which the learned Scultetus saith: Inter dubia & incerta numero epistolas Ignatii, & Polycarpi. Nondum enim inter orthodoxos convenit, sintne epistolæ istæ celeberrimorum martyrum Ignatii & Polycarpi, an aliorum: for which he gives his reasons.

The life of Polycarp, who died anno Christi 170.

POLYCARPUS was disciple to St. John, and bishop of Smyrna: he going with St. John to a bath at Ephesus, and espying Cerinthus the heretic in it, said, Fugiamus ocius, &c. Let us depart speedily, for fear least the bath wherein the Lord's adversary is, do fall upon us; as one of the fathers made haste out of the house of a wicked man, which soon after fell to the ground.

The history of his martyrdom is excellently set forth in an epistle written by his own church at Symrna, to the brethren of Pontus, out of which, so much as concerns this matter, I shall transcribe.

The congregation which is at Smyrna, to the congregation which is at Philomilium, and to all the congregations throughout Pontus; mercy to you, peace, and the love of God the Father, and of our Lord Jesus Christ be multiplied, Amen. We have written unto you (brethren) of those men which have suffered martyrdom; and particularly of blessed Polycarp, who, by shedding his blood, hath (through God's mercy) put an end to this persecution; the manner whereof we shall now relate to you: this holy man hearing of the cruel persecution abroad, was therewith nothing terrified, but retained the immoveable tranquillity of his mind, and continued still in the city, till at length he was persuaded through the importunity of his friends, to betake himself to a certain farm place, not far from the city; where he remained, with a few others, exercising himself night and day in prayer making humble supplications, as his usual manner was, for the peace, and tranquillity of all the churches in the world. Having been in prayer, three days after his apprehension, and now fallen asleep, he saw in a vision by night the pillow under his head on fire, and suddenly consumed to ashes, which when he awaked, he interpreted to them that were present, to foresignify that his life was near an end, and that his body should be burned for the testimony of Christ.

When the searchers were now at hand, and all the people cried out Quæratur Polycarpus: Let us search out Polycarp; at the earnest entreaty of his friends, he removed to another village, unto which the searchers coming, caught two boys, and scourged them, till one of them confessed, and led them to Polycarp's lodging: yet might he easily have escaped, but he would not, saying, 'The will of the Lord be fulfilled:' and so coming to them, he communed with them very cheerfully: so that it was wonderful to see, those which a little before knew not the man, now beholding and viewing his comely age, and his grave and constant countenance, lamented that they had so employed themselves for the apprehension of so worthy a person; but he on the contrary commanded that the table should be presently spread for them, intreating them to eat, and dine well, requesting but one hour's space to make his prayers unto God, in which they assenting to, he arose, and went to prayer, and being replenished with the grace of God, he so poured out his soul, that all that heard him praying were astonished at it, yea, many of his enemies were sorry that so holy, honest, and aged a man should be put to death.

The hour being now come wherein he was to set forwards, they set him upon an ass, and brought him to the city of Smyrna upon a solemn feast day, and there met him Herod the justice of peace, and his father Nicetus, who receiving them into their chariot, said unto him, What harm is it to say Lord Cæsar, to sacrifice, and so to be saved? At first he answered nothing, but when again they urged him, he said, I will not do according to your counsel; they perceiving that he would not be persuaded, gave him very rough language, and at last tumbled him out of their chariot, whereby he brake his shins: but he, as though he had received no injury nor hurt at all, went bolt upright, cheerfully and apace towards the theatre: and being come thither, a voice came down from heaven (though by reason of the great tumult few heard it) 'Be of good cheer, O Polycarp, and play the man;' the speaker no man saw, but the voice was heard by many of us.

The multitude was in a rage, and the proconsul demanded of him whether he were that Polycarp? yet withal, beckoning to him to deny it, he said, 'Have respect unto thine age; tender thyself; swear by the fortune of Cæsar; repent of what is past, and say, Remove the wicked.' But Polycarp looking about upon the multitude with a stedfast countenance, and casting his eyes up towards heaven, said, 'Remove O Lord these wicked.' Yet the proconsul urged him again, saying, 'Swear, and I will let thee go; blaspheme, and defie Christ, and thou shalt be safe;' to whom Polycarp answered, Octoginta sex annos illi jam inservivi, &c. Fourscore and six years have I served Christ, neither hath he ever offended me in any my thing, and how then can

I revile my king that hath thus kept me? The proconſul ſtill urged, and ſaid, 'Swear by the fortune of Cæſar;' Polycarp replied, if thou requireſt of me this vain glory, that I ſhould proteſt the fortune of Cæſar, pretending that thou knoweſt not what I am? Know then that I am a Chriſtian: and if thou deſireſt to know the doctrine of Chriſtianity, appoint a day, and thou ſhalt hear it. 'Perſuade the people unto this,' ſaid the proconſul. Truly ſaid Polycarp, I thought it my part to make this tender unto you, becauſe we are commanded of God to give unto governors and powers whom he hath ordained, the honour, and obedience which is due unto them, and not hurtful unto us; but as for theſe people, I deem them not competent judges, and therefore will not purge myſelf before them: then ſaid the proconſul, 'I have wild beaſts to devour thee, unleſs thou repent.' Polycarp anſwered, bring them forth: for we have determined with ourſelves not to repent, not to turn from the better to the worſe: 'tis more convenient for you to turn from evil to that which is good and juſt. I will, ſaid the proconſul, 'tame thee with fire, if thou ſet naught by the wild beaſts, and wilt not repent;' to which Polycarp anſwered, you threaten me with fire which ſhall laſt but an hour, and is quickly quenched; but thou art ignorant of the everlaſting fire at the day of judgment, and of thoſe endleſs torments which are reſerved for the wicked. But why make you all theſe delays? appoint me to what death you pleaſe. Whilſt he ſpake theſe things, he was repleniſhed with joy, and boldneſs, and his countenance appeared ſo full of grace, and gravity, that it was evident, that he was nothing troubled with the cruel threats of the proconſul: but on the contrary, the proconſul himſelf began to be amazed and ſent for the cryer, commanding him in the midſt of the theatre to cry three times; Polycarp hath confeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian. Hereupon the multitude both of Jews, and Gentiles, inhabiting Smyrna, cried out in a great rage. Iſte Aſiæ Doctor, &c. This is that doctor of Aſia the father of the Chriſtians, the overthrower of our gods, who hath taught many that our gods are not to be adored; and thereupon they cried to the proconſul, that a lion might be let looſe to devour him; but he told them that he might not do it, for that the game of beaſts was now finiſhed: then they cried with one voice, that Polycarp ſhould be burned alive; to which, when the proconſul had aſſented, the multitude forthwith carried logs, and wood, out of their ſhops and booths; eſpecially the Jews, after their wonted manner, were very forward herein.

The pile being prepared, Polycarp put off his apparel, the faithful aſſiſting, and contending amongſt themſelves, who ſhould touch his body at his farewel; being thus made ready, when they would have nailed him to the ſtake, he ſaid; 'Nay, ſuffer me even as I am: for he that hath given me ſtrength to come to this fire, will alſo give me patience to perſevere therein without your faſtning of my body with nails,' then they bound his hands behind him, which done, he prayed thus

'O Father of thy well beloved and bleſſed Son Jeſus Chriſt, through whom we have known thee; O God of angels, powers, and of every living creature, and of juſt men which live in thy preſence; I thank thee that thou haſt graciouſly vouchſafed this day, and this hour, to allot me a portion amongſt the number of martyrs, to drink of the cup of Chriſt, unto the reſurrection of everlaſting life, both of body and ſoul, through the operation of the holy Spirit, amongſt whom I ſhall this day be received into thy ſight for an acceptable ſacrifice; and as thou haſt prepared, and revealed this beforehand, ſo thou haſt now accompliſhed and fulfilled the ſame. O thou moſt true God, which canſt not lie; wherefore for all theſe things I praiſe thee, I bleſs thee, I glorify thee, through the everlaſting biſhop and ſhepherd of our ſouls Chriſt Jeſus; to whom with thee, and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour, and glory, world without end;' Amen.

Having ended his prayer, the tormentors kindled the fire. The flame vehemently flaſhed about, which was terrible to the beholders. But the flame framing itſelf after the manner of a vault, or ſail of a ſhip, with the bluſtering blaſts of wind, touched not the holy martyrs body, which ſent forth a fragrant, and a ſweet ſmell like unto frankincenſe, or ſuch like precious perfume; but the cruel perſecutors perceiving that the fire touched not his body, called for a tormentor, charging him to thruſt him into the ſide with a ſpear; which being done, their iſſued out ſuch abundance of blood as quenched the fire, to the great aſtoniſhment of the beholders.

Then did the Jews ſtir up Nicetes, the father of Herod, and his brother Dalces, to move the proconſul, that his body might not be delivered to the Chriſtians; leaſt (ſay they) leaving Chriſt, they fall to worſhip him; this they ſaid thro' their ignorance, not knowing that we can never forſake Chriſt, which died for our ſalvation, to worſhip any other. For we worſhip Chriſt as the Son of God; the martyrs we love as the diſciples, and followers of the Lord, and that worthily, for the invincible love which they bear to their King and Maſter, &c. Hereupon the proconſul cauſed his body (to ſatisfy the Jews) to be laid upon a pile of wood, and burnt.

Irenæus being young, was acquainted with him, and writeth of him, that Anicetus being biſhop of Rome, Polycarp went thither, and queſtioned with him about the celebration of Eaſter. He ſaith alſo, that there is extant an epiſtle of Polycarp's unto the Philippians, very profitable for ſuch as are careful for their ſalvation; where they may know the true character of faith, and the right rule of doctrine.

It is ſaid of him, that he was teſtis fidelis, conſtanſque veritatis: a faithful and conſtant witneſs to the truths nay, by his wiſdom, zeal, and piety, he recalled many from hereſy, and errors.

He ſo deteſted heretics, that when Maricon (of his former acquaintance) met him at Rome, and wondering that he took no notice of him, ſaid, doſt thou not know me Polycarp? Yea, ſaid he, 'I know thee well, thou art the eldeſt ſon to the devil.'

His manner was to ſtop his ears if at any time he heard the wicked ſpeeches of heretics, and to ſhun thoſe very places where ſuch ſpeeches had been uttered. He ſuffered martyrdom in the ſeventh year of Verus, anno Chriſti, 170, of his age 86.

In the midſt of the flames he made this excellent prayer, 'O God the Father of thy beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt, thro' whom we have received the knowlege of thee; O God the Creator of all things, upon thee I call, thee I confeſs to be the true God; thee I glorify. O Lord receive me, and make me a companion of the reſurrection of thy ſaints, through the merits of our great high prieſt, thy beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt; to whom with the Father and God the Holy Ghoſt be honour, and glory for ever,' amen. He was a biſhop about 63. years.

Hierom writing of him, ſaith, that he was in great eſteem through all Aſia, for that he was ſcholar to the apoſtles, and to them that did ſee and were converſant with Chriſt himſelf; and therefore his authority was of great credit, not only with his own church, but with all other churches about him.

There is extant an epiſtle of his to the Philippians, but Scultetus judgeth it ſpurious.

The Life of DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITA, who died Anno Chriſti 96.

DIONYSIUS Areopagita was born at Athens of eminent parents, he was very ſtudious; he travelled into Egypt to get ſkill in aſtronomy; at the age of 25 years, at Heliopolis, whilſt he lived with Apollophanes the philoſopher, he ſaw that general eclipſe of the ſun at our Saviour's paſſion, and as one amazed, ſaid, Aut Deus naturæ patitur, aut mundi machina diſſolvitur: either the God of nature now ſuffers, or the frame of the world ſhall be diſſolved; and to another, ignotus in carne patitur Deus, &c. God, unknown in the fleſh, doth ſuffer, for whoſe ſake the univerſe is covered with thick darkneſs.

Saint Paul coming to Athens, act. 17. and eſpying an altar there with this inſcription, ignoto Deo, took occaſion from thence to preach of the true God, of the reſurrection, and judgment to come; whereupon by the great philoſophers of that city, he was accounted a wicked, and ſacreligious perſon, for which he was carried by them to Mars his hill, where the court of the Areopagites ſat, which was the chiefeſt judicatory in that city; but before thoſe judges nages he preached with ſuch divine eloquence, and forcible arguments, that through God's mercy he converted this Dionyſius, the chief preſident of the judges, with Damaris his wife, who uſed Paul very courteouſly, and were inſtructed by him in the knowlege of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. At which the whole city was much amazed; for all men accounted Dionyſius a very wiſe and judicious man; but now he was not aſhamed of a maſter to become a ſcholar: ſo that within three years ſpace, he became an admirable inſtrument to propagate the goſpel of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

Then was he by Paul ordained paſtor of the church at Athens, where for a great while he preached the word of God with great wiſdom, zeal and diligence; and as a wiſe harveſt-man brought in many ſheaves of corn into God's barn. Afterwards he went to Epheſus to viſit St John, and St. Paul; by whoſe perſuaſion (leaving one Publius to look to his flock at Athens) he went to Rome, at which time Clemens governed that church. And having converſed a while with Clemens, he intreated him to go into Joan to preach the goſpel there, and to give knowlege of ſalvation to that nation: this he willingly undertook; and judging Paris to be the fitteſt place to reſide in, he ſo laboured amongſt them, that in a ſhort ſpace, through God's bleſſing, he brought many ſheep into the fold of Chriſt, and that not only of the meaner ſort, but many rich, noble, and great perſons, who overthrowing the temples of their falſe gods, erected now places for the ſervice of the true God. But this progreſs of the goſpel being envied by Satan, the enemy of Chriſt's church; he ſtirred up the idolatrous prieſts, who ſuborned many to diſpatch Dionyſius; but there was ſuch a gracious luſtre, and radiancy in his countenance, that when they beheld him, ſome of their hearts failed them: others were ſo affrighted, that they fled away.

Shortly after, Siſinius the Præfect. gave command that Dionyſius, with his fellows, ſhould be apprehended; and when he was brought before him, he ſharply reproved him, for that he had preached againſt the worſhip of their gods, who, by reaſon of his ſermons, had loſt their former honour and eſteem: he therefore required him to confeſs his error, and to ſtop up that breach which he had made; leaving off thoſe novelties, and unheard of doctrines, that by his recantation the people might ſee how vainly they had been ſeduced, and ſo return to their antient rites and cuſtoms again.

To this Dionyſius with great zeal, wiſdom, and eloquence anſwered: that they were no gods whom they worſhipped, but idols, and the works of mens hands, and that it was through meer ignorance, folly, and idolatry that they adored them: adding, that there was but one true God, according as he had preached: at which word Siſinius was exceeding incenſed, commanding him to be laid upon an hurdle, and gentle fire to be made under him to roaſt him. Some others relate, that he was thrown to hungry wild beaſts, which yet would not tear him: then that he was put into an hot oven, which would not burn him. Whereupon he was the ſecond time brought before Siſinius, who cauſed him publicly to be beaten with many, and cruel blows by his officers: and when this prevailed not, he ſtanding up, ſaid: ſeeing thou haſt contemned our gods, derided the emperors edicts, and by magic haſt wrought many miracles to delude the people, whereby thou haſt ſeduced them from the obedience of the emperor, I will therefore that thou ſhalt be forthwith beheaded. Dionyſius nothing terrified herewith, told him that he worſhipped ſuch gods as would periſh like dung upon the earth; but as for myſelf (ſaid he) 'Come life, come death, I will worſhip none but the God of heaven and earth.'

This ſo enraged the Præfect, that he commanded him preſently to be executed: whereupon he was haled out of the city to the top of an high mountain, and delivered to the officers to be tormented, which was accompliſhed with all the cruelty that could be: then lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven he ſaid, 'O Lord God almighty thou only begotten Son, and holy Spirit: O ſacred Trinity, which art without beginning, and in whom is no diviſion: receive the ſoul of thy ſervant in peace, who is put to death for thy cauſe and goſpel:' which prayer being ended, he was beheaded with a ſword which was made dull on purpoſe that his pain might be the greater.

He ſuffered martyrdom in the reign of Hadrianus, anno Chriſti 96. and of his own age 110.

He uſed to ſay, 'that he deſired theſe two things of God: firſt, that he might know the truth himſelf; Secondly, that he might preach it as he ought unto others.'

He wrote ſundry epiſtles (as ſome affirm) and ſome other works; all which Scultetus for very good reaſons rendred by him, judgeth to be ſpurious.

The Life of JUSTIN MARTYR, who died Anno Chriſti 139.

JUSTIN Martyr was born at Neapolis in the country of Paleſtine; his father was Priſcus Bachius, by whom in his youth he was ſet to ſchool, where he profited ſo much, that in a ſhort time he became a famous philoſopher; for being exceedingly inflamed with a deſire of knowlege, he would not be ſatisfied in his mind, till he had gotten inſtructors ſingularly ſeen in all kinds of philoſophy. Firſt he applied himſelf to be a ſcholar to a certain ſtoick: but finding that by his help he nothing profited in divine knowlege, after a time he left him, and went to one of the ſect of the Peripatetiks; with whom after he had been a while, he demanded of him a ſtipend for his teaching: whereupon Juſtin accounting him no philoſopher, left him, and departed. And being not yet ſatisfied in mind, but deſirous to hear of further learning, he adjoined himſelf to one that profeſſed the Pythagorean ſect, a man of great fame, and one that highly eſteemed of himſelf: whom after he had followed a time, his maſter aſked him, whether he had any ſkill in muſic, aſtronomy, and geometry, without the knowlege whereof he ſaid, he could not be apt to receive the knowlege of virtue and felicity; for that his mind muſt be drawn from the knowlege of ſenſible matters, to the contemplation of things intelligible: He ſpake much in commendation of theſe ſciences, how profitable and neceſſary they were: and becauſe Juſtin declared himſelf to have no ſkill therein, he turned him away; which much grieved Juſtin, who conſidering with himſelf, what time was requiſite for the learning of theſe ſciences, and purpoſing to defer it no longer, betook himſelf to the ſect of the Platoniſts for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore chooſing to himſelf a ſingularly learned man of that ſect, that was lately come into thoſe parts, he remained with him, profiting not a little in contemplation of ſupernatural things, and inviſible forms: inſomuch as he hoped ere long through the ſharpneſs of his wit, to attain to the comprehenſion and contemplation of God, which is the end of Plato's philoſophy.

And thus he employed his youth: but afterwards being grown to riper years, he was converted to the knowlege and profeſſion of Chriſtianity by this means: beholding the conſtancy, courage and patience of the Chriſtians in their torments and ſufferings, he was wonderfully moved therewith, which made him thus to reaſon; that it was impoſſible for that kind of people to be ſubject to any vice, or carnality, which would certainly diſable them to ſuſtain ſuch ſharp adverſity, and much more the bitterneſs of death.

Hereupon (naturally affecting knowlege) he began to love and embrace the Chriſtian religion. This himſelf teſtifies in the end of his firſt apology; telling us moreover, that being afflicted in mind about finding out the truth, he reſolved for more privacy to retire himſelf unto a grange near the ſea-ſide, where he might be free from the concourſe of the people; whither as he went, there met him a grave ancient father, of a comely viſage, and gentle behaviour, who began to reaſon with them; and after long diſputation, told him plainly that there was no knowlege of the truth amongſt the philoſophers, who neither knew God, nor were directed by the Holy Ghoſt: he alſo further reaſoned with him of the immortality of the ſoul, of the reward of the godly, of the puniſhment of the wicked: ſo that Juſtin, being convinced by his arguments, voluntarily aſſented to him, and demanded of him by what means he might attain to the knowlege of the true God?

The old man counſelled him to read and ſearch the word of God; and to adjoin prayer thereto. But what man (quoth Juſtin) ſhall I uſe for my inſtructor therein? And who ſhall be able to help me, if theſe philoſophers (as you ſay) lack the truth, and are void of the ſame? To which the old father anſwered; There have been, ſaith he, before theſe philoſophers others more ancient than they, who were juſt men, and beloved of God; and who ſpake by the Spirit of God: fore ſeeing, and fore propheſying of thoſe things which now we ſee are come to paſs, and therefore are called Prophets. Theſe only have known the truth, and revealed it to men neither fearing, nor reſpecting the perſons of any. They were ſeduced with no opinions of man's invention, but only ſpake, and taught thoſe things which themſelves both heard and ſaw, being inſpired with the Holy Spirit of God, whoſe writings and books are extant, out of which the reader may receive great profit, and knowlege of many things: as of the firſt creation of the world, and of the end of the ſame, with all other things that are neceſſary for us to know. Neither in their teaching do they uſe any demonſtrations: the things taught being of themſelves more certain than that they need any ſuch demonſtration: the accompliſhment of their propheſies which we ſee fulfilled, conſtraining us of neceſſity to believe the words and doctrine which they have taught: their doctrine alſo being confirmed by wonders and miracles, which induce us to give credit to it. They preached of God the creator and maker of things: they propheſied alſo before of Chriſt the Son of God, ſent to be the Redeemer of the world; which the falſe prophets, ſeduced by falſe and wicked ſpirits did not, but only took upon them to work certain prodigious wonders, for men to gaze at, that thereby they might gain belief to their falſe and unclean opinions: but remember before all things to make thy prayers to Almighty God, that he will open a gate of light to thee: for otherwiſe the knowlege of theſe things cannot be attained to by every man, but they are revealed only to ſuch to whom God and his Chriſt give underſtanding.

The old father having declared theſe, and many other things to Juſtin, departed from him, exhorting him carefully to follow thoſe things which he had ſpoken: after which he ſaw no more. But Juſtin was preſently wonderfully inflamed in his mind to know and ſtudy the prophets, in compariſon of which, all other philoſophers now ſeemed vain and unprofitable to him, and ſo in time he became a Chriſtian, and was baptized.

After this he became an earneſt defender of the truth, travelling up and down, and diſputing againſt all thoſe which were enemies and oppoſers of it, fearing neither peril of life, nor danger of death, ſo that he might maintain the doctrine of Chriſt againſt the malicious blaſphemers of the ſame, and alſo increaſe the number of Chriſtian believers, as may appear by his vehement diſputations againſt the heathen philoſophers, and by the long diſputation of his at Epheſus againſt Tripho, and alſo by his confutations of heretics: yea, and by his apologies which with great zeal and courage he exhibited to the emperor and magiſtrates againſt the perſecutors of the Chriſtians, and in their juſt defence: all which do ſufficiently teſtify the ſame.

The firſt apology which he wrote, was to the ſenate of Rome, in which he wrote with great liberty, telling them, that of neceſſity he was compelled thus to utter his mind unto them: for that in perſecuting the Chriſtians, they neglected their duty, and highly offended God, of which they had need to be admoniſhed: this apology he alſo ſent to Antoninus Pius the emperor: writing alſo to Urbicius, lieutenant of the city, he told him, that he had put men to torments, and death, for no offence committed, but only for the confeſſion of the name of Chriſt; which proceedings, ſaith he, neither becometh the emperor nor his ſon, nor the ſenate. In the ſame apology he alſo defended and purged the Chriſtians from thoſe crimes which were falſely charged upon them by the Ethnicks.

In his ſecond apology writing to Antoninus the emperor, and his ſucceſſors, with like gravity and freedom of ſpeech, he declareth unto them how they had the name and repute of virtuous Philoſophers, maintainers of juſtice, lovers of learning, &c. But whether they were ſo indeed, their acts declared. As for himſelf he profeſſeth that neither for flattery nor for favour he wrote unto them: but that he was conſtrained to ſue unto them for righteouſneſs in their judgments and ſentences: for, ſaith he, it becomes princes to follow uprightneſs and piety in their judgments, not tyranny and violence: he alſo in plain words chargeth, as well the emperor as the ſenate with manifeſt wrong; for that they did not grant to the Chriſtians that which was not denied to all other malefactors, but judged them to death, not convicted: but out of an hatred to their name. 'Other men' ſaith he, 'which are appeached in judgment, are not condemned till they are firſt convicted: but for us, you take the name for a ſufficient crime; whereas indeed you ought to ſee juſtice done rather upon our accuſers. So that if a Chriſtian that is accuſed, deny his name, him you releaſe, being not able to charge him with any other offence: but if he ſtand to his name, you condemn him; whereas it were your duty rather to examine their manner of life, and ſo according to their demerits to ſee juſtice done upon them.'

And in another place, 'You examine not the cauſes, but hurried on with raſh affections, as with the ſpur of fury, you ſlay and murder the innocent without any reſpect of juſtice: and if any will ſay, ſome of them have been taken in evil doings; I anſwer, that you uſe not to enquire after thoſe things; but condemn them before due examination of their offences, for the cauſe above mentioned; hereby it appears that you degenerate from the goodneſs of your predeceſſors, whoſe examples you follow not; for your father Adrian, of famous memory, cauſed to be proclaimed, that Chriſtians accuſed before the judge ſhould not be condemned, unleſs they were found guilty of ſome notorious crime, &c.'

In the ſame apology he alſo proves, by firm and ſtrong arguments, that Chriſtians ought not at the ſole will and command of the emperor and ſenate to offer ſacrifice to idols, for which if they be condemned, they ſuffer open wrong; he affirms moreover, that the only true religion, is the religion of the Chriſtians, whoſe doctrine and converſation hath no fault. And although by theſe, and ſuch like perſuaſions he could not prevail with the emperor to love their religion, and to become a Chriſtian; yet thus much he obtained, that the emperor wrote to his officers in Aſia in the behalf of the Chriſtians, requiring and commanding them, that thoſe Chriſtians only that were found guilty of other crimes, ſhould ſuffer, and that none for the bare name of a Chriſtian ſhould be puniſhed, as hitherto they had been. By this it is apparent with what zeal, and faith Juſtin ſtrove againſt the perſecutors of his time, who (as he uſed to ſay) 'could kill, but could not hurt.'

At laſt he went to Rome, where he had many open diſputations, and public conferences with ſome philoſophers, eſpecially with one Creſcens, who was of the ſect of the Cynics, from whom he always bore away the bell, which tended to the ſhortning of his life, as himſelf foreſaw, and foretold in theſe words.

'I look for no other end than this, that I be betrayed by ſome one of them called philoſophers: or knocked on the head with a club by Creſcens, no philoſopher indeed, but a proud boaſter. For it is not meet to call him a philoſopher, which ignorantly reporteth that the Chriſtians are impious, and irreligious, to the end that he may flatter, and pleaſe ſuch as are over ſhadowed with the miſt of error, and ignorance. For if he impugn the doctrine of the Chriſtians, having never read, nor known the ſame, then he is full of malice, and far worſe than idiots, that ſometimes fear to reaſon of unknown matters, leaſt they ſpeak falſely; or if he hath read them, yet he underſtands not the myſtery, and majeſtical meaning thereof: or if in any thing he underſtands them, yet is he afraid to confeſs the truth, leaſt he ſhould be taken for one of them, and then he is far more wicked, &c. malicious, yea the bond-ſlave of vain glory, and brutiſh fear, I deſire that you may underſtand the truth, I have propoſed certain queſtions and interrogatories to him, whereby I have found, that he knows nothing; ſo that if you knew what I propounded, and what anſwer he made thereto, you would certainly give ſentence that he is altogether ignorant in our doctrine, &c.

And

And according to this his prediction, he was slain by the procurement of Crescens; being beheaded anno Christi 139. Suffering martyrdom with much cheerfulness under Verus the emperor; or as Epiphanius saith under Adrian.

Tatianus, a learned man, writeth thus of it; Crescens (saith he) being in Rome, passed all men in that filthy and unnatural sin of Sodomy, defiling himself with mankind; inferior also he was to no man in covetousness. He taught, that death was not to be feared, yet himself was so extreamly fearful of it, that he procured Justin's death as it were for a great evil; because that he preaching the truth, reprehended the philosophers as gluttonous and deceitful persons.

He confuted Marcian the heretic; and the Valentinians; he complained to the emperor Antoninus Pius of the cruelty of the proconsul in Asia against the Christians, who forbade them to read any books that spake of Christ.

His usual saying was, 'That which the soul is in the body, that are Christians in the world: for as the soul is in, but not of the body; so Christians are in, but no part of the world.'

Also 'It is best of all not to sin: and next to that, to amend upon the punishment.'

Again 'That it is the greatest slavery in the world to be subject to one's own passions.'

He was one that did not only suffer in his Saviour's cause; but took great pains in defending it against all oppositions in his times. He got much repute for his constant zeal against idolatry, and superstition, and persuading the Gentiles to leave it as a vain and unprofitable service; declaring unto them the excellency and benefit of the true worship of God; so that he was a blessed instrument to bring many out of that miserable condition, cheerfully to embrace the faith of Christ crucified.

His works are these; a dialogue with Triphon the Jew; an apology to the senate of Rome; another to Antoninus Pius; an oration to the Gentiles, with some epistles; one ad Zenam. & Serenum: Altera ad diognetum. Parænetica oratio ad Græcos.

The Life of IRENÆUS, who died Anno Christi 182.

IRENÆUS was born in Asia of Greek parents, as both his name and writings do declare. In his younger years he was a scholar to, and a constant hearer of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna. In his riper years he went into France, and was ordained minister by Photinus bishop of Lyons, and some other presbyters.

At this time the church of Christ was in great trouble, both by reason of the persecution raised by forreign enemies, but especially by reason of errors, and sects which then sprung up in that time, against which he diligently laboured and wrote much. His nature did well agree with his name, for he was a great lover of peace, and endeavoured to the uttermost to procure unity when controversies arose in the church: and therefore when the great controversy about keeping Easter day was renewed, and Victor the bishop of Rome would have excommunicated the Eastern church as schismatics, for disagreeing with him therein: Irenæus, with other brethren of the French church, being sorry to see contentions amongst brethren for such a trifle, met together in a council, and by common consent wrote letters unto Victor, subscribed with their names, intreating him to alter his purpose, and not proceed to excommunicate his brethren for that matter; and although themselves agreed with him in observing the same time, yet by many strong arguments and reasons, they exhorted him not to deal so rigorously with those who followed the custom of their country in observing another day. He wrote also diverse other letters abroad concerning the same contention, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of none effect.

After the martyrdom of Photinus; he was made bishop of Lyons, where he continued about the space of 23 years: by his frequent, faithful, and powerful preaching, and by his holiness of life, he brought most of that city from Gentilism to the knowlege and service of the true God. But the common enemy of mankind, envying the progress of the gospel, and the salvation of so many souls, beside the public persecution, stirred up a spirit of error, and falsehood in some heretics, (as Montanus, Theodosius, Alcibiades, and Maximilla) whereby he greatly disturbed the peace of the church. Hereupon Irenæus, and his fellow-labourers, to shew their care of the brethren sent abroad large epistles of things done amongst them: they sent also the tenets of Montanus into Asia with their judgments upon them. They wrote likewise letters to Eleutherius, then bishop of Rome, desiring him heartily to endeavour to keep the church in unity; and when they could find no fitter a person for so weighty a business, they made choice of Irenæus for his holiness, gravity, and sincerity, whom they knew to be willing to undergo all travel, danger, and labour for Christ's cause and the churches good: him therefore they sent to Rome, writing by him in this manner:

'Father Eleutherius, we wish you health in all things, and always in God: we have requested Irenæus our brother, and fellow-labourer, to deliver these letters, whom we pray you to accept of as a zealous follower of the will of Christ,' &c.

This Irenæus wrote five books against the heresies of his times, which are yet extant; in the first of which, dilating upon the infinite profoundity of matters invented by Valentinus, mixed with many errors, he discloseth openly the malice of the heretic, being cloaked, and concealed as it were a serpent hid in his den: for revealing their profane ceremonies, and detestables mysteries, he writeth thus: 'Some (saith he) prepare their wedding chamber, and accomplish the service to be set over them that are to be consecrated with charmed words: and having thus done, they call it a spiritual marriage conformable to the celestial copulation. Some bring them to the water, and in baptizing, say thus; in the name of the unknown father of all things, in the truth, mother of all things, and in him which descended upon Jesus. Some others pronounce Hebrew words, to the end that young converts might be the more amazed.' And in his third book, he wrote that Valentinus came to Rome, in the time of Hyginus, ninth bishop in succession after the apostles: and also Cerdon another heretic, who sometimes professed the true faith, and privily taught the contrary: afterward he confessed his error, and yet again, being reprehended for the corrupt doctrine which he had taught, he refrained the company of the brethren: he taught that God who preached in the law, and prophets, was not the father of our Lord Jesus Christ. That Christ was known, but the Father of Christ was unknown, &c.

After him succeeded Marcion of Pontus, a shameless blasphemer, which encreased this doctrine.

He tells us also in his second, book that the working of miracles was frequent in his time. Some of the brethren (saith he) and sometime the whole church of some certain place, by reason of some urgent cause by fasting and prayer, have brought to pass that the spirits of the dead have returned into their bodies; and so by the earnest prayers of the saints, they been restored again to life, and have lived with us many years. Some by the like means have expelled devils, so that they which were delivered from evil spirits, have embraced the faith, and were received into the church; others have the spirit of prophesy to foreknow things to come: they see divine dreams, and prophetical visions: others cure the sick, and diseased, and by laying on of their hands restore them to health. For the gracious gifts of the Holy Ghost are innumerable, which the church, dispersed through the whole world, having received, dispenseth daily in the name of Jesus Christ, crucified under Pontus Pilate, to the benefit of the Gentiles, &c.

Whilst he was bishop of Lyons, the state of the church was very unquiet, troublesome and full of danger, because the Roman emperor had not called in the edicts of the fourth persecution: but in this dangerous time, Irenæus was valiant, laboured exceedingly by prayer, preaching, disputing, instructing and reproving with patience and wisdom: seeking the lost; strengthening the weak; recalling the wandring, binding up the broken hearted, and confirming those that were strong: whereupon Tertullian saith, Tanta a vitæ integritate, & doctrinæ sinceritate gregi is præfuit, &c. He governed the flock of Christ with such ſuch integrity of life, and ſincerity of doctrine, that he was loved exceedingly by his own, and feared by others: but in the latter end of Marcus Antoninus Verus, God ſent peace to his church, ſo that the Chriſtians lived ſecurely: held councils, and did preach freely; as alſo in the reign of Commodus, who ſucceeded him; but in the reign of Severus the next emperor, he being a bloody and cruel man, was raiſed the fifth perſecution againſt the church, to the martyrdom of many thouſands: but eſpecially it raged at Lyons, in ſo much, as the blood of the ſlaughtered Chriſtians ran down the ſtreets: and at laſt this bleſſed ſaint, with many other of his flock, were carried between two hills, there was a croſs on the one hand, and an idol on the other, where they were put to their choice, to go either to the croſs to ſuffer, or to the idol to live; but they choſe the croſs, where they all conſtantly ſuffered martyrdom about the year 182. Irenæus being about the age of 60 years, or as ſome ſay 90.

'He uſed to compare the Heretics and Schiſmatics of his time to Æſop's dog, that loſt the ſubſtance of religion, whilſt they gaped too earneſtly after the ſhadow.'

Conſidering the vanity of all earthly things, he ſaid, 'What profit is there in that honour which is ſo ſhort-lived, as that perchance it was not yeſterday, neither will be to-morrow? and ſuch men as labour ſo much for it, are but like froth, which though it be uppermoſt, yet is unprofitableſt.'

Eraſmus thinks that he wrote in Latin; but Hierom reckons him among the Greek fathers: and even till this day ſome of his works are extant in Greek, which ſhews him to be a Grecian.

The Life of TERTULLIAN, who died anno Chriſti 202.

TERTULLIAN was born in Carthage, his father was a centurion of the proconſular order. He was carefully educated in all manner of learning, wherein he profited ſo much, that Lactantius ſaith of him, he was in omni genere doctrinæ peritus, ſkilled in all kind of learning: Hierom ſaith, that his works contained cunctam ſeculi doctrinam, all ſorts of learning. Vincentius Lyrinenſis ſaith, Inter Latinos omnes hic factle princeps judicandus. that amongſt the Latin fathers he was of chiefeſt account. His works which he hath left to us, ſhew that he was excellently verſed in phyſics, mathematics, and hiſtory. He was eminent for his ſtudy of, and knowlege in the civil law. Afterwards falling to the ſtudy of divinity, he attained to ſuch excellent ſkill therein, that at Rome he was made a preſbyter, where he remained to the middle of his age.

He flouriſhed under the emperor Severus, anno Chriſti 183. And burning in holy zeal, he became a great oppoſite to the Heretics of thoſe times, Marcion, Valentinian, Praxea, Hermogenes, &c. He was very expert both in Greek and Latin, and had great acuteneſs in diſputing and writing eloquently, as his books do ſufficiently declare: ſo that Vincentius Lyrinenſis ſaith, that the force of his arguments was ſuch, that whom he could not perſuade, them he compelled to conſent to him. God raiſed him in the time of great perſecution, to be as a pillar or ſtay to his poor afflicted church: for when the Chriſtians were vexed with wrongs, and falſely accuſed by the Gentiles, Tertullian taking their cauſe in hand, defended them againſt their perſecutors, and their ſlanderous accuſations, ſhewing that they never intended any ſtirs, or rebellions, either againſt the empire, or emperors of Rome, for ſo much as the manner of Chriſtians was to pray for the proſperous eſtate of their governors. And whereas they were falſely accuſed to be enemies to mankind, how can that be, ſaith he, when as the proper office of Chriſtians is to pray for all men, to love their enemies, never requiting evil for evil, whereas all others do profeſs only to love their friends, and ſcarcely them? And as touching the horrible ſlander of murdering infants, how can that be true, ſaith he, in the Chriſtians, whoſe cuſtom is to abſtain from all blood, and things ſtrangled, ſo that it is not lawful for them when they feed at their tables to meddle with the blood of any beaſts? and as for filthy copulations, no ſort of men are more free than they, who have ever been the greateſt obſervers of chaſtity, and if they could, have choſen to live in perpetual virginity all their lives long; if they could not, their manner is to contract matrimony for the avoiding all whoredom and fornication. Neither can it be proved that the Chriſtians do worſhip the ſun; which falſe ſurmiſe, ſaith he, ariſeth only from this, becauſe they uſe to pray towards the eaſt. Much leſs was there any of them ſo mad as to worſhip an aſs's head, the occaſion of which ſlander aroſe from the Jews worſhipping the jaw bone of an aſs, from the ſtory of Sampſon, which therefore was falſely and wrongfully charged upon the Chriſtians. Likewiſe againſt all other lies and ſlanders raiſed by the Heathens againſt the Chriſtians, he clearly purgeth them, and evidently proves that they were perſecuted not for any deſerts of theirs, but only out of an hatred to their name and profeſſion.

He ſheweth alſo, that by thoſe grievous perſecutions the religion or number of Chriſtians was nothing impaired, but increaſed rather. The more (ſaith he) we are mown down by you, the more we riſe up. The blood of the Chriſtians proves the ſeed of the church. For what man (ſaith he) beholding the painful torments, and the perfect patience of the Chriſtians, will not ſearch and enquire into the cauſe; and when he hath found it out, will not conſent and agree to both: and when he agreeth to it, who will not be willing and deſirous to ſuffer for it? So that this profeſſion can never be extirpated, ſeeing the more it is cut down, the more it encreaſeth: for every man ſeeing, and wondering at the ſufferings of the ſaints, is moved thereby to ſearch into the cauſe; and in ſearching he finds it, and in finding he follows it.

And as Tertullian thus beſtirred himſelf in defending the innocency of the Chriſtians, ſo he compiled many excellent and fruitful works, whereof ſome are extant, others are not to be found. By theſe excellent apologies of his, he perſuaded the Emperor Severus to favour the Chriſtians, who prayed for his proſperity, and imputed the ſlaughter of his ſubjects at Bizantium, as a juſt judgment upon them for the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian blood.

Having written excellently againſt the heretics of his time, in the end of his book he made a catalogue of all the heretics that then tore the bowels of the church; yet, he continued theſe labours when the perſecution was at the hotteſt, not hiding his head, though the times were ſo dangerous.

Once, in great triumph, the Emperor Severus his ſoldiers, for the greater pomp, were to put on crowns of bays; but one Chriſtian ſoldier there was among them, who wore it on his arm; and being demanded the reaſon, he boldly anſwered, Non decet Chriſtianum in hac vita coronari, that a Chriſtian ought not to wear his crown in this life; upon which occaſion Tertullian wrote his book De corona militis. Cyprian when he would read Tertullian, uſed to ſay, Da magiſtrum, Give me my maſter. His manner was conſtantly to pray thrice a-day, at the third, ſixth, and ninth hours. Writing De quatuor noviſſimis, of death, judgment, heaven, and hell, he ſaith, Hæc nos aliquando riſimus, cum de vobis fuimus: fiunt, non naſcuntur Chriſtiani. I ſometimes ſcoffed at theſe things when I was a Heathen; I now perceive that we are not born, but made Chriſtians.

He was converted by reading the ſcriptures, and labours of other learned and holy men. In reading the ſcriptures he found them full of majeſty and truth: and ſaith he, Quiquid agitur, prænunciabitur: Whatſoever is done was in them foretold. And after his converſion, he was taken up night and day in the reading of them, and did, with great pains, get much of them by heart, and that ſo exactly that he knew each period. He highly commended Severus, for that, knowing many noble men and women to be Chriſtians, he did not only not puniſh them, but greatly praiſed them, and did publicly withſtand ſuch as were their enemies. Yet, notwithſtanding the great learning and famous virtues of this worthy man, through envy, as is conceived, at the Roman clergy, he fell into the error of Montanus: ſo that, though the glory of ſome of his writings was darkened by his errors, yet his learning ſhewed in thoſe very writings is admired by all poſterities; in ſo much as Cyprian, that excellent martyr, would let no day paſs without reading ſome part of him. He died in peace about the 63 years of his age, anno Chriſti 202.

Some of his uſual ſayings were theſe.

'If thou beeſt backward in thoughts of repentance, be forwards in thoughts of hell, the burning flames whereof only the tears of a penitent eye can extinguiſh.'

'If the devils without Chriſt's leave had no power over the Gadarens ſwine much leſs have they power over God's own ſheep.

'We ſhould not try mens faith by their perſons, but their perſons by their faith.

It is in vain to come to the God of peace, without peace; or to pray for the remiſſion of our own ſins, without forgiving others. We muſt not come to make an atonement with God at his altar, before we have made an attonement with our brother in our hearts.

The Life of CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, who flouriſhed, Anno Chriſti, 196.

SCULTETUS ſaith, that the Parentage, country, birth, breeding, and manner of converſion of Clemens are uncertain, ſome would have him to be born at Athens: but certain it is, that he was the diſciple of Pontenus, who moderated in the Catechiſtical ſchool at Alexandria, and after his death Clemens ſucceeded in that office, whence he was called Alexandrinus. He moſt flouriſhed about the year of Chriſt, 196. He was endowed with all manner of polite learning, and was ordained Preſbyter in Alexandria, where, by his fervent zeal and piety he much propagated the Chriſtian faith.

Photius ſpeaking of his writings, ſaith thus of them; Dictio eſt florida, quæque; effurgit in Majeſtatem cum ſua vitate conjuncta, in quibus etiam eſt eruditio multa, & decens. That the language is flouriſhing, and ariſeth into a certain majeſty joined with ſweetneſs, wherein is much learning in a comely manner adorned and and ſet forth He was an excellent hiſtorian, and a zealous confuter of the hereſies of his times.

He wrote many works, moſt of which are periſhed with time, to the great prejudice of the church, and grief of the learned: only three remain, Protreptikos ad Gentes: Pædagoguas: & Stromata. In the firſt, he exhorts the Gentiles and heathens to embrace the Chriſtian faith. In the ſecond, he informs thoſe which were newly converted how to carry themſelves. In the third, he directs grown Chriſtians in the doctrines which were fit for them in that eſtate. He complains much of the decay of zeal and of the want of the power of godlineſs amongſt profeſſors in his time.

He was maſter to Origen, who alſo ſucceeded him in his place in Alexandria. He was excellently verſed in the holy ſcriptures, and very careful to preſerve the doctrines which he had received from his predeceſſors in purity; whereupon in his firſt book intituled Stromaton, he thus writeth: This preſent tract of mine is not made for any oſtentation, but theſe monuments are laid up as helps againſt weakneſs of memory in my old age, that it may be to me a plain image and protracture of that effectual and lively doctrine which I was thought worthy to hear, &c. The time and manner of his death is uncertain.

He uſed to ſay, 'That ſuch as adorn themſelves with gold, and think themſelves bettered thereby, are worſe than gold, and not lords of it, as all that have it ought to be.

Out of the depth and bowels of the earth hath God diſcovered and ſhewed gold unto men, and they have made it the occaſion of all miſchief and wickedneſs.

Gold to many men is much dearer then their faith and honeſty: and the love of it makes many ſo covetous, as if they were to live here for ever.

Avarice is not the vice of gold, but of men which uſe it wickedly.

The Life of ORIGEN, who died Anno Chriſti 220.

ORIGEN was born anno Chriſti 189 his father, grandfather, and great grand father were Chriſtians.

He was by his father Leonides trained up from his infancy in the Chriſtian religion, and other good literature, but eſpecially in the knowlege of the ſacred ſcriptures, who demanded of him daily a certain taſk and cauſed him to rehearſe the ſame: and he (though a child) reſted not in the bare words of the ſcripture, but ſought farther into the profound ſenſe, and meaning of them, ſo that divers times he would gravel his father in the queſtions which he propounded to him; for this his father checked him to his face, admoniſhing him not to ſearch beyond the capacity of his years, nor beyond that the plain letter gave to underſtand: yet inwardly he rejoiced greatly, yielding unto God hearty thanks, who had made him the father of ſuch a ſon: yea, he many times uncovered the breaſt of his ſon as he lay aſleep, and kiſſ'd it, as the temple wherein the Holy Ghoſt had taken up his reſidence: he was called Origen Adamantius; the firſt name was given him for his ſublime and divine ſpeculations, who by ſweet and melliſluous allegories carries his reader's affections from terrene to heavenly meditations and contemplations: the ſecond name he had from the nature of the adamant, whoſe luſtre and hardneſs giveth it renown; for ſuch was this man's noble and generous mind, that he was not daunted, nor affrighted with any dangers, or afflictions whatſoever.

When he was but ſeventeen years old, his father being carried to priſon, he had ſuch a fervent mind to ſuffer martyrdom with him, that he would have thruſt himſelf into the perſecutors hands, had it not been for his mother, who in the night time privily ſtole away his cloaths, and his very ſhirt alſo: whereupon more for ſhame to be ſeen naked, than for fear to die, he was conſtrained to remain at home: yet when he could do no more, he wrote a letter to his father in priſon, in which he exhorted him thus, Vide pater, ne quid mea cauſa ſecus facias: ſee, O father, that you do not change your reſolution for my ſake.

After the death of his father, and the confiſcation of all his goods to the emperor, he with his poor mother and ſix brethren were brought to ſuch extream poverty, that he was forced to ſuſtain himſelf and them by teaching a grammar ſchool, till at length, being weary of that profeſſion, he wholly betook himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſcriptures and divinity: he alſo ſtudied the languages, and profited very much in the knowlege of Hebrew, and other tongues, comparing the Hebrew text with the ſeptuagint, as alſo with other tranſlations of Aquila, Symachus, and Theodoſion: and thus caſting himſelf upon the divine providence for his ſubſiſtence, it pleaſed God, that he was entertained by a religious and rich matron, together with his mother, and brethren.

This gentlewoman had alſo in her houſe at the ſame time a certain man of Antioch, a notable heretic, who ſo plauſibly demeaned himſelf, that ſhe entertained him as her dear friend and ſon: Origen being by this means neceſſitated to frequent his company, ſhewed forth a manifeſt proof of his cleaving to the right and true faith: for when as a great multitude not only of heretics, but of the orthodox alſo frequented the lectures of this Paulus (for ſo was his name) being counted a wiſe and profound man, yet Origen would never be perſuaded to join with him in prayer, deteſting his heretical doctrines.

During this time he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of rhetoric and other human learning, wherein he profited exceedingly: and ſo being well accompliſhed with learning, and the catechiſt-ſchool at Alexandria being void at that time, every one being forced away by the thunderbolt of perſecution, he ſet upon preaching there, being now about 18 years old.

Unto his lectures many of the Gentiles reſorted, and were, by God's bleſſing upon his miniſtry, converted, as one Plutarch, who was afterwards crowned with martyrdom, and Heracles his brother, who afterwards ſucceeded Demetrius in the biſhop-rick of Alexandria, and many others. In this employment he proſpered exceedingly, and purchaſed to himſelf a famous name amongſt all the faithful, in that he chearfully embraced and encouraged all the martyrs, not only of his acquaintance, but even ſuch as were unknown unto him. He verified ſuch as were in deep dungeons and cloſe impriſonment, encouraged them when they were to receive their laſt ſentence, and after their ſentence pronounced; yea he accompanied them to the place of execution, putting himſelf often into great danger thereby: he boldly embraced, and kiſſed at their farewel, ſo that once the heathens in their furious rage had ſtoned him to death, if the divine power of God had not marvellouſly delivered him. And the ſame divine power and providence of God did at many other times protect and defend him, even ſo oft as cannot be told, being aſſaulted by the adverſaries for his prompt mind, and invincible courage in publiſhing the doctrine of Chriſt.

Yea, ſo extreamly was he hated by the infidels, that ſoldiers were oft fain to be hired to watch about his houſe by the multitudes of thoſe that repaired to him to be inſtructed in the Chriſtian faith; and the enemies rage was ſo vehemently bent againſt him for this cauſe, that he could not paſs ſafely in the ſtreets of Alexandria; he was alſo forced oft to change his lodging, thereby to prevent the purſuers. As he taught, ſo he lived, and as he lived ſo he taught; and God's grace working exceedingly with and by him, multitudes were converted to the Chriſtian faith by his miniſtry; hereupon Demetrius the biſhop, divolved the whole charge and care of the ſchool upon him alone, and he judging the reading of humanity to be out of ſeaſon, wholly applied himſelf to divinity lectures: and afterwards (his neceſſities being urgent) upon the advice of his friends he ſold all his authors of humanity, which he had diligently peruſed, and now lay by him, to one, upon condition that he ſhould allow him two pence a day for his maintenance, wherewith he contented himſelf; and to cut off all occaſions of youthly concupiſcence, all the day long he ſpent in the forenamed exerciſes, and a great part of the night he ſpent in meditating upon the holy ſcriptures, taking his reſt only for a few hours, and that not in his bed, but on the bare ground; he uſed alſo faſting often, and expounding the ſaying of our Saviour literally, would not wear two coats, neither ſhoes, but went bareſoot, not taking care for the time to come with a greedy or a covetous deſire. He inured himſelf to cold and nakedneſs, and abſtinence from wine, even to the amazement of his familiar friends, and to the offence of many who would willingly have relieved his neceſſities; by theſe means he was in great danger (through weakneſs of limbs, and faintneſs of body) to have deſtroyed and caſt away himſelf; yet this his ſtrict courſe of life won many, not of the common people only, but of the wiſe, learned and rich, to become zealous followers of his doctrine; many of which in thoſe times of perſecution ſuffered for the ſame, as you may ſee more at large in my General Martyrology.

Having many matrons and virgins, who upon ſundry occaſions reſorted to him, to prevent temptations to uncleanneſs, miſtaking theſe words of our Saviour Chriſt, 'There are ſome that make themſelves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven ſake,' he gelded himſelf, the rather to prevent ſuch ſlanderous reports as might be raiſed of him, to the ſcandal of the goſpel.

The church of Achaia being at this time vexed with divers hereſies, Origen was ſingled out, and being furniſhed with letters teſtimonial from the church, was ſent to confute them. As he paſſed through Paleſtine, he was by the biſhops ordained a preſbyter, that thereby he might be armed with the more authority againſt the hereticks: wherein he did not run before he was ſent.

But his life and doctrine grew ſo renowned and eminent, as ſtirred up envy in the hearts of ſome againſt him, eſpecially in Demetrius the biſhop, who had formerly loved and preferred him: ſo that now on the contrary, he did all he could to darken and obſcure his fame; hereupon he ript up Origen's faults, and by his writings publiſhed them to the world, upbraiding him eſpecially with that raſh and inconſiderate act of diſmembring himſelf, for which he judged him unfit for the miniſterial office; thus in the height of Origen's fame theſe things were divulged, and his adverſary was potent, and thereupon he was forced to give way to the ſtorm, and to yield to the importunity of his enviers, and ſo left Alexandria, yet always retained his conſtancy and courage, preaching the goſpel with all diligence and painfulneſs, ſtriving to convert many to Chriſt, not troubling the church with ſchiſm, nor yet requiting his adverſary with ill language, but on the contrary, ſpeaking well of ſlanderers. The principal place wherein he taught was Cæſarea of Paleſtine, wherein he inſtructed many in the faith, and ſaw the fruits of his labours in the converſion of many to God, which afterwards proved famous in the church of Chriſt. Mammæa alſo the mother of Alexander Severus the emperor hearing of his fame, ſent for him to Antioch, and after ſhe had been inſtructed by him in the Chriſtian faith, diſmiſſed him honourably.

After this he wrote a learned epiſtle to Philip the emperor, who was deemed the firſt Chriſtian king of the Romans. He reclaimed Ambroſe from the hereſy of the Marcionites. He never affected wealth, but contented himſelf in a low condition, whereas having ſo many and great friends, he might have abounded in wealth if he had pleaſed.

Afterwards he returned to Alexandria again, and laboured hard in the affairs of the church, ſo that he continued above the ſpace of 52 years in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting, and expounding the ſcriptures, even to the time of Decius and Gallus.

Divers and great perſecutions he ſuſtained, and ſometimes was ſo eagerly purſued, that ſcarce any ſhifting of place or country could preſerve him. In the reign of Decius, for the doctrine of Chriſt he under-went bands and torments in his body, racking with bars of irons, dungeons, beſides terrible threats of death and burning; and divers and ſundry other torments which he manfully and conſtantly ſuffered for Chriſt. At length hearing that ſome Chriſtians were carried to an idol temple to force them to ſacrifice, he out of his zeal, ran thither to encourage and diſuade them from it. This was the opportunity which his adverſaries expected, and therefore, letting go the other, they laid hold upon him, putting him to his choice, whether he would offer incenſe to the idol, or have his body defiled with a fowl and ugly black-more, which they had prepared for the purpoſe. Origen being in a miſerable ſtraight, at laſt choſe rather to offer incenſe than to have his chaſte body polluted by ſo filthy a creature; then did they preſently put incenſe into his trembling hands, and whilſt he demurred upon it, they took his hands and cauſed him to throw it into the fire: whereupon they preſently cried out, Origen hath ſacrificed. Origen hath ſacrificed. After which fact he was excommunicated by the church; and being ſo filled with ſhame and ſorrow, he left Alexandria and went into Judea, and when he came to Jeruſalem, being well known for his learned expoſitions, and gift of utterance, he was intreated by the miniſters to beſtow a ſermon upon the people in the church and open aſſembly, and after much importunity, being in a manner conſtrained thereto, he ſtood up, took his Bible, opened it, and the firſt place that he caſt his eye upon was this portion of ſcripture; 'Unto the wicked ſaith God, Why doſt thou preach my laws, and takeſt my covenant into thy mouth?' Which text ſo ſoon as he had read, he clapſed the book, ſat down, and burſt out into abundance of tears, the whole congregation weeping with him alſo, ſo that he was unable to ſay any more unto them. After this he wandred up and down in great grief and torment of conſcience, and wrote this lamentation:

'In the bitterneſs and grief of mind, I go about to ſpeak unto them which hereafter ſhall read this confuſed writing: But how can I ſpeak when my tongue is tied up, and my lips dare not once move or wag? My tongue doth not his office; office, my throat is dried up, and all my ſenſes and inſtruments are polluted with iniquity.

But I will proceed, and firſt I will fall to the ground on my bare knees, and make my humble ſupplication unto the ſaints that they will help me, filthy wretch, which by reaſon of my ſins dare not crave ought at the hands of God. O ye ſaints and bleſſed of God, with wateriſh eyes, and wet cheeks ſoaked in dolour and pain, I beſeech you to fall down before the ſeat of almighty God, for me miſerable ſinner. Wo is me becauſe of the ſorrow of my heart: wo is me that my ſoul is thus afflicted, wo is me that I am compaſſed thus on every ſide, and ſhut up in my ſin, ſo that there is no health in me. Wo is me my mother that ever thou broughteſt me forth, for a ſkilful lawyer to be overthrown in his unrighteous dealing, for a religious man to fall into extream impiety. Wo is me my mother that broughteſt me forth, a righteous man to be converſant in unrighteouſneſs; an heir of the kingdom of God, to be now an inheritor of the kingdom of the devil: a miniſter to be found wallowing in impiety: a man beautified with honour and dignity, to be in the end blemiſhed with ſhame and ignominy, yea beſet with many evils, and choaked with infamous doings. Wo is me my mother that broughteſt me forth a lofty turret, yet ſuddenly thrown to the ground: a fruitful tree, yet quickly withered; a burning light, yet forthwith darkned; a running fountain, yet by and by dried up. Wo is me that ever I was decked with gifts and graces, and now ſeem pitifully to be deprived of all:

But who will miniſter moiſture to my head? and who will give ſtreams of tears unto mine eyes, that I may bewail myſelf in this my ſorrowful plight? Alas O my miniſtry, how ſhall I lament thee? O all ye my friends tender my caſe, and pity my perſon that am ſo dangerouſly wounded? Pity me, O ye all my friends, who am now become an abject perſon. Pity me O ye my friends, for that I am now with ſorrow come to naught. Pity me, O ye my friends, for that I have now troden under foot the ſeal and cognizance of my profeſſion, and joined in league with the devil. Pity me, O ye my friends, for that I am rejected, and caſt away from before the face of God: it is for my lewd life that I am thus polluted and branded with open ſhame. The Lord hath made and engrafted me into a fruitful vine, but inſtead of pleaſant cluſters, I have brought forth pricking thorns, inſtead of grapes I have brought forth brambles

But let the well-ſprings of tears be ſtirred up, and let my cheeks be watered; let them flow upon the earth and moiſten it, for that I am born in iniquity, and ſoaked in ſin, &c. Alas! what have I felt, and how am I fallen? Alas! how am I thus come to naught? There is no ſorrow comparable to my ſorrow; there is no affliction that exceedeth my affliction; no bitterneſs that paſſeth my bitterneſs: no lamentation more lamentable then mine; neither is there any ſin greater than my ſin, and there is no ſalve for me.

Where is that good Shepherd of ſouls? Where is he that went down from Jeruſalem to Jericho, which ſalved and cured him which was wounded by the thieves? Seek me out O Lord, that am fallen from the higher Jeruſalem: which have broken the vow I made in baptiſm: which have profaned my cognizance in that I dealt injuriouſly with thy bleſſed name. Alas! that ever I was a doctor, and now occupy not the room of a diſciple! thou knoweſt O Lord, that I fell againſt my will: whereas I went about to enlighten others, I darkened myſelf: when I endeavoured to bring others from death to life, I brought myſelf from life to death. When I minded to preſent others before God, I preſented myſelf before the devil. When I deſired to be found a friend and a favourer of godlineſs, I was found a foe and furtherer of iniquity; when I ſet myſelf againſt the aſſemblies of the wicked, and reproved their doings, there found I ſhame, and the moſt peſtilent wound of the devil. Some promiſed me that they would be baptized: but after that I departed from them, the devil the ſame night transformed himſelf into an angel of light, and ſaid unto me: when thou art up in the morning, go on, and perſuade them, and bring them to God: but the devil, going before me, prepared the way by whetting their wits to deviſe miſchief againſt one, ſilly wretch, ſowing in their minds hypocriſy, diſſimulation and deceit. But I (O unhappy creature) ſkipping out of my bed at the dawning of the day, could not finiſh my wonted devotion, neither accompliſh my uſual prayers, deſiring that all men might be ſaved, and come to the knowlege of the truth, whilſt in the mean time I wrapped myſelf in the ſnares of the devil. I gat me to thoſe wicked men; I required of them to perform the covenant made the night before, I ſilly ſoul, not knowing their ſubtilty, and we came to the baptiſm.

O blind heart, how didſt thou not remember? O fooliſh mind, how didſt thou not bethink thyſelf? O witleſs brain, how didſt thou not underſtand? But it was the devil that lulled thee aſleep, and in the end ſlew thy unhappy and wretched ſoul. He bound my power and might, and ſo wounded me. I anſwered but in a word, and became reproachfully defamed. I ſpake without malice, yet felt I ſpite. The devil raiſed an aſſembly about me, and pronounced againſt me that unjuſt ſentence, Origen hath ſacrificed. O thou devil, what haſt thou done unto me? How haſt thou wounded me? I bewailed ſometimes the fall of Sampſon, but I have fallen worſe myſelf: I bewailed formerly the fall of Solomon, but now have I fallen far worſe myſelf: I bewailed formerly the ſtate of all ſinners, yet now am I plunged into ſin myſelf: Sampſon had his hair cut off: but the crown of glory is fallen off my head. Sampſon loſt the carnal eyes of his body; but my ſpiritual eyes are put out. It was the wyleneſs of a woman that brought confuſion upon him: but it was my tongue that brought me into this ſinful condition: and as he afterwards wanted the comfort of his earthly poſſeſſions: ſo my tongue by this wickedneſs hath deprived me of thoſe ſpiritual gifts, which ſometimes have flown into me with heavenly riches: and as he endured thoſe things by leaving the Iſraelites, and cleaving unto foreigners; ſo I going about to ſave notorious ſinners, made myſelf captive to captives, and a bond ſlave unto ſin.

Alas! my church liveth, yet I am a widower. My ſons be alive, yet I am barren: every creature rejoiceth, and I alone am deſolate and ſorrowful, &c. Bewail me, O ye bleſſed people of God, who am baniſhed from God; bewail me who am deprived of all goodneſs; bewail me who am deprived of the Holy Ghoſt. Bewail me, who am thruſt out of the wedding chamber of Chriſt. Bewail me, who was once thought worthy the kingdom of God, but am now altogether unworthy. Bewail me, who am abhorred of the angels, and ſevered from the ſaints of God. Bewail me, for that I am condemned to eternal puniſhments. Bewail me, for that I am here on earth, and yet am tormented with the prick of conſcience. I do fear death for that I am wicked. I do fear the dreadful day of judgment for that I am damned for ever. I do fear the puniſhment, for that it is eternal. I do fear the evil angels that overſee the puniſhment, becauſe they are void of mercy. I do fear out of meaſure all the torments; and what I ſhall do I wot not, being thus on every ſide beſet with miſery. If there be any man that can, I beſeech him now to aſſiſt me with his earneſt prayers and ſorrowful tears. For now it behoveth me to ſhed infinite tears for my great ſin: who knoweth whether the Lord will have mercy upon me, and whether he will pity my fall? Whether he will tender my perſon? Whether he will be moved with my deſolation? Whether he will ſhew mercy unto me? Whether he will have reſpect to my humiliation, and incline his tender compaſſions towards me?

'I will proſtrate myſelf before the threſhold and porch of his church, that I may intreat all people both ſmall and great, ſaying unto them, trample and tread me under foot who am the unſavoury ſalt; tread upon me, who have no taſte nor favour of God: tread upon me, which am fit for nothing. Now let the elders mourn, for that the ſtaff whereon they leaned is broken. Now let the young men mourn, for that their ſchool-maſter is fallen. Now let the virgins mourn, for that the advancer of virginity is defiled. Now let the miniſters mourn, for that their patron and defender is ſhamefully fallen. Wo is me, that I fell ſo lewdly: wo is me that I fell moſt dangerouſly, and cannot riſe again. Aſſiſt me O holy Spirit, and give me grace to repent. Let the fountains of tears be opened, and guſh out into ſtreams, to ſee if that peradventure I may have the grace worthily and throughly to repent, and to wipe out of the book of my conſcience the accuſations printed therein againſt me. But thou O Lord, think not upon my polluted lips, neither weigh thou the tongue that hath uttered lewd things: but accept of my repentance, affliction, and bitter tears, the dolour of my heart and heavineſs of my ſoul, and have mercy upon me, and raiſe me up out of the mire of corruption, for the puddle thereof hath even choaked me up.

'Wo is me, that was ſometimes a pearl gliſtering in the golden garland of glory, but now am thrown into the duſt, and troden in the mire of contempt. Wo is me that the ſalt of God now lieth on the dunghil. But how great ſtreams of lamentations ſhall cleanſe and purify my humble heart? Now I will addreſs myſelf, and turn my talk unto God; Why haſt thou lifted me up, and caſt me down? for as thou haſt exalted me with the divine word of thy heavenly wiſdom, ſo me thinks, I ſtick in the depth of ſin which myſelf hath wrought. I had not committed this impiety, unleſs thou hadſt withdrawn thine hand from me. But it is thy pleaſure, O Lord, which art good to do all things graciouſly, and I on the other ſide, being a fool have fooliſhly fallen. But why, O Lord, haſt thou ſhut my mouth by thy holy prophet David? Have I been the firſt that ſinned? or am I the firſt that fell? why haſt thou thus forſaken me being deſolate, and rejected and baniſhed me from amongſt thy ſaints, and aſtoniſhed me when I ſhould preach thy laws? what man is he that is born of a woman, that ſinneth not? what man is he that was ever converſant here on earth, and did no iniquity? This I ſay, becauſe thou haſt forſaken me. David himſelf, who hath ſhut up my mouth, ſinned too bad in thy ſight, yet upon his repentance thou receiveſt him to mercy. Peter that was a pillar, after his fall, wiped it away with ſalt tears, not continuing long in the puddle of his infidelity. But they in favour were thought worthy of mercy. Wo is me that I fell moſt wickedly. Wo is me that my adventure in this thing proved ſo unfortunate: but now I humbly beſeech thee O Lord, call me back, for that I tread a moſt perilous and deſtructive way. Grant me that good guide and inſtructer, the Holy Ghoſt, that I be not made a pricking hedge hog, and become an habitation of devils; but that I may tread under foot the devil that trode upon me, and overcoming his ſlights, may be again reſtored to the joys of thy ſalvation. Remember not, O Lord, the iniquity of thine humble ſuitor. Remember not, O Lord, mine iniquity, who made anſwer with wicked language.

Now all ye which behold my wound, tremble for fear, and take heed that ye ſlumber not, nor fall into the like crime: but rather let us aſſemble together and rend our hearts, and provoke ſtreams of tears to guſh out of our heads; for when theſe run and flow upon the earth, there will follow remiſſion of ſins; the pains will be avoided, and the torments ſhall not be felt. I mourn and am ſorry from the heart-root, O ye my friends that ever I ſo fell: I am fallen and am bruiſed, ſo that there is no health in me: let the angels lament over me, becauſe of this my dangerous fall. Let the aſſemblies of the ſaints lament over me, for that I am ſevered from their bleſſed ſocieties. Let the holy church lament over me, for that I am wofully declined. Let all the people lament over me, for that I have my death's wound.

'I ſee the clouds in the ſky ſhadowing the light from me, and the ſun hiding his bright beams: you all do now ſee that the prophet David hath ſhut my mouth, I was conſtrained by the biſhops to ſpeak ſome words of exhortation, and taking the book of Pſalms into my hands, I prayed, and opened the book; and I lighted upon this ſentence which I am aſhamed to repeat, yet compelled to pronounce, 'Unto the wicked,' ſaith God, 'Why doſt thou preach my laws, and takeſt my covenant in thy mouth?' But bewail me, and lament this my bitter ſorrow: bewail me that am in the like caſe with the reprobate Jews; for that which was ſaid unto them by the prophet, now ſoundeth alike in mine ears. What ſhall I do that am thus beſet with manifold miſchiefs? Alas O death why doſt thou linger? herein thou doeſt ſpite and bear me malice. O Satan what miſchief haſt thou wrought unto me? how haſt thou pierced my breaſt with thy poiſonous dart? thinkeſt thou that my ruin will avail thee any thing at all? thinkeſt thou to procure to thyſelf any eaſe or reſt whilſt that I am grievouſly tormented? who is able to ſignify unto thee whether my ſins be not wiped and done away? whether I have not eſcaped the pains which I grievouſly feared? who is able to ſignify unto thee, whether I ſhall not again be coupled with and made a companion to the ſaints? O Lord I fall down before thy mercy ſeat, have mercy upon me who mourn thus out of meaſure, becauſe I have greatly offended: I ſhed many ſalt and bitter tears, and every living creature hath lamented my miſerable condition. Why haſt thou broken down my hedge and ſtrong holds: the wild boar out of the wood hath deſtroyed me, and the wild beaſts of the field have eaten me up. Rid my ſoul, O Lord, from the roaring lion. The aſſembly of the ſaints doth make interceſſion for me who am an unprofitable ſervant. Shew mercy, O Lord, to thy wandering ſheep which is ſubject to the rending teeth of the ravenous wolf: Save me, O Lord, out of his mouth; ſuffer me not to become the ſacrifice of ſin; but ſend down upon me thy holy Spirit, that with his fiery countenance he may put to flight the crooked fiend of hell, that I may be brought home again by thy wiſdom, that the bill of ſin written againſt me may be blotted out, that my lamentation may ceaſe in the evening, and that I may receive joy in the morning. Let my ſackcloth be rent aſunder, and gird me with joy and gladneſs. Let me be received again into the joy of my God: let me be thought worthy of his kingdom through the earneſt petitions of the church, which ſorroweth over me, and humbleth herſelf to Jeſus Chriſt in my behalf: to whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.'

Whilſt Origen was a catechiſt at Alexandria, finding himſelf not ſufficient, neither able alone to ſearch out the profound myſteries of the holy ſcripture, neither the interpretation and right ſenſe thereof, becauſe of the multitude that frequented his ſchool from morning till night in ſeveral companies, one ſucceeding another, ſo that he wanted leiſure for his private ſtudies, he ordained Heraclas his familiar friend, who was expert in the holy ſcripture and a profound philoſopher, to be his fellow helper, committing to him the inſtruction of the inferior ſort which were lately come to the faith; reſerving to himſelf the teaching of thoſe that were farther and better entered.

Having alſo a great deſire to ſearch out the deep myſteries of the holy ſcriptures, he ſtudied the Hebrew tongue, and bought copies that were uſed amongſt the Jews: he ſearched out alſo other tranſlations beſides the vulgar, as that of Aquila, of Symachus, and of Theodoſion: theſe being compacted together in one volume, and the pages divided into ſeveral columns, ſetting each copy againſt other, and adding the Hebrew to them, he publiſhed the ſame, and entitled it Hexapla.

When the rumour was now every where ſpread abroad of the fame of Origen, many learned men came to try the truth of his doctrine, and to have experience of his utterance in preaching; yea many heretics and famous philoſophers reſorted to him, and were converted by him. Origen was the firſt that wrote commentaries upon the ſacred ſcriptures, being earneſtly ſolicited thereto by Ambroſe, who for his encouragement made him large allowance for his neceſſary expences, furniſhing him with ſeven ſwift notaries, who wrote that which he dictated to them.

Whilſt he continued at Alexandria, there came a ſoldier with letters from the governor of Arabia to Demetrius the biſhop of that ſee, and to the lieutenant of Egypt, deſiring them with all ſpeed to ſend Origen to him, which might communicate to him ſome part of his doctrine; hereupon he took his voyage into Arabia, and inſtructed the governor thereof, and hearing that Beryllus biſhop of Boſtra in Arabia, taught that our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, before his incarnation, had no being, and that he had no proper divinity but only his Father's divinity dwelling in him, about which hereſy many biſhops had dealt with him by conference and diſputation, and yet could not reclaim him; Origen was ſent for, who conferred with him at firſt to find the ground of his opinion, after which, perceiving him not to believe aright, he rebuked him, per-funded him with reaſons, convinced him by manifeſt proofs, and ſo reſtored him to the truth.

He wrote twenty two tomes upon the goſpel of St. John, twelve upon Geneſis, five upon the Lamentations of Jeremiah; annotations upon the firſt five and twenty pſalms; two books of the Reſurrection; one of principal Beginnings; ten called Stromateis. He wrote alſo commentaries upon Iſaiah in thirty tomes; upon Ezekiel twenty five tomes; upon the Canticles in ten books, &c.

Whilſt Origin executed his paſtoral office at Cæſarea (which was after he had left Alexandria) many flocked to his miniſtry, not only men of that country, but alſo infinite foreigners, who forſook their native ſoil came to be his diſcipies: amongſt whom were Theodorus and Athenodrus, two brethren, who after they had continued with him five years, profited ſo much in the holy ſcripture, that they were ordained biſhops in Pontus. And now Origin being above ſixty years old, and much worn and waſted by reaſon of his inceſſant ſtudies and painful exerciſes, at length permitted that thoſe things which he had publicly preached and diſputed of, ſhould, by his notaries, be copied out, which before he would not ſuffer to be done. About the ſame time alſo he wrote his book againſt Celſus the Epicure, intitled the Word of Truth. Then twenty five tracts upon the goſpel of St. Matthew; and twenty five upon the Minor Prophets; he wrote alſo above an hundred epiſtles.

About this time there aroſe ſome Hereticks in Arabia, who taught, that the ſoul dieth together with the body, and that in the general reſurrection they ſhould ariſe together, and be reſtored to life again. For which cauſe a ſynod was congregated, and Origen was ſent for, who ſo ſtrenuouſly diſputed againſt the heretics, that he withdrew their ſeduced minds from this foul error.

Decius ſucceeding Philip in the Roman empire, raiſed a perſecution againſt the church: wherein, amongſt others, Origen ſuffered grievous things: the ſpiteful devil deadly purſuing him with his whole troop, ſtriving againſt him with all the might and ſlight that could be poſſibly invented, ſo that for the doctrine of Chriſt, he ſuſtained impriſonments, torments of body, ſcourging at iron ſtakes, ſtench of dark and loathſome dungeons, and for many days, his feet lay ſtretched four ſpaces aſunder in the ſtocks; all which he patiently endured, together with the terrible threats of fire, and all that the enemy could invent againſt him. After all which he died under Gallus and Voluſianus, being ſixty nine years old, anno Chriſti, 220.

It is to be wondered at, what pious ejaculations, comfortable prayers and zealous exhortations he made, and gave to the Chriſtians in the extremity of his ſufferings, retaining his valour and conſtancy to the giving up of his ghoſt.

One ſaith of him, Origeni nulla pars ætatis periit a ſtudiis: that Origen's whole life was a continued ſtudy. And another ſaith, Origenis ingenium ſufficiebat ad omnia perdiſcenda; that he had ſuch pregnancy of wit that he could learn any thing: that he had a wonderful faculty in expreſſing himſelf ex tempore, and that he was wondrous quick and able to explicate obſcure places of ſcripture. Jerome ſtiles him Magiſtrum eccleſiarum poſt Apoſtolos. Another ſaith, Quis ex ſcriptoribus qui poſt Origenem vixere non inſigniter ab eo adjutus; who of all the writers that lived after Origen, that was not ſingularly holpen by his labours.

He uſed to ſay, 'That God's providence hath ordained all things for ſome end and purpoſe. He made not malice, and though he can reſtrain it, yet he will not. For if malice were not, virtue would not have a contrary, and ſo could not ſhine ſo clear. For the malice of Joſeph's brethren was the means whereby God brought about many admirable works of his providence, as the ſtory ſheweth.

The Life of CYPRIAN, who died Anno Chriſti 259.

CYPRIAN was an African, born in the ancient city of Carthage, and being educated in the ſtudy of the liberal arts, he profited ſo much therein, that whileſt he was young, he was choſen profeſſor of Rhetorick. Yet was he at firſt a Gentile, and idolator, looſe and profane in his practiſe, and much addicted to the ſtudy of magical arts: but it pleaſed God, who had choſen him to a veſſel of mercy for his own glory, to convert him by the means and miniſtry of Cecilius, a godly Preſbyter of Carthage, (whoſe name he ever afterwards bore;) and by the occaſion of hearing him preach upon the hiſtory of the prophet Jonas:

Immediately upon this converſion, he diſtributed all his goods amongſt the poor: and the Carthaginians perceiving in him a very great zeal and ardour for the propagation of the Chriſtian religion, they prevailed with him to be ordained a preſbyter, in which office he ſo worthily demeaned himſelf, that not long after he was made the biſhop of the church of Carthage; and therein gave an excellent example of modeſty, humility, charity, greatneſs of mind and fidelity. His modeſty appeared in that, in all great and weighty buſineſſes, he would never determine or act any thing of himſelf, but by the common conſent and advice of his preſbyters, yea he, many times called in the help and aſſiſtance of the whole church; his humility appeared in that he was never tenacious, nor wilful in his own judgment, but what was wholſomly advied and counſelled by his brethren and colleagues, that he willingly aſſented to. His charity was notably ſeen, in that he did not only commend the care of the poor to his preſbyters; but himſelf alſo, according to his ability, was always forward in miniſtring to them. The greatneſs of his mind appeared in this ſpeech of his, Si qui ſunt &c. If there be any, ſaith he, that think to adjoin themſelves to the church, not by their prayers, but by their threats; not by their humiliation and ſatisfaction when they have ſcandalized the brethren, but by their great words and menaces: let all ſuch know, that the church of the Lord will oppoſe them, and that the tents of Chriſt will prove immovable, and not to be conquered by them. His fidelity will notably appear by his epiſtles, wherein he excellently comforts the afflicted, recalls ſuch as were fallen, or commends the care of them to other biſhops of the church, vigorouſly oppoſeth the heretics and ſchiſmatics. Neither was he only a ſpectator of the martyrdom of others; but ſuffered himſelf to be proſcribed, yea choſe death rather then to betray the truth of the goſpel, or to approve of the leaſt defection to the impious worſhip of the gentiles.

By theſe means his fame increaſed ſo exceedingly, that he was not ſo much the biſhop of Carthage, as of all Africk, yea of Spain, the Eaſt, Weſt and Northern churches. Yea, he was judged the father of all chriſtians.

And to the further ſetting forth (to the praiſe of God's grace) of his glorious vertues wherewith he was endued, appearing as well in his own works, as deſcribed by other worthy writers: he was courteous and gentle, loving and full of patience, and there withal ſevere and impartial in his office. Furthermore he was moſt affable and kind towards his brethren, and took much pains in helping and relieving the martyrs: yea, he wrote letters to the elders and deacons of his biſhoprick, that with all ſtudy and endeavour they ſhould gently entertain, and do all the offices of love that poſſibly they could do to the martyrs in his abſence. He was very prudent and circumſpect: of a marvellous liberal diſpoſition towards the brethren that fled for refuge from other countries; and ſo often as he had cauſe of abſence; he committed the care of thoſe poor men to his fellow officers, writing to them that of their own proper goods they ſhould help their baniſhed brethren to that which was neceſſary for them.

He had alſo great ſkill in the fore knowlege of future events. He was of ſo communicative a diſpoſition, that he concealed nothing which he knew, but with meekneſs and willingneſs uttered it to others. He maintained Eccleſiaſtical peace and concord with thoſe that differed from him in ſmaller matters. Laſtly, he neither circumvented, nor did prejudice to any man; but did that which always ſeemed good in his judgment. He much addicted himſelf to reading; and would let no day paſs wherein he read not ſome part of Tertullian's works, and when he called for him, he uſed to ſay, Da magiſtrum, Give me my maſter. He chiefly ſtudied to keep his body continent, and clean clean from fleshly lusts, saying, 'That then his heart would be truly fit to attain to the full capacity and understanding of the truth, if once he could trample down concupiscence.

A great persecution being raised against the church of Christ by Æmiluanus, president of Egypt and by Paternus, and Galerius Maximus, proconsuls of Africk, Cyprian, sheweth the true causes thereof in his fourth book, epistle the fourth, in these words.

'We (saith he) must acknowlege and confess, that this turbulent oppression and calamity which hath wasted for the most part all our churches, and doth daily more and more consume it, ariseth chiefly from our own wickedness and sins whilst we walk not in the way of the Lord, nor observe his precepts left unto us for our instruction. Our Lord Christ observed the will of his Father in all points; but we observe not the will of the Lord, having all our mind and study set upon lucre and possessions: we are given to pride: full of emulation and dissention: void of simplicity and faithful dealing: renouncing this world in word only, but not in deed; every man pleasing himself, and displeasing all others; and therefore are we thus scourged and that worthily; for what stripes and scourges do we not deserve, when as the confessors themselves, who formerly endured the trial of their faith, and ought to be an example to the rest in well doing, do now observe no discipline? And therefore for their sakes who proudly brag with swelling words of their former confession and sufferings, these torments come, even such as do not easily send us to the crown, except by the mercy of God, some being taken away by a quick death, do prevent the tediousness of punishment. These things do we suffer for our sins and deserts, as by the Lord's threatening we have been forewarned, where he saith, If they shall forsake my law, and will not walk in my judgments, if they shall profane my institutions, and will not observe my precepts, I will visit their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges we justly feel, who neither please God with our good deeds, nor repent of the evil; wherefore, saith he, let us pray from the bottom of our hearts, and with our whole mind, and let us intreat his mercy who promiseth that his loving kindness shall not be wholly taken away. Let us ask and we shall obtain, and though we be delayed, yet seeing we have grievously offended, let us continue knocking: for he hath promised that to them that knock it shall be opened: therefore with our prayers, sighs and tears, let us still knock, and we shall be sure to speed, &c.'

And in another part of his epistle, he shews what vices were principally reigning amongst the Christians, viz. grievous divisions and dissentions amongst the brethren. For although these words were spoken to them in a vision, Petite & impetrabitis: pray, and ye shall obtain: yet afterwards when it was required of the congregation to direct their prayers unto God in behalf of certain persons assigned to them by name, they could not agree about the persons that were to be prayed for, but disagreed in their petitions, which thing did greatly displease God, that spake unto them, 'Pray, and ye shall obtain,' because they were not uniform in voice and heart, neither was there one joint consent among the brethren. Upon which occasion Cyprian moveth them to prayer with mutual agreement. 'For (saith he) if it be promised in the gospel, that whatsoever two or three shall agree upon to ask upon earth, it shall be granted in heaven, what shall then be done when the whole church agree together? or what if this unanimity were amongst the whole fraternity? which unanimity if it had been amongst the brethren, Non veniſſent fratribus hæc mala ſi in unum fraternitas fuiſſet animata, i. e. These evils had not befallen the brethren, if they had joined together in brotherly unanimity.

Cyprian having thus described the causes of this persecution, sets down a vision, wherein was shewed unto him by the Lord before the persecution came, what should happen: the vision, saith he, was this; there was a certain aged father sitting, at whose right hand sat a young man very sad, and pensive, as one that with indignation is sorrowful, with his hand upon his breast, and an heavy countenance. On the other hand sat a person having a net in his hand, wherewith he threatened to catch the people that stood about; and as Cyprian marvelled hereat, it was said unto him; 'The young man whom thou seest sit on the right hand is sad and sorrowful, because his precepts are not observed: but he on the left hand danceth and is merry, for that occasion is hence given to him to get power from the ancient Father to afflict men.' This vision was seen long before this tempest of persecution happened, wherein was declared, that the sins of the Christians were the cause why Satan in this and in all other persecutions, did then, and still doth get such power, with his net of destruction to rage against the blood of christian men: and all (saith Cyprian) because we neglect praying, and are not so vigilant therein as we should be; wherefore the Lord, because he loveth us, corrects us; corrects us to amend us; amends us to save us, &c. And further speaking about this vision, he saith; 'To the least of his servants, both sinful and unworthy, hath God of his tender goodness vouchsafed to reveal these things:' And tell him, said God, that he be quiet, and of good comfort, for peace will come, albeit there be a little stay for a while, for that some remain yet to be proved and tryed.

He had also another vision, wherein he was admonished to use a spare dyet, and to be sober in his drink, lest his mind given to heavenly meditations, might be drawn away with wordly allurements, or oppressed with too much surfeiting upon meats and drinks, and thereby should be less apt and able to prayer and spiritual exercises.

Furthermore, whereas the christians were charged by the heathens as the causes of all public calamities; he tells them that it was long before prophesied of by Christ that towards the end of the world there should be famine, wars and pestilences, which was rather to be imputed to their impious idolatry, and contempt of the true God, then to Christians: which evils (saith he) are increased by the wickedness of men: For, Famem majorem facit rapacitas, quam ſiccitas. Famine comes more by the avarice of men then by the drought of the air; but the special cause thereof proceeds from the shedding of so much christian blood. And whereas the christians were condemned for not worshipping their idols; he shewed that those idols were no true gods, but images of certain dead kings, which could neither save themselves from death, nor such as worshipped and trusted in them.

In the beginning of this persecution, Cyprian went into voluntary banishment, lest (as himself saith) he should do more hurt then good to the congregation: and from the desolate places of his abode, where yet he was often sought after, he wrote to the churches, shewing thereby the beseeming vertue of a faithful pastor in that he took no less care of his flock in his absence then when he was present.

After the death of the emperor Decius he returned to his place, but not long after he was again banished by Paternus, the proconsul of Africa, into the city of Thurben. But when Paternus the proconsul was dead, he came back again, and Galienus Maximus succeding in the office of Paternus, found Cyprian in a garden, whereupon he caused him to be apprehended by his sergeants, and to be carried before the idols to offer sacrifices; which when he would not do, the proconsul brake forth into these words, saying, 'Long hast thou lived in a sacrilegious mind, and hast gathered together men of a wicked conspiracy, and hast shewed thyself an enemy to gods of the Romans, and to their holy laws, neither could the sacred emperors Valerianus and Galienus revoke thee to the sect of their ceremonies; wherefore I condemn thee to have thy head cut off:' To this he answered joyfully; Do fully what belongs to your office: and thereupon putting off his apparel, he gave it to his deacons, wishing them to give his executioner 25 peices of gold in testimony of his love to him, and so kneeling down he covered his eyes, and willingly submitted his neck to the stroke of the sword, suffering martyrdom, anno Chriſti, 259.

He was undaunted in the time of persecution, so that neither his wives disuasions, nor the world's frowns, nor the malice of his adversaries could affright him: he never turned widow empty from him; he was the blind man's eyes, the lame man's legs, the naked man's garment: he called Cæcilius that converted him, novæ vitæparentem, the father of his Christian life: his carriage was such, as it it was hard to ſay, whether he was more loved or feared: he tells that the church having enjoyed long peace, all men ſtudied their private wealth, ſo that devotion, religion, and good diſcipline were quite neglected, and all eſtates were fearfully corrupted: Ergo ſivit hoc flagellum Deus, therefore (ſaith he) God ſuffered this ſcourge of perſecution to reform it; in the time of a peſtilence he ſhewed much piety and charity, comforting ſome, adminiſtring to the wants of others, and ſtirring up others to do the like: he ſuffered under Valerianus and Gallienus.

Some of his uſual ſayings were theſe;

Ne dormiat in theſauris tuis quod pueperi prodeſſe poteſt. Let not that ſleep in thy treaſury that may be profitable to the poor.

Duo nunquam veteraſcunt in homine, cor ſemper novas cogitationes machinando; lingua vanus cordis conceptiones proferendo. Two things never wax old in man; the heart ever imagining new cogitations; the tongue ever uttering the vain conceptions of the heart.

Quod aliquando de neceſſitate amittendum eſt, ſponte pro divina remuneratione diſtribuendum eſt. That which a man muſt neceſſarily ſometimes part with, it's wiſdom for a man to diſtribute it ſo that God may everlaſtingly reward him.

Integritas ibi nulla eſſe poteſt ubi qui improbos damnent deſunt, & ſoli qui damnentur occurrunt. There can be no integrity, whereas they which ſhould condemn the wicked are ever wanting, and they only which ſhould be condemned are ever preſent.

Sericum & purpurum indutæ, Chriſtum induere non poſſunt: women that pride themſelves in putting on ſilk and purple, cannot lightly put on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Fœminæ crines ſuos malo præſagio inficiunt: capillos enim ſibi flammeos auſpicati non metuunt: they which colour their locks with yellow and red, begin betimes to prognoſticate of what colour their hair ſhall be in hell.

Qui ſe pingunt in hoc ſeculo aliter quam creavit Deus, metuant ne cum venerit reſurrectionis dies, artifex creaturam ſuam non recognoſcat. They which love to paint themſelves in this world otherwiſe than God created them, may juſtly fear that at the reſurrection, their Creator will not know them.

Qui Pauperi elemoſynam dat, Deo ſuavitatis odorem ſacrificat, he that gives an alms to the poor, offers a ſweet ſmelling ſacrifice unto God.

Contemnenda eſt omnis injuria præſentium malorum, fiducia futurorum bonorum: all injury of evils preſent is to be neglected, for the hope of good things to come.

Nihil prodeſt verbis proferre virtutem, & factis deſtruere: to ſet out vertue in words, and by deeds to deſtroy the ſame, is nothing worth.

Cyprian in another book mentioneth twelve abſurdities in the life of man, which are theſe;

Sapiens ſine operibus: A wiſe man without good works.
Senex ſine religione: And old man without religion.
Adoleſcens ſine obedentia: A young man without obedience.
Dives ſine elemoſyna: A rich man without alms.
Fœmina ſine pudicitia: A woman without ſhamefaſtneſs.
Dominus ſine virtute: A guide without vertue.
Chriſtianus contentioſus: A contentious Chriſtian.
Pauper ſuperbus: A poor man that is proud.
Rex iniquus: A king that is unjuſt.
Epiſcopus negligens: A biſhop that is negligent.
Plebes ſinæ diſciplina: People without diſcipline.
Populus ſine lege: Subjects without law.

The Life of ARNOBIUS, who flouriſhed Anno Chriſti 330.

ARNOBIUS was a famous profeſſor of rhetoric in a city of Africk, called Sicca; about the year 330 being converted to the Chriſtian religion, he came to ſome biſhops, earneſtly deſiring to be admitted into the church, and baptized; but they ſuſpecting, ne vir ſeculari eloquentia tumens, &c. leſt a man ſwelling and puffed up with ſecular wiſdom, and who had always hitherto oppoſed the Chriſtian religion, ſhould make a mock both of them and it, therefore they rejected him; whereupon he offered unto them thoſe ſeven excellent volumes of his diſputations againſt his former Gentiliſm, which they ſeeing, with great joy received him: he was maſter to Lactantius he uſed to ſay; 'That perſecution brings death in the one hand, and life in the other: for while it kills the body, it crowns the ſoul.' He flouriſhed under Dioclefian between anno Chriſti 300. and 330.

Learned Scultetus in his Medulla Patrum, holds all the works that go under the name of this Arnobius to be ſpurious, but only thoſe ſeven books which he wrote againſt the Gentiles; wherein (ſaith he) Erudite, & quidem tumido, elatoq; orationis genere contra gentes diſputat.

The Life of EUSEBIUS, who died Anno Chriſti. 340.

THE life of Euſebius was written by Acatius, his diſciple, and ſucceſſor in the biſhoprick of Cæſarea, which being loſt, I can meet with no author, that gives us any account either of his parents, maſters, or his firſt courſe of life: but Euſebius is commended to the Chriſtian world, not for his parents or maſters ſake, but for his excellent wit, and great variety of learning: ſo that St. Baſil ſaith of him, Euſebius Paleſtinus eſt fide dignus propter multiplicem experientiam. Euſebius of Paleſtine is worthy to be credited for his great experience. St. Hierom ſaith, Euſebius in divinis ſcripturis ſtudioſiſſimus, & Bibliothecæ divinæ cum pamphilo martyre diligentiſſimus perveſtigator. Euſebius was a great ſtudent of the ſacred ſcriptures, and together with Pamphilus the martyr, a moſt diligent ſearcher of the divine library. Evagrius ſaith, Euſebius vir ſane cum in aliis rebus diſertiſſimus, tum in ſcribendo tantum pollens ut poſſit lectores ſuorum librorum, etſi non efficere perfectos Chriſtianos, ita tamen perſuadendo impellere ut Chriſtianam religionem lubenter colant. Euſebius truly was a man, as in other things moſt eloquent, ſo, in writing, of ſuch prevalency, that tho' he could not make the readers of his books perfect Chriſtians, yet he could inforce them by his perſuaſions willingly to embrace the Chriſtian religion.

He was biſhop of Cæſarea Paleſtina, and for his great love to Pamphilus, ſirnamed Pamphilus: a moſt learned man, of whom Conſtantine the Great uſed to ſay, that he was worthy to be biſhop not only of one city, but of the whole world: and for his eloquence, Hierom ſtiled him, Romani eloquii tubam; the trumpet of Roman elocution.

About this time Euſtathius biſhop of Antioch was depoſed from his biſhoprick, as ſome ſay, for the Sabellion hereſy, whereupon there was kindled in Antioch ſuch a fiery flame of ſedition, that in a manner the whole city was therewith turned upſide down. Amongſt the common ſort of people, ſome cleaved to this ſide, ſome to that; the garriſon-ſoldiers alſo were ſo divided and ſet one againſt the other, that if God, and the allegiance they owed to the good emperor Conſtantine the Great, had not been called to remembrance, they had lamentably murdered one another. But the emperor by his letters appeaſed the tumult, and ſedition, that was raiſed amongſt them; the cauſe whereof was this; one party of them choſe Euſebius Pamphilus for their biſhop, and would bring him in; the other party would have their former biſhop Euſtathius again: but Euſebius refuſed to come to them, whereupon the emperor Conſtantine highly commended him for his wiſdom and moderation.

Afterwards a ſynod being gathered at Tyre, to determine the controverſies which were ſprung up amongſt the biſhops, Conſtantine ſent Euſebius thither to take cognizance of their differences, where this memorable thing fell out. Potamon (one of the biſhops) ſeeing Euſebius to ſit as a judge, and Athanaſius ſtanding, and pleading his cauſe before him, being overcome with ſorrow, and weeping for thoſe things, which he ſaw the profeſſors of the truth to ſuffer, with a loud voice he inveighed againſt Euſebius, ſaying, 'Thou ſitteſt there Euſebius, and innocent Athanaſius ſtands to be judged by thee: who can endure endure ſuch things? Tell me, Euſebius, Was thou not in priſon with me in the time of perſecution? and I truly loſt one of my eyes for the truth ſake, but thou haſt nothing mutilated in thy body, neither didſt thou give any teſtimony for thy confeſſion; thou liveſt and haſt had no member cut off. How gateſt thou out of priſon, but becauſe thou either madeſt a promiſe of ſubmiſſion to our perſecutors, or elſe didſt that which was abominable? Euſebius hearing theſe things, grew into great choller, and diſſolved the aſſembly, ſaying, If you come hither, and now ſpeak ſuch things againſt us, ſurely your accuſers ſpeak nothing but the truth. For if you go about to exerciſe a tyranny here, much more will you do it in your own country.'

There is much conteſt amongſt divines both ancient and modern what Euſebius faith was about the perſon of the Son of God: ſome charge him with arianiſm for denying the deity of Chriſt. But Athanaſius ſaith, that he recanted it in the Nicæne council. Euſtathius of Antioch accuſed him for innovating the Nicæne Creed, when as himſelf profeſſed that he reſted ſatisfied therewith, Hierom nameth him for an open defender of the Arian impiety. On the contrary Socrates, out of Euſebius his writings, endeavours to vindicate him from that charge.

Learned Scultetus thus reconciles them, Arius (ſaith he) denied two things: the eternity of the Son of God, and his co-equality with the Father. Euſebius doth every where profeſs the eternity of Chriſt: but his co equality he never ſeriouſly believed.

He uſed to ſay, 'That Moſes wrote the old law in dead tables of ſtone; but Chriſt did write the perfect documents of the New Teſtament in living ſouls:' he flouriſhed under Conſtantinus Magnus and Conſtantius.

His eccleſiaſtical hiſtory is well known, beſides which he wrote ſome other books, as Libra Præparationis Evangelicæ 15. Libri demonſtrationis evangelicæ decem, and ſome others which are loſt.

The Life of Lactantius, who flouriſhed Anno Chriſti 308.

Lucius Cælius was an Italian by birth, and from his country Firmia was called Firmianus, & a lacteo dicendi genere was called Lactantius: he ſometime lived at Rome, where he was ſcholar to Arnobius, under whom he profited exceedingly, and became ſo famous for his eloquence, that he far ſurpaſſed his maſter therein.

Wimphelingus contends to have him a German by birth, and ſaith, that there is till this day a famous family of the Firmiani in Germany, who boaſt themſelves to be the progeny of Lactantius.

Having perfected his ſtudies at Rome, he went into Bythinia, where he taught oratory under the reign of Dioclefian and Conſtantine; and when he ſaw the Chriſtian religion to want ſome eloquent defenders of it, he took pen in hand, and beſides divers other writings which are periſhed, he wrote his ſeven books of Inſtitutions againſt the Gentiles; a book de ira Dei, of the anger of God: and another of God's workmanſhip; alſo an epitome of the divine inſtitutions. Other things that are fathered upon him are ſpurious, ſaith the learned Scultetus.

About the nineteenth year of Dioclefian, there was an horrible perſecution raiſed againſt the church of Chriſt, wherein the Chriſtian churches were demoliſhed, the ſacred ſcriptures, and other godly books were burnt, the Chriſtians themſelves were dragged to moſt inhuman tortures and torments; yea, where any were found that conſtantly adhered unto Chriſt, they were cruelly martyred: yet it pleaſed God to hide Lactantius in this great ſtorm, though he retained his piety, fearing no torments, but reſolved both in life and death to cleave cloſe unto Chriſt.

He dedicated moſt of his works to Conſtantius Magnus. Hierom ſaith of him, Lactantius quaſi quidam fluvius Tullianæ eloquentiæ: Lactantius flowed with eloquence, yea, was as abounding as Tully himſelf, &c. In his old age, for his rare parts, he was appointed tutor to Criſpus, Conſtantine's ſon: he was ſo far from ſeeking after riches, that he died very poor.

He uſed to ſay, 'That godlineſs always enriches the poſſeſſor:' he flouriſhed under Dioclefian anno Chriſti 308.

The Life of Athanasius, who died Anno Chriſti 375.

Athanasius was born in Alexandria, and by the care of his parents was brought up in all ſorts of learning both human and divine; being a boy, upon a ſolemn feſtival day, he was playing amongſt other boys, who would needs imitate the church in her ſacred offices, and for that end they choſe Athanaſius for their biſhop, who acted his part well, examining other boys about the principles of religion to prepare them for baptiſm. It fell out that whilſt they were at their ſport, came by Alexander, the biſhop of Alexandria, and obſerving the manner of their paſt time, he called them before him, examining every boy what part he had acted, thereby gathering their diſpoſitions for future employments: then did he cauſe them all to be carefully educated in good learning: but above all he took a love to, and was exceeding careful of the education of Athanaſius, for his ingenuity, diligence, and towardlineſs; and when he came to ripeneſs of years he made him deacon, and finding him a nimble, and good diſputant, he took him with him to the council of Nice, ſummoned by Conſtantine the Great againſt the Arians, to aid and aſſiſt him in his diſputations, which procured him much hatred and trouble from the Arians, as afterwards we ſhall hear.

Alexander having by long familiarity with him, gained experience of his piety, parts and zeal in defending the truth againſt the heretics of thoſe times, when he lay upon his death bed, was directed by God to chuſe Athanaſius for his ſucceſſor in his biſhoprick; which Athanaſius having intelligence of, hid himſelf, that he could not be found. Yet did Alexander call for him, and when he came not, being now near death, he ſaid, O Athanaſius, 'Thou thinkeſt that thou canſt eſcape, yet ſhalt thou not eſcape this office.'

After the death of Alexander he was ſearched out, and made his ſucceſſor. This ſo irritated the Arians (who had now crept into favour with the old emperor) that they ſought by all means to caſt him out of Alexandria, and for that end they accuſed him to the emperor as the author of much ſedition, and of many tumults in the church; they charged him with keeping many out of the church which deſired to return into the unity of it, by which means peace and concord was prevented: they procured many biſhops and preſbyters to atteſt the truth of theſe things to the emperor, profeſſing themſelves to be orthodox, and accuſing Athanaſius and the biſhops that adhered to him, to be the authors of the murders, bonds, unjuſt ſtripes, wounds, and burnings in the church: Athanaſius on the contrary wrote to the emperor, that thoſe Arians were the authors of unlawful ordinations, and of innovating the decrees of the council of Nice, of corrupting the faith, of ſeditions, and of proſecuting the orthodox with unjuſt contumelies and reproaches. The good old emperor in theſe various informations, knew not whom to believe: but the Arians being about him, having his ear at command, they procured the emperor to write to Athanaſius, to require him to prohibite none from entring into the church, and that if he ſhould do otherwiſe, he threatened to drive him out of Alexandria, and to place another biſhop in his room. Hereupon Athanaſius wrote back to the emperor, labouring to convince him, that the Arians ought not to be admitted to communicate with the catholic church. Euſebius (one of the chiefeſt of theſe Arians) perceiving that he could not this way prevail againſt Athanaſius, intended ſecretly to make him away, but not finding how to effect it, he ſpake with the Miletians (other heretics) promiſing, that if they would accuſe Athanaſius to the emperor, he would ſo far prevail with him and ſome other great perſons about him, that their cauſe ſhould be heard; hereupon they put in a charge againſt Athanaſius, that he had impoſed a tribute of linen garments upon the Egyptians, affirming that he had alſo gathered the ſame.

But it pleaſed God that by chance there were preſent Alippius and Macarius, two preſbyters of Alexandria, who eaſily refelled and wiped off this falſe charge; yet they ſo far far prevailed, that Athanasius was sent for, and then they charged him with sending a sum of gold to one Philumenus, to make away the emperor. But Athanasius easily cleared himself from this aspersion also; whereupon the emperor suffered him to return home again in peace. He wrote also by him to the people of Alexandria, assuring them of the singular modesty, and sound faith of Athanasius, with whom he had had much comfortable conference, and found him to be a truly divine man, and one that had been accused by his adversaries out of envy, and not for any just cause that they had against him.

Yet for all this the Miletian heretics, because they were frustrated in their former endeavours, invented two other grievous accusations against Athanasius; first, that he had broken the holy chalice. Secondly, that one Arsenius being slain, he had cut off his arm, and kept it to practise magic with all. This Arsenius was a presbyter who having committed a great fault, hid himself, fearing lest his bishop [Athanasius] should call him to an account, and punish him for it; which the Miletians having intelligence of, they diligently sought him out, and having found him, they spake him fair, promised him much favour and security, persuading him to retire himself to one Pines, a friend of theirs, and a presbyter of a certain monastery, and prevailing with him, they hid him there.

Then did they every where disperse rumors in the streets, and at the meetings of the magistrates, that Athanasius had privily murdered Arsenius: yea they suborned a certain monk called John, to charge Athanasius with this grievous crime: hereupon, the rumor of this abominable fact being spread abroad, came at last to the ears of the emperor Constantine. Athanasius perceiving, that though happily he might defend himself against so false an accusation, yet that it would be a difficult thing for him to answer for himself before the judges whose minds were possessed with those false rumors; therefore for the full clearing of himself before all, he endeavoured that the truth might not be concealed: yet with all, he judged it almost impossible to defend and clear himself, so long as Arsenius could not be found: and thereupon he employed one of deacons, a most faithful man, to search out Arsenius. This deacon going into Thebais, by conferring with certain monks, learned where Arsenius was hid. But when he came to Prine's house, Arsenius could not be found: for Prines having had intelligence beforehand of the deacon's coming, had sent him away into the lower Egypt: hereupon the deacon seized upon Prines, and together with him, upon one Helias, an intimate friend, who was said to have conveyed away Arsenius, and carried them along with him to Alexandria: when they came thither, they were carried before the governor of the Egyptian soldiers, unto whom upon examination they confessed that Arsenius was alive, that he had formerly been hid with them, and that now he was hidden in Egypt: this confession of theirs Athanasius desired to be sent to the emperor, and obtained it; whereupon the emperor wrote back to him, that he should go on diligently in his office, that he should be careful in instructing the people, and promoting piety amongst them; and that he should not at all value the snares of the Miletians: 'For (saith he) I know sufficiently, that being stirred up by envy, they have invented these false and forged accusations against you, and thereby raised tumults in the church, I have therefore decreed that such wickedness shall not go unpunished, but that judgment shall be executed according to the civil laws, and except they be quiet they shall be severely punished, as such as lay snares to entrap the innocent, as disturbers of the peace, and right order of the church, and as destroyers of true piety.'

This his epistle he commanded to be publicly read before all the congregation, whereby all the people might be informed of his mind. Hereupon the Miletians, being stricken with fear, carried themselves peaceably, being very fearful of the emperor's displeasure. And the whole church of Egypt being quieted and governed by so worthy a bishop, flourished exceedingly, and daily encreased, many of the Gentiles and of other sectaries being converted to the true faith.

Yet not long after, his restless adversaries began again by cunning and subtile devices to disturb his peace, to carry new complaints against him to the emperor, and to suborn such a multitude of accusers, that the good emperor by their importunity was forced to call a council at Cæsarea Palestinæ; to which Athanasius was summoned to appear. But when he heard that Eusebius bishop of that city, and Eusebius of Nicomedia, and other Arian bishops, his adversaries, ruled all the roast there, he refused to appear, fearing that he should have no equal dealings at their hands. They again and again sent for him, and greatly urged his coming, yet deferred it about thirty months space: but afterwards, when they still urged his appearing, he went to Tyrus, where many of the Oriental bishops, were met, who commanded him to answer to the crimes objected against him. For Callinicus a bishop, and Ischirion (an Arian) had accused him to Hyginus the Præfect of Egypt, for throwing stones against the images of the emperor, whereupon he had been bound with chains. Furthermore, for that he had removed Callinicus, the bishop of Pelusium, and had committed the government of the church to one Mark, a presbyter of the same, causing Callinicus to be kept by soldiers, to be beaten, and brought before the judgment seat.

Some other of the Arian bishops accused him also for causing them to be beaten, in brief all of them objected against him, that he had obtained his bishoprick by the perjury of certain men, whereas all the bishops had protested that none ought to be ordained to that office before he had cleared himself from such crimes as were objected against him; for which causes they had refused to communicate with him, and yet instead of clearing himself from the crimes wherewith he was charged, he sought by force of bonds and imprisonment to compel men to join with him. To these things, they renewed also the charge against him about the matter of Arsenius, and as commonly it falls out where snares are purposely laid to entrap a man, on a sudden, some that formerly seemed to be his friends, stood up to be his accusers: letters also were produced, and read, that the people of Alexandria had made many outcries against him, and for his sake had refused to come to the public of assemblies the church.

Athanasius being commanded to answer for himself, often came into judgment, easily wiping off some of these charges, and requiring some time for the clearing himself from the rest. Yet he was very doubtful what to do, when he saw his accusers wholly to frame themselves to the will and beck of his judges: as also that they had gotten many witnesses against him, partly of the Arians, and partly of the Miletians, which grievously calumniated him; and though the crimes objected were false, and he had easily refuted them, yet the false accusers went away with impunity: especially in the great business about Arsenius, whose arm they said he had cut off to practise magick with: they accused him also for giving gifts to a certain woman, that he might satisfy his lust upon her; yea, that one night he had lien with her against her will: both which accusations were plainly ridiculous and full of falsehood. For whereas they brought the woman into the council before them to justify this charge, Timothy a certain presbyter of Alexandria standing by Athanasius (according to their former agreement) spake thus to the woman: 'Did I lie with you by force?' yea, said she, did you not? and with all told them the time and place where it was done. Athanasius also produced Arsenius in the midst of them, and shewed them both his arms safe and sound, requiring withal that his accusers should shew the arm that was cut off. For it pleased God that Arsenius being again hidden by them, hearing that the good bishop was in danger by reason of him, stole away in the night, and hasted to Tyrus, and came to Athanasius two days before he was to be judged for that cause. By these means Athanasius was so cleared from both the crimes wherewith he was charged, that he thought he needed not any other purgation.

In the records of the council there is no mention made of the first of these charges, the business being so fowl and ridiculous that they were ashamed to make mention of it: but for the latter, his accusers thought it sufficient to say, that Plusianus, one of the bishops that was under Athanasius, by the command of Athanasius had set Arsenius his house, houſe on fire, bound him to a pillar, and whipt him, and afterwards ſhut him up in his houſe, but Arſenius eſcaping out at a window, had hid himſelf for his own ſecurity, and he no where appearing, it gave juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion that he was murdered; for which cauſe the Arian biſhops pretended that they had diligently ſought after him as a worthy perſon and confeſſor, and when they could not find him, had brought his cauſe before the magiſtrate.

Athanaſius perceiving their violence, began to be afraid, and juſtly to ſuſpect, leſt his adverſaries ſhould watch an opportunity privily to murder him. The council having many meetings after this, and all things being filled with tumult, Athanaſius his adverſaries ſtill crying out againſt him, that he was a jugler, a violent man, a man that was unworthy of his miniſtry, and worthy to be puniſhed with death; they which were appointed by Conſtantine to ſee buſineſſes regularly managed in this council, began greatly to fear, leaſt a tumult being raiſed (which they had juſt cauſe to ſuſpect) Athanaſius ſhould be murdered amongſt them; whereupon they ſecretly conveyed him out of the council. Athanaſius alſo finding certainly that he could not ſafely remain at Tyrus, and that it was not poſſible for him to contend with ſuch a multitude of accuſers before ſuch judges as were his profeſſed enemies, he fled to Conſtantinople: hereupon the council, without rendering any reaſon, condemned him, caſt him out of his biſhoprick, and decree that he ſhall no more return to Alexandria, leſt, (ſay they) by his preſence there, he ſtir up and occaſion ſeditions and tumults; and with all, they abſolved the Arians, and all others which had been cenſured by him, as if he had done them much wrong therein; whereupon they did not only reſtore them to communion again, but to all thoſe places and offices from whence they had been juſtly ejected.

They alſo ſignified theſe decrees to the emperor, and wrote to all other biſhops that they ſhould hold no communion with Athanaſius; that they ſhould by no means write to him, nor receive any letters from him: becauſe (ſay they) having ſundry great crimes proved againſt him before us, partly by his flight, and partly by refuſing to plead his cauſe before us, he hath declared himſelf to be guilty. Furthermore they declared, that they proceeded to paſs ſuch a ſentence upon him, becauſe when the emperor the former year had called together the biſhops of the Eaſt to meet in a council at Cæſarea for the hearing of the cauſe, he never came at them, and thereby had tired the council, and deſpiſed the emperor's command: and that when many biſhops were met together at Tyrus, he came to them with a great multitude of perſons, raiſing tumults in the council; one while refuſing to anſwer before them; another while loading the biſhops with reproaches: ſometimes when he was called before them, he refuſed to hear them, and other ſometimes refuſed to ſtand to their judgment: as alſo becauſe it plainly appeared to them that he had broken the holy chalice: for witneſs whereof they had produced Theognis, biſhop of Nice: Maris biſhop of Chalcedon: Theodore, biſhop of Heraclea: beſides Valence, Urſacius and Macedonius, whom (ſaid they) we have ſent into Egypt to examine the matter, and when they came into a certain village, they found the chalice broken.

By ſuch cunning and ſlie allegations they ſought to traduce Athanaſius; yet there were many Preſbyters preſent in that council, who altogether diſliked their proceedings as unjuſt: whereupon Paphnutius a confeſſor, took Maximus biſhop of Hieruſalem by the hand, ſaying, 'Come let us riſe, and be gone hence; for it doth not become us that have loſt our eyes, and have been lamed for the truth of Chriſt, to be preſent, or to communicate with ſuch wicked men in their ſins.'

But Athanaſius (as we ſaid before) being gone to Conſtantinople, complained to the emperor of the unjuſt judgment that the biſhops had paſſed upon him; whereupon the emperor ſent for them to appear before him, to give an account of their proceedings: who as ſoon as they came, perceiving that their falſe and unworthy dealings were fully diſcovered, leaving thoſe former fictions, they now accuſe Athanaſius to the emperor for threatening to reſtrain the coming of corn out of Egypt to Conſtantinople, as it uſed to do; to which accuſations the too credulous emperor giving heed, was ſo much incenſed againſt Athanaſius, that he baniſhed him to Triver in France.

Preſently after his departure Arius with his complices returned to Alexandria, where he made ſuch factions and diviſions, that he caſt the whole city into diſorder and tumults: the people of Alexandria were much grieved and offended, that Arius and his companions had that liberty granted them of returning thither; but eſpecially, becauſe they underſtood that their godly reverend biſhop was driven into exile by their means. But when the emperor underſtood of the perverſe mind, and unquiet behaviour of Arius, he ſent for him to Conſtantinople, to give an account of the tumults and ſeditions that he had raiſed at Alexandria.

At this time there was one Alexander, a godly and worthy man, Biſhop of Conſtantinople. He in the dimication which aroſe about Arius, ſhewed himſelf a very prudent and pious man: for as ſoon as Arius came to Conſtantinople, he preſently raiſed diviſions amongſt the people there alſo, ſo that great tumults enſued whilſt one part of the people ſtood for the faith confirmed by the Nicene council: another part of them ſaid, that the opinion of Arius was moſt conſonant and agreeable to reaſon: hereupon Alexander fell into a great perplexity, eſpecially becauſe Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia, often and grievouſly threatened him, that he would depoſe him from his biſhoprick, if he would not receive Arius and his companions into communion with him. But Alexander was not ſo ſolicitous about his own depoſition, as he was careful for to maintain the Nicene faith, and the doctrine eſtabliſhed by the council. For eſteeming himſelf bound to be a patron of the decrees of that council, he thought it was his duty to the uttermoſt of his power to ſee that they might not be broken, nor made invalid: being therefore engaged in this conteſtation, he laid aſide human arguments, and betook himſelf to the help and aſſiſtance of God; and thereupon, ſhutting himſelf up in the church, he fell to faſting and prayer, and night and day with tears he begged of God, that if the opinion of Arius was true, he might never ſee the day appointed for the trial; but if his own faith were the truth, that then God would inflict ſome viſible judgment upon Arius, the author of all thoſe miſchiefs.

In the mean time the emperor, deſirous to find out the opinion of Arius, ſent for him to his palace, and aſked him whether he did agree to the decrees of the council of Nice? He without delay willingly and chearfully ſubſcribed them: whereas in the mean time he cunningly and fallaciouſly evaded thoſe things which were determined about matters of faith. The emperor wondering at it, required him to ſwear to them, which he alſo did, but with the like fraud as he had before ſubſcribed them. For having written privately his own opinion, he put it into his boſom; and ſwore that he did truly, and from his heart believe according as he had written. The good emperor giving credit to the ſubſcription and oath, commanded Alexander the biſhop of Conſtantinople to receive him into communion. This was on the Saturday, and Arius expected the next day to be admitted into the communion of the church, but God prevented it. For Arius going out of the palace with Euſebius, and a great number of his followers in great pomp and pride, as having gotten the victory of his adverſaries. He no ſooner came to the chief market place in the city, but his conſcience began to accuſe and terrify him for all his deceit and wickedneſs: through the violence whereof his belly was looſened, whereupon he aſked whether the jakes were not near, and being informed that they were hard by, he turned aſide into them, and whilſt he was eaſing nature, firſt his fundament came forth, then abundance of blood, and at laſt he voided his bowels, together with his ſpleen, and his liver, and thereupon he immediately died.

Some of his company thinking him long, went in to ſee the cauſe of his ſtay, and found him dead in this miſerable manner. Hereupon Euſebius and all his rout ſtricken with a wonderful terror: the fame of Arius his accurſed death preſently flew all over the city, yea almoſt over all the world: every one as they went by, pointed at the place where he made this wretched end, and ſhunned the uſe of it: yet his aſſociates gave it out, that his adverſaries by the help of magick had thus deſtroyed him. And

whereas many reforted to see the place of his death, whereby it became very infamous; at length a certain rich citizen that was an Arian, bought it, and pulled down the jakes, built an house in the room of it, that so the thing, in process of time, might be wholly forgotten.

Anathasius being thoroughly informed of these things, writes thus of them. 'Arius (saith he) the prince and author of his sect, and the companion of Eusebius, was by the art and industry of the Eusebian faction sent for to Constantinople by the emperor of blessed memory, who commanded him to write his faith: and this cunning fox wrote it indeed: but (after the manner of the devil in quoting scripture) he craftily suppressed, and left out the impudent words of his impiety.' And when Constantine urged him, that if he had no other opinion which he kept secret in his mind, he should subscribe, and swear to the truth; withal, telling him, that if he forswore himself, God would find him out, and plague him for it; this miserable wretch swore that he had held no other opinion, nor thought otherwise than he had written: whereupon, saith he, going forth from the emperor, God's hand presently fell upon him, and like Judas, dying, he burst in sunder, and his bowels came forth. And though death be common to all men, so that no man, no not our enemy is to be reproached after death: yet the death of Arius being so strange, and differing from the death of other men, is not to be passed over in silence. For when Eusebius and his followers threatened to bring Arius the very next morning into the congregation, and Alexander by prayer had sought unto God to prevent it. It pleased God, who was now made the judge, that very day, to bring him to such a fearful end.

Constantine being informed hereof, wondering at it, assuring himself that Arius had been guilty of perjury.

But shortly after it pleased God to take away that good emperor: after whose death Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia, and Theognis bishop of Nice, supposing that now they had gotten a fit time, endeavoured by all means possible, to take away the Nicene creed out of the church, wherein was the clause of One Substance, and in the room thereof to settle the detestable heresy of Arius: but this they knew they could never effect, if Anathasius returned from exile to Alexandria: wherefore they made use of a certain Arian priest to carry the last will and testament of Constantine to Constantius his son, together with the legacies bequeathed to him. Constantius finding in the will that which he greatly desired, viz. That the empire of the east was left to him, made very much of the priest, granted him great liberty, charged him to use his palace freely and boldly at his pleasure. Hereupon this cunning seducer insinuated himself into acquaintance with the empress, and with her eunuchs and chamberlains: and whereas one Eusebius was chief of the eunuchs, through the persuasions of this lewd priest, he became an Arian, and infected the other eunuchs that were of his company: yea the empress also by the enticements of this priest, and her eunuchs fell into the pestilent heresy of Arius. Yea a while after the emperor himself began to favour that opinion, and so by little and little it was spread every where, first the emperor's guard took it up: then it busied the minds of the multitude in the city, the emperor's chamberlains in the very palace began to contend with women about it: and this woful effect followed the countenancing of this heresy, that in every house and family through the city, they brawled and went together by the ears about it. Yea this infection spread itself quickly, through other regions and countries, and the controversy, much like a spark of fire, kindled the minds of the hearers with the fiery flame of discord and dissention. For every one that desired to know why they made tumults, by and by had occasion given him to reason: and every one was not satisfied with questioning, but contentiously would argue thereof.

By these means the peaceable and quiet state of the church was turned upside down: but in the interim, it pleased God, that this flame kept in the east; whilst the western church enjoyed peace and quietness: for by no means would they suffer the canons of the Nicene council to be violated, or made null.

After the heat of contention was blown abroad, and burnt more and more, the faction of Eusebius doubted not but it would turn to their great advantage: or they hoped that it would come to pass that some bishop would be chosen of Alexandria that would favour and advance their opinion. But at the very same time Athanasius returned unto Alexandria, carrying along with him letters from Constatine the younger, who was one of the emperors, The tenor whereof was this.

'Constantine Cæsar to the people of the Catholic church of Alexandria sendeth greeting: I hope it is not unknown to your discreet wisdom, that Anathasius the professor of sacred divinity, was for a time banished into France: lest that through the mischievous dealing of lewd men (for blood suckers and cruel beasts sought to bereave him of his life) he should privily be slain; wherefore that he might be sheltered from the malice of those despiteful men, he was taken out of their jaws, and was commanded to live under my dominion, where I took care that he might be fully furnished with all things needful, as if he had been in the city where formerly he lived. And when as our lord and father of famous memory, Constantine the emperor, had intended to restore him to his bishoprick again, he was prevented by death before he could accomplish his desires; I thought it my part and duty, therefore to execute the intent of so godly an emperor: with what estimation and reverence I have entertained the man, he shall report with his own mouth at his return to you: neither is there any marvel that I shewed him such courtesy: for methought, that I saw in him the great longing ye had for him, and I beheld also the fatherly reverence and gravity of the man himself; all which moved me not a little thereunto. God of his goodness (well-beloved brethren) have you in his tuition.

Athanasius upon the confidence of these letters, returned unto Alexandria, whom the people received with most willing minds: but such in that city as were infected with the leprosy of Arianism, conspired against him, so that many tumults and skirmishes were raised, which gave occasion to the confederates of Eusebius to accuse Athanasius falsely to the emperor, that of his own private spirit, without the consent of the assembly of the bishops, he had settled himself in that church: this odious accusation so far incensed the emperor Constantius, that he sent one Gregory, an Arian, to be bishop of Alexandria, and with him Syrianus a captain, with five thousand soldiers to drive out Athanasius, and to settle Gregory in his room; the Arians which were in the city, joined themselves with them to help them: it was then even-tide, and the people were assembled in the church to prepare themselves for the sacrament, which was the next day to be administred.

The captain drew nigh, set his soldiers in battle array, and beset the church: Athanasius understanding the danger, devised how the people might take no harm for his sake: whereupon he commanded his deacon to read the collects to the people, and after that to sing a Psalm; and as the Psalm was sweetly and harmoniously sung, all the people went out at one of the church doors, and it pleased God that the soldiers had no power to meddle with them, and Athanasius in the midst of the singers escaped also without any harm: and Gregory took possession of the church; whilst Athanasius being thus (through God's mercy) delivered, went in all haste to Rome.

About this time Constantine the younger was slain by the soldiers, and Constance the youngest of the three emperors, remained emperor of the West. Athanasius coming to Rome, complained to the bishop Julius of the great wrong which was done to him: the like did divers others of the Eastern bishops, who were unjustly thrust out by the Arians: hereupon Julius wrote freely unto the bishops of the East, requiring them to restore those bishops to their places again, sharply rebuking such as had rashly and unjustly procured their deposition.

The wronged bishops trusting to Julius his letter, returned every man to his own church, conveying the letters unto those to whom they were written: who, when the letters came to their hands, took it very hainously that Julius should interpose in that cause, and thereupon summoned a council at Antioch. In the mean time Athanasius being come to Alexandria, there was great stir, and many tumults were raised by Gregory, and the Arians against him: they also forged, and divulged this slander, viz. That whereas Constantine the Great had given certain grain for alms to relieve the poor of the church of Alexandria; this (ſay they) Athanaſius hath ſold, and converts it to his own private lucre: the emperor takes this ſlanderous report for truth, and threatneth him with death, which Athanaſius hearing off, fled, and hid himſelf in a ſecret and obſcure place: at length Julius biſhop of Rome being informed where he lay hid, ſent for him, and when he was come to Rome, he acquainted the emperor Conſtance with all the injuries which were done to him: this good emperor being much affected with that ſad relation, wrote to his brother in the Eaſt, requeſting him to ſend to him three men that would juſtify the accuſations againſt Athanaſius. Accordingly there were ſent Narciſſus the Cilician, Theodore the Thracian, Maris the Calcedonian, and Marcus the Syrian: but when they came to Rome they would by no means reaſon with Athanaſius, only they exhibited to the emperor a certain form of faith, and ſo took their leave without reaſoning of any other matter.

Not long after the Weſtern biſhops aſſembled in a council at Sardis, where Athanaſius was acquit from the crimes charged upon him, and thereupon Conſtance wrote to his brother to acquaint him therewith, and to requeſt him that Athanaſius might be reſtored to his biſhoprick: but when Conſtantius deferred from day to day to anſwer his deſire, Conſtance wrote to him the ſecond time, giving him in choice either to reſtore Athanaſius, and ſo account of him as his friend, or elſe to bear the proclamation of open war, and ſo find him his deadly foe. The emperor of the eaſt, hearing this, was wonderful ſad and penſive; and calling together many of the Eaſtern biſhops, layeth before them the choice his brother had given him; demandeth of them what was beſt in this caſe to be done? they anſwered, that it was far better to reſtore Athanaſius, than to make that an occaſion of mortal and deadly wars: Hereupon the emperor wrote this letter unto him:

'Conſtantius the Puiſſant and noble emperor, unto Athanaſius the biſhop ſendeth greeting. Our ſingular and wonted clemency will no longer ſuffer thy fatherhood to be turmoiled and toſſed with the ſurging waves of the ſeas; the piety which we have always in great price, will no longer permit thy holineſs, now baniſhed out of thy native ſoil, bereaved of thy ſubſtance, barred of all proſperity, to wander through crooked and croſs ways, through deſarts and dangerous countrys. Although we have lingred now a great while from ſending our letters, whereby we might ſignify unto thee the concealed ſecreſie of our mind, hoping that of thine own accord thou wouldſt repair unto us, and with humble ſuit crave remedy and redreſs of thine injuries: yet nevertheleſs (fear peradventure hindering thee of thy purpoſe) we ſent preſently our gracious letters unto thy grave wiſdom, that with all celerity thou come unto us, whereby thou ſhalt ſatisfy thy longing deſires, thou ſhalt have trial of our wonted clemency, and be reſtored to thine own ſee, and native ſoil. For to this end I have entreated my lord and brother Conſtance, the puiſſant and noble emperor, that he would licenſe thee to return unto us, whereby thou mighteſt by the means of us, both enjoy thy country, and have this token for trial of our ſingular clemency, and good will towards thee.'

But whilſt Athanaſius doubted and feared to go unto Conſtantius, by reaſon of the falſe and ſlanderous reports that were raiſed of him, and the implacable malice of his enemies, Conſtantius wrote this ſecond letter to him.

'Conſtantius the Puiſſant and noble emperor, unto Athanaſius the biſhop ſendeth greeting. Although by our former letters we have ſignified to thy wiſdom after the plaineſt manner, that with a ſecure mind and ſafe conduct, thou ſhouldſt come unto our court, becauſe we were fully determined to reſtore thee to thy former dignities: we have notwithſtanding ſent theſe letters alſo to thy holineſs, that thou hire a common waggon, and removing all timorous thoughts from thy diſtruſtful mind, thou ſpeedily repair unto us, to the end thou mayeſt the ſooner enjoy thy long wiſhed deſires.'

Preſently after he wrote again this third letter for his further ſatisfaction.

'Conſtantius the Puiſſant and noble emperor, unto Athanaſius the biſhop ſendeth greeting: Being lately at Edeſſa, where alſo were ſome of thy preſbyters then preſent, it ſeemed good unto us to ſend one of them unto thee, that thou ſhouldſt haſten unto our court, and after thy coming into our preſence, without delay return unto Alexandria: and foraſmuch as it is now a great while ago ſince thou receivedſt our letters, and haſt deferred thy journey, therefore now alſo we thought good to put thee in remembrance, that without delay thou come unto us, and ſo thou ſhalt poſſeſs the liberty of thy country, and thy long wiſhed eaſe and quietneſs. And that thou mighteſt fully perſuade thyſelf of all the promiſes, we have ſent unto thee Achetas the deacon, by whom thou ſhalt underſtand, both what our purpoſe is, and alſo how that thy heart's deſire ſhall prevail.'

Athanaſius being at Aquileia when he received theſe letters, immediately poſted to Rome, and ſhewed them to biſhop Julius: whereby the church of Rome rejoyced much, conceiving that Conſtantius the Eaſtern emperor was of the ſame faith and opinion with themſelves; whereupon Julius wrote this letter to the people of Alexandria in the behalf of Athanaſius.

'Julius biſhop of Rome, unto the preſbyters, deacons, and well beloved brethren of Alexandria, ſendeth greeting in the Lord: I do greatly rejoyce with you (well-beloved brethren) that henceforth you may behold with your eyes the fruit of your faith: for that is to be ſeen in my brother and fellow biſhop Athanaſius, whom God hath reſtored unto you, partly for his ſincere and godly life, and partly alſo by the means of your prayers. Hereby it may be eaſily conjectured what pure and fervent prayers you have always poured out unto God; for when you called to mind the heavenly promiſes, and the intire affection which you bare unto them, all which you learned of my foreſaid brother, you underſtood plainly, and through the right faith ingrafted into your minds, you were fully perſuaded that Athanaſius, (whom in your godly minds you beheld as preſent) ſhould not be always ſevered from you; wherefore I need not to uſe many words unto you, for whatſoever I can ſay, the ſame hath your faith prevented; and whatſoever you all heartily deſired, the ſame (through the grace of God) is now fully come to paſs. And that I may repeat the ſame again, I do greatly rejoyce with you, that you have continued ſo firm and ſtedfaſt in the faith, that by no means you could be withdrawn from it. Moreover I do no leſs rejoyce for my brother Athanaſius, who notwithſtanding the manifold calamities, and ſundry miſeries which he endured, yet remembred almoſt every hour your intire love, and great longing for him: and though for a ſeaſon he ſeemed to be abſent from you in body, yet lived he always as preſent with you in the ſpirit. I think verily (well-beloved brethren) that all the temptations and pains which he endured are not void of their commendations or profit; for by this means both his faith and yours have been made manifeſt to the whole world. If he had not been tried with ſuch great and lamentable temptations who would ever have thought, or known that your mind had been ſo unmoveably fixed upon ſo worthy a biſhop; or that he was the man that excelled in ſuch rare gifts, by means whereof he is made partaker of the hope that is laid up for him in heaven; wherefore he hath attained to a notable teſtimony of his faith, not only in this life, but of that which is to come: for by his patient ſuffering of much adverſity both by ſea and land, he hath trampled and trod under foot all the malicious treacheries of Arius adverſaries: oft times by reaſon of their ſpite, he ſtood in great hazard of his life, yet made he no account of death: but through the grace of Almighty God, and power of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, he eſcaped their hands, whereby he conceived good hope that in the end he ſhould quit himſelf of his adverſaries, and be reſtored to the comfort of you all, and bear away, together with you, the victorious garland of well-doing, in that he is already famous even to the end of the world: highly commended for his good life: renowned for his free and conſtant perſeverance in the defence of the Chriſtian and heavenly faith, and regiſtrated by the cenſure of you all to immortal memory, for the ſingular love and affection he ſhewed towards you; wherefore he is returned unto you bedecked with greater excellency and renown than before his departure. If the purity of fine and precious metal, as of gold and ſilver be exquiſitely tried in the fire; what can be ſpoken of ſo excellent a man in reſpect of his worthineſs, who after the quenching of so many flaming fires of sedition: after the recovering of so many dangerous perils, and grievous downfals, is now restored to you, and found innocent, not only by our determination, but by the decree and censure of the whole council? Entertain therefore (well-beloved brethren) your bishop Athanasius, and also such as have been partakers of his afflictions, with all reverence, joy and gladness: rejoice in that you have obtained your desires: in that you have (as it were) fed and quenched the thirst of your shepherd, hungering and thirsting in his absence after your godly zeal: for thereby, during his abode in foreign and far countries, you comforted him not a little, and whilst he was tossed to and fro with the storms of persecution, and entangled with the snares of his malicious adversaries, you mitigated his grief and sorrow by sending to him tokens of your faithful and fervent minds towards him; when that I think with myself, and cast in my mind the conceived joy of you all at his return; the flocking multitude full of religion and godliness; the solemn feast of sage persons assembled together; what kind of day the return of my brother unto you is like to be, I cannot but conceive with wonderful joy; especially because the schism and discord which reigned heretofore will then be plucked up by the roots: for that his honourable return according to your own hearts desires hath replenished you with incredible joy and gladness: so that the joy for the greatness thereof hath reached unto us, to whom it is given from above to have acquaintance and familiarity with so excellent a man. It seemeth good that we end our epistle with a prayer;'

'God almighty, and his Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, give you always of his grace, and grant you of his mercy the reward of so noble a faith which you have shewed towards your bishop, with so worthy a testimony: that both you and yours may not only in this world, but also in the life to come enjoy far more excellent gifts, which neither eye hath seen, nor ear hath heard, neither the heart of man conceived the things which God hath prepared for them that love him through our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom with almighty God be glory for ever and ever. Amen. God have you in his tuition, well-beloved brethren.'

Athanasius having received these letters went into the East, and though the emperor Constantius, at that same time, received him not unwillingly, yet giving ear to the crafty sleights of the despiteful Arians, he thus reasoned with him.

Although thou art restored to thy bishoprick by the decree of the council, and our determination: yet because there are in Alexandria certain people differing in opinion from thine, and severing themselves from thy communion, my request is, that thou permit them one church by themselves: Athanasius made answer to this request very wittily, and said, O emperor, it lieth in thee to do as pleaseth thee best: to command, and execute the commandment: I also will crave of thee another thing by way of recompence, and my humble request is, that thou grant it me: and when the emperor answered, that with most willing mind he would condescend thereunto: Athanasius immediately said: 'My humble suit is, that I may obtain that which thou wouldst have at my hand, viz. That thou wouldst grant one church through every city for such as will not communicate with the Arians.' The Arians perceiving that the request of Athanasius was not unreasonable, made answer, that they would defer the answer unto another time, and consider better of it; that they hindred not the emperor, but suffered him to do what pleased him best: wherefore the emperor restored Athanasius to his bishoprick again, writing letters to the bishops, clergy, and people of Alexandria, that they should receive him lovingly and willingly: the tenor whereof was as followeth;

'Constantius the mighty, noble, and puissant emperor, unto the bishops and presbyters of the catholic church, sendeth greeting: it appeareth evidently that Athanasius the reverend bishop was not destitute of the grace and goodness of God, but though by the judgment and censure of men he was dealt injuriously withal, and unjustly condemned for a little while: yet the divine providence of almighty God, the beholder of all things, pronounced for him the just sentence of innocency, so that by the will of God, and our decree, he recovered both his native soil and proper church, where the Holy Ghost hath assigned him governor. He is to receive at your hands such things as our clemency, being led by right and reason, shall think convenient for him: so that all, whatsoever hath been heretofore decreed against such as communicated with him, be henceforth quite forgotten, that all suspicion raised of him be henceforth removed, and that his clergy (reason so requiring) may enjoy such liberty, freedom, and privileges as they have done in times past. Moreover of our sovereign benignity towards him, we have thought good to add this also, that as many as are allotted to the sacred senate of the clergy may understand of truth, that we have granted safety and good leave to as many as cleave unto him, be they bishops, or of what other degree soever of the clergy. Every one's firm and sure consent in this behalf shall be a sufficient sign or token of his faithful mind and purpose: we have commanded that such as embrace his communion, addicting themselves to the sounder opinion and better sentence, all alike now by our permission, as heretofore by the providence of God, may enjoy the benefits bestowed upon them from above.'

He wrote also to the governor this epistle.

'Constantius the puissant and noble emperor, unto Nestorious sendeth greeting. If any thing be found decreed and recorded to the prejudice, hurt or damage of such as communicate with Athanasius the bishop, our will is, that the same be wholly abrogated and disanulled. Our pleasure is moreover, that his clergy shall enjoy their like franchises and liberty as in times past: we will have this commandment put in ure, that as Athanasius the bishop is restored to his see, so all the clergy of his communion may recover, and possess the like liberty with other ecclesiastical persons, that so they may live at heart's ease.'

Athanasius having received these letters, passed through Syria, and came to Palestine: and arriving at Hierusalem, he opened unto Maximus the bishop, both the decrees of the council of Sardis, and also the emperor Constantius his agreement and consent therein, and procured a synod of bishops to be assembled there: which being gathered together, Maximus gave to Athanasius the communion, and assigned to him his dignity, and the council signified by their letters to the people of Alexandria, and to the bishops of Egypt and Lybia, all their decrees and canons touching Athanasius, and so dissolved.

Hereupon all the adversaries of Athanasius cried out against Maximus, because that aforetime he had subscribed to his deposition; but now repenting of his folly, he became of his faith, and awarded to him both the communion and his dignity.

When Ursacius and Valence, who formerly had been earnest followers of Arius, heard of these things, they condemned their former doings, and gat them to Rome, there to exhibit their recantation to Julius the bishop, subscribing also the Creed that contained the clause of one substance, writing also to Athanasius, that thenceforth they would communicate with him.

Athanasius travelling through Palestine towards Alexandria, preached in every city where he came, exhorting them to eschew the Arians, and to embrace such as confessed the faith of one substance; and in divers of the churches also he ordained ministers, which gave occasion to his adversaries to accuse him again for presuming to make ministers in other mens provinces.

Not long after it pleased God, that Constance the emperor of the West died, and Constantius made challenge unto all the dominions of his brethren, and being proclaimed emperor of the West, he made an expedition against Magnentius and Bretanion, two tyrants that had usurped the government there. The adversaries of Athanasius supposing that now they had gotten a fit opportunity, invent, and charge him with new hainous offences: informing the emperor that he had perverted all Egypt and Lybia; also they urged against him his late ordination of ministers in other mens diocess. Athanasius in the mean time came to Alexandria, convened divers councils of the bishops of Egypt, where they agreed to the decrees of the council of Sardis, and of that held at Jerusalem.

The emperor upon this occasion, who aforetime was addicted addicted to the Arian hereſy, wreſted all things that he had lately decreed on the contrary part, and firſt the baniſhed, Paulus the biſhop of Conſtantinople, whom he guides that were to conduct him into exile, very lewdly ſtifled at Cucuſum in Cappadocia. Marcellus was expulſed. Lucius biſhop of Adrianople was clapt up into priſon, and there choaked with ſtink. But above all, the emperor was moſt incenſed againſt Athanaſius, giving commandment, that he ſhould be executed wherever he could be taken: he charged alſo that Theodulus, and Olympius, biſhops of Thrace ſhould be put to death, and Arians were placed in all theſe biſhops rooms.

But it pleaſed God that Athanaſius was made privy to theſe bloody decrees of the emperor; whereupon he fled from Alexandria, and eſcaped the danger. This the Arians, rejoiced at, and grievouſly traduced him for it; which Athanaſius hearing of, apologized for himſelf, making a relation of the horrible practiſes commited at Alexandria by Georgius the Arian.

'There came (ſaith he) to Alexandria certain perſons that ſought us out to execution: the ſoldiers unawares beſet the church, and inſtead of devout ſerving of God, took in hand their bloody ſwords, Georgius alſo joined with them: then were the virgins haled, and clapt up into priſon: the biſhops were bound, and led away by bands of ſoldiers: the fatherleſs and widows were diſpoſſeſſed of their houſes: whole families were rifled: the true Chriſtians were violently trailed and lugged out of their habitations: their doors were nailed up: the clergy mens brethren were in great danger for their brethrens ſake: theſe things were very grievous, but that which followed was far worſe. The week after Whitſuntide, the people did faſt, and met in the church yard to pray, becauſe they abhorred the communion of Georgius: but when this paſſing lewd man heard of it, he ſtirred up againſt them one Sebaſtian, a captain, who alſo was a manichee. He immediately with a great troop of ſoldiers, all in armour, and with naked ſwords in their hands, and bows and arrows prepared, ran upon the people as they were praying upon the Sabbath, and finding there but a few, (for the hour being paſt, the greater part was gone home) he committed ſuch hainous acts as very well became his perſon. He ſet on fire a great company of faggots, he made the virgins ſtand nigh the burning flame to ſcorch them: he endeavoured thereby to enforce them to confeſs the Arian faith; but when he perceived that they would not, and that they deſpiſed the burning heat of the raging fire; he ſtripped them ſtark naked; buffetted them about the head and face, ſo that for a long time after they were ſcarce known of their own friends. He alſo took forty perſons, and plagued them with a new kind of torment never heard of before: he took palm-twigs newly plucked off from the trees, and ſtripping them ſcourged them therewith, and the twigs, having on their pricking knobs, ſo rent them, that by reaſon of the ſtumps ſticking in their fleſh, they were fain to repair to ſurgeons to be dreſſed of their wounds: others of them not being able to endure ſuch terrible pains, died of their wounds: and ſuch men and virgins as remained alive, he ſent away by the ſoldiers into exile. The dead carcaſſes not yet fully cold, were denied to their friends being thrown here and there, and lying unburied (for that liked them beſt) the ſoldiers inſulting over them, as though they had not been faulty in committing ſuch horrible crimes: this did they, having their minds beſotted with the furious rage of frantick hereſy. And when as the dear and familiar friends of the dead rejoiced at the bold and conſtant proteſtation of their faith, yet mourned, becauſe that their corpſes were not covered with earth, the ſavage impiety and beaſtly cruelty of theſe ſoldiers revealed itſelf with greater ſhame and infamy.

'Moreover, they baniſhed forthwith ſundry biſhops of Egypt and Lybia, and ſome of the preſbyters: and having bereaved them of their native ſoil, they uſed them ſo mercileſſly, that ſome of them died by the way, and others in exile. They put to death alſo above thirty biſhops. They followed the ſteps of wicked Achab, employing all their art and induſtry to root out the truth from off the face of the earth.'

Conſtantius his armies having overcome and ſlain the tyrants, he preſently removed to Rome, there to celebrate the triumphs for his victories: and hoping that he might by one means or other draw the chief diſſenting biſhops to an agreement in the faith, he ſummoned a council to meet in Italy; about which time Julius the biſhop of Rome died, having been biſhop 25 years, and Liberius ſucceeded him. Whereupon thoſe biſhops which were againſt the Nicene faith, perſuaded themſelves that they had gotten a fit time to diſperſe their calumnies againſt the orthodox, laboured by all means with the emperor, that all thoſe orthodox biſhops, whom they had depoſed, might not be again reſtored to their churches, both becauſe they maintained a form of faith contrary to theirs, as alſo for that in the lifetime of Conſtance, they had endeavoured to ſow the ſeeds of contention betwixt the two emperors. And this odious ſuggeſtion they made, becauſe of Conſtance his letters formerly mentioned in the behalf of Athanaſius: but their chiefeſt ſpleen was againſt Athanaſius; whereupon about thirty of theſe Arian biſhops meeting together at Antioch, they wrote to all other biſhops, that Athanaſius had returned to Alexandria againſt all the laws of the church: not by a decree of a council, but by the contention of ſome that were of his own opinion: whereupon they commanded that none ſhould communicate with him, neither write to him, but that they ſhould hold communion with biſhop Georgius whom they had ordained.

But Athanaſius little eſteemed theſe their doings, expecting to meet with far greater afflictions afterwards. For Conſtantius being now the ſole emperor of Rome, laboured by all means to draw the weſtern biſhops to agree with them that denyed Chriſt to be conſubſtantial with the Father: yet at firſt he attempted not this by force, but ſought rather to effect it by fraud, and fair means, endeavouring to perſuade them to agree with the eaſtern biſhops in that ſentence which they had pronounced againſt Athanaſius: aſſuring himſelf, that if by this means he could but remove Athanaſius out of the way, he could compoſe matters of religion according to his own mind.

A council therefore being called to meet at Millain, few of the eaſtern biſhops came to it, ſome being hindred by ſickneſs, and others by the length of the journey: but of the weſtern biſhops there appeared above three hundred.

The eaſtern biſhops which were there, required that Athanaſius might be condemned, and depoſed from his biſhoprick: and of the weſtern biſhops, ſome (through fear) others being circumvented by fraud, and another part being ignorant of former proceedings; aſſented to it: only Dionyſius biſhop of Alba, Euſebius biſhop of Verſelle, Paulinus biſhop of Trevir, and Rhodanus and Lucifer proteſted againſt ſuch proceedings, for (ſay they) if ſuch things be ſuffered, this evil will not reſt here, but the decrees which are rightly and truly eſtabliſhed concerning God, and the Nicene faith will be utterly ſubverted, and we diſcern that all the care of the emperor and of the Arians is to bring this to paſs; but becauſe theſe men ſpake ſo freely in the council, they were all of them baniſhed: and the event ſhewed that they did not miſs the mark.

For ſhortly after there was another council gathered at Ariminum, and another at Seleucia, both which laboured to introduce new things againſt the decrees of the council of Nice.

In the mean time Athanaſius perceiving that ſnares were laid for him in the emperor's palace, and that he could not come thither without apparent danger, he appointed five biſhops of Egypt, amongſt whom Serapon was one, a man eminent for piety, and holineſs of life, and alſo very eloquent, to go to the emperor, who was yet in the weſt: and with them he ſent three of his own presbyters to ſee if by any means they could reconcile the emperor to him, and vindicate him from the calumnies which his enemies had caſt upon him, as alſo to tranſact other buſineſſes which much concerned the good, both of him and his church.

But as ſoon as they were gone from Alexandria, he received letters from the emperor, requiring his preſent coming to the court. This much troubled Athanaſius and all his people, much doubting what the iſſue might be: For they knew that he could neither ſafely aſſent to the emperor, who defended a contrary faith, neither could he without apparent danger croſs him therein. Hereupon Athanaſius reſolved to abide at Alexandria, and ſent him back who had brought the emperor's letters.

The

The ſummer after came another meſſenger from the emperor, who, with the aſſiſtance of the governors of Egypt, forced Athanaſius to depart out of Alexandria, and grievouſly moleſted the clergy of his church. But when the meſſenger ſaw the people to be extremely offended with theſe proceedings, and that they betook themſelves to their weapons, he went his ways, without effecting what he came about.

Shortly after, the forces which were called the Latin Legions, were commanded to aſſemble out of Egypt and Lybia, and to go to Alexandria; and the captain of them being informed that Athanaſius lay hid in one of the churches, he took a company of ſoldiers, and Hilarius that brought the emperor's command, and going to the church, they environed it, and brake in at the windows, ſearching every corner, yet found not Athanaſius; for it had pleaſed God, by a divine revelation, to warn him of his dangers, (as in many other ſtraits he had formerly done); whereupon he had a little before conveyed himſelf out of the church, and thereby eſcaped. The like alſo had happened once before, when being grievouſly threatened by Conſtantius, in the lifetime of Conſtance, he had retired himſelf to a friend, and there lay hid in a cave, that formerly uſed to be full of water. In that place he continued long, and a certain maid uſed to miniſter to his neceſſities. But the Arians, making diligent enquiry after him, had, by their large promiſes, corrupted this maid to betray him; but God diſcovering the danger to him, a little before they came to apprehend him, he had conveyed himſelf to another place.

The like alſo happened at another time; for Athanaſius being forced to fly from Alexandria, he entered into a pinnace, and went up the river Nilus, which his adverſaries being informed of, ſent a captain and ſoldiers in another ſhip to purſue him. This being revealed to him by God, he required the maſter of his pinnace to turn again towards Alexandria; and ſo, having the ſtream with him, he ſwiftly paſſed by his purſuers; and returning to Alexandria, he hid himſelf in his friends houſes, and by reaſon of the multitude of people, was eaſily concealed, thereby eſcaping the danger. For theſe, and ſuch like miraculous, his adverſaries, the Arians and Gentiles, accuſed him as dealing in the magical art.

Athanaſius being thus (as we ſaid before) eſcaped, his clergy and people enjoyed the liberty of his churches for a ſhort time, viz. till the government of Egypt, and the captain of the ſoldiers, caſt all that adhered to Athanaſius out of the ſame, and delivered thoſe churches to ſuch as longed for the return of Georgius the Arian; who ſhortly after came to Alexandria, and carried himſelf very ſternly towards all, but cruelly towards all the friends of Athanaſius, caſting both men and women into bonds, and cruelly ſcourging them, ſo that every one looked upon him as a tyrant. Yea, he grew into ſuch hatred of the multitude, that on a time they roſe up againſt him whilſt he was in the church, and he hardly eſcaped from being torn in pieces by them; which ſo affrighted him, that he immediately fled to the emperor. Hereupon the friends of Athanaſius recovered their churches again; but they kept them but a while, for the præfect of the Egyptian ſoldiers drave them out, and reſtored the churches to the followers of Georgius. The emperor alſo ſending his ſecretary to Alexandria, he grievouſly puniſhed many of the people, whipping and ſcourging them in a cruel manner; and ſhortly after him came Georgius, and for the aforementioned cauſes was far more terrible to them than formerly he had been, which procured him their implacable hatred, both for incenſing the emperor againſt them, and for his heretical opinions, and cruel uſage of them.

But not long after, in a tumult raiſed by the Gentiles, Georgius was pulled out of the church by the ears, tyed to a camel, torn in pieces, and burned to aſhes, together with the beaſt. Conſtantius the emperor alſo died, and Julian the apoſtate ſucceeded him; about which time Athanaſius returned to Alexandria, and was lovingly and chearfully entertained by his people. The Arians were baniſhed, and the church was reſtored to the government of Athanaſius.

But the Arians took occaſion, from his former flight, exceedingly to reproach and traduce him, whereupon he made this apology:

'Behold (ſaith Athanaſius) the lewd practices of wicked perſons; although they are privy to the hainous offences committed againſt me, yet they are nothing aſhamed of them, but charge me with a foul ſpot, in their opinion, and blemiſh of infamy, for eſcaping the hands of cut-throats and blood-ſuckers; yea, they beſhrew themſelves that they diſpatched me not out of the way. Moreover, that they may ſtain my credit and eſtimation, they fall to accuſe me of faint heartedneſs, and a timerous diſpoſition; being forgetful, that whilſt they blaze theſe things to my diſpraiſe, they cauſe the ſhame to light upon their own pates. For, if it be a diſcredit to fly the hands of a tyrant, how much more for them to perſecute a man to death? He that flyeth ſeeks means to ſave his life; but he that perſecuteth goeth about to procure another's death.

'That we ſhould fly, in ſuch caſes, the ſcripture doth warrant us; but in thirſting after the blood of our brother, the command is broken, and the author thereof is found the chief cauſe of the flight. If they blame me for giving them the ſlip, they are worthy of far greater ſhame and reprehenſion themſelves; for let them ceaſe from perſecuting, and threatening with death, and then I will ceaſe from running away. But their ſpite and malice hath no end; they do nought elſe but deviſe ſnares to bring men to deſtruction; yea, and that, though they know full well, that the flight of the perſecuted is a foul ſhame to the perſecutors. For no man flyeth from the gentle and meek, but from the cruel and wicked man. They that were far indebted to others gave Saul the ſlip, and fled unto David. Wherefore theſe men go about to diſpatch ſuch as convey themſelves out of their way, leaſt the lewdneſs of their biſhops ſhould be manifeſtly known. Herein alſo they ſeem to be ſtark blind; for look how evident the flight is, far more apparent will their ſlaughter and baniſhment ſeem unto the world. If they murder men, death no doubt lifteth up her voice, and ſoundeth out their cruelty. If they baniſh them, therein they ſet up monuments for the remembrance of their wicked doings. Had they been in their right wits, they might have perceived their own folly, and ſeen themſelves overthrown in their own devices. If they reproachfully charge them with hiding themſelves from ſuch as ſeek their lives, and accuſe them for flying from the hands of their perſecutors, what have they to ſay, when they read that Jacob fled from the face of his brother Eſau? and that Moſes, for fear of Pharaoh, conveyed himſelf to Midian? What have theſe contentious quarrellers to ſay unto David, who fled from Saul, which ſent ſome of his guards to ſlay him, who hid himſelf in a cave, counterfeited his perſon, until he had ſubtily paſt Abimelech the prieſt, and avoided the laying in wait for him? What anſwer can theſe raſh babblers give, when they ſee that the great prophet Elias, who ſo devoutly called upon the name of God, and raiſed the dead, was fain to fly, and to hide himſelf, from Ahab, and run away becauſe of the threats of Jezebel? The ſons of the prophets alſo, in thoſe days, being ſought for, hid themſelves; and, through the help of good Obadiah, were ſuſtained in caves. Have they not read theſe antient ſtories?

'Are they ignorant alſo of what the evangeliſts have written? For the diſciples fearing the Jews fled, and were ſcattered abroad in divers countries. Paul alſo being at Damaſcus, and ſought for by the governour of that country, was let down over the wall in a baſket, and ſo eſcaped the danger. The ſcripture therefore having ſhewed us theſe things, what colour can they find to cloak their impudent cavils?

'If they charge them with timerouſneſs and fear, the fault recoils and lights upon their own diſtempered brains. If they ſay it is contrary to the will of God, then are they found altogether ignorant of the word of God; for it is commanded in the law, that ſanctuaries and cities of refuge ſhould be appointed for ſuch as were purſued to death, where they might live in ſafety. Yea, what ſaith Chriſt? 'When they ſhall perſecute you in one city, fly into another.' And again, ſaith Chriſt, 'When you ſhall ſee the abomination of deſolation, mentioned by the prophet Daniel, ſtanding in the holy place, then let them that be in Judea fly into the mountains. He that is on the the house top, let him not come down to take ought out of the house; and let not him that is in the field return home for his raiment.' Holy men having learned these things, framed their lives thereafter. Yea, the word of God being made man, flicked not to hide himself, as we commonly do, when he was sought for; he fled to avoid the conspiracies of Herod, and afterwards of the Pharisees which persecuted him. For, as by his patient suffering of hunger and thirst, and such miseries, he shewed himself to be true man; so also by flying away from the face of his adversaries. And, as in his childhood he fled into Egypt from Herod, so when he heard that Archelaus reigned in his father's stead, it pleased him to go aside into the parts of Nazareth. Afterwards, when he manifested himself to be God, and healed the withered hand, the Pharisees went out, and took counsel how they might dispatch him; but Jesus, perceiving their conspiracy, conveyed himself from amongst them.

'Again, when he restord Lazarus to life, they took counsel how they might put him to death; 'Jesus therefore, at that time, shewed himself no more openly amongst the Jews, but d parted into a solitary place near to the wilderness.' Again, when our Saviour avouched 'Before Abraham was, I am,' the Jews took up stones to throw at him; but our Lord hid himself, and went out of the temple, and passing through the midst of the throng, escaped away.

'When they see these examples, and bethink themselves of these presidents, are they not inwardly pricked in their consciences, when they presume thus to sit in judgment upon the sayings and doings of our Saviour? So also when Jesus heard of the beheading of John the Baptist, the text saith, 'that he took shipping, and went aside in to a desert place.'

'I would to God that these men would now at length be ashamed of their doings, and presently cease from slandering true professors, and proceed no further in their furious dealings, charging even our Saviour himself with timorousness and fear, thereby blaspheming the majesty of his blessed name. But no man can away with such persons as are wholly given over to all manner of ungracious behaviour. It may easily be proved, that they are altogether ignorant of what the Evangelists have left us in writing; the cause that moved our Saviour to fly and go aside, being laid down in the gospel, was most agreeable unto reason; and was therefore an example to all his saints: for whatsoever things are written to have happened unto him after the manner of men, the same is to be referred unto all mankind; insomuch as he took our nature upon him, and lively expressed in himself the human affections of our frail constitutions. He suffered not himself to be taken before his hour came, neither yet hid himself when his hour was come, but yielded himself to the enemy. In like sort, the blessed martyrs, in the great heat and troublesome storms of persecution, which often fell out, being pursued by men, fled away, and hid themselves in secret and solitary places; but being taken, they valiantly encountered with their adversaries, and ended the combat with martyrdom.'

Though this valiant champion of Christ, Athanasius, in the beginning of Julian's reign returned to Alexandria, yet long could he not rest in quiet; for his adversaries forged false accusations against him, complaining unto the emperor that he had subverted Egypt, and the whole city of Alexandria, so that it stood with the emperor's interest to banish him the city. Upon these suggestions, the emperor wrote to the governor of Egypt, and greatly incensed him against Athanasius, which he being informed of, said to some of his familiar friends, My friends, let us go aside for a season, Nubecula est, et cito transibit, this is but a little cloud, which will quickly vanish away, and accordingly taking ship, he fled away into other parts of Egypt. The enemy hearing of it, made haste to overtake him; but when they approached (God revealing the danger to him, as was said before), his friends in the ship gave him counsel to haste to the shore, and to fly into the desert: but he, on the contrary, required the pilot to sail back to Alexandria, and when they met the pursuers, they enquired of them, if they had not seen Athanasius? to whom the other answered, that if they made haste they might overtake him, and so let them go. But Athanasius returning to Alexandria, hid himself among his friends till the storm of persecution was blown over. And indeed, most of that time he lay hid in the house of a most beautiful, chaste, and godly virgin, who was very careful to supply him with all necessaries, and to borrow such books for him as he stood in need of. And when news came of Julian's death, Athanasius that very night appeared in his church, to the great rejoicing of his friends, and the astonishment of his adversaries, who wondered how he could so suddenly be there, when he had been so diligently sought after by the magistrates, and could not be found.

Not long after, hearing that Jovianus the Christian emperor was come to Antioch, Athanasius, consulting with his friends, thought good to visit him. Some say that this good emperor sent for him, craving his advice for the establishing the true orthodox religion; which when he had done, he was to return to Alexandria; but Euzoius the Arian bishop of Antioch, joining with him Probatius an Arian eunuch, and some others of that faction, went to the emperor, and made grievous complaints against Athanasius, as that all the time since he was made a bishop, he lay under great scandals, for which, by the former emperors, he had been often condemned and exiled; as also, that he had been the author of much discord in religion, and of great tumults among the people; whereupon they prayed that another bishop might be appointed to Alexandria. But the good emperor, knowing that these were malicious forgeries, would by no means hearken to them, commanding Probatius and the rest, as they loved their own ease and good, to give over such malicious proceedings, adding threatenings in case they obeyed not. And as for Athanasius, whom he highly esteemed for that worth which he found in him, he sent him back into Egypt, bidding him govern his church as he saw best; commending him highly for the virtue, piety, and prudence which he found in him.

Not long after, it pleased God to take away this good emperor by an immature death in Bythinia, as he was going to Constantinople, having reigned only eight months. And the army, coming to Nice in Bythinia, chose Valentinian, a good and worthy man, for their emperor, who, when he came to Constantinople, chose his brother Valence for his companion in the empire. These, though they were brethren, yet did they differ in their religion, for Valentinian was orthodox, and Valence an Arian. Valence reigning in the east, sent his mandate to the magistrates, that such bishops as had been deposed in the time of Constantius, and returned to their seats under Julian, should be again banished and expelled from their churches. Hereupon the magistrates of Egypt took occasion to endeavour the expulsion of Athanasius out of Alexandria. For the emperor's letters grievously threatened such magistrates with great mulcts and corporal punishments, that should neglect to observe them. But the multitude of Christians meeting together in Alexandria, desired the president, that he should not rashly nor inconsiderately go about to drive away their bishop Athanasius from them; but rather seriously to consider what the scope of the emperor's letters was; for (say they) they extend only to such as were banished by Constantius, and returned under Julian: but Athanasius, though he was banished by Constantius, yet was he by him called back again, and restored to his place; and Julian, whereas he called from exile all the other bishops, yet Athanasius alone was by him driven into exile, whom Jovian again restored to his seat.

When the President would not be persuaded by these arguments, the people resisted him, and would not suffer their bishop to have any violence done to him. Hereupon, the people being assembled from all parts, a great tumult was raised, so that every one expected a sedition to ensue. The president sent presently to the emperor to acquaint him with these proceedings, and in the mean time suffered Athanasius to remain in the city.

Many days after, when the sedition was well appeased, Athanasius privily stole out of the city, and went and hid himself in a certain secret place. The night after, the president and colonel of the soldiers went to his house which which joined to the church, and there ſought every corner for him, but not finding him, they loſt their labours: for they thought that now the people were quieted, and feared no ſuch matter, they might eaſily apprehend him, and ſo execute the emperor's command: but when Anathaſius could not be found, every one much wondered at it, believing that God had diſcovered the danger to him, and thereby preſerved him from it. Others ſay, that Athanaſius miſtruſting the heady and raſh motion of the common people, fearing that if any miſchief were wrought by them, it would be laid to his charge, retired privily and hid himſelf for the ſpace of four months in his father's monument. But in the mean time the emperor Valence, conſidering how many friends Athanaſius had, which by reaſon of his abſence might happily raiſe commotions, to the great prejudice of the empire; and withal conſidering that Valentinian, who was an earneſt defender of the Nicene faith, might take the baniſhment of Athanaſius very hainouſly; hereupon he wrote very loving letters to the people of Alexandria, ſignifying that his pleaſure was, that Athanaſius ſhould quietly, according to their hearts deſire enjoy his biſhoprick. Yet in other places a great perſecution was raiſed againſt the orthodox, who were driven out of their churches, and Arians placed in their rooms, only the churches of Egypt enjoyed peace all the life time of Athanaſius, whoſe death fell out not long after, when having endured many ſkirmiſhes in the quarrel of the church, and having been biſhop 46 years, in which time he had often been in danger of his life, yet at the length through the goodneſs and mercy of God he died in peace in his own city of Alexandria, leaving behind him Peter, a godly and zealous man to ſucceed him anno Chriſti 375. It was ſaid of him, Non ſolum Epiſcopi, &c. Not only biſhops, but emperors, kingdoms, nations, and armies, oppoſed him: whereupon he uſed to ſay, 'Though an army ſhould encamp about me, yet would I not fear.'

In the time of Julian the Apoſtate, who made much uſe of conjurers, the magicians and ſoothſayers in Alexandria cried out, that they could do nothing in their art, except Athanaſius were removed out of the city.

It was ſaid of him, Unus Athanaſius contra totum mundum: One Anathaſius ſtood firm againſt all the world. Gregory Nazianzen ſtiles him, Tubam ingentem, & columnam Eccleſiæ: the great trumpet and pillar of the church. Theodoret ſtiles him Pirobolon tes aletheias, the bulwark of truth.

His works are commonly printed in two tomes, which Scultetus diſtingniſheth into Germana, Dubia, & Suppoſita, Germana ſunt.

The Life of HILARIE, who flouriſhed Anno Chriſti 355.

HILARIE biſhop of Poictiers, was nobly deſcended, and of excellent gifts: he was frequent in preaching, exemplary in life: a great oppoſer of the Arian hereſy: whereupon the biſhops, Valence and Urſacius, procured the emperor to baniſh him into Phrygia: afterwards, the emperor commanding many biſhops to aſſemble at Seleucia to give their opinions about the Arian hereſy, Hilarie carried himſelf ſo well there, that he was reſtored to Poictiers. After which he travelled over Italy and France, diligently inſtructing the biſhops of both thoſe countries in the canons of the catholic faith; he was a very eloquent man, and wrote many things in the Latin tongue, amongſt which he wrote 12 books of the Trinity, expounded the Canon containing the clauſe of one ſubſtance, proved it ſufficiently, and confuted the arguments of the Arians. He was a very heavenly man both in his life and doctrine, and by his means, eſpecially, the faith confirmed in the Nicene council, was propagated and defended in theſe Weſtern parts of the world all his life time. He wrote alſo againſt the emperor Conſtantius, one book. Two books to the emperor, againſt Auxentius the Arian. Commentaries on Matthew: epiſtles to St. Auguſtine, &c. He died in peace under Valentinian and Valence.

The Life of CYRIL, who died Anno Chriſti 365.

CYRILLUS, biſhop of Jeruſalem, was, at the firſt an Arian, and therefore by that faction was made biſhop of Hieruſalem: but ſhortly after, he was accuſed in a council, for certain hainous crimes, by whom he was depoſed from his biſhoprick, and being often called by them to purge himſelf from thoſe crimes, he ſtill abſented himſelf for the ſpace of two years, thinking thereby to eſcape, and the crime to be forgotten; as ſoon as he was depoſed he ſent an appellation in writing to his depoſers, appealing from them to the judges of the higher court.

Conſtantius the emperor admitted his appellation, ſo that Cyril was the firſt and the only man that brought in this preſident, ſo prejudicial to the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions. At length he came to Seleucia to have his cauſe heard, where his depoſition was confirmed for his communicating with certain heretical biſhops: and Herennius was ſubſtituted, in his room, biſhop of Hieruſalem, and after him Heraclius, and after him Hilarius;

Theſe continued the government of that church, till the reign of Theodoſius ſenior; at which time Cyril having reformed his former miſcarriages, was again placed in the biſhoprick of Hieruſalem by that good emperor, and he proved an eminent inſtrument of God's glory, and his churche's good; inſomuch as one ſaith of him, that he was magnæ ſanctimoniæ vir, a man of great ſanctity, learning and wiſdom; he endured many heavy things for the teſtimony of faith and a good conſcience, being often forced to forſake his place by the rage of the Arians: he was very charitable, inſomuch that in a great famine many poor people reſorting to him for relief, he gave them all he had, and that not ſufficing, he took the veſſels, and church ornaments, and ſold them to relieve their wants; when Julian the emperor had given command to re-edify the temple at Jeruſalem in his time, one night there was ſuch an earthquake, that it parted the very ſtones of the foundation, and ſo all the upper buildings fell down; and when many Jews came together to behold what was done, ſuddenly there came fire from heaven that conſumed all the tools and inſtruments of the workmen.

Epihanus gives him this teſtimony: he not only feared not to encounter Acacius the arian, but did Chriſtianly and faithfully oppoſe divers other heretical biſhops. Hieron alſo ſaith thus of him; Cyril that valiant ſoldier and combatant for Jeſus Chriſt, that moſt conſtant maintainer of the orthodox faith, for many years together ſtrove for the propagation of divine truth, ſuffered various and heavy perſecutions: being exerciſed in ſuch dangers from almoſt the beginning of Conſtantius his reign to the reign of Theodoſius; yet all this while in the midſt of theſe manifold afflictions he kept his firſt reſolution, and died in the faith at laſt, anno Chriſti 365.

He uſed to ſay, 'Some come to the church to ſee faſhions, others to meet their friends; yet it is better to come ſo, than not at all: in the mean time the net is caſt out, and they which intended nothing leſs, are drawn into Christ, who catches them, not to destroy them; but that, being dead, he may bring them to life eternal.'

He wrote divers treatises, which are called his Catechisms upon the principal heads of divinity.

The Life of Ephrem Syrus, who died anno Christi 404.

Ephrem Syrus was born in Nisiba, and by the care of his parents was educated in learning, in the study whereof he was exceeding industrious, insomuch that without the help of an instructor, he attained to an excellent skill in the Syriack tongue: he was also a great philosopher, and a very good orator, so that he far excelled most of the Greek writers. Basil bishop of Cæsaria in Cappadocia, did wonderfully admire and commend him for his learning. He is said to have written three hundred thousand verses, which were much esteemed in those times, many endeavouring to imitate his learning therein; amongst whom were Abbas, Zenobias, Abraham Meras, and Simeon, all of them famous amongst the Syrians, and amongst all such as diligently study that language.

But besides his exquisite learning, he also gat great honour and commendations for his many good works, and exact course of life. He was very grave and severe in his carriage, and living a single life, that he might prevent all calumnies and scandals, he shunned the sight of a woman: for the report goes, that a certain woman dissolute in life and manners, and of an impudent face, either on purpose to tempt the man, or else being hired thereto by some others, on purpose met him in the city gate, and earnestly stared in his face: Ephrem taking notice of it, sharply rebuked her, and bade her look down upon the ground: but the woman answered, 'How can I do that, who am not made out of the earth, but of thee? It is more meet that thou shouldst look upon the ground from whence thou hadst thy original, but that I should look upon thee, from whom I was procreated.' Ephrem wondering at the woman, went his ways, and wrote a book of these passages betwixt them, which the learned in the Syrian tongue do much esteem.

It is also recorded of him, that though by nature he was very choleric, and all his youth, could not bridle his anger; yet after he entered into this strict course of life, he was never seen to be angry with any man.

Having fasted divers days, one of his servants that was bringing him his supper, let the earthen pitcher fall wherein it was, and brake it, and Ephrem seeing him overwhelmed with fear and shame, said to him; 'Be of good cheer, let us go to our supper, since it will not come to us, and so sitting down by the fragments of the pot, did eat his supper.' He was very humble, full of self-denial, and a great enemy to vain-glory, as will notably appear by this example.

Upon a time he was voted to an episcopacy, and they that had chosen and designed him thereto, sought him out to bring him to the place where he was to be created bishop, which as soon as he understood, he ran into the market place, and there by sundry signs made shew as if he was crack-brained; so that they that came for him, thinking him to be beside himself, took further counsel what to do: by which means he having gained time, fled privily away, and concealed himself, till he had heard that they had chosen another bishop to that place.

Another notable example of his charitable disposition will appear by this instance: upon a time there was a very great famine in Edessa, whereupon Ephrem coming out of his house, and calling many rich men together, he grievously accused, and complained of them, that the poor were almost starved, whilst they in a covetous manner, kept their riches by them, which, saith he, will in the end turn to your own great loss, and to the torment of your souls, whereas you ought to prefer the wealth of your souls not only before all your riches, but before your very bodies themselves: they hearing this, were much affected with his words, and said thus unto him: 'Truly we care not much for our riches, but we know not whom to commit them to, to be faithfully distributed amongst the poor, seeing that almost every man is infected with the desire of lucre and gain, and they use to make merchandize and advantage to themselves upon such occasions:' then said Eprem to them, What do you judge of me? to whom they answered, 'We judge you to be a very faithful, good, and upright dealing man, as every man esteems you to be.' Well, said he, and for your sakes I will undertake this great and troublesome work: and so receiving their money, he caused three hundred beds to be provided, and laid in the cloisters, placing in them such as were sick by reason of the terrible famine, for whom he made convenient provision, and not only for them, but also for strangers, and for all such as were driven by the famine out of the villages to seek relief in the city. And thus he continued till the famine being ceased, he returned into his retired house again, and not long after he quietly slept in the Lord, anno Christi 404.

He was a great opposer of Sabellius, Arius, Apollinarius, and other heretics: so chaste, that he repelled the shameless behaviour of a lewd woman, who being instigated by the devil, thought to have enticed him to lust; but with grave exhortations, admonitions, and divine speeches, he caught and overcame the tempter: so that by his fatherly advice she proved a grave, modest, and religious matron: in his will he commanded that they should sing no verse in his commendation, bury him in no fine linens, nor with ointments, raise no monuments for him: for, saith he, 'I am a stranger and sojourner, &c.' He was very merciful to the poor, as in part we have heard before, and having not of his own to give, by his sweet and attracting sermons he stirred up the hearts of others to relieve them.

He used to say, 'That the resolute traveller knows that his journey is long, and the way dirty, yet goes on in hope to come to his house, so let a Christian; (though the way to heaven be narrow, though it be set with trouble and persecutions) yet let him go on till he hath finished his course with joy, for heaven is his home.' And again, 'He that feasts his body, and starves his soul, is like him that feasts his slave and starves his wife.' He died unto Valence.

His works are contained in three tomes upon several subjects.

The Life of Basil, who flourished anno Christi 370.

Basil was born in Pontus, of noble and religious parents: his grand-father and great grand-father suffered martyrdom under Galerius Maximus. He was called Basilius Magnus, for as one saith of him, he was great in wit, great in eloquence, great in wisdom, great in defending, great in propagating God's glory, great in convincing heretics, &c.

When he was grown up to years of discretion, he went to Cæsarea of Cappadocia, which was then the most famous city of Asia for learning; In which place in a short time he made such a proficiency in his studies, that he excelled all his equals in all sorts of learning: From thence he went to Constantinople, where having studied a while, he went to Athens, where he heard those famous rhetoricians Hymerius and Prosæresius; at which place also he fell into acquaintance with Gregory Nazianzen, and joining studies together, they continued in firm amity all their life after: he was of an excellent constitution, but by much watching, praying, fasting, reading, and spare diet, much weakned his body.

Afterwards he went to Antioch, in Syria, where he frequented the school of Libanius, and became an excellent orator. So that he was thought worthy to deliver to the world the precepts of philosophy, and was much solicited thereunto by many excellent men: others persuaded him to become an orator: but neither of these employments suited with his purpose: wherefore having sufficiently profited in philosophy under Libanius, he provided for himself the commentaries of Origen (who then was famous throughout the world) and learned out of them to interpret and expound the sacred scriptures: then did he valiantly encounter with the Arians, and when as they alledged Origen's books for the confirmation of their heretical opinions, he refuted their ignorance, and shewed by plain demonstrations, that they understood not the mind and meaning of Origen. Yea Eunomius, a favourer of that sect, and as many Arians as were of greatest reputation, and accounted the profoundest scholars, when they disputed with him and and Gregory Nazianzen, proved themſelves fools and unlearned perſons.

He was at firſt ordained deacon by Miletus biſhop of Antioch, afterwards biſhop of Cæſarea and Cappadocia where he was born: after which he gave himſelf wholly to benefit and profit the church: and when he greatly feared that the new device of Arius his brain would creep throughout the province of Pontus, in all haſte he gat him into thoſe parts, inſtructing the ignorant, and confirming the wavering minds of weaklings in the faith. A little before, ſome difference aroſe betwixt Euſebius biſhop of Cæſarea, and Baſil about their different opinions, which Valence, the Arian emperor hearing of, haſted thitherward, and when he came into Cappadocia, according to his uſual manner, he grievouſly afflicted the orthodox, thruſting them out of their churches, and placing Arians in their rooms: and he hoped eaſily to do the like when he came to Cæſarea, becauſe of the enmity that was betwixt Euſebius and Baſil. But it fell out far otherwiſe; for Baſil and Pontus, hearing of the emperor's proceedings in Cappadocia, haſted to Cæſarea, and preſently was reconciled to Euſebius, and by his miniſtry ſeaſonably ſtrengthened the church: ſo that when Valence came thither, finding his hopes fruſtrated, he returned without effecting what he came about.

Not long after Euſebius dyed, and Baſil was choſen and ordained biſhop in his room; where he performed the office of a worthy ſhepherd to his flock, as well by duly and truly feeding them with the ſincere milk of God's word, as by driving away all hereticks, that like wolves, ſought to devour his ſheep.

At laſt came back the emperor Valence into Cappadocia, fully purpoſing to drive Baſil out of Cæſarea: but the Lord prevented him by this means. The very night after he attempted this wickedneſs, his wife was grievouſly troubled with dreadful dreams about him, and his only ſon Gallates fell ſick of a ſharp and violent fever, ſo that the phyſicians, deſpairing of his recovery, gave him up for dead: his wife alſo told him of thoſe ugly ſhapes, and fearful viſions of devils and wicked ſpirits which ſhe had ſeen in her ſleep: adding that their child alſo was viſited with that ſickneſs, becauſe of the evil and miſchief which he had purpoſed againſt Baſil.

The emperor marking diligently the words of his wife, and muſing with himſelf, caſt in his mind what to do and at length reſolved to ſend for Baſil, and when he came, ſpake thus unto him; If thy faith and opinion be true, pray that my ſon die not of this diſeaſe. To whom Baſil anſwered; If thou wilt promiſe me to believe as I do, and if thou wilt bring the church into unity and concord, thy child, no doubt, ſhall live: but the emperor would by no means agree unto this: then ſaid Baſil, 'Let the Lord deal with the child as pleaſeth him,' and ſo departed, and immediately after, the child died.

He was very charitable, inſomuch as in a great famine, he ſold his lands and all his other goods to relieve the poor, and ſtirred up other rich merchants, by ſcripture, and ſweet ſpeeches, to contribute to their neceſſities: he was alſo careful to ſee the ſick provided for, and cauſed public places to be erected for their maintainance, and would often, not only viſit them, but alſo adminiſter to them. Julian the emperor having formerly known him at Athens, ſent, and deſired him to write to him, which he refuſed to do, becauſe of his apoſtacy: nay Valence the emperor, when he perſecuted the orthodox, and had put eighty preſbyters into a veſſel, thinking to have burnt them at ſea, yet meeting Baſil, he ſpake him fair, and ſent alſo to him by many meſſengers to win him to that hereſy; yet neither threats, nor promiſes could once move him; for when the meſſenger gave him good language, and promiſed him great preferment, he anſwered, 'Alas Sir, theſe ſpeeches are fit to catch little children that look after ſuch things: but we that are taught, and nouriſhed by the holy ſcriptures, are readier to ſuffer a thouſand deaths, than to ſuffer one ſyllable, or title of the ſcriptures to be altered:' and when Modeſtus the præfect aſked him, 'Know ye not who we are who command it?' No body, ſaid Baſil, whilſt you command ſuch things:' 'Know ye not, ſaid the præfect, that we have honours to beſtow on you? to which he anſwered, They are changeable, like yourſelves: hereupon he threatened to confiſcate his goods, to torment him, to baniſh or kill him: to which he anſwered, He need not fear confiſcation who hath nothing to loſe; nor baniſhment, to whom heaven only is a country: nor torments, when his body would be daſht in pieces with one blow: nor death, which is the only way to ſet him at liberty: the præfect told him that he was mad; to whom he replied, Opto me æternum ſic delirare, I wiſh that I may for ever be thus mad: yet the præfect gave him that night to reſolve what to do; but he was the ſame man the next morning: whereupon the præfect related all to the emperor, who went to church with intentions to have diſturbed him in his holy duties; but ſeeing his reverend carriage, he was ſo convinced that he made a large offering, which Baſil refuſed, as coming from an heretic.

At another time the Præfect ſending for him commanded him to comply with the emperor in his opinion, or elſe threatened him with death; whereupon Baſil unfeignedly and freely ſpake his mind about the emperor's opinion, withal highly commending the faith of one ſubſtance; and whereas (ſaith he) you threaten me with death, would it ſhould fall out ſo well on my ſide that I might lay down this carcaſs of mine in the quarrel of Chriſt, and in defence of his truth, who is my Head, and Captain. Then ſaid the Præfect; 'Be not ſo raſh in thy anſwer, ſecond thoughts may prove better, and therefore I give thee this day and night to conſider further of it, and to morrow I will expect thy anſwer, deſiring that thou mayſt not wilfully caſt away thyſelf;' Whereupon Baſil replied; I have no need to take further council about this matter; look what I am to day, the ſame thou ſhalt find me to morrow; but I pray God that thou change not thy mind; for ſince I am a creature myſelf I can never be perſuaded to worſhip one that is like me, and to acknowlege him for God; or to conform myſelf to thine, and the emperor's religion. For though you be illuſtrious perſons, and command a great part of the world, yet muſt I not ſubmit to your wills, being but men; nor obey you, with the neglect of my faith in God, which, God aſſiſting, I will never betray, though you confiſcate my goods, tho' you baniſh me, or torment me to death; ſeeing none of theſe things will trouble me at all; as for riches, truly I have none beſides my torn garments, and a few books, and I ſo dwell here in this world, as one that is always ready to leave it; and as for my body, it is ſo weak, that one blow will make it inſenſible both of grief and torments. This reſolute anſwer cauſed the Præfect to diſmiſs him.

Yet after this the Arians prevailed again for his baniſhment; but when the writing was brought to Valence to be confirmed, the pens would not write the leaſt title, being often tried; and when the emperor (being mad with rage) ſtill endeavoured to confirm the edict for his baniſhment, he was ſtruck in his right hand with a great trembling: ſo that at laſt, being terrified with theſe judgments of God, he tore the paper in pieces.

So having been biſhop at Cæſarea and Cappadocia eight years and an half, he departed this life with theſe words, 'Into thine hands, O Lord, I commend my ſpirit.'

He uſed to ſay, 'To know thyſelf is very difficult; for as the eye can ſee all things but itſelf; ſo ſome can diſcern all faults but their own; and again, divine love is a never failing treaſure; he that hath it, is rich, and he that wanteth it, is poor; when he had read the Bible over, he ſaid, It's a phyſician's ſhop of preſervatives againſt poiſonous hereſies; a pattern of profitable laws againſt rebellious ſpirits; a treaſury of moſt coſtly jewels againſt beggarly elements, and a fountain of moſt pure water, ſpringing up to eternal life.'

Eraſmus ſaith, that he rather deſerved the name of Maximus, than of Magnus; concerning whoſe eloquence (ſaith he) I take it to be a great diſgrace to him, if I ſhould compare him with any of thoſe whom the Græcians moſt admired, and endeavoured to imitate. For which of all thoſe great orators did ſo excel in eloquence, wherein ſomething was not either wanting or offenſive? Did Pericles thunder and lighten in his orations? yet it was without art. Lyſias was frozen in his Attick ſubtilty. Phalereus had much ſweetneſs, but want'd gravity. Iſocrates was but the ſhadow of an orator. Demoſthenes whom Tully maketh the compleat example of an exquiſite orator, yet wanted wanted affections, and urbanity in his orations: but St. Baſil was an incomparable man, in whom was wanting neither nature nor art, nor exerciſe: he was not only an excellent orator, but a great philoſopher, and exactly ſkilled in all kind of learning. But as I ſaid before, its a diſgrace to compare ſuch a Chriſtian with any of the heathens: it's fitter therefore to compare him with Chriſtians, like himſelf; and truly that age produced many excellent men, famous both for their learning and piety; as Athanaſius, Gregory Nazianzen, John Chryſoſtom, and Gregory Niſſen. And each of theſe excelled in their ſeveral gifts: Athanaſius for excellent teaching: Nazianzen for his florid and acute orations: Chryſoſtome, though he anſwered his ſir-name by reaſon of his golden mouth, yet he hath many ſuperfluous words, and was immoderate in his digreſſions. Niſſen was content with his pious ſimplicity. But I know not what the moſt critical reader can deſire more than he ſhall find in Baſil. He ſhall find in him a ſimple and natural form of ſpeech flowing from his moſt holy breaſt, drained of all human paſſions: whatſoever art can do, is to be found in him, yet without the appearance of art. There thou mayſt find the knowlege of mundane philoſophy, without the leaſt oſtentation of it: there thou mayſt diſcern his ſkill in the liberal ſciences, and amongſt them of the mathematics; and yet he makes them all handmaids to piety. In his diſcourſes he doth exquiſitely mingle divine teſtimonies of ſcripture, that they are like to precious ſtones not ſewed to, but bred in purple clothes.

His works are theſe;

The Life of Gregory Nazianzen, who flouriſhed, Anno Chriſti 370.

GREGORY Nazianzen was firſt biſhop of Saſima, then of Nazianzum in Cappadocia, and laſtly, of Conſtantinople: he was a living library of philoſophy and divinity: exceeding eloquent: a defender of the poor and oppreſſed; and a comforter of the afflicted. In his younger days he became acquainted with Baſil, and joined ſtudies with him: ſo that with him at Athens, he heard thoſe famous rhetoricians Hymerius and Proæreſius. At Antioch in Syria he frequented the ſchool of Libanius, and by theſe means he became an excellent orator.

By reading the commentaries of Origen, he learned to expound, and interpret the ſacred ſcriptures. In diſputation he foiled and overthrew the moſt learned amongſt the Arians: and fearing leſt thoſe errors ſhould infect the churches of Cappadocia; he got him thither to oppoſe them, where he was made biſhop of Nazianzum, a mean city of Cappadocia, whereof his father had been biſhop before him.

What inſight he had into mens diſpoſitions by their phyſiognomies, may appear by that which he wrote concerning Julian the apoſtate, in his ſecond oration againſt the Gentiles, where he thus writeth, 'I foreſaw (ſaith he) long ago in Julian that which is now come to paſs, when I knew him at Athens: for he came thither when the empreſs had procured licenſe of the emperor for his voyage, and when his brother Gallus had conſpired the death of the emperor Conſtantius.' There were two cauſes that moved him to repair to Athens: the firſt was tollerable, the ſecond had ſmall honeſty in it: the firſt was to ſee Greece, and the ſchools that flouriſhed therein: the ſecond (which was more ſecret, and was known unto few) was to conſult with ſooth ſayers, and ſacrificers, about his affairs in time to come, becauſe it was not permitted openly for the authors of ſuch impiety to practiſe ſuch deviliſh inventions. And I myſelf in conjecturing of him at that time, (although I am not of the number of prophets) yet was not much deceived: for his wavering mind and frantic diſpoſition made me prophet good enough. I ſaw not one ſign in him that gave me any hope that ever he would become an honeſt man.

He had a running head: his ſhoulders did never leave wagging: he had winking eyes that continually rouled in his head: his countenance was ſtaring: he had a ſliding and limping pace: his viſage was ſcornful. He had a ſleering face of his own, the which, his immoderate laughter, and continual ſcorning did declare. His manner was without all honeſty, to ſay and unſay: his words came tumbling out with vehemency and ſtops, the ſentence broken in the midſt: his queſtions and objections were raſh and fooliſh: his anſwers were little better, which oftentimes followed one after another, and as there was little hold of them, ſo were they propoſed without order. But what need I to run over all particulars? I foreſaw in him before he was created emperor, that which afterwards proved to be moſt true. If there were any of my familiar friends preſent which heard me thus divining of him, I am ſure they would teſtify this to be no otherwiſe than what I do report it: in whoſe hearing alſo at the foreſight of theſe things, I uttered theſe words; 'O good God, what a monſter the empire of Rome doth nouriſh?' When I had uttered theſe words, I deſired of God, that in this matter I might be found a liar. For that had been far better, than the whole world ſhould have been viſited with ſo many miſchiefs, or than that ſuch a monſter ſhould have been ſeen amongſt men, the like unto whom had never been remembred before; for in his time happened many deluges, and floods over-flowing the countries, the which both young, and old, do at this time remember; beſides great loſſes by fire, terrible earth quakes, and gapings of the ground; men alſo of a ſtrange ſhape were born into the world, of mix'd and compound natures, being half men, half beaſts; but he purchaſed to himſelf ſuch an end as his frantic diſpoſition juſtly deſerved; theſe things did Gregory report of Julian.

Not long after, in the reign of Theodoſius ſenjor, Gregory was tranſlated from the city of Nazianzum to govern a little church within the walls of Conſtantinople; unto which the emperor afterwards annexed a goodly temple, called the reſurrection; but Gregory being a famous man, and excelling in vertue and godlineſs all that flouriſhed in his time, when he perceived that ſome murmured, and objected to him, that he was a ſtranger, and foreigner, although he rejoiced at the emperor's coming, yet was utterly refuſed to continue any longer at Conſtantinople.

He had ſuch a dexterity of wit, that which way ſoever he turned himſelf, he could happily effect it; in opening the myſteries of the ſacred ſcriptures he was an excellent teacher, diligent, cautious, plain, and without offering violence to the text. Nature ſeemed to have framed him for panegyrick orations, yet did he ſo temper his ſpeeches therein to the minds, and ears of the multitude, that he was very plain to the ignorant, and yet at the ſame time to be admired by the learned. In his diſputations againſt Eunomius, he ſhewed admirable acuteneſs, yet never receded from his perſpicuity of ſpeech: and ſo contained himſelf within the bounds of defence of the catholic truth, that he never brake forth into reproaches extravagant from the cauſe.

Neither was he unlike himſelf in his work to Amphilocus about the Holy Ghoſt. But what argument ſoever he handled, wholeſome and pleaſing ſpeeches were never wanting to him, and thoſe not acquired, but natural. According to his name in all his works there appears a certain kingly majeſty, mixed with admirable humanity. He ſo inveighed againſt the evil manners of men, that they could not but love him whilſt he chid them. And look what his doctrine was, ſuch was his life.

By this dexterity of his wit, when Euſebius biſhop of Cæſarea, by his ambition ſtirred up ſedition, of a rival he made him his very good friend. By this he ſo contained Modeſtus, the emperor's præfect, that he drew that wicked man by the ſhining of his virtue to admire him. By this, when the emperor Valence himſelf entred into his church, he firſt aſtoniſhed him, and afterwards by his diſcreet conference, deterred him from his cruelty, yea, reclaimed him from the faction of the Arians, though afterwards wards thoſe wicked men prevailed to bring him over to them again. He had always a mind ſo prepared for martyrdom, that he deſired it as a great favour.

In all his writings there is ſuch a peculiar grace, and excellency, that he never tires his reader; but always diſmiſſeth him with a thirſt after more. One ſaith of him, that the true beauty of his ſoul did ſhine forth in his eloquence, rhetoric being both his companion and ſervant. Hierom was his ſcholar. He was of ſuch authority in the Greek churches, that whoſoever durſt oppoſe his teſtimony, was ſuſpected for an heretic. He ſo loved ſolitude, that when for his excellent learning and ſanctity, he diſcovered that the people choſe him for their biſhop, he retired himſelf into obſcurity: but being diſcovered, the people choſe him for their biſhop. At laſt, growing old, and unfit for his public employment, he conſtituted another biſhop, and returned to his former ſolitude. He flouriſhed under Theodoſius.

He uſed to ſay, 'That in a great multitude of people of ſeveral ages, and conditions, (who are like an harp with many ſtrings) it is hard to give every one ſuch a touch in preaching, as may pleaſe all, and offend none.' He wrote divers works both in proſe and verſe.

The Life of EPIPHANIUS, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti, 370.

EPIPHANIUS biſhop of Salamine in Syrus, was born in Paleſtine, in an obſcure town called Beſcanduces, of poor and obſcure parents; his father dying when he was young, he was adopted, and brought up by one Tryphon a Jew, whereby he attained to an exceſſent knowlege in the Hebrew: he was converted to the Chriſtian faith by one Lucianus, famous for his learning and virtue: Lucianus put him to Hilarius to learn, under whom he profited exceedingly.

Whilſt he was a boy, certain heretics, called the Gnoſtics, cunningly ſought to inveigle him, and to draw him over to their opinions: but it pleaſed God to preſerve him from the temptation, and to keep him in the truth. In his riper years he was famous in the church for his piety, holineſs of life, and for the ſincerity of his doctrine, and elegancy of his ſtyle, as his books witneſs, which ſhew their author to be a man of great reading, ſkilful in the tongues, well acquainted with controverſies, prudent in aſſerting the truth, and acute in confuting errors; whereupon Melanchthon ſaith of him, We have no fuller an hiſtory of thoſe ancient affairs of the church than the writings of Epiphanius do contain, in which, whilſt he intends the confutation of hereſies, he inſerts many hiſtorical paſſages: ſo that out of this author, may be collected almoſt a continued hiſtory of the ancient church, if any would with prudence join his narrations together: and I wiſh that ſome prince would take care to ſee ſuch a work done.

He was of a very liberal, and charitable diſpoſition, inſomuch as he ſpent all his eſtate in relieving the poor. Being afterwards choſen biſhop of Salamine in Cyprus, he at firſt modeſtly refuſed that dignity, but importunity prevailing with him, he ſo lived, that Vitam doctrina, doctrinam vita comprobarte, his doctrine approved his life, and his life defended his doctrine: he was ſemper hereticorum acerrimus oppugnator, always a ſharp oppoſer of heretics: he purged all Cyprus, defiled and ſtarried with divers hereſies and having gained an edict from Theodoſius the emperor, he caſt all the hereticks out of the iſland.

About this time Theophilus biſhop of Alexandria, having upon ſome falſe ſurmiſes conceived diſpleaſure againſt John Chryſoſtom biſhop of Conſtantinople, he fought cunningly to thruſt him out of his biſhoprick: whereupon he ſent letters to the biſhops throughout every city, concealing his principal drift, and only pretending that he miſliked the books of Origen: Epiphanius alſo being at this time very old, Theophilus wrought upon his weakneſs, and prevailed with him to call a council in Cyprus: in which council the biſhops decreed, that thenceforth none ſhould read the works of Origen: and by the inſtigation of Theophilus, they wrote alſo to Chryſoſtom, exhorting him to abſtain from the peruſing of thoſe books, requeſting him to ſummon a council at Conſtantinople, and to ratifie that decree with the uniform conſent of all.

After this, Epiphanians went to Conſtantinople, contrary to the canons of the church ordained ſome miniſters there, and adminiſtred the ſacrament: yet Chryſoſtom honoured him highly, went with the reſt of his clergy to welcome him to the city; invited him to lodge at his own houſe, and to make uſe of his church during his abode there: but Epiphanius, being prepoſſeſſed with prejudice, anſwered that he would neither lodge in his houſe, nor join with him in prayer, except he would condemn the books of Origen, and drive away Dioſcorus with his aſſociates from him, who were favourers of Origen. But Chryſoſtom anſwered, that it would be great injuſtice to condemn men before their cauſe was heard; eſpecially conſidering that the time for adminiſtration of the ſacrament was now near: and with this anſwer he left him.

Preſently after the enemies of Chryſoſtom came to Epiphanius, and perſuaded him, publicly before all the people, to condemn the books of Origen, and alſo Dioſcorus and his followers, and withal to tax the biſhop of the city for favouring theſe perſons: Epiphanius being of too facile a diſpoſition went out the next day to perform theſe things, which Chryſoſtom hearing of, ſent Serapion, who met him not far from the church, and proteſted, that if he did theſe things, he would do that which was neither juſt nor equal, nor convenient for himſelf: for that hereby he might bring himſelf into danger, if any tumult ſhould be raiſed amongſt the people. Hereupon he deſiſted; yet privately he called together ſome biſhops that ſtayed in the city, and ſhewed them the decrees which condemned the books of Origen, and drew ſome of them to aſſent to the ſame: but the greateſt part refuſed, and Theotymus, biſhop of Scythia, blamed him to his face for it, and told him that it was altogether unlawful thus to calumniate and aſperſe a man that was dead long ſince, eſpecially being of ſo great worth, and his writings approved of by their predeceſſors, &c.

At laſt he reſolved to return into Cyrus, and for a farewel to Chryſoſtom, he ſaid, 'I hope that thou wilt not die a biſhop:' to which Cyryſoſtom replied, and 'I hope thou wilt never return into thy own country': both which came to paſs: for a while after, Cyryſoſtom was caſt out of his biſhoprick: and Epiphanius died upon the ſea: and when he found himſelf mortally ſick, he called his friends, and ſaid to them, Salvi eſtote filii &c. God bleſs you my children, for Epiphanius ſhall ſee your faces no more in this life; and ſhortly after he died, aged 115 years, having been biſhop 55 years, his loſs was exceedingly lamented at Salamine.

He uſed to ſay, 'That he never let his adverſary ſleep; not that he diſturbed him in his ſleep; but becauſe he agreed with him preſently, and would not let the ſun go down upon his wrath.

His works are printed together, being moſt of them againſt the hereſies of his time, the names are,

The Life of AMBROSE, who died anno Chriſti 397.

AMBROSE was biſhop of Milan; his father was a præfect in France: when Ambroſe was an infant, a ſwarm of bees (as he lay in his cradle) ſettled on his face, and flew away without hurting of him, whereupon his father ſaid, Si vixerit infantulus iſte, aliquid magni erit, if this child live; he will be ſome great man.

Afterwards he went to Rome, and gained great knowledge in the liberal arts, and was excellently accompliſhed with eloquence, and ſweet behaviour, whereupon he was made governor of Inſurbia, and ſo went to Millain, where he was made lieutenant, and being made lieutenant thereof, about the ſame time this ſtrange act happened; when Auxentius, whom the Arians had choſen to be biſhop of that ſee, died, all was there in an uproar about the election of another biſhop, and great ſtrife there was, whilſt ſome would prefer this man, and ſome others that man unto the biſhoprick. The tumult being raiſed, Ambroſe the lieutenant of the city, who alſo was a conſul, fearing greatly leſt that Schiſm would breed miſchief in the city, came purpoſely into the church to appeaſe the ſeditions: and his preſence prevailing very much with the people, after he had given them many notable exhortations, and thereby mitigated the rage of the heady and raſh multitude; all on a ſudden with one voice, and, as it were, with one mouth, nominated Ambroſe for their biſhop, hoping hereby that all things would be reconciled, and that all would embrace one faith and opinion.

The biſhops that were preſent, thought verily that the uniform voice of the people was the voice of God himſelf: wherefore, without any further deliberation, they took Ambroſe (who was but a Catechumeniſt) and baptized him purpoſing alſo to inſtal him in the biſhoprick: Ambroſe came willingly to baptiſm, yet denied utterly to be a biſhop; whereupon the biſhops made the emperor Valentinian privy to their doings: he wondering at the conſent and agreement of the people, judged that which was done to be the work of God himſelf: he ſignified therefore to the biſhops, that they ſhould obey the will of God, and create Ambroſe biſhop, ſaying, 'That God, rather than men, preferred him to this dignity.'

Thus Ambroſe being made biſhop, the citizens of Millain, who afore time were at diſcord amongſt themſelves, thenceforth embraced peace and unity. Whereupon the good emperor publicly returned thanks unto God in theſe words; 'I give thee humble thanks O omnipotent God, and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, that whereas I had committed the government of their bodies to this man, thou haſt alſo committed their ſouls to his care, and thereby haſt declared that my ſentence was juſt in appointing him to ſuch a place.

Not long after Ambroſe ſpoke very freely to the emperor, complaining of divers things which were ill adminiſtred by ſundry of the magiſtrates: to whom that worthy emperor anſwered, I knew long ago thou waſt a free ſpoken man, for which cauſe I was ſo far from reſiſting thine ordination to the biſhoprick, as that I gave my free and full conſent to it; wherefore according to the rule of God's holy word, do thou prepare a medicine for our erring minds.

This good emperor a while after dying, Juſtina his wife being infected with the filth of Arianiſm, yet whilſt her huſband lived, ſhe could no kind of way moleſt thoſe that embraced the faith of One Subſtance: but after his deceaſe, removing to Millain, together with her young ſon, ſhe raiſed ſuch tumults againſt Ambroſe, the biſhop, that in the end ſhe prevailed for his baniſhment: but the people, who bore ſingular love and affection to Ambroſe, withſtood her act, and hindered their force that went about to convey him into exile; and it pleaſed God, that juſt at the ſame time, news came that Maximus a Britain had rebelled, and that Gratian the emperor was ſlain in France by Andragathius the captain of Maximus: which news ſo cooled the heat of Juſtina's ſpleen, that ſhe was content to let Ambroſe alone.

Yet did ſhe proceed to work upon the tender and flexible mind of her young ſon Valentinian junior, and to inſtil into him the principles of Arianiſm, and the young man, deceived by the enticements of his mother, too greedily drank in the poiſon thereof, whereupon at length he began to communicate his mind to Ambroſe, ſuppoſing that if he could but draw him to his opinion, he could eaſily overcome the reſt: but Ambroſe began to mind him of the piety and ſincerity of his father, exhorting him to defend the truth which he had received from him, as he would defend his empire: he alſo opened to him the difference between thoſe two opinions, ſhewing him, how that of the Arians was directly contrary to the doctrine of Chriſt, and his holy apoſtles, and that of the orthodox was moſt conſonant thereunto: but the young man, as a young man that was blinded with the error of his mother, was ſo far from hearkening to the good counſel of Ambroſe that on the contrary, being inflamed with wrath, he compaſſed the church where Ambroſe was, with a great number of armed ſoldiers, thinking thereby to terrify him.

But when he ſaw that this valiant champion and ſoldier of Chriſt was no whit affrighted, he grew into ſuch a rage, that he commanded him to come forth of the temple: to whom Ambroſe anſwered: that will I never willingly do, neither will I betray the ſheepfold of my ſheep to the wolves, nor deliver up this temple of God to the authors of blaſphemy: but if thou pleaſeſt to kill me, here is my breaſt, pierce it either with thy ſword or ſpear as thou pleaſeſt, for I deſire and am willing to embrace ſuch a death: this his reſolute anſwer made the emperor to withdraw.

A little before this time, Theodoſius the great, reigning in the eaſt, there fell out a great ſedition in the city of Theſſalonica, which ſome of the magiſtrates coming to quiet, by the furious people, they were not only greatly reproached, but ſtoned to death: the news hereof being carried to Theodoſius, he was ſo grievouſly incenſed againſt the citizens of Theſſalonica, that he ſent an army againſt them, and ſlew ſeven thouſand of them, even the innocent amongſt the guilty, without ever examining the fact, and proceeding judicially againſt the innocent: and preſently after he went into the weſt againſt the tyrant Maximus (whereof you may read the ſtory in the Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in the life of Theod. ſenior) And having obtained a wonderful victory, he went to Millain; but as he was about to enter the church Ambroſe met him at the door, and ſaid unto him: "It is very likely, O emperor, that you know not the greatneſs of that murder that was committed by you, neither after your anger was appeaſed, did you, by reaſon, weigh the greatneſs of your crime. For it may be the greatneſs of your imperial dignity would not ſuffer you to acknowlege your ſin; but your power blinds your reaſon: for you ought to conſider the weakneſs and frailty of human nature, and to bend your eyes upon your mother earth, from which you had your original, and into which you muſt return: neither ought you by reaſon of the ſplendor of your purple garments, to be ignorant of the weakneſs of that body which is ſhrouded in them: conſider further that you rule over thoſe who are partakers of the ſame nature with you, and therefore are your fellow-ſervants. For God, the creator of the univerſe, is lord and king of all men: with what eyes then can you behold his temple who is the Lord of all? with what feet can you tread in his courts? how dare you (I pray you) ſtretch forth before him, thoſe hands which are defiled with murder, and unjuſt bloodſhed, and with the ſame receive the holy ſacrament of Chriſt's body? or how dare you put his holy blood into your mouth, which being inflamed with anger, commanded unjuſtly the ſpilling of ſo much blood? depart therefore, and do not increaſe your former ſin by adding a new one to it, but embrace that bond which the Lord of all doth from heaven impoſe upon you: which bond truly hath force to cure you of the diſeaſe of your ſoul, and of reſtoring you to health."

The godly emperor willingly ſubmitted to him (for having been religiouſly trained up, he knew full well what was the duty of Gods miniſters, and what was proper for kings to do in ſuch caſes) and accordingly returned to his palace full of ſighs and tears. About eight months after, the feaſt of Chriſt's nativity being to be celebrated, the emperor ſate ſtill in his palace, giving himſelf to lamentations, and pouring out abundance of tears: which Ruffinus the maſter of his hall taking notice of, being very dear unto the emperor, went to him, and asked him the cauſe of his weeping: then the emperor weeping more bitterly, and pouring out more abundance of tears, ſaid, 'Surely Ruffinus thou doſt mock me! or knoweſt not with how great miſery I am afflicted: for I ſigh and bewail my calamity, whilſt I conſider in my mind how open the church is to my ſervants, yea to beggars, who have free leave to pour out their prayers before God: but not only that place, but even heaven itſelf is ſhut up againſt me: for that ſaying of our Saviour comes into my mind, Whoſe ſins ye bind on earth ſhall be bound in heaven:' to this Ruffinus anſwered, Therefore if it pleaſe you, I will run to the biſhop, I will intreat, beſeech, and perſuade him to free you from this bond. 'But I fear, ſaid the emperor, that he will not hearken to you. For I know that Ambroſe's ſentence is ſo juſt and equal, that he will not violate the law of God for fear of the imperial power.' But when Ruffin was not yet ſatisfied, promiſing that he would prevail with Ambroſe, the emperor bade him run quickly; and himſelf hoping that Ruffin might prevail, immediately followed him.

'But as ſoon as Ambroſe ſaw Ruffin, he ſaid unto him: thou ſeemeſt unto me (Ruffin) to imitate the impudency of dogs: for although, by thy perſuaſion, that cruel ſlaughter was committed, yet thou haſt ſo ſteeled thy face, that thou art not aſhamed, neither art thou grieved, that by ſo great madneſs thou rageſt againſt the image of God: but when Ruffin had earneſtly entreated him to be pacified, and told him that the emperor would preſently be there, Ambroſe being kindled with an holy zeal, ſaid, I profeſs, Ruffin, that I will forbid him entrance into the church, and if he will turn his power into tyranny, I am willing to be ſlain by him. Ruffin hearing theſe things, preſently ſent a meſſenger to the emperor, intreating him to ſtay in his palace. The emperor meeting with this meſſage in the market place, ſaid, 'Yet I will go that I may undergo his juſt reproofs which are due to me:' And when he came to the church door, he entred not, but went to the biſhop, deſiring him to abſolve him from his excommunication. But Ambroſe told him, that his coming was tyrannical, and that he was engaged againſt God, and trampled his laws under his feet. To whom the emperor anſwered: 'I do not oppoſe thoſe laws with an obſtinate mind: neither do I deſire wickedly to enter into the church, but I intreat thee to abſolve me, and to ſet before thine eyes the clemency of him who is Lord of all things: neither ſhut thou thoſe doors againſt me which he opens to all that truly repent of their ſins.'

To which Ambroſe anſwered: 'What repentance doſt thou ſhew after ſo grievous a ſin committed? What medicines haſt thou applied for the healing of ſuch great wounds?' it is thy part (ſaid the emperor) to prepare the medicine, and to apply it, and when the wound is cured, to remove it: it's my part to follow thy directions Then ſaid Ambroſe; 'Becauſe thou gaveſt way to thy anger, and didſt not temper it with reaſon, but pronouncedſt ſentence with an inflamed mind, I deſire that thou make a law, that all ſentences pronounced in anger ſhall be void: and that in all cauſes which concern death, or confiſcation of goods, thirty days interveen between the ſentence and execution, that ſo if there be juſt cauſe, the ſentence may be revoked: and that at the end of the thirty days they which wrote thy ſentence, ſhew it to thee, that ſo, laying aſide all anger, thou mayeſt weigh the cauſe with judgment, and ſo either eſtabliſh it or make it void.

The emperor judging this moſt prudent counſel, willingly embraced it, and preſently commanded a law to be enacted, which he confirmed by his ſubſcription: which being done, Ambroſe abſolved him, and the emperor preſently entring the church, fell proſtrate, pronouncing that verſe of the Pſalm; My ſoul cleaveth to the duſt, quicken me according to thy word: and then with many tears and teſtimonies of ſorrow, he begged pardon and afterwards was made partaker of the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper.

Upon a time a certain witch ſent his ſpirits to kill Ambroſe; but they returned anſwer, that God had hedged him in as he did Job, another came with a ſword to his bed-ſide to have killed him; but he could not ſtir his hand, till repenting, he was by the prayer of Ambroſe reſtored to the uſe of his hands again:

When Eugenius was emperor, Flavianus the præfect deſired leave of him to build the altar of victory at Millain, which Ambroſe hearing of, departed from thence to Bononia; but after a while (Eugenius and Flavianus going to war againſt Theodoſius) he returned to Millain again: but before they went, they ſent word, that when they returned conquerors, they would make the great church in Millain a ſtable for horſes: but God prevented them: for Eugenius was ſlain by his own ſoldiers, and Theodoſius got the victory.

This Ambroſe was very abſtinent, full of watchings and prayer, diligent in writing, never dining but on the Sabbaths; he was very courageous for the truth, and merciful to the poor, and captives; he would weep when he heard of the death of any godly miniſter. Falling ſick, he appointed Simplicianus, a godly old man to ſucceed him, and continuing inſtant in prayer, he departed this life the third year after Theodoſius, anno Chriſti 397.

He uſed to ſay, 'When gold is offered to thee, thou uſeſt not to ſay, I will come again to morrow and take it, but art glad of preſent poſſeſſion: but ſalvation being profered to our ſouls, few men haſte to embrace it; and again, it is not ſo much to be enquired how much thou giveſt, as with what heart; it's not liberality, when thou takeſt by oppreſſion from one, and giveſt it to another; and again, a clear conſcience ſhould not regard ſlanderous ſpeeches; nor think that they have more power to condemn him, than his own conſcience hath to clear him; and again, death is the burial of all vices; for it is the progreſs and accompliſhment of the full mortification of all our earthly members, wherein that filthy flux of ſin is dried up in an inſtant; it is a voluntary ſacrificing of the whole man, ſoul and body to the Lord, the greateſt and higheſt ſervice we can do him upon earth.'

His works are printed in five tomes.

The Life of GREGORY NISSEN, who flouriſhed Anno Chriſti 480.

GREGORY was ſirnamed Niſſenus from the city whereof he was biſhop; he was born in Cappadocia in the fourth age after Chriſt. His father's name was Baſil, his mother's Emmelia; his brother's names were Baſil biſhop of Cæſarea, and Peter biſhop of Sebaſtia. He had a ſiſter called Macrina.

From his childhood he was much affected with the ſtudy of rhetoric, wherein he grew as famous as any of the ancient fathers. He affected not that ſolitary life which his brother Baſil did, but employed himſelf in inſtructing others. Firſt he was a profeſſor in a ſchool of rhetoric: afterwards he became a reader of divinity in the church: yet, after a while, he returned to his rhetoric-ſchool again, but was reduced to his former work of reading divinity by Gregory Nazianzen. Suidas ſaith, that he was Vir inſignis, omnique doctrina exuberans: a famous man abounding with all manner of learning: neither was he leſs ſignal for his piety, and holineſs of life, as Nicephorus teſtifies. For his great worth he was preferred to the biſhoprick of Nyſſa, a chief city in Cappadocia.

He was baniſhed by the Arian emperor Valence, and from the ſeventh to the fifteenth year of his reign, he wandred up and down; yet ſtill went to ſuch places where the neceſſity of the church required his preſence, and where he might do moſt good; in which godly employment he was much encouraged by Gregory Nazianzen.

He lived under Conſtantius, Julian, Jovian, Valentinian, and Valence, Gratian, and Theodoſius, the great; which time, together with Gregory Nazianzen, he was preſident in the univerſal council of Conſtantinople againſt the Macedonian heretics, anno Chriſti 492. When Hierom wrote his catalogue of illuſtrious men, he was alive; but the year of his death is not expreſſed by any author. He was admired for his eloquence, and one calleth him pervigilem antiſtitem, the faithful and vigilant prelate; he uſed to read the ſcriptures with all diligence, reverence and ſtrictneſs, having a ſpecial regard to the genuine ſenſe of them: he was a ſtrong oppoſer of Eunomius his hereſy; by the Oecumenical council of Conſtantinople he was appointed as a man moſt fit to viſit the churches planted in Arabia.

After the deceaſe of his brother Baſil, he finiſhed his commentaries which he had left imperfect upon the ſix days works. He alſo preached at Conſtantinople a funeral ſermon upon the death of Miletius biſhop of Antioch. He wrote an admirable book againſt Eunomius, and another, no leſs famous, of the creation of man, beſides many excellent ſermons which he made: but the treatiſe of the ſoul, which he wrote to his ſiſter Macrina, deſerves the praiſe of learned men in all ſucceeding ages.

Many things are fathered upon him, but judicious Scultetus owneth only theſe; Exegetica Scripta in Eccleſiaſten. In Cantica Canticorum. In Pſalmos. De Occurſu Domini. De Deo & Trinitate. De Creatione. De Providentia. De Chriſto Theanthro. De Baptiſmo. De cultu Dei in genere. De cultu Dei in ſpecie. viz. De Peregrinatione nationē ad loca ſancta: De oratione. De Pauperum Amore. De Beatitudinibus. De Fornicatione fugienda. De iis qui ægre ferunt reprehenſiones. De iis qui temere alios damnant. De Uſurariis. Funebres orationes ſive de morte piorum. De Reſurrectione mortuorum. De Theologia Univerſa in oratione Catechetica magna.

He compared the 'Uſurer to a man giving water to one in a burning-feaver, which doth him no good, but a great deal of miſchief; ſo the Uſurer, though he ſeem for the preſent to relieve his brother's want, yet afterwards he doth greatly torment him;' he gave this character of an Uſurer, 'he loves no labour but a ſedentary life; the pen is his plough. parchment his field; ink his ſeed; time is the rain to ripen his greedy deſires; his ſickle his calling in of forfeitures; his houſe the barn where he winnows the fortunes of his clients; he follows his debtors as eagles and vultures do armies, to prey upon the dead corps; and again, men come to uſurers as birds to an heap of corn; they deſire the corn, but are deſtroyed in the nets; and again, there is no excuſe for hard-heartedneſs; for where can a rich man caſt his eyes but he may behold objects of his charity?' &c. He died under Valentinian and Valence.

The Life of THEODORET, who flouriſhed Anno Chriſti 420.

THEODORET biſhop of Cyrus, was born at Antioch, of noble and religious parents; his mother, before ſhe had him, was much grieved in mind, becauſe ſhe was barren, and without hope of iſſue to inherit their large poſſeſſions, whereupon ſhe with her huſband, reſolved to bequeath all their revenues to the maintenance of poor Chriſtians; yet at laſt God was pleaſed to anſwer her requeſts, giving her a ſon which ſhe named Theodoret, the gift of God:

He proved of great acuteneſs, and in a ſhort time profited ſo in piety, and in letters, that he was made a biſhop whilſt he was yet a young man; and ſhortly after he ſet forth that excellent work which he called The Hiſtory of the lovers of God: he was a great oppoſer of heretics, and wrote much againſt them, and reduced many round about him that were Marcionites, even to the hazard of his life; he was wondrous charitable, viſiting and refreſhing the bowels of the poor; he was a careful imitator of Chryſoſtom, whom he always propoſed as a worthy pattern for his ſtyle in his writings; and by this means he proved very fluent and eloquent, which his learned works do plainly declare:

His commentaries upon the ſcriptures are very excellent, wherein he reſolved many of the hardeſt queſtions in the Old Teſtament. He ſhewed much learning in his divine treatiſe of God's providence; he very ſtrongly opened and confuted the fond conceits of abundance of heretics; as of Simon Magnus, Menander. Baſilides, Carpocrates, &c. A ſynod being appointed at Epheſus to ſtop the hereſy of Neſtorius, and Cyril coming firſt thither, (not knowing that the biſhops of Syria were coming alſo) he of himſelf condemned Neſtorius, which afterwards cauſed much contention, eſpecially between Theodoret and Cyril; but Theodoſius junior calling them together to Conſtantinople, by his care and wiſdom healed this breach, and Theodoret and Cyril were wondrous loving each to other ever after.

In that famous council of Chalcedon, wherein were above ſix hundred biſhops, he was ſtiled by their unanimous conſent, Catholicus & orthodoxus eccleſiæ paſtor, & doctor ſincerus. A catholic and orthodox paſtor of the church, and a ſincere teacher of the truth. Gennadius teſtifieth of his writings that they were ſtrengthened with impregnable and undeniable arguments, by which with reaſons and teſtimonies of ſcripture, he proves and confirms that Chriſt was truly incarnate of the virgin Mary. Bellarmine ſtiles him virum plane doctiſſimum, an abſolute learned man. He wrote an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory which is of great uſe to the church; he died in the reign of Theodoſius junior, being not very old; but rather ſpent with labours and ſtudies than with age.

He uſed to ſay, 'That the delights of the ſoul are to know her Maker, to conſider his works, and to know her own eſtates.'

His works were printed in two tomes, at Collen, anno Chriſti 1617. Which beſides his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, contain expoſitions upon many portions of the Old and New Teſtament.

The Life of HIEROM, who died anno Chriſto, 422.

HIEROM was born in a town called Seridon in the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, anno Chriſti, 331. His father's name was Euſebius, a pious and godly man, who, before his country was over run and ſacked by the barbarous Goths, (who about this time laid all waſte before them) he was a man of a middle and competent eſtate, and very careful of the education of his ſon: his mother alſo was a religious woman; and therefore from his infancy he was trained up (like another Timothy) in the knowlege of Chriſt and of the ſacred ſcriptures, and as he grew in years, ſo did he alſo in learning; and when he was a boy, he was by his parents ſent to Rome, at that time the moſt famous place for piety and religion, in the weſt, where he was brought up in the ſtudy of the liberal ſciences. For they ſeemed to foreſee that they had begotten a ſon for the good of the world, and therefore in his education they did not indulge their private affections, but ſought to promote the public good.

He quickly, by reaſon of his ingenuity, became very expert both in the Greek and Latin tongues: he alſo became a very good grammarian and rhetorician, having an excellent wit, and being of an indefatigable diſpoſition. And it was his hap to have excellent ſchool maſters: Donatus for the grammar, and Victorinus for the rhetoric, who were at that time famous men in Rome.

Afterwards being grown riper in years, he fell to the ſtudy of philoſophy of all ſorts, as Ariſtotle's, Plato's, the Stoics, &c. Yet he ſpent not too much time herein, but proceeded to the ſtudy of hiſtory, coſmography, and antiquities: and he perceived that even to that time amongſt the Latins, theology was but an infant, whereupon many abhorred the reading of divinity books, he therefore thought, that if a man could attain to ſet forth the divinity of theology with excellency of ſpeech, it would come more into requeſt: beſides, he thought by this means to ſtop the mouths of the Ethnics, who reproached Chriſtians as barren and barbarous perſons.

He had for his fellow ſtudents, Pammachius of noble parentage, a man of ſuch learning and integrity, that he was ſolicited to be biſhop of Rome: Bonoſus, who alſo proved very famous: Heliodorus whoſe virtue advanced him to a biſhoprick.

Having now ſufficiently profited in the knowlege of human arts, he proceeded to more grave and weighty ſtudies, and after the example of other worthy men, for the further poliſhing of his mind with wiſdom and experience, he travelled all over France, procuring the acquaintance of, and familiarity with the moſt worthy men of that country: Bonoſus alſo was his companion in theſe travels: he was very diligent in ſearching the libraries in every place where he came: and at Trevir he wrote out with his own hand a great volume of Hilary de Synodis: and having much profited himſelf, not only in learning, but in religion alſo, after a long time, he returned to viſit his countries, both where he was born, and where he was new born (Rome.)

Then did he begin to conſider what courſe of life to betake himſelf to, and in what place to fix his habitation; knowing that it would much conduce to his comfort, if he undertook ſuch a courſe with judgment as was moſt ſuitable to his Genius. He ſeriouſly conſidered that Rome was yet overſpread with Paganiſm, and that it was not ſafe for a young man to be in a place of ſo much pleaſure, which himſelf ſometimes called Babylon; he alſo conſidered, that his own country was corrupted with barbarous pleaſures, as himſelf ſomewhere notes in one of his epiſtles: whereupon he conſulted with ſome of his intimate friends, reſolving to depart to ſome place where he might with more privacy follow the ſtudy of divinity, and wholly dedicate himſelf to Chriſt.

It

It was alſo a great trouble to his mind, to conſider how Chriſtians and pagans were intermixed together, whence it neceſſarily came to paſs, that many who profeſſed Chriſt, were Chriſtians rather in name than in truth. He conſidered further, that in marriage, beſides other incumbrances, he ſhould loſe his freedom; and that in the life of miniſters and biſhops there was a great deal of danger; that will he, nill he, he muſt be intangled with riches, honours, and cares of the world, and thereby be caſt upon many temptations: beſides, the lives of many of them diſpleaſed him ſeeing the ancient piety of the miniſtry to begin to degenerate into pride and tyranny. All theſe things ſeriouſly conſidered, he began to be in love with a Monaſtic life, which in thoſe times did far differ from their lives in future ages, being afterwards intangled with ceremonies and ſuperſtitions. For in thoſe times they had liberty to change their condition when they pleaſed, to go whither they pleaſed; they had a great deal of freedom to attend their ſtudies, betaking themſelves to faſting and prayer, they were not bound under any human conſtitutions. Their apparel was mean, yet not enjoined, but left to every one's free will, not which was noted for prodigious novelty, ſo that every one might point at them with the finger, but which was moſt agreeable with Chriſtian ſimplicity; they were tyed by no vows but ſuch as every true Chriſtian ought to be ſubject to.

Having reſolved upon this courſe of life, his next endeavour was to aſſociate ſome companions to him therein: but Pammachius, who hitherto had been his chamber fellow, and fellow ſtudent, for his courſe of life was wholly of another diſpoſition: the greateſt freedom was moſt pleaſing to Hierom, and a married life to Pammachius. Bonoſus having ſettled his affairs, forſaking his country, parents and friends, and only accompanied with his books, was departed into a ſolitary iſland; and therein had out-run Hierom, extricating himſelf from the ſnares of the world to enjoy more freedom in the ſervice of Chriſt.

Not long after Hierom having ſettled his affairs, and provided things neceſſary for his journey, eſpecially a fair library, he ſailed into Syria, having Heliodorus for his companion, who having remained a while with him in Syria, diſliking that courſe of life, left him. Yet did not Hierom at all break off his good eſteem of him for the ſame. Then did Hierom go to Jeruſalem, veiwing all the obſervable places about that once famous city: but ſhortly after, by reaſon of the change of air and country, he fell into a grievous ſickneſs, at which time Evagrius entertained him into his houſe, and ſhewed much kindneſs to him.

Having recovered his health, he was inflamed with an earneſt deſire of proſecuting his former reſolution for the manner of his life, and thereupon retiring himſelf into a deſart between the Syrians and Saracens, he had no company beſides wild beaſts and ſerpents, and here and there a monk's cell that had betaken himſelf to the ſame courſe of life, as Hierom now did. But before his fixing in this wilderneſs, he ſpent ſome time in Antiochia, which yet he ſtayed not long in, partly by reaſon of the celebrity of the place, and partly becauſe of a ſchiſm that was in the church: neither could he ſtay long in Chalcis, becauſe of the neighbourhood of ſome Arians, which moleſted him: and indeed this holy man was grievouſly vexed by their wicked practices, who daily cited him before them to give an account of his faith. In brief, he met with ſo many moleſtations, that many times he repented his coming into Syria: and thereupon, at length, he ſhut up himſelf far from the commerce of men in that forenamed deſart; thinking it far better to live among thieves and wild beaſts, than amongſt ſuch Chriſtians. And continuing three four years together, he only converſed with Chriſt and his books, ſeriouſly buſying himſelf according to his former purpoſe.

And having in his youth fallen into ſome looſeneſs, the firſt thing he did was with ſhowers of tears to bewail his ſins, and to endeavour to make his peace with God: then by abſtinence, watchings, and incredible auſterity of life to baſt down his body, and to bring it into ſubjection to his ſpirit, that ſo he might be freed from all temptations to fleſhly luſts: and leſt his carnal affections ſhould impede his heavenly life, he preſcribed and exacted of himſelf a daily taſk wherein he was employed.

He diſtributed his time into two parts, one for his ſtudies, the other for meditation and prayer, wherein alſo he ſpent a good part of the night. He allowed himſelf the leaſt part for ſleep, leſs for his food, and none for idleneſs. When he was weary of ſtudy he betook himſelf to prayer, or ſinging of a pſalm; and then preſently returned to his ſtudies again. He read over all his library, and then rubbed up his old ſtudies: he learned moſt of the ſcripture by heart: he meditated much upon the prophets, labouring to find out the myſteries of their prophecies: he extracted Chriſtian wiſdom out of the Evangeliſts and apoſtolical writings, as out of the moſt pure fountains; for it is the firſt ſtep to piety, to acquaint ourſelves with the truths of God.

Then he read over the works of ſuch as had commented thereon, with great judgment, not pretermitting the works of Ethnicks and Heretics; for he knew how to gather gold out of a dunghill, and honey out of weeds, leaving the poiſon to ſpiders: then did he collect what he could out of the Egyptian writers, endeavouring to beautify the houſe of God with the ſpoils of his enemies. And for the help of his memory, and to make him more prompt, he digeſted all that he read into certain heads and common places: but eſpecially he read over Origen's works, whom he called Suum, his own; and ſome of whoſe homilies, whilſt he was a young man, he turned into Latin: his reading alſo he mixed with writing.

About this time he interpreted the prophecy of Obadiah allegorically, becauſe he knew not the hiſtory, as himſelf afterwards confeſſed in his preface to his ſecond interpretation of that prophecy, in which he makes amends for his former youthful precipitation. In brief, he pretermitted nothing that might make him an admirable doctor of the church, and a moſt accompliſhed divine; that nothing might be wanting in his learning, nothing amiſs in his life, which might any whit tend to the diminiſhing of the credit of his doctrine.

Afterwards alſo, finding by experience, that many ſecrets could not be underſtood, nor handled as they ought to be, without learning thoſe languages wherein they were firſt written and taught, by hard ſtudy and induſtry he overcame the difficulties which are in the Hebrew tongue; yea, he did not only labour for the knowledge of it, but to give the right ſound and pronunciation to ſome barbarous and ſtrange languages which he ſtudied. And, for his perfecting in the Hebrew, he did, with great charges, hire the moſt learned of the Jews to inſtruct him; emptying his purſe to enrich his ſoul with learning. He alſo learned the Chaldee, becauſe the books of Job, Daniel, and ſome other portions of the Old Teſtament, though they were written in Hebrew, yet much uſe of the Chaldean language is made therein. He ſtudyed alſo the Syriac, becauſe through their commerce with the Hebrews, their ſpeech was near of kin to it.

In theſe holy labours, though he ſpent ſome years, as alſo in his rigorous courſe of life, yet he profeſſeth that he took much pleaſure therein; for that which at firſt ſeemed difficult and troubleſome, by degrees became eaſy and familiar to him; and that which was beſt, in its own nature, became moſt pleaſant alſo. Yea, he was ſo far from prizing and deſiring the delights of Rome, that living in a wilderneſs, he ſeemed to converſe with angels. Sometimes his friends viſited him, and ſometimes himſelf viſited his neighbour monks, and by intercourſe of letters he enjoyed the ſociety of his abſent friends. And though he could have deſired all his life long to enjoy this pleaſing retiredneſs, yet it much conduced to God's glory, and the good of the church, that this champion of Chriſt ſhould at laſt appear in public, and that this excellent light ſhould no longer be hid under a buſhel: and therefore though he ſeemed unwilling thereto, yet divine providence ſo ordered it, that at laſt he was drawn back to Rome, and that by the means of Epiphanius biſhop of Salamine in Cyprus, and Paulinus biſhop of Antiochia, by whom he was formerly ordained a preſbyter. At Rome he became acquainted with ſome noble matrons, and amongſt the reſt with Marcella: all whom he inflamed with the deſire of ſtudying the ſacred ſcriptures, yea himſelf became an interpreter thereof unto them, eſpecially to Marcella, who ſo profited under him, that afterwards when any controverſy aroſe about the teſtimony of ſcripture in ſuch and ſuch points, they repaired to her to be a judge therein.

By theſe means the fame of Hierom grew ſo great, that every one judged him worthy to ſucced Damaſus in the biſhoprick of Rome. But as there is never a ſhadow but when the light is preſent, ſo the eminency of this holy man wanted not envy. There were not ſome wanting who calumniated him for his firſt departure into Syria, and in his abſence wounded him with the darts of their virulent tongues: notwithſtanding which he was very dear to, and highly prized by Damaſus the preſent Roman biſhop, and living three years in ſtrict friendſhip with him, and Paula a noble matron, he procured the greater envy to himſelf thereby, which at length brake forth into open burning. For certain of the Arian faction were cloſely crept into Rome, who the better to conceal themſelves, had taken upon them the name of Origeniſts; theſe men that they might the better ſtrengthen themſelves, ſcrewed themſelves into familiar acquaintance with ſundry noble matrons, amongſt whom they ſecretly ſpread the poyſon of their doctrines; and becauſe Hierom was much taken with Origen's wit, and had highly commended him, they ſought to make him a partner of their faction; being ſo much the more dangerous by how much under a pretence of friendſhip they plotted his ruin, ſo that he began to conſult about leaving Rome, of which himſelf in a certain place ſpeaks thus. I was accounted a ſcandalous perſon, a turn coat and inconſtant, a lyar, and one that deceived many by Satan's artifices. They kiſſed my hands, whilſt like vipers, they detracted behind my back; they ſeemed to grieve for me with their lips whilſt in their hearts they rejoiced at my hurt. One jeared at my gait, another at my laughter, another, under my ſimplicity, ſeemed to fear ſome miſchief.

He had many reaſons to induce him to leave Rome: the remembrance of his former eaſe and freedom from the troubles and diſtractions of the city; as alſo the troubleſome celebrity of the city, the more troubleſome delights, together with the pride and luxury which attended the ſame.

For about this time the riches of the church increaſing, Chriſtian ſimplicity began to decreaſe: alſo the malice and envy of the Origeniſts againſt him grew daily more violent; eſpecially Ruffinus who living in the city at this time, as he never was a ſincere friend to him, ſo now he was a ſecret, yet peſtilent adverſary againſt him.

Upon theſe and ſuch like reaſons, Hierom left Rome, and went back to Syria; concerning which journey, himſelf thus writes; When (ſaith he) I touched at Cyprus, I was entertained lovingly by the venerable biſhop Epiphanius; when I came to Antiochia I enjoyed the ſociety of that excellent confeſſor Paulinus, and departing from him in the midſt of winter, the weather being extream cold, I came to Jeruſalem, where I viewed all things, and ſaw thoſe places with mine eyes which I had only read, or heard of before. From thence I went into Egypt, where I ſaw aſps lurking in the monks cells; laſtly, I returned to Bethlehem. I ſaw alſo the famous lake; neither did I indulge myſelf, but by travelling up and down, learned many things which before I knew not.

In this journey he grew acquainted with Gregory Nazianzen, whom he calls his Maſter, and profeſſeth, that he learned much out of the Scriptures by his aſſiſtance. He alſo often heard Apollinarius at Antioch, and had much familiar ſociety with him; by whoſe perſuaſion he went to Alexandria, and there compleated his ſtudies in divinity by the help of Didymus. Laſtly, by the help of Barhanina a Jew, he perfected his ſtudies of the Hebrew tongue.

Thus by long experience having got much wiſdom, and by the ſociety of many learned and excellent men, having attained to a great meaſure of learning, he buckled himſelf to the handling of divinity. Undertaking the office of a divine: ſettling himſelf at Bethlehem, which place, by his vertues and writings, he made famous all over the world; and in which place he lived a very quiet and comfortable life in the company of ſome godly, learned, and faithful friends, ſpending his time in ſinging pſalms, tranſlating the bible, and preaching to his auditors.

Very many reſorted to him out of all countries, all whom according to his ability he entertained lovingly and bountifully, driving none from his houſe but ſuch as were branded for hereſie: he wrote much againſt the hereſies of thoſe times, ſo that there was no chief heretick but looked upon Hierom as his great adverſary: and indeed there were never any times more full of ſedition, and confuſion then thoſe, wherein the hereticks had ſo diffuſed their errors, that it was a piece of great art to be orthodox. Eſpecially the Arians by their writings, weapons, and countenance of the emperors, had not only diſturbed the peace of the eaſt, but almoſt of all the world: and when that hereſy was in ſome meaſure lulled aſleep, it revived in the Origeniſts, who were crept into Rome itſelf, and there ſecretly and cunningly ſpread abroad the poiſon of their doctrines: the captain of whom was Ruffinus of Aquileia, who in his childhood had been very intimate with Hierom: but afterwards theſe great friends became great enemies: though the firſt breach betwixt them was pieced up by the prudence of Hierom: who ſaw, and yet connived at his ſecret devices and clancular detractions: but when Ruffin began to charge the truth with hereſy, and to make Hierom a partner in his impious opinions, the holy man could bear no longer, but breaking the bands of friendſhip, they wrote moſt bitterly one againſt another, Hierom thinking that all forbearance towards a heretic was impiety, not a virtue.

Many were ſtirred up by Ruffinus means to write againſt Hierom, and charged him with many and foul aſperſions both in his life and doctrine; but he, like to an old and well rooted oak, brake the winds that aſſaulted him on every ſide; he remained in all theſe ſtorms unbroken, and unconquered, and was ſo far from departing from that which was honeſt; that the more his enemies barked againſt him, the more he was provoked to the ſtudy of piety. And againſt the violence and fraud of heretics, he was ſomewhat holpen by Epiphanius and Theophilus, biſhops of Alexandria: at Rome, he had Pammatius and Chromatius to take his part.

By reaſon of theſe troubles his life was a continual martyrdom: he ſpent whole thirty years in the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures and divinity, and to extreme old age continued in teaching and writing; he was of a very weak conſtitution, and conflicted with many painful diſeaſes, before old age came upon him: which diſeaſes he procured by the great auſterity of life, and his nightly ſtudies: but eſpecially by his indefatigable labours in writing ſo many great volumes, for which cauſe it was that ſometimes he was forced to make uſe of notaries; and at laſt having worn out himſelf with his great pains, and continual labours, he quietly ſlept in the Lord in the ninety firſt year of his age, anno Chriſti, 422. Honorius and Conſtantine being emperors.

His holy life and his books ſtuffed with ſo much learning and eloquence, procured him ſo much credit and authority, that learned Greece which uſed to undervalue the learning of all nations but their own, took care that his commentaries ſhould be tranſlated into Greek. He was ſo famous in his life time, that if any difficulty did occur in expounding ſcriptures, all men had recourſe to him as to the oracle of the Chriſtian world. Frequent letters and meſſengers were ſent to him out of Italy, Spain, France, Germany, and Africa: he was conſulted with by biſhops, by noblemen, by matrons, and by the chiefeſt of all ſorts; many from all parts repaired to Bethlehem, not ſo much for religion ſake, as to ſee and confer with Hierom. Auguſtine held a ſtrict bond of friendſhip with him, and was willing to learn of him as of his maſter. Paulus Oroſius the hiſtoriographer learned many things by conference with him. His induſtry was admirable, whence Eraſmus ſaith of him, minima pars vitæ dabatur ſomno, minor cibo, nulla otio. Et ſacras literas ad verbum edidicerat. His uſual prayer was, 'Lord let me know myſelf, that I may the better know thee the Saviour of the world.'

He uſed this excellent ſaying, 'If my father ſtood weeping on his knees before me, and my mother hanging on my neck behind, and all my brethren, ſiſters, children, and and kinſfolk howling on every ſide to retain me in a ſinful life, I would fling my mother to the ground, run over my father, deſpiſe all my kindred, and tread them under my feet that I might run to Chriſt, Eraſmus ſaith of him, quis docet aptius? quis delectat urbanius, &c. Who teacheth more diſtinctly? who delights more modeſtly? who moves more effectually? who praiſes more candidly? who perſuades more gravely? and who exhorts more ardently? Trithemius ſaith, vir in ſecularibus valde eruditus, &c. He was a man well ſeen in ſecular learning, but in divinity he was inferior to none of the doctors of the church, and famous for his ſkill in the languages: a rooter out of hereticks, and a defender of the truth.

He uſed to ſay, dead fleſh is to be cut off for fear of a gangrene: Arius at firſt was but a ſpark, but being not ſuppreſſed betimes, he proved the incendiary of the whole church: and again, you muſt be a dove, and a ſerpent: one, not to do hurt to others; the other, not to be hurt by others: and again, that woman is truly chaſte, that hath liberty and opportunity to ſin, and will not.

What ever he did, he ſtill thought that that voice was in his ears, ſurgite mortui, & venite ad judicium, ariſe you dead, and come to judgment. And again, all virtues are ſo linked together, that he that hath one, hath all; and he that wants one, wants all.

He tranſlated the bible out of the originals into Latin.

His works were printed in nine tomes at Paris, anno Chriſti 1534. with Eraſmus his ſcholia upon them: where he alſo ſhews which of them are genuine, which doubtful, and which ſpurious.

The Life of CHRYSOSTOM, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti, 400.

JOHN Chryſoſtom was born at Antioch, a city of Cæloſyria; his father was called Secundus, his mother Anthuſa: he deſcended of the noble race of ſenators: he was the diſciple of Libanius the ſophiſt, and the auditor of Androgathius the philoſopher: his firſt purpoſe was to apply himſelf to the ſtudy and practice of the law, and to handle the public affairs of the common-wealth: but when he perceived how lewd and unrighteous a trade of life they led which buſied themſelves therein, he left that troubleſome and dangerous courſe, and betook himſelf to a quiet and more retired manner of life; and ſo changing both his habit and behaviour, he addicted himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures, deviſing with himſelf how he might be moſt uſeful and profitable to the church of Chriſt.

He perſwaded Theodorus and Maximus his fellow ſtudents, who together with him had frequented the ſchool of Libanius, to forſake that trade of life, which was wholly ſet on lucre and gain, and to follow that which was contented with a little. He alſo aſſociated himſelf with Baſil, and was a partner in his ſtudies; after which he was made reader in the church of Antioch by Zeno biſhop of Jeruſalem, and a while after was made deacon by Meletius, and afterwards for three years ſpace he lived a retired life, ſevered from all the troubleſome affairs of the world; at the end whereof he was made a preſbyter by Evagrius, then biſhop of Antioch.

He was a man of marvellous great temperance, very auſtere in life, and rather harſh than courteous in his deportment: he had no great forecaſt, made no account of the world, and becauſe of his plain and ſimple meaning, was ſoon deceived: he was very copious and free of ſpeech with all ſuch as had any conference with him. In his miniſtry he was very diligent and painful, endeavouring all that poſſibly he could to reform the lives and manners of his auditors; and he had an excellent faculty in perſuading, wherein he excelled moſt men of that age. He was very frequent and earneſt in reproving ſin, not only in his public miniſtry, but by going to the houſes of ſuch as were ſcandalous, and dealing privately and plainly with them, laying to heart the diſhonour done unto God, as if himſelf had been perſonally wronged by them; by this means he became very grateful to the common people; but moſt ungrateful to the great and rich men, who uſually take moſt liberty in ſinning. Hereupon his fame ſpread all over the Roman empire; ſuch as knew him, prized his great experience; ſuch as knew him not, were drawn by the fame of his great learning; inſomuch as the biſhopric of Conſtantinople being void, he of all others was thought moſt worthy to ſucceed therein; and thereupon he was unanimouſly choſen both by the clergy and laity, the emperor himſelf approving well of their choice, and ſending ſome meſſengers to fetch him. In the mean time alſo the emperor convoked a ſynod, that, by that means his ordination to the biſhopric might be better approved of.

Aſterius the præfect of the eaſt, having received the emperor's letters ſent to Antioch for John, as if he meant to confer with him about ſomething: but as ſoon as he came, taking him up in his coach, he carried him to Pagra, where he delivered him to the emperor's meſſengers; and this he did becauſe he knew the tumultuous diſpoſition of the Antiochians, who would have raiſed ſome ſedition rather than have parted with him, and would never but by force have ſuffered him to have gone from them.

When he came to Conſtantinople, the clergy were called together; but Theophilus biſhop of Alexandria oppoſed his ordination, endeavouring to prefer to that place one of his own preſbyters called Iſidore, who had been his inſtrument in an action very prejudicial to the emperor. But when Eutropius one of the courtiers had told him that except he conſented with the reſt for the choice of John, he ſhould be queſtioned for that former fact, he alſo gave his ſuffrage for him.

Thus John being ſettled in the biſhopric of Conſtantinople, his firſt ſtudy and care was to reform the lives of his clergy, and making a diligent inquiſition into their converſation, their diet, and other carriages, he reproved, corrected; yea and caſt ſome of them out of the church. For John being of a choleric and haſty nature, and now armed with authority, would not indulge their faults, but laboured thoroughly to reform them; and this he did not only to the clergy of his own church, but being of a great ſpirit, and inflamed with zeal, he endeavoured the reformation of all within his juriſdiction; and finding alſo a great rent and ſchiſm between the eaſtern and weſtern churches, he did all that poſſibly he could for the healing and making up of the ſame, and prevailed ſomewhat therein, though he could not perfectly attain his deſire.

His government and miniſtry (through Gods mercy) proved, very effectual in Conſtantinople, ſo that he converted many Pagans to Chriſtianity, and reduced many hereticks from their errors. Many flocked daily to him, ſome for the profit and benefit which they got by his doctrine; others for the tempting of him, all whom he held captive, and prevailed with them to agree with him in matters of religion. So that a great conflnence of people reſorted to his ſermons, with an inſatiable deſire after them, that they were ready to ſtifle one another whilſt every one crouded to be neareſt to him.

About this time Chryſoſtom was informed that the churches in Aſia were generally governed by unworthy biſhops, who either for affection or bribes preferred unfit perſons to the miniſtry, whereupon he went to Epheſus, and examining theſe things, he depoſed thirteen biſhops, ſome in Lycia, ſome in Phrygia, and the reſt in Aſia, placing more fit perſons in their rooms. At Epheſus finding the biſhop to be lately dead, he placed Heraclides, born in Cyprus, and ſometimes a diſciple of Evagrius. But upon the removal of theſe biſhops, they with their adherents raiſed many ſlanders againſt Chryſoſtom, accuſing him as a violator of their country laws; and amongſt others they ſtirred up Eutropius, an eunuch in the emperor's court againſt him, who was in great favour, and was eſteemed as the father of the emperor, and made one of the conſuls of the city. This Eutropius procured a law to be enacted, that malefactors taking ſanctuary in the church, ſhould be drawn thence and puniſhed according to their demerits. Shortly after himſelf was accuſed for uſing the emperor's wife unworthily, whereupon he fled to the church, and there lay under the communion table. Chryſoſtom being to preach the next day, took occaſion to ſpeak againſt the pride and inſolency of great men, and to ſhew the vanities and uncertainty of all worldly glory; and afterwards Eutropius, according to his own law, was fetched out of the church and beheaded.

About the ſame time alſo the Arians, who by the emperor Theodoſius were driven out of all the churches within Conſtantinople, held their conventicles in the ſubburbs, where firſt they met together in the night-time, and made certain ſongs and reſponſories in favour of their own hereſies, and in diſgrace of the catholics, and at laſt they grew ſo bold, that they went about the ſtreets every morning, eſpecially on the firſt and laſt days of the week, ſinging them as they went. John Chryſoſtom ſuſpecting leſt ſome of his people might be ſeduced by theſe means, ſtirred them up to the like practice; whereupon the heretics being enraged, fell upon the orthodox, ſo that ſome of both ſides were ſlain; which ſo incenſed the emperor againſt them, that he forbade all the conventicles of the Arians: by which means the people were more in love with John, both for his prudence and profitable preaching.

Yet many of the great, rich men, and of the clergy hated him, becauſe he was ſo free and impartial in his reproofs: for as oft as any of his clergy offended, he puniſhed them: and ſuch as abuſed their riches to pride, luxury, and diſhoneſt pleaſure, he laboured by all means to reduce them to virtue. Some of the clergy joining with ſome monks, reproached him as a cholerick and implacable man; and endeavoured to alienate the affections of the people from him by ſuggeſting that he was unſociable, never inviting any man to his table, nor going to any feaſt when he was invited: whereas the true reaſon of it was, becauſe of his great temperance, and by reaſon of his hard ſtudies he was troubled with rhmues and headach, which made him ſhun ſuch meetings.

About this time there aroſe a great contention amongſt the monks in Egypt, whilſt ſome of the more ignorant and illiterate held God to have a body like unto man; others denied it: Theophilus biſhop of Alexandria held with, and favoured the former, laying ſnares to entrap ſome of the latter, who thereupon went to Conſtantinople to complain of him to the emperor, and to John; theſe he received very courteouſly, and admitted them to the prayers of the church, but not to the ſacrament till their cauſe was heard before the emperor. But a rumour being ſpread in Alexandria, that he had admitted them to the ſacrament, Theophilus was extreamly offended with him, and ſought to put him out of his biſhoprick; whilſt he meditated theſe things, he wrote to all the biſhops thereabouts that they ſhould condemn the books of Origen; and conſidering that it would much advance his affairs, if he could draw Epiphanius biſhop of Salamine in Cyprus, a man famous for his life and learning, to ſide with him, he wrote very flattering letters to him, whereby he made him his friend; then did he perſuade him to call a ſynod in Cyprus to condemn the works of Origen; which the good man too eaſily aſſented to; and calling a council they condemned them; then did Epiphanius write to Conſtantinople to John, to call a council and to condemn them likewiſe there. Theophilus in the mean time conſidering that he might ſafely do what ſuch a famous man as Epiphanius had done, he alſo ſummoned a council of all the Egyptian biſhops, where they alſo condemned the books of Origen. But John thought that this buſineſs did not deſerve the calling of a council, and therefore neglected it, ſhewing to his friends the letters ſent him by Theophilus and Epiphanius; hereupon the clergy, and the rich and great men who were angry with him for the reaſons aforeſaid, perceiving that the purpoſe of Theophilus was to remove John from his biſhoprick, they ſtudied how they might promote the ſame, and ſo far prevailed with the emperor, that a very great council was ſummoned to meet at Conſtantinople, which Theophilus much rejoicing at, preſently commanded all the biſhops of Egypt to repair thither; he wrote alſo to Epiphanius, and to all the eaſtern biſhops that they ſhould haſten to Conſtantinople, himſelf following them.

Epiphanius was the firſt that arrived, and in a town near to Conſtantinople he went into the church, where he made public prayers; from thence going to the city, John with all his clergy met him with all the reſpect that might be; but Epiphanius ſhewed by his carriage that the calumnies raiſed againſt John, had made too deep an impreſſion in him; for when he was invited to the biſhop's houſe, he refuſed to go in, and ſhunned to have any ſociety with John; yea moreover calling privately together ſuch biſhops as were at Conſtantinople, he ſhewed what they had decreed againſt the books of Origen, and prevailed with ſome to give their ſuffrage to the ſame, though the greater part protracted the doing of it. And Theotinus biſhop of Scythia blamed him to his face for it, ſaying that it was altogether unlawful thus to condemn a man that was dead ſo many years before; and that it was not without blaſphemy thus to calumniate the judgment of our anceſtors, and to reject thoſe things which they had decreed; and with all plucking forth a certain book of Origen's, he read part of it, and ſhews how uſeful and profitable it was for the church; ſaying further, they that diſcommend theſe things, ſhew their great folly, and its to be feared that in time they may condemn the ſcripture itſelf, about which theſe books are written.

Notwithſtanding theſe things, John did much reverence Epiphanius, intreating him to partake with him both in his houſe and table; yea, and in the church too; but he returned anſwer, that he would neither come into his houſe, nor communicate with him at church, except he would condemn the books of Origen, and drive away Dioſcorus with the reſt of the monks his companions; John thought this very unequal thus to drive them away before their cauſe was heard, the rather becauſe he had appointed a ſacrament in the apoſtles church. Then did the enemies of John ſuborn Epiphanius, that he ſhould come forth in public, and before all the people condemn the books of Origen with Dioſcorus and his companions for holding the ſame opinions, and that with all he ſhould tax the biſhop John for favouring of them; the deſign of theſe men which thus ſet him on was to alienate the affections of the people from their biſhop. Accordingly two days after Epiphanius went to the church to accompliſh theſe things; at which time John hearing of his purpoſe, ſent Serapion, one of his preſbyters to meet him, and to proteſt to him that he was going about that which was neither juſt nor ſafe for himſelf; for that hereby he might bring himſelf into danger if any tumult or ſedition ſhould ariſe amongſt the people, whereof he would be judged the author; this cooled his heat, and made him deſiſt from his purpoſe.

About this time a young ſon of the emperor's fell ſick, whereupon the empreſs ſent to Epiphanius, requeſting him to pray for him. Epiphanius anſwered, that the child ſhould live, and do well, if ſhe ſhould forſake Dioſcorus and his heretical aſſociates. But (ſaid the empreſs) I leave my child in the hands of God; let him do with him as he pleaſeth; he gave him me, and he may take him away again; but for thy part, if thou canſt raiſe the dead, why didſt thou ſuffer thy archdeacon Criſpion to die, who was ſo dear unto thee? Shortly after Epiphanius departed towards Cyprus, and as he went down to the haven to take ſhipping, he ſaid to John, 'I hope thou ſhalt never die a biſhop': and John anſwered him again, I hope thou ſhalt never come alive into thy country:' both which came to paſs; Epiphanius dying by the way in the ſhip, and John being depoſed and baniſhed, as afterwards we ſhall hear.

After the departure of Epiphanius, Theophilus came to Conſtantinople: but none of the city clergy went to meet and entertain him, becauſe they knew that he was an enemy to their biſhop; yet ſome mariners of Alexandria which were then at Conſtantinople, met him, ſinging ſongs in his praiſe, and ſo he went to the emperor's palace, where a lodging was provided for him: he alſo cunningly found out many which hated John, and were ready to accuſe him, whereupon he went to Quercus, a ſuburb of Chalcedon, where he gathered a council, and there again condemned the books of Origen. The council alſo ſent to Conſtantinople to ſummon John, and ſome of his preſbyters to appear before them, and to anſwer to ſuch things as ſhould be objected againſt them. John anſwered, that he refuſed not to come to his trial, if firſt he might know his accuſers, and the crime objected againſt him, and be brought before a free council: but (ſaid he) I am not ſuch a fool as to appear before ſuch biſhops as are my profeſſed enemies, and to ſuffer them to be my judges: moſt of the biſhops were much incenſed at this anſwer: only Demetrius and ſome few that favoured John departed out of the council: then did the reſt cauſe John to be called four times, and becauſe he appeared not, but had appealed to œcumenical council, they depoſed him. When tidings hereof was brought to Conſtantinople, the whole city was on an uproar, and they watched his houſe all night, leſt he ſhould be thruſt out of the city: they cried out alſo that he ſhould have been heard before a fuller ſynod: but the emperor's command was that he ſhould be carried into exile: hereupon John the third day after his depoſition about noon, unknown to the people, (for he was loath there ſhould be any ado for his ſake) yielded himſelf into the hands of his adverſaries, and ſo privately went away; this being known, the people were in a ſedition, and many that hated him before, changing their minds pitied his caſe; yea ſome that before deſired to ſee his deprivation, now cried out that he was falſly accuſed, and craftily dealt with all. Many cried out againſt the emperor, but more againſt the council, and moſt of all againſt Theophilus, whom they knew to be the author of all this miſchief. Hereupon in all haſte, the emperor cauſed John to be ſent for again; the meſſenger was an eunuch of the empreſs, who found him at Prunetum, a mart town over againſt Nicomedia, and brought him to Conſtantinople: yet John though he was thus brought back from exile, reſolved not to enter into the city till his innocency was cleared, and he were acquitted by the ſentence of higher judges, and thereupon he ſtayed in the ſuburb called Mariana: but becauſe he returned not into the city the people fell a railing upon the magiſtrates, which neceſſitated him to come home. As he came into the city multitudes of people met him, brought him to the church with great reverence, requeſted him to continue their biſhop, and thenceforward after the uſual manner to pray for the peace and proſperous eſtate of the church of God.

Shortly after a ſilver picture of Eudoxia the empreſs was made and erected upon a marble pillar near to the church called wiſdom, and common plays and ſhews were celebrated at the ſame time: and John believing that theſe things were very ſcandalous and diſhonourable to the Chriſtian religion, not forgetting his wonted audacity and liberty of ſpeech, ſharply reproved the authors and abettors of ſuch vanities: whereupon the empreſs applying theſe things to herſelf, and ſuppoſing that they were ſpoken in diſgrace and reproach of her, ſhe cauſed another council of biſhops to be called together againſt him. John being informed hereof, in his ſermon uſed theſe expreſſions; 'Herodias rageth afreſh, ſtomacketh anew, danceth again, ſeeketh the head of John in a platter, which ſermon more enraged the empreſs againſt him. Then did divers biſhops meet together, as Leontius biſhop of Ancyra in Galatia, Ammonius biſhop of Laodicea, Briſo biſhop of Philippi, Acatius biſhop of Beræa, &c. who called the late accuſers of John before them, to accuſe him again: John truſting to their juſt dealing, requeſted only that the accuſations againſt him might be equally and indifferently examined: in the mean time the emperor ſent John word that he would not communicate with him before he had cleared himſelf from the crimes laid to his charge: but the accuſers being ſtricken with ſhame, could prove nothing; ſo that the biſhops then preſent, affirmed that they ought not to examine any other offence, ſaving whether after his depoſition he had not of himſelf aſſumed his biſhoprick again of himſelf without the admiſſion of a council? To this John anſwered, that he had the conſent of fifty biſhops which communicated with him. Leontius replied that there were more againſt him. Again, John ſaid that that canon belonged not to their church, for that it was made by the Arians at Antioch againſt Athanaſius: but they making no account of this anſwer, proceeded to paſs ſentence againſt him, not conſidering that they which were authors of this canon, were alſo depoſers of Athanaſius. Upon this the emperor ſent John word that he had no authority to go into the church, for that he was depoſed, whereupon he kept himſelf in his houſe; till by the emperor's command he was carried into exile: but God ſuffered not this wickedneſs to go long unpuniſhed: for Cyrinus biſhop of Chalcedon, who had railedupon him, had a ſore brake forth in his leg, ſo that he was forced to ſaw it off, yet then did the ſore grow in his other leg, which he was forced to cut off alſo: and preſently after ſo great a hail fell in the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, as the like was never ſeen; and four days after died the empreſs: John was carried to Cucuſus in Armenia: and divers miniſters that adhered to him were carried to Chalcedon, and there caſt into bonds: and his enemies going about Conſtantinople, ſought out as many as were favourers of him, dragging them to priſon, and forcing them to curſe John. John whilſt he was at Cucuſus in Armenia grew very famous; for having much money ſent him by his friends, he wholly employed it for the redemption of captives, and for the relief of the poor; he alſo by his miniſtry gat him many friends, ſo that he had great reſort to him, not only of the Armenians, but out of Syria and Cilicia; which ſo incenſed his enemies at Conſtantinople, that they gat a new order from the emperor to carry him to far remoter parts; which alſo they put in practice: but by the by, he being grown weak, and not able to endure the ſcorching of the ſun in thoſe hot countries, made an end of his earthly pilgrimage; to receive his crown in heaven.

Chryſoſtom was ſo ſtiled ob venuſtatem Eloquii, for his graceful eloquence: he was diſciple to Euſebius; of an admirable wit in framing his homilies; beloved and reverenced of all men; Sophronius teſtifies nunquam eum mentitum fuiſſe, &c. that he never told a lie, never curſed any, never ſpake any ſcurrilous matter, and never admitted of vain ſports; his ſtyle was neither too lofty, nor too mean, but fitted to the profit of the hearers: holineſs and ſcholarſhip are joined in one, his works throughout: he ſtudied not aures titillare, but corda pungere, to tickle the ears of his hearers, but to prick and raviſh their hearts; he uſed to tell his auditors, That they were not only to learn, but exerciſe themſelves in practiſing and ſearching the ſcriptures, to avoid idleneſs. He contemned riches, and hated vices; was full of ſweet ſimilitudes; Evimium orbis terrarum luminare, The eminenteſt light of the whole world. By authority from the emperor, he employed ſome to throw down and demoliſh all the idols, and their temples throughout all Phenice, and reformed all the churches in Aſia, ſtirring up the miniſters to the ſtudy of piety: he ſent many miniſters and deacons into Scythia, which was over-run by the Arian hereſy, reducing many thereby to the orthodox faith. Hearing alſo that the Scythian Nomades by the river Iſther thirſted after the knowlege of Chriſt, he ſent ſome to bring the glad tidings of the goſpel to them; and whereas ſome of the Marcionites had infected the parts about Ancyra with their errors, he procured an edict from the emperor, which he ſent to the biſhop of Ancyra, to expel them out of their places; alſo, whereas one Gainas a great man in Scythia, of an inſolent and tyrannical ſpirit, had importuned the emperor for a church for himſelf and his followers being Arians; the emperor acquainted Chryſoſtom with it, telling him that he durſt not ſay him nay: he deſired to ſpeak with this Gainas before the emperor, where in his preſence he ſo daunted the proud tyrant with his ſtout and reſolute ſpeeches, that he cauſed him to be aſhamed of his requeſt, and to be content without it: yea, he afterwards ſo prevailed with Gainas, that when he had invaded ſome parts of the empire, he brought him not only to make peace with the emperor Arcadius, but alſo to ſet his priſoners free. He ſtoutly told Eudoxia the empreſs, that for her covetouſneſs ſhe would be called a ſecond Jezabel: ſhe thereupon ſent him a threatening meſſage, to which he anſwered, go tell her, Nil niſi peccatum timeo, I fear nothing but ſin: yet when ſhe, conſederating with ſome others his enemies, had procured his baniſhment into Hieron, as he went forth of the city, he ſaid, none of theſe things trouble me; 'The earth is the Lord's and the fulneſs thereof:' if ſhe will, let her ſaw me aſunder; Iſaiah ſuffered the ſame; if ſhe will, let her caſt me into the ſea, I will remember Jonah: if ſhe will, let her caſt me into a burning fiery furnace, or amongſt wild beaſts; the three children and Daniel were ſo dealt with: if ſhe will, let her ſtone me, or cut off my head; I have St. Steven and the baptiſt my bleſſed companions; if ſhe will, let her take away all my ſubſtance; 'Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked ſhall I return thither again.' He was ſo beloved, that on a time when he was like to be ſilenced, the people cried out, Satius eſt ut Sol non luceat, quam ut non doceat Chryſoſtomus, We had better want the ſhining of the ſun, than the preaching of Chryſoſtom.

He uſed to ſay, 'it's a great ſhower of rain extinguiſh-eth the force of fire: ſo meditation of God's word puts out the fire of luſt in the ſoul; and as a boat over laden ſinks: ſo much wealth drowns men in perdition. And a bulwark of adamant is not more impregnable, than the love of brethren. And as a rock, though winds and waves beat againſt it, is unmoveable; ſo faith grounded on the rock Chriſt, holds out in all temptations, and ſpiritual combats. And the devil's firſt aſſault is violent; reſiſt that, and his ſecond will be weaker: and that being reſiſted, he proves a coward.'

His works were printed very accurately in Greek by Sir Henry Savill at Eaton college, anno Chriſti, 1613. in eight volumes.

The Life of AUGUSTINE, who died Anno Chriſti 430.

AUGUSTINE was an African by birth of Thagaſta, of pious parents, Patricius and Monica, who by breeding their ſon in learning much weakened their eſtate: he attained to ſingular ſkill in the liberal arts, wherein he was much holpen by the bountiful contribution of Romanian, a noble gentleman: in his youth, he was vitious in judgment; tainted with the error of the Manichees. He firſt taught grammar in his own city where he was born; then rhetoric in the regal city of Carthage; afterwards he went to Rome, and from thence to Millain, where he was tutor to Valentinian the fifth; and by the doctrine and wiſdom of Ambroſe, he was reduced from his error, and baptized; after which, he wholly ſet his heart to ſeek the Lord, regarding neither honour nor riches, being then about thirty years old: this much rejoiced Monica his mother, then a widow, who was more glad that her ſon devoted himſelf to the ſervice of God, than ſhe would have been of having grand children by him: he alſo gave over reading of Rhetoric, leaving his ſcholars to ſeek them a new maſter. After this he returned into Africa, ſpent his time in watchings, and prayer, ſerving God both day and night, and at laſt was choſen miniſter in Hippo, where he preached both by life and doctrine diligently.

But before this, it fell out that a certain great man at Hippo, hearing the fame of Auguſtine, both for his life and learning, was very deſirous to ſee and ſpeak with him promiſing to himſelf that he ſhould eaſily be perſuaded to forſake the world with the allurements of it, and all the luſts of the fleſh, if he could but once hear the word of God taught by him: which when Auguſtine was informed of by faithful witneſſes, being deſirous to deliver a ſoul from the perils of this life, and eternal death hereafter, he haſted to Hippo, where he viſited and often preached to the man, exhorting him to remember his promiſe, and to perform his vows to God: yet he deferred the performance of it from day to day; neither did Auguſtine at that time ſee his deſires accompliſhed. At this time one Valerius was biſhop of Hippo, who (the neceſſity of the church requiring it) was very ſolicitous to procure a miniſter for that place: whereupon when the congregation was aſſembled, he exhorted and perſuaded them, ſeeing they now had experience of the life and doctrine of Auguſtine, to make choice of him: Auguſtine not ſuſpecting any ſuch matter, was preſent amongſt them. Hereupon the people laid hold of him, and preſented him to the biſhop, all of them with one heart and mouth earneſtly deſiring that he might be their miniſter. At this Auguſtine wept very much, which ſome of them miſinterpreting, laboured to comfort him, ſaying, that though he deſerved a better place, yet being called to the miniſtry, he was in the next degree to a biſhop; whereas indeed the cauſe of his weeping was, becauſe he foreſaw how many and great perils hung over his head by undertaking the government of that church.

Thus being made a preſbyter for that place, he aſſociated to himſelf ſome others which might live with him according to the example of the primitive church, having all things in common. Valerius the biſhop being a very godly man, rejoiced exceedingly, and gave thanks to God for anſwering his prayers, by ſpecial providence ſending him one ſo able by his doctrine to edify the church of Chriſt; and this he did rather, becauſe himſelf, being by nation a Grecian, was not ſo fit nor able to inſtruct that people as was Auguſtine; and contrary to the uſe and cuſtom of the African churches, he permitted, yea urged Auguſtine often to preach in his own preſence; for which ſome other biſhops reproached him; but this venerable and good man, knowing that it was uſual in the eaſtern churches, and ſeeking the glory of God and the good of the people, regarded not the reproaches of evil tongues, whilſt his miniſter did that which himſelf was leſs apt and fit to do; by this means Auguſtine, like a bright candle ſet in a candleſtick, gave light to all that were in the houſe. The fame of this thing flying abroad, was the occaſion that many preſbyters being allowed by their biſhops, preached the good word of God to the people in the biſhop's preſence.

At this time the manichæan hereſy had infected many, both citizens and ſtrangers into the city of Hippo, being deceived by a certain peſtilent heretic, by name Fortunatus, a preſbyter, remaining in that city; hereupon many of thoſe citizens and ſtrangers, both Catholics and Donatiſts come to Auguſtine, requeſting him to confer and diſpute with this Manichæan preſbyter (whom they judged a learned man) about its opinions; who willingly embraced the motion, being ready to render a reaſon of the faith, and hope that was in him, to every one that ſhould aſk it; as alſo not only to exhort with wholeſome words of ſound doctrine; but to convince the gainſayers; but he enquired whether Fortunatus was willing to do the like? hereupon they haſted to Fortunatus, exhorting, perſuading, and earneſtly entreating him to embrace the motion. But truly Fortunatus was very fearful to encounter with Auguſtine, whom he had formerly known at Carthage infected with the ſame error. But being overcome by their importunity, and aſhamed to decline the encounter, he promiſed to give Auguſtine a meeting, and to diſpute with him.

The time and place being appointed, multitudes flocked to it; public notaries were appointed to write down what paſſed, the diſputation continued two days; the event was, that this maſter of Manichees was neither able to overthrow the catholic faith, nor to defend his own erroneous opinions; and ſo wanting an anſwer, he which before was accounted a great and learned man, was now judged of no value nor ability to defend his errors; which did ſo fill him with confuſion and ſhame, that preſently after he forſook Hippo, and never after returned again. And ſo, through the bleſſing of God upon Auguſtine's labours, many who before were infected with that error, were reclaimed, and embraced the true Catholic faith.

Auguſtine continued to preach the word of truth frequently, both in the church and from houſe to houſe confuting the hereſies of the times, eſpecially the Donatiſts, Manichees, and Pelagians; the ſame alſo he did by his writings, the chriſtians wonderfully admiring and rejoicing in it; ſo that through God's bleſſing the catholick church in Africk began to lift up her head, which formerly had been wonderfully corrupted and dejected by reaſon of hereticks, eſpecially through the rebaptizings of the Donatiſts, whereby they had infected and ſeduced many. Auguſtine's books alſo and tractates being diſperſed, filled with learning and the authority of the holy ſcriptures, ſo prevailed through the grace of God, that not only the catholicks, but many hereticks flocked to Hippo to hear him; and every one that could write, or get others to do it for them, wrote forth his notes for their future benefit; ſo that the ſweet ſmell of the doctrine of Chriſt was by this means diſperſed all over Africk, which the churches beyond ſea hearing of much rejoiced therein; for as when one member ſuffers, all the members ſuffer with it; ſo when one member is honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

At the ſame time the African biſhops holding a ſynod at Hippo, by their command Auguſtine being yet but a presbyter diſputed before them of faith, and the creed, which he performed to the joy of them all, eſpecially of the good old biſhop Valerius, who gave much thanks to God for his mercy vouchſafed to him therein: and fearing leſt ſome other city which wanted a biſhop ſhould chuſe Auguſtine, and ſo get him away from him (which indeed had come to paſs unleſs Valerius hearing of it, had cauſed Auguſtine to go to another place, and there hide himſelf, ſo that when they ſought him he could not be found) wherefore this good old man, fearing the like again, and finding himſelf much weakned by age, wrote privately to the the primate of Carthage, alledging the weakneſs of his body, and the infirmities of his old age, and therefore deſired that Auguſtine might be made his coadjutor in the biſhoprick of Hippo, which by his importunity he alſo obtained: ſo that the Primate coming to viſit the church of Hippo, and bringing ſome other biſhops with him, Valerius before them all, and before all the people which were aſſembled together, declared publickly his deſire; which they all approved very well of, and the people earneſtly deſired that it might be effected: but Auguſtine refuſed the biſhopric, being contrary to the cuſtom of the church whilſt his own biſhop lived. But many perſuaded him that it was not ſo much an unuſual thing, producing many examples both of the foreign and African churches for it, ſo that he was forced to yield his conſent, and was ordained to the charge of the biſhopric.

When he was thus ordained a biſhop, he preached the word of life more frequently, fervently, and with greater authority than he did before, and that, not only in his own city and country, but in all places where he was requeſted, whereby the church of God exceedingly encreaſed: many alſo of the Donatiſts frequented his ſermons, took notes, and carried them to their biſhops, which when they had read, they uſed to contradict, but they who carried them, either anſwered them themſelves, or elſe carried their anſwers to Auguſtine, who with much meekneſs and gentleneſs, confirmed the truth, and refelled their errors.

He alſo wrote many private letters to the biſhops and many principal laymen of the donatiſts, admoniſhing and exhorting them that they would either reform their errors, or come to a publick diſputation: but they, diſtruſting their own cauſe, would never write back to him again, but being enraged with anger, uſed to exclaim againſt, both publicly and privately to rail upon Auguſtine as a deceiver of ſouls, and that, as a wolf, he ought to be ſlain in defence of the flock and without all ſhame, neither fearing God nor men, they proclaimed that whoſoever would murder him ſhould without all doubt have their ſins remitted unto them.

Theſe Donatiſts had in their churches a perverſe and violent kind of men, who went up and down under pretence of chaſtity, who were called Circumcelliones; and there were very great numbers of thoſe who were diſperſed through all the regions of Africe: theſe being inſtructed by evil teachers, were ſo inflamed with pride, and grew to ſuch audacious boldneſs, that many times, they neither ſpared their own nor other men, requiring them to do things againſt all right and reaſon; and if any one oppoſed them, he was ſure either to be ſoundly beaten, or baſely murdered by them, they being uſually armed with ſundry weapons, raged up and down through villages and countries, having no fear to ſhed blood.

But whilſt the word of God was diligently preached, and peace was endeavoured to be held with theſe haters of peace, they committed many acts of hoſtility: and whilſt the truth was made known againſt their erroneous opinions, they which were lovers of the truth ſhunned their ſociety, and endeavoured to preſerve the unity of truth in the bond of peace. Hence it came to paſs that theſe men ſeeing their number to be diminiſhed, and envying the encreaſe of the church, being incenſed with extreme anger, raiſed intolerable perſecutions againſt the true members of Jeſus Chriſt, often ſetting upon the godly miniſters both night and day, and many times robbing them of all they had; and not contented therewith, they often murdered them; and often threw lime and vinegar into their eyes to blind them; for which cauſe theſe rebaptizing Donatiſts grew hateful to their own diſciples: and, through God's mercy, the word of God prevailed the more in Hippo by the miniſtry of Auguſtine and his colleagues: and the fame thereof ſpreading abroad, many cities ſent to chuſe their biſhops out of that ſociety, which exceedingly conduced towards the furtherance of the peace of the church.

He preached and writ alſo very learnedly againſt the Donatiſts, Pelagians, and other heretics, whereby the African churches recovered their ancient ſplendor. He went not ſo willingly to a feaſt as to a conference to reduce any that erred. He would not receive gifts to the church from thoſe which had poor kindred of their own.

Auguſtines books alſo being diſperſed, and ſome of them tranſlated into Greek, and ſent beyond ſea into the eaſtern churches, were means of very much good. But theſe things ſo much the more enraged the Circumcelliones, inſomuch as when Auguſtine went abroad to preach to, and to viſit his churches, which he frequently uſed to do, they often lay in wait for him by the way to have murdered him, and had one time certainly effected it, but that the perſon who was his guide, by a ſpecial providence of God, miſtook his way, and ſo led him by a by-way to the place whereby he eſcaped their hands, as afterwards came to his knowlege, for which he praiſed God as his only deliverer: but theſe men in the mean time neither ſpared miniſters, nor laymen.

One notable example we have of their wickedneſs which is not to be paſſed over in ſilence: one of Auguſtine's ſociety, being called to be biſhop at Calamen, was very careful and induſtrious to propagate the truth, and to beat down hereſies; but whilſt he was going from town to town about his buſineſs, he fell into the hands of the rebaptizing Donatiſts who lay in wait for him; theſe men took away the beaſts both from him and his company, and all their neceſſaries, beating the biſhop very cruelly: hereupon the proconſul, being made acquainted with it, ſent for Criſpin the biſhop of the Donatiſts in that place, and ſet a fine upon him according to the wholeſome laws made againſt heretics. But Criſpin denied himſelf to be an heretic, whereupon a diſputation was appointed at Carthage between thoſe two biſhops, which was to be in the preſence of Auguſtine, and the eyes of all Africe were fixed on the event of it: to be brief, the biſhops met, and after three days diſputation, Criſpin was overthrown, and by the proconſul was adjudged and condemned for an heretic: but he, not ſtanding to this ſentence, appealed to the the emperor, who patiently heard all the cauſe, and at laſt concluded that the Donatiſts were heretics, that they ought not to be ſuffered in any public places, and that the laws againſt heretics ſhould be put in execution againſt them: whereupon Criſpin was fined in two pounds of gold: but the Catholic biſhops, and eſpecially Auguſtine ſo prevailed with the godly emperor that the rigour of his ſentence was taken off from them: which piety and charity of theirs much conduced to the increaſe of the church.

Not long after there was a council held at Carthage by the appointment of the good emperor Honorius, who ſent thither a tribune and a public notary to ſupply his own place: this council conſiſted of the biſhops both Catholics and Donatiſts: wherein the Donatiſts being heard to the full whatſoever they could ſay for the defence of their opinions, were fully confuted by the Catholics, and condemned for their errors, and by the emperor's judge were declared to be heretics; their perſecutions alſo againſt the Catholics were declared even to the cutting off their members, and taking away of their lives to the great diſturbance of the peace of the church: but after this council was diſſolved, many of their friends reported that they were not ſuffered to ſpeak all they could for themſelves and their cauſe, becauſe that the judge appointed by the emperor, was too favourable to the Catholics; which yet appeared to be but a poor ſhift to excuſe the weakneſs of their cauſe, ſeeing that they knew him to be a Catholic before the diſputation began, and yet never excepted againſt him.

Not long after there was another council aſſembled at Cæſarea, a chief city in Mauritania, for the ſetling of other affairs of the church. In this city was Emeritas the biſhop of the Donatiſts, a chief defender of his ſect, and one whom they moſt relied upon: him therefore Auguſtine ſingled out, and in the publick congregation challenged him, deſiring him now to produce what he had further to ſay for his opinions, ſeeing his friends gave out that formerly he could not be ſuffered to do it at Carthage; but now he had full liberty and ſecurity being in his own city, and environed with his friends: notwithſtanding which, neither by this exhortation of Auguſtine, neither by the inſtant requeſt of his parents and friends could he be perſwaded to it, though they told him that they would all be of his communion, though they loſt their eſtates, or underwent any other temporal puniſhment, if he could overthrow the catholick aſſertions: yet nothing would prevail with with him, having indeed nothing to ſay more then he had ſpoken before; which diſtruſt of his cauſe, thro' God's mercy, turned to the great advantage of the church, which was much encreaſed and confirmed hereby.

At another time at Carthage, many Manichees being brought before him, of thoſe whom they called Elect men, and Elect women; Auguſtine who had formerly known that execrable ſect, produced their damnable blaſphemies out of their own books, and at length brought them to an acknowlegement of their blaſphemies: and thoſe Elect women alſo confeſſed what filthy things had been (according to their cuſtoms) committed amongſt them: all which things exceedingly redounded to the benefit of the church, and to the ſecuring of the flock againſt ſuch things.

There was alſo a certain nobleman called Paſcentius, an Arian, by whoſe authority the tribute was enacted with much rigour, the Catholic faith was much oppoſed, and many godly miniſters were much moleſted and troubled; Auguſtine coming to Carthage where he was, profered to diſpute with him in the preſence of many noblemen: but this heretic, though he accepted the challenge, would by no means ſuffer any thing to be written which paſſed betwixt them; and his pretence was, leſt that which was written might be made uſe of againſt him to his prejudice becauſe of the law: hereupon Auguſtine conſented privately to diſpute with him without notaries; yet withal, he foretold, that after the diſputation, every one would take liberty to make reports of things never ſpoken becauſe there was nothing ſet dow in writing to refel them. Auguſtine in the conference declared his faith and judgment, requiring an account of the ſame from the other; alſo by arguments and authority of the ſcriptures he confirmed his own, and refelled the errors of the other; which ſo enraged this Arian, that he broke up the conference, and when he departed, he falſly reported that he had overcome Auguſtine, and ſcattered abroad many ſuch lies; which coming to the ears of Auguſtine, he was compelled to write to Paſcentius, and therein to ſet down all the paſſages of the conference, which if he ſhould deny, he was able to produce many witneſſes for the proof thereof both worthy and honourable men, who were then preſent: but he, being thus twice written to by Auguſtine, ſcarce returned a ſingle anſwer, wherein alſo he rather railed, than aſſerted his opinions.

Alſo when the Goths came into Africk, there came along with them one Maximus an Arian biſhop, who coming to Hippo, at the earneſt requeſt of many godly and eminent men, and in their preſence Auguſtine entred into the liſts with him having notaries to write down all that paſſed betwixt them: his adverſary ſhewed more ſubtilty than ſolidity, but the truth prevailed: yet this impudent heretick when he was returned to Carthage amongſt his own ſectaries, lyingly boaſted that he came away with the victory: whereupon Auguſtine was enforced to publiſh in writing a narrative of the whole diſputation with all the objections and anſwers, withal ſhewing wherein Maximus failed, and to what arguments he was able to give no anſwer.

He took great pains alſo by the ſpace of ten years againſt the Pelagians, who were ſubtile diſputants, publiſhing their hereſies by a very cunning way, and endeavouring to propagate them not only in public but from houſe to houſe: againſt theſe Auguſtine wrote many books, and often diſputed with them in the congregation, both to reduce them, and preſerve others from the infection of their errors. He was the author alſo of calling many councils in Afric againſt them, he wrote to the biſhop of Rome that that hereſy was abominable, and to be condemned by all that adhered to the catholic faith: whereupon the godly emperor Honorius taking cognizance of it, condemned it by his laws, and appointed the holders of it to be reckoned amongſt the heretics; whereby many of them forſaking their errors, returned to the true church again. Thus was the holy man of God Auguſtine very ſolicitous about, and careful of the ſafety of the whole church; and truly God gave him much comfort and occaſion of rejoicing in the fruit of his labours even in this life, firſt in Hippo and the country thereabouts, which was more immediately under his charge, the churches thereof enjoying much unity and peace: then in other more remote parts of Afric, which either by his labours, or by the labours of ſuch of his ſociety as were called forth to be biſhops and miniſters in other places, were very much eſtabliſhed in the truth: many Manichees, Donatiſts, Pelagians, and pagans being converted from their errors, and rejoicing that they were now made members of the true church. He was very patient towards all men; he bore with the infirmities of the weak, mourned for the ſins of the wicked, both of ſuch as were within and without the church, rejoicing when any were gained to the Lord, and weeping when any were loſt. So many things were dictated and publiſhed by him, ſo many diſputations held in the church, ſo many things were written againſt heretics, and ſo many books of ſacred ſcripture expounded by him for the edification of the godly, that a ſtudious man all his life long can ſcarcely know and read over. And knowing the duty impoſed by St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 1, &c. of endeavouring to decide controverſies, he was very forward whenſoever he was requeſted either by Chriſtians, or by men of any other ſect to compromiſe and decide their controverſies, with much patience and prudence hearing both parties, that ſo he might paſs a righteous ſentence; and that he might the more fully take cognizance of the cauſe, he uſed ſometime to ſpend a whole day faſting to hear the ſame, always taking advantage thereby to do what poſſible good he could to their ſouls, like a good ſteward preaching the word in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, exhorting, inſtructing and reproving with all long ſuffering and doctrine, endeavouring to inſtruct the ignorant, and to quicken thoſe that were remiſs in the way to heaven. Many letters he wrote to ſuch as ſought to him for counſel and direction in their ſecular affairs: but this he thought a trouble to him, and hinderance from better employments, and therefore he always thought beſt of thoſe who would either write or ſpeak to him about heavenly buſineſſes. He ſeldom was abſent from the councils which were often held in divers provinces, yet always ſeeking therein the things which were of God, and not his own advantage: his endeavour was that the faith of the holy Catholic church might be preſerved inviolate: that ſuch miniſters as were unjuſtly excommunicate might be abſolved; that ſuch as were wicked and obſtinate might be caſt out. In the ordination of miniſters he always judged that the conſent of the godly ſhould concur in it, and that the cuſtom of the church ſhould not be violated.

Upon a time Auguſtine, forgetting the argument which he firſt propoſed to proſecute, fell upon a confutation of the Manichees; and one Firmus a rich merchant, and a Manichee, hearing him, was ſo convinced, that he came to him after, and with tears, on his knees, confeſſed his errors, and promiſed reformation. Alſo one Felix a Manichee, coming to Hippo to ſpread his hereſy, in a diſputation with Auguſtine after the third time was ſo convinced, that he recanted his errors, and was joined to the church.

He was termed Hereticorum Malleus, The hammer againſt heretics. He won alſo many pagans to embrace the truth. He took much pains in ending differences. His apparel was neither ſumptuous nor ſordid: his diet uſually was broth and roots, (He uſed to ſay, Non ego immunditiem obſcenii timeo, ſed immunditiem cupiditatis. Sevenim Noe omne genus carnis quod cibo eſſet uſui manducare permiſſum, & Heliam cibo carnis refectum, &c.) Tho' for his gueſts and ſick-folks, he had better: his diſhes for his meat were of earth or wood, or marble: his table rather for diſcourſe and diſputation than for rich banqueting, and it had ingraven upon it,

Quiſquis amat dictis abſentem rodere famam,
Hanc menſam indictam noverit eſſe ſibi.

He that doth love an abſent friend to jeer,
May hence depart, no room is for him here.

Which rule ſome of his fellow biſhops upon a time forgetting, he ſharply reprehended them for it, and told them that he muſt either blot thoſe verſes out of his table, or ariſe from dinner, and go to his chamber.

He

He would never buy either houſe or land; but any thing that was given to the church he would not refuſe it; yet he often refuſed inheritances, when dying perſons would have given them to the church; not but that he thought they might be profitable to the poor; but becauſe he judged it fit and equal that their children, parents, or kindred ſhould rather inherit them: often ſaying, that it was fitter that Legacies ſhould be left to the church than inheritances, which are troubleſome, and ſometimes chargeable; yet thoſe Legacies he would have freely given, and not begged or extorted from men.

He was almoſt wholly taken up with heavenly affairs, wherein he laboured both day and night, with Mary, chooſing the better part, which could not be taken from him. He was careful of the poor, and in caſe of great want would ſell the ornaments of the church for their relief. And when the church ſtock was ſpent, he uſed to declare to the people, that he had nothing left wherewith to relieve the poor, that whereby he might ſtir up their charity to contribute to ſo good a work. All his preſbyters lived with him in the ſame houſe, fed with him at the ſame table, and were maintained and clothed out of the common purſe. He always judged it fit that miniſters ſhould be preſent at marriages, both to teſtify the mutual conſents and compromiſes, and to beſtow his benediction upon the married perſons. He always kept ſcholars in his houſe, whom he fed and clothed. He was ſo ſevere againſt oaths, that he abated of their allowance to thoſe that ſwore.

He never admitted women into his houſe, though of his own kindred; no not his own ſiſter when ſhe was a widow, and had wholly devoted herſelf to the ſervice of God; nor his uncle's daughter; nor his brother's daughter; ſaying, that though they might dwell in his houſe without ſuſpicion; yet they could not be without maids, or other women would come to viſit them, which could not be without offence and ſcandal; and when any women ſent to him, being deſirous to ſee or ſpeak with him, he would always have ſome of his miniſters preſent, and would never ſpeak with them alone. He praiſed one, who when he was ſick ſaid; I have not lived ſo, that I am aſhamed to live longer; nor do I fear to die, having ſo good a maſter to go to.

In his latter days he looked over all his books: thoſe which he wrote at his firſt converſion whilſt he was a layman, and thoſe which he wrote when he was a miniſter; and laſtly, thoſe which he wrote when he was a biſhop; and whatſoever he found in them leſs agreeing with the word of God, and the Eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions, he corrected, or retracted: of which he wrote two volumes, which he called his Retractions. He complained alſo that ſome miniſters had gotten and divulged ſome of his books before he had perfected them though afterwards he amended them.

Yet being prevented by death he left ſome of his books unperfected. And being deſirous to profit all, knowing that many were deſirous to read much, which yet for want of time they could not do, out of the Old and New Teſtament he collected ſuch precepts as concerned the rule of a Chriſtian life; and ſuch things as were forbidden in the ſame; which he compoſed into a book, adding a preface to it, that ſo every one which pleaſed might read it, and thereby diſcern how obedient or diſobedient he was unto God; and this he called A Looking-Glaſs.

But ſhortly after brake out (by the permiſſion of God) that hideous inundation of Goths and Vandals, and other nothern people, who were enſis Dei, God's ſword to puniſh the pride of the Roman empire. Theſe ſailing out of Spain arrived in Africk, over-running the whole country of Mauritania and other African provinces and countries, laying all waſte before them, and deſtroying all they could with barbarous cruelty and inhumanity, filling all places with torments of all ſorts, murders, burnings, and with innumerable and abominable depopulations, ſparing neither ſex nor age; no not the miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt: the churches ornaments they plundered, the churches themſelves they demoliſhed, and like incarnate devils made havock of all. This holy man of God lived to ſee theſe grievous calamities, and was not affected with them only as other men were; but conſidering them more deeply and profoundly, and in them foreſeeing the great danger of ſouls, he poured forth prayers and tears day and night. For he ſaw cities ſubverted, villages deſtroyed; the inhabitants being either ſlain or driven away; churches deſtitute of miniſters; holy virgins deſloured; ſome of them dying under their torments; ſome ſlain with the ſword; ſome led into captivity, in danger of having their ſouls infected with error and herely, and their bodies enſlaved under a cruel enemy.

He ſaw the pſalms of thankſgiving ceaſed in the congregations; the temples burnt; and the ſolemn aſſemblies to be given over; the ſacraments either not to be ſought after; or none to diſpenſe them to thoſe that deſired them: and for thoſe which fled into mountains woods, deſarts, caves of the earth, or to any other places of refuge, they were either hunted out and ſlain, or periſhed with famine and drought. The biſhops and miniſters of churches, (which had by the goodneſs of God) eſcaped their bloody hands, being ſpoiled of all things, went about begging their bread.

He ſcarce ſaw of all the innumerable churches of Africk, three remaining, viz. Carthage, Hippo, and Cirte, which thro' God's mercy yet remained in ſome ſafety: tho' not long after his death Hippo being forſaken of her inhabitants, was burnt by the enemy. Theſe things this good man much bewailed; and that which much increaſed his ſorrow was, that juſt now the enemies were coming to beſiege Hippo, the governor whereof was one earl Boniface. This ſiege laſted fourteen months, wherein Auguſtine with his fellow biſhops that were fled thither for refuge, and his preſbyters, exerciſed themſelves wholly in prayers and tears, intreating the Father of mercies to be merciful unto them, and to preſerve his church from the rage of the adverſaries. And one day as they ſat at dinner together, Auguſtine ſaid to them; 'You know brethren, that from the beginning of this ſiege, my daily prayers have been, that God would either free us from it, or give his ſervants patience and courage to undergo what he impoſeth, or to take me out of this preſent evil world; and I believe that God will anſwer my deſire.' And indeed accordingly in the third month of the ſiege he fell ſick of a fever which proved his laſt ſickneſs; neither would God defraud his ſervant of the fruit of his prayers; and indeed he was very powerful in prayers, ſo that ſometimes he hath caſt out devils, and reſtored ſick men to their health.

His fever proved ſo violent, that he dyed in the ſame third month of the ſiege. In his ſickneſs he breathed forth moſt pious ejaculations: he made no will, having nothing to beſtow, but only books upon ſeveral libraries. He dyed aged 76. anno Chriſti 430. having been a miniſter 40 years.

It's written of him, that after his firſt converſion to the faith he was grievouſly vexed with inward conflicts againſt his corrupt affections, complaining of his inward, hereditary, habitual, inveterate vices, and after long ſtruggling with them by purpoſes, vows ſtrong reſolutions, watching, faſting, ſelf revenge, and other good means, finding ſtill his own weakneſs, and the increaſing violence of his corruptions, as he was intentively muſing and meditating what to do more, he heard a voice ſaying. In te ſtas, & non ſtas; whereupon rightly apprehending that his own ſtength of wit, carnal reaſon, and other powers and helps of nature could not ſerve the turn for the effecting of that which was the proper and peculiar work of grace, he betook himſelf to his Saviour by humble faithful, and fervent prayer; and at laſt found ſuch aſſiſtance from the Holy Spirit of grace, as ſtrengthned him to ſtand and make his reſolutions with more comfort than before. His uſual wiſh was, that Chriſt when he came might find him aut Precantem, aut Prædicantem either praying, or preaching. When the Donatiſts upbraided him unworthily with the impiety and impurity of his former life, look, ſaid he, how much they blame my former faults by ſo much the more I commend and praiſe my phyſician.

He uſed to ſay, 'Holy marriage is better than proud virginity.' And again, 'Prayer that is pure and holy pierceth Heaven, and returns not empty. It's a ſhelter to the ſoul, a ſacrifice to God, and a ſcourge to the devil.' And again, 'There is nothing that more abateth ſin, than the frequent meditation of death: He cannot die ill that lived lived well; and ſeldom doth he die well that lived ill. A Chriſtian at home in his houſe muſt think himſelf a ſtranger; and that his country is above where he muſt be no ſtranger. And again, if men want wealth, it is not to be unjuſtly gotten; if they have it, they ought by good works to lay it up in heaven. He that taſted the ſweetneſs of divine love, will not care for temporal ſweetneſs. The reaſonable ſoul made in the likeneſs of God, may here find much diſtraction, no full ſatisfaction; for, it being capable of God, can be ſatisfied with nothing but God Not to be without affliction, but to overcome affliction is bleſſedneſs. Love is ſtrong as death: as death kills the body, ſo love of eternal life kills worldly deſire and affections. He called ingratitude the devil's ſponge, wherewith he wipes out all the favours of the Almighty.' He ſo admired the ſeven penitential pſalms, that he cauſed them to be written in great letters, and hung within the curtains of his death-bed, that ſo he might give up the ghoſt in the contemplation and meditation of them. His prayer was, 'Lord give me firſt what thou requireſt, and then require of me what thou wilt' And, 'He that prays well, can not chuſe but live well.'

His works are printed in nine tomes at Baſil by Froben.

The Life of Cyril of Alexandria, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti, 430.

THEOPHILUS biſhop of Alexandria falling into a lethargy, ſhortly after died: whereupon a great contention aroſe about the election of a new biſhop; ſome ſtanding for Timotheus the arch deacon, and others for Cyrillus; Abundatius the captain of the garriſon laboured all that he could to prefer Timothy; but the other partly prevailed, and ſo Cyril was choſen and ſettled in the biſhoprick.

About this time Neſtorius the heretic vented his blaſphemous opinions againſt the deity of our Saviour Chriſt, whom Cyril anſwered and confuted: upon this the emperor Theodoſius minor ſummoned a council at Epheſus, in which Cyril was choſen preſident, and where, with much learning and judgment, he confuted Neſtorius, and Pelagius. So that the council after ſerious examination and deliberation, pronounced this ſentence; 'To omit the other abominable wickedneſſes of Neſtorius, becauſe being ſent for by us, he hath refuſed to appear, neither would he receive thoſe godly and religious biſhops whom we ſent to confer with him; being therefore forced by neceſſity, we proceeded to the examination of his wicked opinions, and finding, partly by the epiſtles and books that he hath written, and partly by words which in this famous city he hath lately ſpoken, which by ſufficient witneſs have been proved before us, that he holds and publiſheth heretical opinions contrary to the word of God and the canons of the holy councils; we therefore, not without many tears, are forced to paſs this ſevere ſentence againſt him: and our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, whom he hath ſo groſly and grievouſly blaſphemed, doth by us decree, that Neſtorius be depoſed from his biſhoprick, and excommunicated from the holy aſſemblies of the miniſters of God. Which ſentence the emperor Theodoſius did alſo approve of and confirm,' and withal baniſhed him to Oaſis, and God to ſhew the ſeverity of his juſtice againſt blaſphemers, ſtruck him with an incurable diſeaſe whereby his tongue rotted, and breeding many worms, was devoured by them, ſo that he ended his wretched life after a moſt miſerable manner.

This Cyril was by birth a Grecian, and as one teſtifies of him was vir doctus & ſanctus, a learned and holy man: he was preſident in the council at Epheſus, where with much learning and judgement he confuted Neſtorius and Pelagius: he was admirably experienced in the holy ſcriptures: flouriſhed under Theodoſius junior: he was ſo famous for piety, eloquence, and wit, that the Grecian biſhops got ſome of his homilies by heart, and recited them to their people. After twenty two years labour in the government of that church, he quietly yielded up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti 448. under Theodoſius junior.

He uſed to ſay, 'It is the beſt way for a rich man to make the bellies of the poor his barn, to ſuccour the fatherleſs and needy, and thereby to lay up treaſure in heaven, that he may be received into everlaſting habitations. And, where the ſcripture wants a tongue of expreſſion, we need not lend an ear of attention, we may ſafely knock at the council door of Gods ſecrets; but if we go further, we may be more bold than welcome. And again, the devil runs with open mouth upon God's children to devour them: they manfully reſiſt him: he thinks to weaken their faith, and they, by his aſſaults are made the ſtronger: he fights againſt them, but they get ground upon him; and ſo what he intended for their deſtruction, full ſore againſt his will makes for their advantage. He was called the champion of the catholick faith.

His works were printed in two tomes at Paris, anno Chriſti 1605.

The Life of Peter Chryſologus, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti, 440.

PETER Chryſologus, ſo called becauſe of his golden eloquence, was born at Imola in France, of honeſt parents; bred under Cornelius biſhop of that city, whoſe care it was not only to inſtruct him in good manners and learning, but to fit him for the work of the miniſtry, that he might bring glory to God in the ſervice of his church: and not long after he was made arch biſhop of Ravenn. He excelled in learning, virtue, and praiſe worthy qualities He was preſent at the councils, the one at Ravenna, the other at Rome; and ſent letters full of learning to the ſynod of Chalcedon againſt Eutiches the heretic. He was powerful in eloquence, eſpecially in his ſermons to the people, and very full in converſation, by both which he won many to the truth. Always before he penned any thing, he would with great ardency and humility ſet himſelf to prayer to ſeek God for direction therein. He lived long, having been biſhop about 60 years, flouriſhed under Martian the emperor, and died anno Chriſti 500.

He uſed to ſay, 'Let not thy care be to have thy hands full, whilſt the poors are empty: for the only way to have full barns is to have charitable hands: and, God had rather man ſhould love him then fear him; to be called father than maſter; he wins by mercy, that he may not puniſh by juſtice: if thou wilt be like thy father, do likewiſe. And, neither in the flint alone, nor in the ſteel alone any fire is to be ſeen, nor extracted out by conjunction, and colliſion: ſo, nor by faith alone, nor by good works alone is ſalvation attained, but by joining both together. And, as the clouds darken heaven, ſo intemperate banquetting the mind; as the violence of winds and waves ſinks a ſhip, ſo drunkenneſs and gluttony our ſouls and bodies in the depth of hell. And, virtues ſeparated, are annihilated; equity without goodneſs is ſeverity; and juſtice without piety cruelty. And, ſome that lived commendably before they attained to dignity, being ſet in the candleſtick of the church, turn their light into darkneſs: it had been better for ſuch lights ſtill to have been hidden under a buſhel, &c.'

He was a man of an excellent wit, and by his miniſtry and example won many to a love of the truth.

He wrote 176 homilies: Lib. ad Eutychen, & Epiſtolæ aliæ.

The Life of Prosper, who died anno Chriſti 466.

PROSPER was born in Acquitane, and preferred to be biſhop of Rhegium in France; he was ſcholar to St. Auguſtine, famous for learning and piety; he learnedly confuted the Pelagian hereſy; he was aſſiduous in reading, eſpecially of the ſcripture; he uſually had the four evangeliſts in his hands: he diſtributed his goods freely to the poor: his ſpecial care was to take away all ſtrife and contentions from amongſt his people. He was a father to all ages and ſexes that were in the city; he much addicted himſelf to watching, faſting, prayer, and meditation. He continued biſhop three and twenty years: flouriſhed under Martianus. Upon his death-bed, ſpeaking to many of his people that wept ſore, he ſaid, 'The life which I have enjoyed enjoyed was but given me, upon condition to render it up again, not grudgingly, but gladly; for me to have ſtayed longer here might ſeem better for you, but for me it is better to be diſſolved, &c.' And ſo praying and lifting up his hands to God before them all, he departed anno Chriſti, 466.

He was excellently verſed in the ſacred ſcriptures: and no leſs famous in human learning: he was a very good poet, and an eloquent orator: of a profound judgment, ſubtile wit, a nervous writer, and holy liver.

His works are all printed in octavo at Cullen, anno Chriſti 1609.

He uſed to ſay, thou ſhalt neither hate the man for his vice; nor love the vice for the man's ſake. And, thou boaſteſt of thy wealth, honour, ſtrength, beauty, &c. conſider what thou art by ſin, and ſhalt be in the grave, and thy plumes will fall: for every proud man forgets himſelf. And, as the ſoul is the life of the body, ſo the life of the ſoul is God: when the ſoul departs the body dies, and when God departs the ſoul dies. And, thoſe things which God would have ſearched into, are not to be neglected; but thoſe which God would have hidden, are not to be ſearched into; by the latter we become unlawfully curious, and by the neglect of the former, damnably ungrateful. And, the envious man hath ſo many tortures, as the envied hath praiſes: it is the juſtice of envy to kill and torment the envious. And, the life to come is bleſſed eternity, and eternal bleſſedneſs: there is certain ſecurity, ſecure quietneſs, quiet happineſs, happy eternity, eternal felicity.

The Life of FULGENTIUS, who died anno Chriſti, 529

HUNERICK the Arian, king of the Vandals, having ſubdued Carthage, baniſhed all the ſenators thereof into Italy, amongſt whom was Gordian grandfather to Fulgentius: and after the deceaſe of Gordian, Claudius his ſon returned unto Carthage; and though his houſe was given to an Arian prieſt, he recovered a great part of his inheritance by ſome favour which he found at the king's hands, and ſo departing to Lepte, he there ſettled his habitation; but ſhortly after dying, he left his ſon Fulgentius to the care of his mother, Mariana, who was very careful to train him up in learning, cauſing him to be inſtructed in the Greek tongue, before he learned the Latin, that thereby he might attain to the greater perfection in that language: and as his years encreaſed, ſo did he highly profit in all ſorts of learning, to the great joy of his mother, who exceedingly rejoiced to ſee his wiſdom and towardneſs, which alſo much refreſhed her after the loſs of her dear huſband: yea ſhe was ſo well ſatisfied with his prudence, that ſhe committed to his care the government of her whole houſe; and he ſo well behaved himſelf therein, that he pleaſed his friends, ſilenced his ill willers, and both by direction and correction procured an awful reſpect from the ſervants: he was alſo very careful to preſerve his patrimony.

By this his deportment he gat ſo much credit and eſteem, that he was made the king's collector, and required to be rigorous in exacting the rated payments: but after a while it pleaſed God, that this multiplicity and burden of worldly buſineſſes began to be very heavy to his ſoul; and the vain flattering felicity of the world yielding diſguſt, by little and little the love of ſpiritual life ſeemed to take root in his heart, and this begat in him a deſire frequently to pray, and to read, and to ſtudy the ſcriptures: then did he often reſort to ſuch men as ſequeſtred themſelves from worldly buſineſſes, and betook themſelves to monaſteries, where he learned by experience the ſweet converſation of God's ſervants, thoſe places being not yet degenerated into ſuch ſuperſtition and profaneneſs as afterwards they were.

Amongſt them he perceived that as they had no worldly ſolace, ſo had they no wearineſs in their preſent condition; as they had no temporal joys, ſo neither had they that vexation of ſpirit which other men were ſubject to by reaſon of their worldly buſineſſes; whereupon with himſelf he brake out into theſe words, 'Why travel I in the world, which can yield me no future nor durable reward anſwerable to my pains? though it be better to weep well than joy ill: yet if to joy be our deſire, how much excelleth their joy who have a good conſcience before God, who dread nothing but ſin; ſtudy to do nothing but to accompliſh the precepts of Chriſt? Now therefore let me change my trade; and as before, I endeavoured amongſt my noble friends to prove more noble, ſo now let my care and employment be amongſt the humble and poor ſervants of the higheſt, to become more poor and humble than they, and like St. Matthew, let me turn from a publican to a diſciple.'

Thus being reſolved to renounce all terrene and worldly delights, and to make himſelf a partaker of that kind of life which upon mature deliberation and examination his judgement approved as moſt excellent: yet withal, wiſely conſidering that ſudden changes might breed ſome diſtemperature either in body or mind, or both, he began by degrees to accuſtom himſelf to faſting, to avoid the company and accuſtomed compliments of his old acquaintance and familiar friends, addicting himſelf to ſolitarineſs, much reading and prayer. Hereupon all that knew him were ſtricken with great wonder and amazement at this ſudden and unexpected change: imputing this ſtrict and demeanor in a man ſo delicately brought up to proceed from neceſſity, and privy poverty: but he having thus made ſome proof of ſuch things, wherein he conceived difficulties might occur, and now finding by experience that nothing was hard to a willing mind, as alſo lighting upon, and reading that divine treatiſe of St Auguſtine upon the 36 pſalm, his love to and longing after that more retired courſe of life much encreaſed in him, ſo that he reſolved without any further delay to put his former purpoſes into practice, and accordingly going to Fauſtus, who was one of thoſe biſhops whom the Arian tyrant Hunerick had confined to a certain place not far from his own country, he beſeeched him to admit him into his monaſtery. The prudent biſhop well knowing the worldly converſation of the young man in times paſt, gave no credit to his ſpeech, nor comfort to his requeſt, but willed him firſt to learn to live leſs delicately before he entered upon ſo ſtrict a courſe of life: but he humbly kiſſing the biſhop's hand, earneſtly requeſted him that he would not reject him, but graciouſly admit him for one of his diſciples; and ſo by importunity declaring his ſincere affections, he procured admittance.

The fame of this thing ſpreading abroad, ſome deſpaired of his perſeverance becauſe of his former delicate life; others conſidering the excellency of his wit were raiſed in expectation of ſome notable and worthy conſequence. Divers of his familiars excited by his example, betook themſelves to the like courſe of life: only his inconſiderate and worldly minded mother grew exceedingly diſcontented at it, as if her Fulgentius were already dead, and ſo, impatiently running to the biſhop, ſhe brawled with him, crying out, 'Reſtore the ſon to his mother, the maſter to his ſervants and houſhold: it becomes you to comfort ſuch diſconſolate widows, not to deſtroy my forlorn houſe.' The biſhop mildly rebrehended her, but wiſely concealed her ſon; wherefore ſhe filled the air with her exclamations, ever calling upon the name of Fulgentius: this violent temptation did he meet with at his firſt entrance into this ſtrict kind of life; but having his heart fixed in heaven, he gave no ear to her exclamations: the biſhop having hereby had experience of the valour of this young diſciple, judged that he that could thus overcome his natural affections, no labour would be hard, nor conqueſt difficult for the time to come.

Whilſt he continued in this place, he wholly abſtained from wine and oil, and was ſo rigorous in faſting that it much debilitated his body, and procured ſome diſeaſes: but his heart being wholly ſet upon the working forth of his ſalvation with fear and trembling, he committed himſelf to God, ſaying, the daintieſt feeders avoid not ſickneſs: and after he had a while been habituated to this courſe, he through God's mercy recovered his health and priſtine beauty. His inheritance (though he had a younger brother called Claudius) he wholly left it to his mother, that at her deceaſe ſhe might leave it to Claudius, if he deſerved well of her; by which means his brother (for the living ſake) was made more dutiful and ſubmiſs, and his mother by this gift received no ſmall conſolation to counterpoiſe the ſorrow of his abſence.

by

Shortly after the Arians renewing their perſecution (which for a ſpace they had diſcontinued under a pretence of more moderation) biſhop Fauſtus was conſtrained by frequent removes from one place to another to hide himſelf, and Fulgentius had no better ſhift than to flee to another little monaſtery governed by one Fælix, who having ſufficiently heard of his learning and vertue, would have reſigned the government thereof to Fulgentius; but he conſtantly refuſed it; yet at the great importunity of the brethren, he was enforced to take part of the government upon him: ſo that theſe two holy men equal in their love to God and their neighbours, equal in vertue, and like in conditions, mutually governed the place, each fearful of offending the other; each vigilantly attending the good of the ſociety. But the perſecution growing more hot, they, together with their diſciples, were forced to remove into more remote and unknown parts of Africa; and at laſt ſettled in the territories of Sicca, where they exceedingly profited the people, and gained many ſouls to Chriſt.

But the old enemy of mankind envying their godly labours, ſtirred up an Arian prieſt called Fælix, who, not far off, had corrupted many with his heretical opinions, to moleſt and trouble them. This fellow, great in power and authority, but greater in malice, fearing leſt by the means of Fulgentius (whoſe learning now grew famous) many of his ſeduced diſciples ſhould be reclaimed to the truth, he cauſed all the ways to be beſet by which theſe two fathers uſed to go to inſtruct the people; and it pleaſed God that as theſe two walked by the way, they fell into theſe watchmens hands, who preſently loaded them with irons, and carried them to the Arian prieſt. Fælix when he ſaw that he was like to be apprehended, threw away ſome money into a buſh, which he happened to have about him for the brethrens ſuſtenance. The Arian prieſt when they came before him uſed them very roughly, demanding, of them why they came out of their own country to ſubvert his Chriſtian hearers? And as they were about to anſwer, he would not hear them, but firſt commanded them to be ſcourged: whereupon Fælix requeſted that his brother Fulgentius might be ſpared: for (ſaith he) he cannot endure the extremity of the torment, but in all likelihood will breath forth his innocent ſoul under your hands. But rather let your wrath be wholly wrecked upon me, who am moſt guilty of that which you charge us with: Fælix therefore was moſt cruelly beaten, but not that Fulgentius ſhould be ſpared, who being of noble parentage was of a tender conſtitution, and ſo the blows with the ſtaves were the more grievous to him, whereupon he earneſtly deſired to be heard having ſomewhat to ſay; and ſo the ſtripes and baſtinadoes being intermitted, he began with his eloquent mouth to relate the cauſe of their travel into thoſe parts, cauſing his very adverſaries to wonder at his eloquence and flowing language. So that the prieſt had almoſt forgotten his cruelty, and ſhame of the injury was ready to embrace his obdurate heart: yet leſt he ſhould appear to be overcome with his words, he cried out; 'Lay him on luſtily, and multiplying your blows rend this prattler. What? Thinks he by his words to ſeduce me alſo?' Hereupon he was again beaten moſt mercileſly: then were both of them ſhaven deformedly, their cloaths pulled off, and ſo they were ſent packing all naked. Forth then from the Arian's houſe they departed no otherwiſe than as from a glorious combat, and as crowned with lawrels of victory: in their return they found the money which Fælix had hidden, which was a great refreſhing to them. The fame of this deteſtable fact gave great offence to many, and in particular to the Arian biſhop of the dioceſs, who had a good opinion of Fulgentius, and much favoured him, and would have puniſhed the prieſt, if Fulgentius had deſired it of him: and indeed many urged him to ſeek revenge; but he gave them this humble denial, ſaying, 'It is not lawful for a Chriſtian to meditate revenge: our Lord Chriſt well knoweth how to repay the injuries inflicted on his ſervants. If my cauſe be avenged, then loſe I the reward of my patience; eſpecially ſeeing it might ſcandalize many little ones if I a catholic ſhould require judgment at an Arian's hand.'

A while after Fulgentius having heard and read much of the ſtrict lives of the monks in Egypt, had a great mind to ſee the ſame, and ſo leaving his monaſtery, he took ſhipping for Egypt: but a ſtorm meeting him by the way, he was driven into the haven of Syracuſe, the chief city of Sicily: at this time Euſalius was biſhop there, who very courteouſly entertained Fulgentius, and upon converſe, finding his ſufficiency, enquired the cauſe of his voyage, and underſtanding by him the cauſe, he much diſſuaded him from it, and perſuaded him to continue at Syracuſe that winter; which when he conſented to, he maintained him all that time, and Fulgentius out of that little allowed him, carefully miniſtred ſomewhat to the neceſſities of others. Summer being come, he failed to Rome, where beholding the glory of the Roman nobility, the triumph and pomp of king Theodorick, and the univerſal ſplendor and joy of the city, he was ſo far from being taken with ſuch worldly toys and delights, that it raiſed up his deſires after heavenly joys, ſaying thus to ſome of his friends that accompanied him; 'How beautiful may the cæleſtial Jeruſalem be, when terreſtial Rome, ſo glittereth? If ſuch honour be given to lovers of vanity, what glory ſhall be imparted to the ſaints who are lovers and followers of truth?' Then did he return into Africa to the incredible joy of his brethren; but after a while, finding the diſtractions which neceſſarily attended his abode there, partly by reaſon of his care in government, and partly by reaſon of much reſort of noble men, and others that daily repaired to him (his fame being now ſpread abroad) he privily ſtole away, and went to another monaſtery far off, amidſt the ſhelly rocks of the ſea, deſtitute in a manner of all humane ſolace and neceſſaries, where being with all courteſy received, as much as he excelled others in learning and eloquence, ſo far ſubjected he himſelf to all in humility and obedience. Many books he there copied out fair with his own hands, and for his recreation made many neceſſary implements for the houſe of Palm-leaves: but at laſt his old ſociety gained knowlege of the place of his abode, and preſently ſent to requeſt his return: hereupon great contention aroſe between the two houſes, whilſt one fought to retain, the other to regain him. The controverſy at laſt came before biſhop Fauſtus, who decreed his return to his firſt place; and that he might be employed for the public good, he ordained him a preſbyter: at which time ſundry cities wanting paſtors (for the king had forbidden the ordination of any more biſhops) many of them ſought and ſued to Fulgentius to undertake that charge, and ſome proceeded to elect him outright; yet thought he himſelf ſecure by reaſon of the king's prohibition, till at laſt the perſecuted biſhops, who yet ſurvived, reſolved rather to incur the diſpleaſure of the king than to ſuffer the people any longer to want biſhops; and thereupon meeting together, they decreed that biſhops ſhould be ordained for all the vacant places; and forthwith (leaſt the Arian king hearing of it, ſhould prevent them) they ſought out godly preſbyters whom they might appoint to this office, but that Fulgentius who was moſt of all ſought for, could no where be found; for he had hid himſelf to avoid that employment, and ſo continued till all the ſolemnities were over paſſed, and then returned hoping now to live in quiet: But it pleaſed God otherwiſe to diſpoſe of it: for it fell out that the city of Ruſpa remained as yet unfurniſhed, the citizens whereof getting inkling that Fulgentius was diſcovered, they came unto him, laid hold upon him, carried him with them, and did not requeſt, but conſtrain him to be their biſhop; yet in this dignity he nothing forgot his former integrity: he ſtill uſed mean and ſimple attire, went many times barefoot, wholly abſtained from fleſh, wine, and oil, and always kept about him ſome of his former aſſociates: but he, with his fellow biſhops enjoyed not long their places: for that fell out which was eaſily foreſeen to be a likely conſequence, yet was contemned in reſpect of the churches neceſſity and want, which was that the Arian king enraged by this act, baniſhed about 60 biſhops into Sardinia, amongſt whom Fulgentius was one, who joyfully aſcended the ſhip, being heartily glad that he had a ſhare in ſuch a glorious confeſſion: divers of his clergy and friends followed him, and being arrived at Calaris in Sardinia, he there lived with them at the ſame table, and by his ſermons converted many.

Not long after king Thraſamund amongſt the crafty fetches;

fetches, and perſecutory drifts whereby he endeavoured to allure the catholics to the Arian hereſy, uſed this policy: he feigned a deſire to become a catholic, and ſetting down divers captious and deceitful queſtions, pretended that he could not find any that could ſufficiently anſwer thoſe queſtions, whereupon hearing the fame of Fulgentius, he haſtily ſent for him: who with an undaunted courage came to Carthage, and not being preſently called to the king endeavoured ſeriouſly to confirm the catholics in their faith; and with much courteſy and affability anſwered all queſtions, rejecting no man; whereby he reclaimed many from their errors, admoniſhing them to repent of, and to bewail their fall: others he exhorted not to hazard the damnation of their ſouls for temporal advantages: and whom he ſaw in danger of perdition, with mild, yet effectual words he ſtayed and encouraged to a noble and generous reſolution, animating them to ſuffer any dangers or torments rather than deny the truth: and it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs his labours, that ſome who before were ſtaggering, were now by his means emboldned plainly to reprove the weak grounded impudence of the Arian party: and thus the omnipotent God turned the enemies device to the advancement of his own glory. Then did the king ſend for him, and queſtioned with him, and met with ſuch ſolid and judicious anſwers, that he was forced to acknowlege that he found him every way to anſwer the report which he had heard of his wiſdom and learning, and withal he propoſed ſundry difficult queſtions to which he required his anſwer in writing. Fulgentius having drawn up his anſwer, communicated it to the moſt learned catholics, and after their approbation, to the people, before it was delivered to the king. Thraſamund having with great diligence peruſed it, praiſed his wiſdom wondred at his eloquence, commended his humility; yet had his heart ſo hardened that he could not underſtand and ſubmit to the truth.

Fulgentius could not be ſuffered to ſtay long at Carthage, for the Arians with their clamours incenſed the king, complaining that he had already gained from them ſome of their miniſters, and that the people fell apace to him, ſo that their whole religion ſtood in great hazard by his means: then the king to quiet them, ſent him back into Sardinia. Late in the night was he carried aboard the ſhip, that his departure might be the better concealed from the people: but it pleaſed God by contrary winds long to detain the ſhip in the harbour, ſo that for many days almoſt the whole city flocked to him to take their farewel, and many communicated at his hands: and when great lamentation was made for his departure, he took one Juliates (a very godly man) apart, and told him he ſhould ſhortly again return, and that the church ſhould enjoy peace, which alſo came to paſs: when he was requeſted to pray for any that were ſick or in miſery, he commonly uſed this petition: 'Thou (O Lord) knoweſt beſt what will make for our ſouls health: grant of thy mercy a ſupply unto our neceſſities, ſo far forth as ſhall not hinder our ſpiritual profit:' And when God graciouſly anſwered his prayers in their behalf, he uſed to ſay, 'That God did it for their ſakes, not for his:' He commonly ſaid that miracles make not a man juſt or righteous, but famous.

When he was come back to Sardinia, he returned to his former ſtrict courſe of life, with his aſſociates, who had all things in common; and when he diſtributed more to one than to another by reaſon of ſickneſs or weakneſs, he uſed thus to ſay to them; 'Who taketh of the common ſo much, becometh debtor to all, which debt he can only pay by humility.' It was very pleaſing to him when any of the brethren propoſed any hard queſtion; and gladly he hearkened to the doubts of any though they were never ſo ſimple; neither would he through wearineſs or tedioufneſs ceaſe to give them anſwers, until they confeſſed themſelves to be ſatisfied: though he was ſometimes ſevere towards the obſtinate, yet he remained even when he ſeemed moſt diſpleaſed and angry, nothing at all in mind troubled or diſquieted.

Thraſamund the king being ſhortly after taken away by death, Hilderick ſucceeded him, who reſtored peace and liberty to the catholicks, recalling their biſhops from exile, and amongſt the reſt Fulgentius, who was received with great devotion by the Africans, no leſs in every city than if he had been their peculiar biſhop: everywhere they met him with tokens of joy, with whom now rejoicing he rejoiced, as before with them lamenting he had lamented: yea, their love was ſo great to him, that a ſhower of rain falling, they held their garments over his head to keep him dry. Then did he return to his proper ſeat, where he would do nothing without the advice of his clergy.

In the council of Vinceſa he was by the common ſuffrage of the biſhops choſen preſident: Though biſhop Quodvultdeus claimed that preheminence as belonging to his ſea: and though Fulgentius for the preſent would not oppoſe this choice, yet at the next ſeſſions, he procured that the biſhop Quodvultdeus was reſtored to his right. A year before his death he retired with ſome brethren into the iſland of Circina, and there lived a moſt ſtrict life: but the neceſſities of his people requiring, and their importunity prevailing, he returned to them, and ſhortly after fell into grievous pangs of ſickneſs, wherein he continued ſixty days, often crying out O Lord give me patience and pardon. Phyſicians perſuading him to make uſe of a bath, he anſwered; Can baths make that man who hath accompliſhed the courſe of nature that he ſhall not die? Why then do you go about to perſuade me now at my laſt end to remit of that rigor which I have always uſed? Laſtly calling together the brethren about him, he thus ſpake to them; Dear brethren having been careful of your ſouls health, perhaps I have been auſtere and harſh towards you: If any one be offended I beſeech him to pardon me: and if my ſeverity have poſſibly paſſed meaſure and due moderation, pray ye to God that he may impute it not to me. They all kneeling down acknowleged him to have been always loving, gentle, and mild towards them. Then did he pray for his people, that God would provide for them a paſtor after his own heart: After this he called for a ſum of money, which as a faithful ſteward he daily uſed to diſtribute amongſt the poor, willing it all to be preſently divided; and reciting by name the widows, orphans, and poor, he allotted to every one his portion. Soon after in the midſt of his prayers died this bleſſed ſervant of God, and famous doctor of the church, in 65 year of his age, anno Chriſti 529. having been biſhop about 25 years.

He was very powerful in prayer, as may appear by this example: ſometime before his death the Moores invaded the territories of Ruſpa filling all places with rapines, murders, burnings, and devaſtations, not ſparing the churches themſelves, but murdering ſuch as fled to them for refuge: but yet ſo long as Fulgentius lived, the city of Ruſpa remained in ſafety, and when all the reſt of the province was under miſerable captivity, that city alone enjoyed an happy peace.

He wrote many excellent treatiſes againſt heretics beſides ſundry ſermons and epiſtles: his moving and affectionate eloquence was ſuch, as that the biſhop of Carthage hearing him preach two days together in his church, could not refrain from tears; rejoicing that God had given to his church in thoſe afflicted and comfortleſs times ſuch a worthy inſtrument of his glory.

He uſed to ſay, Chriſt died for men and angels: for men, that they might riſe from ſin; and for angels, that they might not fall into ſin. And If they go to hell that do not feed the hungry, cloath the naked &c. what will become of them that take away bread from the hungry, cloaths from the naked? &c. If want of charity be tormented in hell, what will become of the covetous?

His mother having committed the charge of her houſe to him in his youth, he ſo managed it that he got this teſtimony, that he was matri præſidium, domeſticis ſolatium, &c. A ſafe guard to his mother, a comfort to the family, and to all with whom he converſed, a rare example. In the midſt of his greateſt ſufferings he uſed to ſay, Plura pro Chriſto toleranda: We muſt ſuffer more than this for Chriſt.

His works are printed a Lyons, anno Chriſti 1633.

The Life of GREGORY the GREAT, who died Anno Chriſti, 605.

GREGORY the Great was born in Rome: his father was a ſenator, by name Gordianus; his mother's name was Sylvia, a woman noble by birth, but both of them more noble for their piety. Our Gregory in his tender years was carefully educated by his parents, being inſtructed both in religion and literature; and as he grew in years, ſo he encreaſed in learning, which he retained with a firm memory, whereby he was enabled afterwards to make good uſe of it for the profit and benefit of the church of God: having gone through the ſtudy of other arts, he ſpent two years in reading of Pythagoras; but finding little ſatisfaction therin, he at laſt with much diligence breathed after more divine ſtudies; and after his father's death, having more freedom in diſpoſing himſelf, and his eſtate, he gave all his riches towards the relief of the poor, and betook himſelf to monaſtical life, firſt under Hillarion, and afterwards under Maximianus, who both of them were famous for their piety and learning.

He was very abſtemious in his diet, frequent in faſting and prayer, and ſo ſtudious of the ſacred ſcriptures, that he could ſcarce find leiſure to eat his food till neceſſity urged him thereunto: and indeed his abſtinence was ſo great that he much impaired his health thereby: yet would he not give over his employments, ſpending all his time in prayer, reading, writing, or dictating to others. His humility was very examplary; for though he came of noble parents, yet had he ſo little reſpect to his deſcent, that with tears he would often ſay, 'That all earthly glory was miſerable, if the owner of it did not ſeek after the glory of God:' He was very exact in ſpending his time, ſaying, that he was to give an account of it unto God; neither was he leſs charitable to the ſouls of others; for on a time when many merchants were met to ſell their comodities at Rome, it happened that Gregory paſſed by them, and ſaw many young boys with white bodies, fair faces, beautiful countenances and lovely hair ſet forth to ſale, whereupon going to the merchant, their owner, he aſked him from what country he brought them? The merchant anſwered from Britain where the inhabitants were generally ſo beautiful: then ſaid Gregory; 'Are they Chriſtians, or heathens?' heathens replyed the other; whereupon Gregory deeply ſighing ſaid, 'Alas for grief! that ſuch fair faces ſhould be under the power of the prince of darkneſs, and that ſuch beautiful bodies ſhould have their ſouls void of the grace of God;' Then did he again aſk the merchant 'by what name that people were called?' He anſwered Angli: Truly ſaid he, 'they may be called Angli, quaſi Angeli, for they have angels countenances, and it is fit they were made fellow citizens with the angels.' Again he aſked, 'What was the name of the province whence they came?' The merchant anſwered, Deiri; 'well may they be of Deiri, for its fit they ſhould be pulled De ira Dei (from under the wrath of God) and called into the grace of Chriſt.' Again he aſked him, 'what was the name of their king?' the merchant anſwered Alle, whereupon Gregory alluding to his name, ſaid 'Well is their king called Alle, for its fit that Alleluja to their Creator ſhould be ſung in thoſe parts:' And ſo going ſtrait to Benedict, who was biſhop of Rome at that time, he earneſtly requeſted him to ſend ſome miniſters into Britain for the converſion of the inhabitants there; and when none could be found that would undertake that journey, himſelf would have gone if the biſhop would have permitted it: and indeed at the length, by his importunity he prevailed for leave, and ſet forwards on his journey; but within three days the people of Rome ſo complained to Benedict of the loſs of Gregory, that he ſent for him back, which occaſioned his return (tho' with much ſorrow) that he was hindered in ſo good a work.

Not long after he was ſent upon ſome Eccleſiaſtical affairs to the emperor at Conſtantinople, where tho' the ſplendor of the court was troubleſome to him, yet intermitted he not his private ſtudies and devotion, and during his abode there, at the requeſt of a biſhop who was ambaſſador for the Viſigoths, he wrote a Comment upon the book of Job. Alſo whereas Eutychius biſhop of Conſtantinople, had taught and writ that our bodies at the reſurrection ſhould be impalpable, more ſubtle than air: Gregory confuted that error both by reaſon, and by the example of Chriſt's body after his reſurrection: whereupon enſued an hot diſputation betwixt them: this the emperor Mauritius hearing of, ſent for them both to him, heard the cauſe on both ſides, read over diligently the book writ by Eutychius, and being convinced of the error by that which he had heard from Gregory, he adjudged the book to be burned. Shortly after Eutychius fell very ſick, and a little before his death, retracted his error, and acknowleged the reſurrection of our fleſh.

Gregory having diſpatched the buſineſs about which he was ſent to Conſtantinople, returned to Rome, about which time the river Tiber ſwelled to ſuch an unmeaſurable height that it ran over the walls of the city, and drowned a great part of it, and brake into many great houſes, overthrew divers ancient monuments: it overthrew alſo the granaries belonging to the church, and carried away many thouſand meaſures of wheat: preſently after which inundation of Tiber, there came down the river an innumerable company of ſerpents, with one monſtrous great one, as big as a beam, which when they had ſwimed into the ſea, were there choaked, and their carcaſes being all caſt upon the ſhore, there rotted, which cauſed ſuch an infection of the air, that preſently a great plague followed in Rome, ſo that many thouſands died of it; yea, arrows were viſibly ſeen to be ſhot from heaven, and whomſoever was ſtricken with them, preſently died, amongſt whom Pelagius biſhop of Rome was one: and this judgment ſo raged in the city, that many houſes were emptied of their inhabitants.

After the death of Pelagius, the clergy, ſenate, and people of Rome made choice of Gregory to be their biſhop, though he oppoſed it all that poſſibly he could: crying out, that he was altogether unworthy of ſuch an honour, fearing leſt the ſplendor of worldly glory, which he had formerly laid aſide, ſhould in ſuch an office creep upon, and infect him. But the importunity of the people being ſo great, he ſeemed to conſent to them: but privately under hand wrote to the emperor Mauritius, earneſtly requeſting him that he would not conſent to the election, but that by his authority he would free him from it: but Germanus the præfect of the city meeting with the meſſenger, took his letters from him, and reading them, detained them, ſending word to the emperor of the unanimous conſent of all in the election of Gregory: whereupon the emperor, returning thanks to God, for that they had made ſo good a choice, confirmed the election, ſo that Gregory could no longer evade it.

In the mean time the peſtilence raging exceedingly, Gregory called the people together, and ſhewed them the juſtice of God in his judgements, who uſed not to puniſh till by ſin he is provoked thereunto, telling them that they might read the greatneſs of their ſins in the greatneſs of the plague; and thereupon exhorted them to repentance by the precepts of God, and by the example of Nineveh, appointing them to lay all their worldly buſineſſes aſide, and to meet together the next day to ſpend it in faſting and prayer; which accordingly they did: yet whilſt they were together God's hand was out againſt them, ſo that fourſcore of them fell down dead in the place: but Gregory being not diſcouraged hereby, continued his ſermon, telling them that God would at length be found of them, if they would forſake their wicked ways, and turn unto him with all their hearts, and with all their ſouls: and accordingly not long after the peſtilence ceaſed.

Gregory obſerving that many cuſtoms were lately crept into the church which were not warranted by the holy apoſtles, he firſt extirpated them out of the church of Rome, and then calling a council of many biſhops: he endeavoured to root them out of the whole church. Then removing from about him all ſecular perſons, he choſe presbyters and other learned men in their ſtead, whereby learning was much advanced in his days. He was very chritable, and much given to hoſpitality, inſomuch as when very many inhabitants from divers parts (flying from the barbarous cruelty of the Longobards) came to him, he entertained and relieved them, inviting daily to his houſe many of thoſe exiles. He made alſo large diſtributions unto others, giving them corn, wine, fleſh, fiſh, cheeſe, and and many other refreſhings in their ſeveral ſeaſons. Many times alſo he ſent large relief to the ſick, lame, and impotent perſons, not only in Rome, but in many other towns and villages round about, inſomuch as all that he had, ſeemed to be the common granary of the church.

In the fourth year of his biſhoprick having in ſome good meaſure ſettled the affairs of the church, he now began to think how he might advance the converſion of the Engliſh, which he had formerly been ſo ſollicitous for, and had never ſince been forgotten by him; for which end he ſent Auſtin and ſome other miniſters from about him; to preach the goſpel unto them: but they had not gone many days journey before they began to be a weary of undertaking ſo difficult and dangerous a taſk, as to go to preach to a fierce, barbarous, and unbelieving nation, whoſe language they did not underſtand, whereupon they ſtopped, and ſent Auſtin back to Gregory, deſiring that they might have leave to return, that they might be freed from ſo laborious, difficult and dangerous a work.

Gregory having received this meſſage, wrote thus back to them again: beloved brethren, ſeeing it had been better that you had never begun a good work, than that you ſhould recede from it, it behoves you through the aſſiſtance of Almighty God to go forwards with it: neither let the labour of the journey, nor the tongues of wicked men deter you from it: I have ſent back Auſtin whom I would have you to obey, knowing that he will counſel you nothing but what ſhall be for the good of your ſouls. Almighty God give you his grace, and grant that I may ſee of the fruit of your labours, though I cannot join with you therein. With this exhortation Auſtin did ſo encourage his companions, that paſſing through France, where they found kind entertainment by the good biſhops in every place, they at laſt arrived in Britain, and came to Ethelburg, the king of Kent, where through God's mercy they did not only obtain leave to preach, but had habitations and maintainance allowed them in Canterbury his chief city. Whoſoever deſires to ſee the ſucceſs of this buſineſs, may read it in my Engliſh Martyrology.

Gregory died anno Chriſti 605 having been biſhop of Rome 13 years 6 months and 10 days. He lived under the emperor Maurivius and died in the ſecond year of Phocas. Johannes Trithemeus gives him this teſtimony; Gregorius, vir in divinis Scripturis eruditiſſimus, & in ſecularibus liberis utique doctiſſimus: theologorum princeps: ſplendor philoſophorum & rhetorum lumen; vita & converſatione integer, atque ſanctiſſimus.

He was of an acute wit, whereby he overthrew Eutiches, Pelagius, (who died in the time of the plague at Rome) and divers other heretics. He ſeverely reproved the biſhop of Conſtantinople, who would have been called Univerſal, which he calls Nomen iſtud blaſphemiæ, That name of blaſphemy.

He uſed to ſay, 'He is poor whoſe ſoul is void of grace, not whoſe coffers are empty of money; contented poverty is true riches: and again, God is never abſent, though the wicked have him not in their thoughts: where he is not by favour, he is by puniſhment and terror.' He could never read thoſe words, 'Son, remember in thy life time thou receiveſt good things,' without horror and aſtoniſhment, leaſt having ſuch dignities and honours as he had, he ſhould be excluded from his portion in heaven. It is ſaid of him, that he was the worſt Roman biſhop of all thoſe that were before him: and the beſt of all thoſe that followed him.

He wrote expoſitions upon the greateſt part of the bible. His works are contained in 6 tomes?

The Life of ISIDORE, who died anno Chriſti 676.

ISIDORE Hiſpalenſis, by birth a Spaniard, was carefully educated by his parents, of a quick wit, and able memory, admired for his learning and eloquence? he was choſen biſhop of Sivil under Mauritius the emperor, wherein he was very painful, and could accommodate his ſpeech fitly both to the ignorant and learned: he was full of mercy and good fruits. He was had in great honour, his fame ſpreading abroad far and wide, both for his life and learning: he ſo macerated his body with labours, and enriched his ſoul with divine learning and contemplations, that he ſeemed to live an angel's life upon earth. He died in the reign of Heraclius the emperor, about the year 675

He uſed to ſay, 'Knowlege and a good life are both profitable; yet if both cannot be obtained, a good life is to be ſought rather than much knowlege. And as the viper is killed by the young ones in her belly; ſo are we betrayed and killed by our own thoughts, nouriſhed in in our boſoms, which conſume and poiſon the ſoul. And, all things may be ſhunned, but a man's own heart: a man cannot run from himſelf; a guilty conſcience will not forſake him whereſoever he goes; and the devils have a threefold preſcience 1 By natural ſubtilty. 2. By experience. 3. By ſupernatural revelation. And, he that begins to grow better, let him beware leſt he grow proud; leſt vain glory give him a greater overthrow than his former vices.

The Life of BEDE, who died anno Chriſti, 735.

VENERABLE Bede an Engliſh Saxon was born anno Chriſti 671, near the monaſtery of St Peter and St Paul in Wyrimunda. His parents dying when he was but ſeven years old, he was bred up in that monaſtery, under two abbots Bennet and Ciofride, men famous in thoſe times for religion and learning: under whom he was trained up, and from his child hood accuſtomed to virtue and piety. He proved very learned in philoſophy, aſtronomy, muſic, and poetry; in Greek rhetoric, arithmetic, and hiſtory; but eſpecially he was very ſtudious of the holy ſcriptures.

Three things were familiar to him in his whole life; to pray, write, and preach. He was made deacon at nineteen years old, and a preſbyter at thirty: after which time he wholly devoted himſelf to the meditation of the holy ſcriptures. He was ſo famous for learning and piety, that he was ſent for to Rome by Pope Sergius, to help to ſettle the churches peace: he was very modeſt, never hunting after preferments, ſo devout in reading the ſcriptures, that he would often ſhed tears, and after he ended reading, he concluded with prayers.

He hated idleneſs and often ſaid, 'That there was ſo much work to do for a divine in ſo little time, that he ought not to loſe any of it. And for pleaſures we muſt deal with them, ſaid he, as we do with honey, only touch it with the tip of the finger not with the whole hand, for fear of forfeit.' He finiſhed his works anno Chriſti 731, and died 735 and of his age 70.

He uſed to ſay, 'He is a ſluggard that would reign with God, and not labour for God; in the promiſed reward he takes delight; but the commanded combats do affright him.' And, 'Anger doth languiſh by ſuppreſſing, but flames higher by expreſſing.'

He wrote of all the liberal arts ſundry excellent treatiſes. Though he lived in the uttermoſt corner of the world, yet neglected he not the ſtudy of the Greek and Hebrew tongues; he had many excellent ſcholars, whom by his counſel and example he drew to an ineſtimable love of the holy ſcriptures, endeavouring to make them as famous for their religion and piety as they were for their learning. He was of a very bountiful diſpoſition, venerable for his knowlege and integrity of life; full of charity, devotion, and chaſtity.

He was of a comely ſtature, of a grave pace, clear voice, eloquent tongue, amiable countenance, which ſeemed to be compoſed of gravity and mildneſs. He was very affable to ſuch as were good: a terror to ſuch as were proud and wicked; yet mild and humble to his fraternity. What he learned out of God's word by ſtudy and meditation, he communicated it to others without envy: he had ſcholars that flocked to him out of all parts of England, deſiring to be trained up in learning and manners under ſuch a maſter; for his converſation was a rule of religion, and honeſty to all about him.

Anno Chriſti 731, and of his age 59, he finiſhed the catalogue of his writings which are many, and upon moſt books in the Old and New Teſtament, beſides epiſtles, hiſtories of the ſaints, the hiſtory of his own abbey, the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of his own nation in five books, a martyrology, martyrology, a book of hymns, and many others, which are all printed in Collen, anno Chriſti 1612.

In ſickneſs he comforted himſelf with that of the apoſtle, Heb. xii. 6. 'Whom the Lord loveth he chaſteneth, and ſcourgeth every ſon whom he receiveth.' When his ſcholars were weeping about him, he ſaid in the words of Ambroſe, Non ſic vixi ut pudeat me inter vos vivere, ſed nec mori timeo, quia bonum dominum habemus. The time is come if my Creator pleaſeth, that being freed from the fleſh, I ſhall go to him, who made me when I was not, out of nothing; I have lived long, and the time of my diſſolution is approaching; and my ſoul deſireth to ſee my Saviour Chriſt in his glory. After his death one of his ſcholars was very deſirous to have made an epitaph: Hæc ſunt in foſſa Bedæ ſancti, or Presbyteri, oſſa, yet he could not make up the verſe with thoſe words: but on the morning this was found on his tomb: Hæc ſunt in foſſa Bedæ venerabilis oſſa.

Here lies intombed in theſe ſtones.

The Life of JOHN DAMASCEN, who flouriſhed, anno Chriſti, 730.

JOHN Damaſcen was born in Damaſcus, of religious parents, who carefully brought him up in learning, wherein he profited exceedingly, ſo that he attained to the knowlege of all the liberal ſciences. After which, going to Jeruſalem, he ſtudied the ſcripture and divinity, where he was made a preſbyter, preached diligently, and much propagated the faith by ſermons and writings; a great oppoſer of heretics he was; he flouriſhed under Leo, and died in peace

He was a very eloquent man, and ſecond to none of that age in learning: he wrote three books of parallels of the ſacred ſcriptures, four books the of orthodox faith, beſides many other works which are printed at Paris, anno Chriſti 1619.

The Life of THEOPHYLACT, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti 880.

THEOPHYLACT born in Conſtantinople, and afterwards arch biſhop of the ſame, was much employed in viſiting and reforming the churches in Bulgary, and when he had proved himſelf a faithful labourer in the dangerous perſecutions there, he yielded up his ſpirit to his Maker.

He uſed to ſay, 'Be not troubled if this man lives in tranquillity, and thou in tribulation, God will have it ſo; he puts thee into the combat, thou muſt therefore ſweat hard before thou comeſt off with the victory; whereas he that comes forward in the world, goes back in grace; his eſtate is miſerable that goes laughing to deſtruction, as a fool to the ſtocks for correction'

He wrote in Greek commentaries upon the four evangeliſts which are tranſlated into Latin by Charles Morell, and printed at Paris. anno Chriſti, 1631.

The Life of ANSELM, who flouriſhed anno Chriſti 1080.

ANSELM, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Aoſta, or Auguſta Prætoriana, at the foot of the Alps in Italy, and therefore, as an Italian, he always favoured the cauſe of the Roman biſhop. He was carefully brought up in learning by his mother Ermerburga, till he was fourteen years old; when ſhe dying, he gave himſelf a while to vain pleaſures, and his father being ſevere to him, he reſolved to travel, in which he met with wants, ſpent three years in Burgundy in France, and then became ſcholar to Lafrancus abbot of Beck, where being held hard to his ſtudy, he entered into a monaſtery, and by his ſtrict carriage there, his fame ſpread abroad, and the old abbot dying, he ſucceeded him, and after the death of Lanfrank he was choſen arch-biſhop of Canterbury: he received ſuch honours and encouragements from pope Urbane, as never biſhop received greater from a pope. For at the council of Burum in Apulia, the pope placed him at his right foot above all others, which was ever ſince the place of the arch-biſhops of Canterbury in all general councils; much contention was between William Rufus king of England and him, which cauſed him to leave the kingdom till Henry I. his time, when he was reinveſted again, but lived not long after his return into England before he died, which was anno Chriſti 1109. and in the 9th year of the reign of Henry I. and of his age 76. He was indeed the pope's factor in England for denial of inveſtures to the king, and marriages to the miniſters: but otherwiſe he was found in the main points of our religion; and taught many things contrary to the corrupt tenets of the church of Rome.

He uſed to ſay, 'That if he ſhould ſee the ſhame of ſin on the one hand, and the pains of hell on the other, and muſt of neceſſity chuſe one, he would rather be thruſt into hell without ſin, than go into heaven with ſin. And again, O duras caſus, &c. O hard hap! Alas, what did man loſe? what did he find! who loſt his bleſſedneſs to which he was made; and found death to which he was not made.'

The Life of NICEPHORUS, who flouriſhed, anno Chriſti, 1110.

NICEPHORUS, a man of profound judgment and learning, both in humanity and divinity, flouriſhed under Andronicus ſenior the emperor, anno Chriſti 1110. He was a great light, when the world was in great darkneſs, and both by his life and doctrine illuminated many; he wrote his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory in eighteen books in Greek, and dedicated them to the emperor Andronicus, and not long after exchanged this life for eternal glory.

He ſaid, 'God beholds and moderates our actions, uſing the ſcourge of affliction for our caſtigation, and converſion; and after due correction, ſhews his fatherly affection to thoſe that truſt in him for ſalvation' And 'Chriſt aſked Peter three times if he loved him; not for his own information, but that by his threefold profeſſion, he might help and heal his threefold negation of him.

The Life of BERNARD, who died anno Chriſti 1153.

BERNARD was born in Burgundy in the town of Fontaine; his father's name was Tecellinus, of an ancient family, and a brave ſoldier: but that which moſt commended him was that he feared God, and loved juſtice, and following the counſel of John the baptiſt, he did wrong to no man, and was content with his wages. His mother's name was Aleth, of the caſtle called Mont-bar, a woman eminent for piety, chaſtity, and charity, bringing up her children in the fear of God: ſhe had ſeven children, ſix ſons, and one daughter, all which ſhe nurſed with her own breaſts. Bernard was her third ſon, whom from his infancy (with Hannah) ſhe devoted to the ſervice of God, and therefore brought him not up tenderly and delicately, but inured him to courſe fare, and hardſhip; and as ſoon as he was of capacity, inſtilled into him the knowlege of the ſacred ſcriptures, and inſtructed him in the principles of religion; and finding him to be of an acute wit, ready apprehenſion, firm memory, comely feature, of courteous and meek deportment, and much addicted to learning, ſhe ſet him to ſchool betimes to Caſtillion, under the care and tuition of able ſchool maſters: and the boy being pioufly addicted, ſtudious, and of a quick apprehenſion, eaſily anſwered his mother's deſire and expectation, profiting in learning above his age, and out ſtripping all his ſchool fellows, and withal ſhewed a great contempt of all earthly things; and indeed he was very ſimple in all worldly affairs.

He ſhunned company, and affected retiredneſs; was much in meditation; obedient to his parents; grateful and courteous to all; he was exceeding ſhamefaced and modeſt; loved not to ſpeak much; towards God very devout, that he might keep himſelf pure in his childhood: and amongſt other learning, he was frequent in reading the holy ſcriptures, that from thence he might learn to know and ſerve

God:

God: ſo that it cannot be imagined how much he profited in a ſhort time.

Whilſt he was yet a boy, he was much troubled with a pain in his head, and lying upon his bed, there was brought to him a woman who had undertaken to cure him with certain verſes and charms: but as ſoon as he heard her begin to utter her verſes, wherewith ſhe uſed to deceive the ſimple, he cryed out with great indignation to have her taken away from him, ſaying, that he had rather endure the hand of God, than to be cured by the power of the devil: and God had reſpect to the zeal of the boy; for preſently after he was freed from his pain. What money was given him whilſt he was thus young, he privately gave it away to the poor. When he was grown to be a young man, his mother having ſeen him to exceed her expectation, falling ſick, quietly reſigned up her ſpirit unto God; and Bernard began now to grow famous for his ſtrict courſe of life, elegancy of feature, ſweet manners, ſharp wit, an eloquent tongue; ſo that many opportunities were put into his hand whereby he might have attained to great dignity in the world: hereupon the devil who watcheth all opportunities to do miſchief, laid his ſnares for him, ſeeking to draw him to uncleanneſs, and preſenting an object, whilſt Bernard for a time fixed his eyes too firmly upon her, he began to feel the burnings of his youthly luſts to ſtir in him: but quickly coming to himſelf, he bluſhed for ſhame, and purpoſing revenge, he preſently ran into a pool (the weather being cold) up to the neck, where he continued till he was almoſt ſtarved, thereby quenching that inward flame which before ſcorched him: and withal ſtudying how to avoid ſuch ſnares and temptations for the time to come, he reſolved to enter into a monaſtery of the Ciſtericans, which was the ſtricteſt order of friers, perſuading himſelf that there he might live retired from the world, and enjoy the freer communion with God; but this purpoſe of his coming to the ears of his brethren and friends, they laboured by all means to diſſwade him, exhorting him rather to continue in his ſtudies of humane learning, which might bring him to preferment in the world.

This tentation had almoſt prevailed with him, till the remembrance of his mother's purpoſe and care to ſet him apart for the ſervice of God came into his mind; and then retiring into a private place, he poured out his prayers well watered with tears unto God, ſeeking unto him for direction and counſel, and from that day forward he was confirmed in his reſolution, and could by no means be removed from the ſame: yea, his zeal was ſuch, that he reſted not till he had perſuaded four of his brethren to leave the world, and all their worldly preferments, and to join with him in the ſame courſe of life: and when they had taken their leave of their father, and were going towards the monaſtery, they ſaw their younger brother (Nivard) a boy playing among boys, to whom Guido the elder brother ſaid, 'Farewel brother Nivard, behold we leave to you all our earthly poſſeſſions:' but he preſently anſwered, 'You will take heaven, and leave me the earth, this is no equal diviſion: and ſo going to his father, after a while he reſolved to leave all, and to enter into the ſame courſe of life with his brethren, which he did accordingly.

Theſe brethren being thus entred into the monaſtery, lived under the government of one Steven, who was their abbot which was. anno Chriſti 1113. and in the 22 year of Bernards age. When Bernard entred into this courſe of life, he intended wholly to ſequeſter himſelf from the world; but God intended otherwiſe, who had prepared him to be a veſſel of honour for his own glory: this Bernard knew not, and therefore lived privately in his cell; ſpending his time in ſtudy, meditation, and prayer, often ſaying to himſelf, Bernard, Bernard, Remember for what end thou cameſt hither!

He allowed himſelf very little time for ſleep, often complaining that all that time was loſt; and indeed in ſo ſparing a dyet as he uſed, there was need of the leſs ſleep: for he never indulged himſef in either, neither eating nor ſleeping to fatiety. Yea, by his rigid abſtinence he ſo weakened his ſtomach, that he was ſcarce able to retain food when he had eaten it, and that little which he did retain ſerved rather to retard death, than to prolong his life: yet all this while he remitted nothing of his ſtudies and labours: inſomuch as equalled the other monks in digging of the ground, felling of wood, and carrying it home upon his ſhoulders; and when his ſtrength failed, he buſied himſelf about meaner ſervices; and whenſoever he had any intermiſſion he ſpent his time in prayer, and reading the ſacred ſcriptures, which afterwards in the midſt of his bodily labours he meditated over again.

He read alſo the beſt expoſitors, yet took far more delight in the fountain, than in theſe ſtreams, whereby he became very mighty in the ſcriptures, which ſtood him in great uſe, when afterwards he became a preacher. Shortly after Steven ſent forth ſome of theſe brethren to build the monaſtery of Clarævall, appointing Bernard to be their abbot. The place was in the territory of the Lingones, not far from the river Alba, where they lived in penury, hunger, thirſt, cold, watchings, and prayer; and Bernard underſtanding that the miniſtry of the word was much wanting in that country, burning with a zeal to ſave ſouls, reſolved to ſet upon that work, and ſeeking one by whom he might be ordained miniſter, he pitched upon the biſhop of Catalonia, to whom when he came, and had converſed a while with him, there grew a very ſtrict bond of friendſhip betwixt them.

After his ordination he was very frequent and fervent in preaching the word of God whereſoever he came, whereby he grew very famous. Yet Otho biſhop of Friſing, who was his cotemporary, blameth him for three things: 1. For his jealouſy, which carried him away with wrong conceits. 2. For credulity, or lightneſs of belief, giving ear to tale-bearers and liars with too much facility, which made him ſo earneſt againſt the Goſpellers, who were better men than himſelf. 3. For prejudice, eſpecially againſt learned men, who by the help of art ſoared aloft like eagles beyond the pitch of his capacity: for though himſelf had an excellent natural wit, yet he was little ſtudied in the arts and ſciences, and whoſoever went not in the rote way of learning, ſubmitted his reaſon to the dictates and phraſes of the Roman church, him would Bernard ſuſpect for an heretic.

Anno Chriſti 1153. he fell ſick, and wrote this letter to Arnold abbot of Bonæval, who deſired to know how he did in his ſickneſs. 'We received your letter in love, ſaith he, and not in pleaſure; for what pleaſure can there be where pain and bitterneſs challengeth all unto itſelf? Only it is a little delightful to me to eat nothing. Sleep hath departed from me, that ſorrow and pain may never depart from me, by the benefit of my ſenſes lulled aſleep. The want of a ſtomach is almoſt all that I ſuffer; only it requireth often both day and night to be comforted with a very little liquor whatſoever it be; but if at any time I admit of a little more, it is moſt grievous to me; my feet and thighs be ſwoln as theirs who are troubled with a dropſy. And in all theſe things (that I may conceal nothing from my friend who deſires to know the ſtate of his friend) the ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weak. Pray unto my Saviour who deſireth not the death of a ſinner, not that he will defer, but that he will guard my departure by his bleſſed angels. Take ye care that my hull, which is naked of merits, be ſtrengthened and defended by your prayers; that he which layeth in wait may not find where to faſten his tooth, and inflict a wound. Farewel.'

A little before his death all the monks came and aſked him whether he did not take pity on them, and their monaſtery? to which he anſwered, that he was in a great ſtrait, not knowing which to chuſe, life or death; but left all to the will of God: 'For, ſaith he, my fatherly love moves me to pity you my children, ſo as to deſire to remain here: but on the other ſide my deſire to be with Chriſt, draws me to long to depart hence.' His humility was ſuch that he called himſelf an unprofitable ſervant: a dry tree, from whom no good had come either to himſelf or others. He died Aug. 20. anno Chriſti 1153. and in the 63d year of his age.

He accompanied the biſhop of Huſſia, the pope's legat, to Thouloufe, purpoſely to root out thoſe whom he called heretics, but indeed were the true ſervants of Chriſt: and being too facile and miſinformed himſelf, he miſreported their opinions and doctrines, ſhewing himſelf the ground-factor for two popes, viz. Innocent II. and Eugenius III. One Adam, a canon regular, made this epitaph on him;

Clarae sunt valles, sed claris vallibus Abbas
Clarior, his clarum nomen in orbe dedit.
Clarus avis, clarus meritis, & clarus honore,
Claruit ingenio, at Religione magis.
Mors est clara, cinis clarus, clarumque sepulchrum,
Clarior exultat spiritus ante Deum.

He had many opinions differing from the church of Rome: as that there were but two sacraments: denied transubstantiation: that the wicked receive not Christ's flesh. That we are justified by the imputation of Christs righteousness. That man's righteousness justifieth not before God. That we might be assured of our salvation. Denied works of supererogation, free-will. Would not have traditions obstinately defended nor superstitiously observed. Complained that popes and bishops were the greatest persecutors of Christ, &c.'

He used to say, 'Ambition is a gilded misery, a secret poison, a hidden plague, the engineer of deceit, the mother of hypocrisy, the parent of envy, the original of vices, the moth of holiness, the blinder of hearts, turning medicines into maladies, and remedies into diseases. Ever when he came to the church door, he used to say thus to himself, stay here all my worldly thoughts, and all vanity, that I may entertain heavenly meditations.

His works are well known being bound up together in one volume.

The Life of Peter Lombard, who flourished anno Christi, 1196.

Peter Lombard was born at Navaria, afterwards made bishop of Paris, was cotemporary with Gratian; and as Gratian gathered canons, so this Peter collected sentences out of Ambrose, Hilary, Augustine, Cassiodore, and Remigius, and out of them, with some addition of his own, compiled his books. He wrote comentaries on the Psalms, and Paul's epistles: he was called The master of the sentences; in respect of them all the famous school men that followed him are called but scholars; and when they are named together, they are thus cited, The master and his scholars. He died the thirteenth of the kalends of August, anno Christi 1164. He lyeth entombed at Paris, in the church of St. Marcellus, with this epitaph:

Here lyeth Peter Lombard, B. B. of Paris, who compoled the books of sentences, and the glosses of the Psalms and epistles.

His chiefest works were his four books of sentences: whereof,

The first book contains the sentences of the fathers, concerning the trinity and unity of God.

The second book contains the sentences of the fathers, concerning the creation of the world, especially of the creation of angels and men; and concerning the grace of God.

The third is concerning the incarnation of the word, and of virtues and vices.

The fourth is concerning the sacraments and the last things.

By which book appears that the popery of those times, and this of our days, is much different; and that many things which in his time passed for sound divinity, is now cried out against as Calvinism and heresy, and will not be endured, either in their schools or pulpits.

Some of his sayings were, there can no good dwell in us that cannot will good: nor can we perfect good that cannot desire good. There are in us evil concupiscences and desires, which are the devils weapons, whereby when God forsakes us, he over-throws us, and gives our souls a deadly wound. God condemns none before he sins, nor crowns any before he overcomes. Let none glory in the gifts of preachers, in that they edify more by them: for they are not authors of grace, but ministers. The instruction of words is not so powerful, as the exhortation of works: for in vain they teach well, neglect to do well, they shall hardly profit their audience.

The Life of Alexander Hales, who died anno Christi, 1270.

Alexander of Hales was born at Hales in Glocestershire, carefully educated; of an excellent wit; and very industrious He travelled into other countries; read a long time in Paris; he made there the Sum of Divinity, divided into four parts: a great school-divine, and was called Doctor irrefragabilis. He was master to Bonaventure, and Thomas Aquinas: he writ a most copious and notable sum of theology, by the command of pope Innocent IV. He wrote marginal notes upon the Old and New Testament, and commented upon most of the bible. His life was full of charity and labour. He died anno Christi 1245.

His sayings, A soul patient when wrongs are offered, is like a man with a sword in one hand, and salve in the other; could wound, but will heal.

What the eye is to the body, faith is to the soul; it is good for direction if it be kept well; and as flies hurt the eye, so little sins and ill thoughts the soul.

Covetousness deserves the hate of all, for six reasons: 1. It is a sin against nature, making the soul terrene, which should be celestial. 2. For the many curses against it in the word, wo to them that join house to house, &c. 3. For the many evils it subjects us to: it is the root of all evil. 4. It makes a man a fool: O fool, this night, &c. 5. It causes strifes: from whence are strifes, &c. 6. It brings men into snares which drown in perdition.

Every lie is odious, but that most, which is against points of faith: as to say, Christ was not born of the virgin, &c. Faith must be defended, not opposed.

An humble man is a good tree; the more full of fruit the branches are, the lower they bend themselves.

The Life of Bonaventure, who died anno Christi, 1274.

Bonaventure, was born in Etruria in Italy, of noble and devout parents; he was of a winning countenance, very studious, and a great follower of Alexander Hales. He engraved in his study that saying of our Lord, Learn of me, for I am meek, &c. and to keep his mind from swelling, he would sweep rooms, wash vessels, make beds, &c. He was very cheerful in ministring to the poor; and when he met with any persons that were troubled in mind, he would not leave them till they found comfort.

He was much in meditation and prayer: in preaching he sought to inflame the hearts of his hearers: his words were not inflantia; but inflammantia, not high swelling, but inflaming. He hated idleness: read over the whole body of the fathers, and out of them made that famous piece that he calls his Pharetra. He wrote two bibles out with his own hand, and had most of them by heart.

After three years study in Paris he was chosen divinity-reader there. He was called doctor Seraphicus, was present at the council of Lions, where having spent himself in pious actions and painful studies, he died anno Christi 1274. and of his age 53.

The Life of Aquinas, who died anno Christi 1274.

Thomas Aquinas was born in Italy, not far from Naples, anno Christi 1223. and was bred in the monastery of Cassine; he was humble, modest, grave, industrious, and witty; zealous, and frequent in prayer.

He afterwards taught the sciences, in Paris. Rome, Bononia, and Naples. He was always either at his book, disputations or meditations: insomuch that supping at court with Lewis the French king, whilst others were discoursing of pleasant matters, he was so deep in his meditions, that forgetting himself, he struck the table with his hand, saying Jam contra Manichaeos confutatum est, That now the Manichees were foiled. He was a great contemner of worldly honours and wealth: when promotions were offered, his usual answer was, Chrysostomi commenta-

rium in Matthæum mallem, I had rather have Chryſoſtom's commentary on Matthew. In teaching, he framed his ſpeech to the peoples capacity: in reproofs, he hated the vice, but ſpared the perſon. He died as he was going from Naples to a council at Lyons, being called thither by pope Gregory the X. anno Chriſti 1274. in the fiftieth year of his age. He was called doctor Angelicus.

He uſed to ſay, 'That a day will come when fair dealing ſhall be found a jewel: when a good conſcience ſhall be better than a good purſe; for then the judge will not be put off with fair words, nor drawn aſide with hope of reward; and, make much of time, eſpecially in that weighty matter of ſalvation. O how much would he that now lies frying in hell rejoice if he might have but the leaſt moment of time wherein he might get God's favour! and, the young man hath death at his back, the old man before his eyes: and that's the more dangerous enemy that purſues thee, than that which marches up towards thy face: remembring that though God promiſe forgiveneſs to repentant ſinners, yet he doth not promiſe that they ſhall have to morrow to repent in.

His works are many, which are well known.

The Life of JOHN WICKLIEF, who died Anno Chriſti 1384.

JOHN WICKLIEF an Engliſh man born, famous both for life and learning, under king Edward the III. anno Chriſti 1371. was brought up in Merton college in Oxford, profited exceedingly in the knowlege of the arts, and ſchool-divinity, every one admiring both his carriage and abilities. He was divinity reader in Oxford, and alſo preferred to a paſtoral charge there, in which he took great pains, and proteſted that his chief end and purpoſe, was to call back the church from her idolatry, eſpecially in the matter of the ſacrament.

After he had now a long time profeſſed divinity in Oxford, perceiving the true doctrine of Chriſt's goſpel to be adulterated, and defiled with ſo many filthy inventions of biſhops, ſects of monks, and errors, with many ſecret ſighs bewailing the general ignorance of the Chriſtian world, he could no longer ſuffer, nor endure the ſame, whereupon he reſolved to do his utmoſt endeavour for the reformation thereof: but withal foreſeeing how dangerous this attempt would be, for that ſuch things as by long uſe and cuſtom had been rooted in mens minds, could not ſuddenly be eradicated and pulled out, he judged it fitteſt to attempt the ſame by little and little. Whereupon he firſt aſſailed his adverſaries by logical and metaphyſical queſtions, and having made way hereby, he at length came to the matter of the ſacraments, and other abuſes of the church.

But this bile could not be touched without great grief and pain to the whole world: for firſt the rabble of monks and begging fryars were enraged againſt him, who (as ſo many hornets) aſſaulted him on every ſide: after them the prieſts, and laſtly the archbiſhop Simon Sudbury took him in hand, who deprived him from his benefice which he had in Oxford: yet being befriended and ſupported by the king, he remained there ſtill till about the year 1377. But the king growing old and infirm, and his ſon called Edward the black prince being now dead, a parliament was conveened, whereing twelve ſage and diſcreet lords and peers were choſen to manage the affairs of the ſtate (ſix at one time, and ſix at another) who remained for a certain ſpace in that employment: but they afterwards being removed, the whole government of the realm under the king was devolved upon John of Gaunt duke of Lancaſter. This John was a great friend to Wicklief: whereupon to diſgrace him, the biſhop of Wincheſter reported that the ſaid John was not king Edward's ſon; nor of the queen, who being in travel at Gaunt, had no ſon, but a daughter, which was overlaid by the mother in bed: whereupon the queen, fearing the king's diſpleaſure, cauſed a man child of a woman of Flanders, born the ſame day with her own, to be ſecretly brought to her, whom ſhe brought up, and is now called duke of Lancaſter; and this, (as the biſhop affirmed) the queen told him upon her death bed under the ſeal of confeſſion; yet withal enjoining him if the kingdom were like to fall to him, to reveal it, ſo that a falſe heir might not be king; which ſlanderous report of the wicked biſhop, as it favoured of a contumelious lie; ſo many apprehended that it proceeded from his zeal to uphold his popiſh religion; the foreſaid duke favouring Wicklief, and thereby declared himſelf to be a profeſſed enemy to their ſuperſtitious practiſes.

The duke being juſtly incenſed againſt the biſhop for this foul ſlander, ſo perſecuted him in parliament, that he was condemned, and deprived of all his temporal goods; he was alſo inhibited from coming within twenty miles of the court: but ſhortly after the clergy made great tuit in the parliament in his behalf: and when a ſubſidy was aſked in the king's name of the clergy, the biſhops complained grievouſly for the lack of their brother of Wincheſter, and enforced the archbiſhop to ſend for him from Wincheſter, to appear at the convocation of the clergy, which he gladly did, and was joyfully received by the biſhops; and by means of one Alice Perris, a wicked harlot, which had bewitched the king's heart, he was reſtored to his temporalities again.

In the mean time the duke of Lancaſter ſent for Wicklief from Oxford, who had now proceeded ſo far as to teach, that in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper the accidents of bread and wine remained not without the ſubſtance: proving his aſſertion by the authority of ſcriptures and the ancient fathers, and withal rejecting ſuch as had written upon that argument ſince anno 1000. ſaying that after that time Satan was looſed, and men were led into many errors. For theſe things the biſhop hated him exceedingly; yet by the favour of the duke of Lancaſter, and of Henry lord Percy, he was preſerved from their rage and fury, till anno Chriſti 1376. at which time they had prevailed with their archbiſhop Simon Sudbury, who had before deprived him, and prohibited him to meddle any more in thoſe matters, to ſend forth his citation to have him brought before them. The duke having notice hereof, and fearing that he being but one, ſhould be too weak for ſuch a multitude, ſent for four batchelors of divinity to join with him; and for more ſurety, when the day of his appearance was come, himſelf with the lord Percy, marſhal of England went along with him.

As they went along, they encouraged him not to fear the faces of the biſhops, who (ſay they) are all unlearned in compariſon of you, neither be you troubled at the concourſe of the people for we will defend you from them.

Being thus encouraged, Wicklief approached Paul's church, where multitudes of perſons were aſſembled to hear what ſhould be ſpoken and done, inſomuch as the lord Marſhal could ſcarce make way in the crowd: whereupon Courtney the biſhop of London ſeeing what ſtir he made amongſt the people, ſaid to him, 'If I had known what maſteries you would have plaid amongſt the people, I would have kept you out of this place:' at which ſpeech the duke being offended, ſaid that he would keep ſuch maſtery there, though he ſaid nay. When they came to the place where the archbiſhops ſat, Wicklief preſented himſelf before them to know what ſhould be laid to his charge. Then the lord Percie ſpeaking to him, bade him ſit down, for that having many things to anſwer to, he had need have a ſoft ſeat: whereupon the biſhop of London growing into a great fume, ſaid, he ſhould not ſit there, neither ſaid he, is it according to law or reaſon, that he that is cited to appear before his ordinary ſhould ſit down during the time of his anſwer, but ſhould ſtand.

This kindled ſuch a fire betwixt them, the one rating and reviling the other, that the people b gan all to be on a hurry: then the duke taking the lord Percie's part, gave ſome haſty words to the biſhop; but neither did the biſhop ſpare him one jot, returning rebukes for rebukes, ſo that the duke was aſhamed that the biſhop ſhould out rail him, telling him that he would take a courſe to bring down his pride, and of all the prelates in England: hereupon the Londoners cried out, that they would rather loſe their lives than ſuffer their biſhop to be abuſed: ſo that all things being in a confuſion, the aſſembly was diſſolved for that time: and the duke with the lord Percie returning to the parliament, that day a bill was put up in the name of the king by the lord Thomas of Woodſtock, (another of the king's ſons) and the lord Percie, that London ſhould be no more governed by a mayor, but by a captain, as formerly it had been, and that the marſhal of England ſhould have all the power in taking the arreſts in the city, as he had in other cities.

This bill one John Philpot, a burgeſs for London, ſtoutly oppoſed; and the next day the Londoners aſſembled themſelves together in council to conſider what to do about it: and whilſt they were in conſultation, came in two lords, the lord Fitz-Walter, and the lord Guy Brian, whom the vulgar ſort taking to be ſpies, were ready to flie upon them, till they were enforced to ſwear that they came for no harm towards them; and that if it proved otherwiſe they would be content to forfeit all their goods and poſſeſſions in the city. Then did the lord Fitz-Walter tell them of his love to them, and of his care to preſerve their liberties, which ſaid he, 'If you do not ſpeedily look to, and prevent, you will loſe the ſame; for at this time the lord Marſhal hath one of your citizens in priſon in his houſe,' &c. This was no ſooner ſpoken, but the raſh citizens ran to their houſes, armed themſelves, and going to the lord Percie's houſe, brake open his gates, reſcued the priſoner, took the ſtocks and burnt them in midſt of the city, ſearched and ranſacked his houſe for the lord himſelf; whom if they had found, they would certainly have ſlain: and when they found him not, they tore and cut his rich beds and hangings in pieces; and then ſuppoſing him to be with the duke, they ran to the Savoy, were though they were diſappointed of their cruel purpoſe, yet they took the duke's arms, and hung them up in a reproachful manner in the midſt of the city, as if he had been a traitor: they alſo ſo wounded a prieſt that ſpake in his defence, that he died within a few days after, and meeting one of the duke's men with his arms hanging in a plate on his breaſt, they pulled him off his horſe, pulled the arms from him, and had ſlain the man but that he was ſpeedily reſcued by the mayor.

But theſe outrages created much trouble to the Londoners, which being beſide my purpoſe, I ſhall leave the reader to ſearch them out in the chronicles of thoſe times.

Shortly after the old king Edward died, and his grandſon Richard the II. ſucceeded him: upon which change the biſhops taking notice that the duke and the lord Percie had given over their offices, living privately at their own houſes without meddling with ſtate affairs, they thought it a fit time to revenge themſelves upon John Wicklief: whereupon they cauſed theſe articles to be gathered and drawn up out of his ſermons againſt him.

1. That the holy euchariſt after the conſecration is not the very body and blood of Chriſt, but figuratively.

2. That the church of Rome is not the head of all other churches in the world: nor that Peter had any more power given him by Chriſt, than any other of the apoſtles.

3. That the pope of Rome hath no more power of the keys than any other preſbyter.

4. That the lords temporal may lawfully take away the temporalities of the church-men offending habitualiter.

5. That the goſpel is of itſelf a ſufficient rule both of faith and manners without any other rule.

6. That neither the pope, nor any other prelate ought to have priſons of their own wherein to puniſh offenders, &c.

Theſe with ſome others the biſhops gathered out of his ſermons and writings, which they ſent to pope Gregory, who condemned them for heretical and erroneous by twenty three cardinals; and withal ſent his bull to Oxford, rebuking them ſharply for ſuffering Wicklief's doctrine ſo long to take root amongſt them, and for not wholly eradicating the ſame; which bull being exhibited by the pope's meſſenger to the proctors and maſters of the univerſity, they deliberated long amongſt themſelves whether they ſhould receive it with honour, or reject it with contempt. The pope alſo at the ſame time ſent letters to the archbiſhop Sudbury, and biſhop Courtney of London, commanding them to apprehend and impriſon Wicklief, and to admoniſh the king and nobles of England, that they ſhould not give any credit to John Wicklief or his doctrine in any wiſe. He wrote alſo at the ſame time to the king, deſiring him to aſſiſt the biſhops in the apprehenſion and impriſonment of John Wicklief.

Theſe letters ſo encouraged the biſhops, that they reſolved to proceed againſt him in their provincial council, all fear or favour being ſet apart, and that no perſon neither high nor low ſhould hinder them, neither would they be induced to favour him neither by intreaty, threatnings, nor reward; but that they would proceed roundly with him. tho' it ſhould be to the hazard of their lives. But it pleaſed God by a ſmall matter to confound and overthrow their devices, notwithſtanding all their proud brags and policies: For the day of examination being come, there came in a courtier amongſt them called Lewis Clifford, a man of no great birth, and commanded them that they ſhould not proceed to any definitive ſentence againſt John Wicklief, wherewith the biſhops were ſo amazed and creſt-faln, that they became as mute men, not having one word to anſwer.

And thus it pleaſed God by his providence thus once more to deliever Mr Wicklief out of their cruel hands: and one that writes this ſtory ſaith further, that whilſt the biſhops were ſitting in the chappel at Lambeth upon John Wicklief, not only the citizens of London, but (ſaith he) the vile abjects of the city were ſo bold as to intreat for him, and to ſtop the biſhops in their proceedings. And thus was Wicklief diſmiſſed, the biſhops charging him that he ſhould preach no more ſuch doctrine to the offence and hurt of the lay people: yet being departed, he ceaſed not to proceed in his godly purpoſe, going up and down bare footed, and in a frize gown, endeavouring by his miniſtry ſtill to edify and profit the church as formerly he had done. And God's providence ſo ordered it, that about the ſame time pope Gregory the 11th died; whereupon enſued ſuch a ſchiſm in the church of Rome between two popes, and others ſucceeding after them, that it continued 39. years, even to the council of Conſtance.

About the ſame time alſo, or ſhortly after, there aroſe a cruel commotion of the commons under Jack Straw, where the rude multitude taking Simon Sudbury archbiſhop of Canterbury beheaded him, whom William Courtney biſhop of London ſucceeded, who was very zealous and diligent againſt the hereſies of Wicklief, (as he called them.)

Alſo in the year 1380. William Barton being vicechancelor of Oxford, called together eight monaſtical doctors, and four others, and having the conſent of others of that fraternity, he ſet forth an edict under the common ſeal, threatning all under a grievous penalty, if they ſhould be ſo hardy as to aſſociate themſelves with any of the faults of Wicklief: and to Wicklief himſelf he threatned the greater excommunication and impriſonment, both to him and his favourers, unleſs within three days after Canonical warning they repented and ammended.

Wicklief underſtanding this, reſolved to forſake the pope, and all his clergy, and to appeal to the king: but the duke of Lancaſter being now inveigled by the biſhops, interpoſed, forbidding him not to attempt any ſuch thing, but rather to ſubmit to his ordinary: Wicklief finding himſelf hereby in this great ſtrait, was forced to make a confeſſion of his doctrine, and therein to qualify his aſſertions after ſuch a ſort that thereby he aſſwaged the rigor of his enemies.

Anno 1382. Archbiſhop Courtney appointed a convocation to be held at London, principally againſt Wicklief, wherein this memorable accident fell out: When they were all gathered together at the Gray-Fryars in London, juſt at the very inſtant when they were beginning their buſineſs againſt Wicklief, there fell out a wonderful and terrible earthquake thro' all England, whereupon divers of the Suffragans being frighted with the terror of it, thought good to leave off their further proceeding therein: yet did the archbiſhop carry on his deſign, declaring ſome of Wicklief's doctrines to be heretical, others erroneous, and others irreligious and ſeditious, and not conſonant to the doctrine of the church of Rome; and not content herewith, he ſo prevailed with the young king, that he procured letters patents to be directed from the king to himſelf, wherein are theſe words;

'Foraſmuch as the archbiſhop of Canterbury hath made his ſupplication to us for the coercion, and due caſtigation of

of all ſuch as ſhall henceforth obſtinately preach and maintain any of thoſe concluſions which in the late convocation have been adjudged heretical, &c. requeſting that we would vouchſafe to put to the arm and helping hand of our kingly power: we therefore moved by the zeal of the catholic faith, whereof we are, and will be defenders, and being unwilling that any ſuch hereſies ſhould ſpring up within our dominions: give, and grant licenſe and authority by theſe preſents unto the aforeſaid archbiſhop and his ſuffragans, to arreſt, and impriſon either in their own priſons, or elſewhere, all and every ſuch perſon and perſons as ſhall either privily, or openly preach, or maintain the aforeſaid concluſions, &c. further, charging and commanding all our leigh men, miniſters and ſubjects, upon their fidelity and allegiance neither to favour, counſel nor help ſuch preachers or maintainers of the aforeſaid concluſions, upon pain of forfeiting all that they have; but to obey, and humbly to attend upon the archbiſhop and his ſuffragans in the execution of theſe preſents,' &c.

The like letters the king wrote alſo to the vice chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, requiring him to give notice, that none ſhould be ſo bold as to entertain Mr John Wicklief, or any of his followers into their houſes, or to communicate with them; which if any did, that he ſhould baniſh them the univerſity and town of Oxford, till they ſhould prove their innocency before the archbiſhop of Canterbury; yea, this young king, preſſed by the violent importunity of the archbiſhop, wrote another letter to the vicechancellor and proctors of the univerſity, ſtraitly charging and commanding them to make a general inquiſition through the whole univerſity, as well for Wicklief and his followers, as for all others which were ſuſpected to be maintainers, receivers or defenders of thoſe perſons, or their opinions any manner of way, and all ſuch to apprehend and expel the univerſity, and to ſend them up to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be further proceeded againſt by him: as alſo to attach and ſeize upon all their books, and to ſend them to the ſaid archbiſhop: and this to do as they would avoid the forfeiting of all the liberties and privileges of the univerſity, &c. John Wicklief was hereupon either baniſhed or retired for a while to ſome ſecret place; but ere long he returned to his perſonage of Lutterworth in Liecеſterſhire, where after all theſe ſtorms, he at laſt died in peace, anno Chriſti, 1384.

He wrote very many books, many of which were burnt at Oxford, anno Chriſti 1410. Æneas Sylvius writes that Subincus archbiſhop of Prague burnt two hundred volumes of his, excellently written, richly covered and adorned with boſſes of gold: one that had all his works, wrote that they were as big as the works of St. Auguſtine.

Mr Wicklief received his firſt knowlege of the truth from one fryar Rainard Lollard, who brought the doctrine of the Waldenſes into England, and from whom his diſciples were called Lollards. Mr Wicklief was an eloquent man, and ſo profound a ſcholar, that he drew the hearts of many noble perſonages to affect and favour him; whereby he was ſheltred from the rage of the popiſh clergy, till pope Gregory the XI. raiſed up a perſecution by the monks inquiſitors againſt him.

All his books were commanded to be burnt; but he had before enlightned ſo great a number, who kept his books carefully, maugre all the diligence of his adverſaries; ſo that they could never wholly deprive the church of them. For the more they laboured by horrible threats, and death itſelf, to hinder the knowlege and reading of them, the more were many kindled in their affections to read them with ardency.

He wrote above a hundred volumes againſt Antichriſt and the church of Rome. Multos præterea in Philoſophia, multos quibus St. Scripturam interpretatus eſt, edidit: Quorum Catalogum videre eſt apud Baleum in ſuis Centuriis. Tranſtulit etiam Wiclevus in Anglicum ſermonem Biblia, adhibitis præfationibus, & argumentis cuique libro ſuis. Vertit & Libro, 12. Clementis, Lanthonienſis Eccleſiæ Preſbyteri, De concordia Evangeliſtarum, cum multis veterum Doctorum Tractatibus.

He was a great enemy to the ſwarms of begging fryars, with whom it was harder to make war than with the pope himſelf. He denied the pope to be the head of the church, and pronounced him to be the Antichriſt: he confuted and condemned his doctrine about bulls, indulgences, maſſes, &c. He affirmed the ſcripture to be the ſupreme judge of controverſies, condemned tranſubſtantiation, &c. He was a painful and faithful preacher under king Edward the III. who always favoured and protected him againſt the rage of his adverſaries: by his means the pope loſt in England his power of ordaining biſhops, the tenth of benefices, and peter-pence; whereupon Polidore Virgil calls him an infamous heretic.

He was buried at his parſonage of Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire. His dead body being digged up 51 years after: viz. 1428. by the command of pope Martin the V. and the council of Sene, was burnt: and thus he ſuffered their cruelty after death, whoſe cruelty he had preached againſt in his life. He wrote above two hundred volumes, moſt of which were burnt by the archbiſhop of Prague.

This Mr Wicklief, a courageous witneſs of the truth, was firſt fellow of Merton college, and afterwards Mr of Baliol college in Oxford.

In his book entitled, The Path-way to perfect Knowlege, he ſheweth what pains he had taken in tranſlating the Bible into Engliſh. How he had gotten many old Latin Bibles. For the late books (ſaith he) are very corrupt. And he employed many learned men to aſſiſt him in his fourth tranſlation of it.

He taught, that the truth of the goſpel ſufficeth to ſalvation without obſerving the legal ceremonies. He urged Chriſtian men and women, young and old to ſtudy the ſcriptures frequently, eſpecially the New Teſtament, which (ſaid he) 'is full of authority, and gives underſtanding to the ſimple, eſpecially in all points needful to ſalvation, &c. And though kings and lords know no more of the ſcriptures, but what is written of Jehoſaphat, Hezekiah, and Joſiah, yet may they learn thence ſufficiently to live well; to govern their people by the law of God: to eſchew all pride, idolatry, and other ſins.

But alas! alas! alas! (ſaith he) whereas king Jehoſaphat ſent his princes, prieſts, and levites to teach God's law openly in every city; Chriſtian lords, now a days, ſend to all their leige people, the pope's pardons (which are open lies, granting many hundred years pardon after doom't day) to be preached generally in their dominions! and if any be found to ſpeak againſt the errors of Antichriſt, &c. he ſhall be impriſoned, and proceeded againſt as a traitor to God, and his prince. And whereas king Hezekiah buſied himſelf in cleanſing God's houſe, &c. Chriſtian lords defile the ſanctuary of God by bringing in Symoniacal clerks, that are full of covetouſneſs and hereſy, of hypocriſy, and malice, ſeeking to hinder God's law from being known, and kept, and freely preached: yea, ſome of theſe great ones keep many prelates, and curates in their courts, and employ them in ſecular offices, which is againſt the laws both of God, and men, &c.

'Whereupon, its much to be feared, that kings and lords have ſinned with Manaſſe: God gave them to repent with Manaſſe. Now in England a man may be protected againſt the perſecution of prelates, if he will ſwear needleſs, falſe, and unadviſed oaths, as by the bones, nails, ſides, and other members of Chriſt. If he will be proud and leacherous, and not meddle with God's law, or reprove ſin, &c. But if a man abſtain from needleſs oaths and unlawful; and, out of charity to mens ſouls, ſhall reprove ſin, this is cauſe enough for prelates, and ſome lords to ſlander them, and to call them Lollards, heretics, raiſers of ſtrife, and treaſon againſt the king: how much blood many lords have ſhed in the wars, by the inſtigation of prelates, their confeſſors, and preachers, it paſſeth man's wit to ſet down. They alſo ſlay poor Chriſtians by withdrawing their alms from them, which they gave to ſtocks, and ſtones, and to rich clerks, and feigned religious perſons: they kneel and pray to dead images, and yet beat and ſlay Chriſtian men. What honouring of God is this?' &c.

But the ſchiſm of the anti popes gave ſome reſpite unto Wicklief, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury was ſlain in a diſſention between the nobility and the commons. But his ſucceſſor (William Courtney) was more violent againſt him than the former, and prevailed with the king, to baniſh him. He procured an act alſo in the fifth year of this young king (Richard II.) for the impriſoning of heretics, as he called them.

Mr Wicklief in the time of his baniſhment, wrote to pope Urbane, a confeſſion of his faith, wherein he affirmed, That ſeeing the biſhop of Rome called himſelf Chriſt's vicar, of all men he was moſt bound to follow the laws of Chriſt in his goſpel; ſeeing that the greateſt amongſt Chriſt's diſciples conſiſted not in worldly honours, but in their exact imitation of the life of Chriſt and his doctrine. He alſo therein adviſed the pope to leave all temporal rule to the ſecular powers, as Chriſt did; and he prayed him, and his cardinals, to imitate the lord Jeſus, and faithfully to inſtruct his flock.

But the pope of Rome was ſo buſily employed againſt the pope at Avignion, that neither of them had leiſure to attend ſuch matters, and ſo Wicklief returned from his baniſhment. And ſhortly after he fell ſo ſick that there was little hope of his recovery, whereupon the fryars ſent four of their order to wiſh, and urge him, before his death, to retract, and recant his former errors. And when they had delivered their meſſage, he deſired ſome of his friends to ſet him up in his bed, and then he ſaid with aloud voice, 'I ſhall not die, but live to declare the moſt wicked acts of the fryars;' and accordingly he recovered of his diſeaſe, and wrote a treatiſe againſt their order, which is mentioned by doctor James in his book, called, Wicklief's conformity to the church of England.

Mr. Wicklief was a ſecular preſbyter, a great enemy to the idle and luxurious monks; but highly honoured and eſteemed by our king Edward the III. and his nobles, for his excellent learning, piety and prudence. He was ſent by the king among other nobles, as ambaſſadors, to the duke of Millane, to treat about a marriage, between Lionel, our king's ſon, and the duke of Millane's daughter.

He wrote about fifty books: ſome of them of other arts, but moſt of them of divinity. Many of which are extant in the king's majeſties library at St. James's: others of them in Bodley's library in Oxford, and others in other libraries.

Doctor James, who printed ſome of Wicklief's works at Oxford, wrote an apology in his behalf, wherein he ſaith, That he was an orthodox divine, and that he agreed in moſt of the articles of religion, with the preſent church of England.

He was an eloquent man, and a profound ſcholar, whereby he won the hearts of many noble perſonages, as of John a Gaunt duke of Lancaſter, Henry lord Percy, the earl of Saliſbury lord chancellor of England, and Lewis Gifford, &c. whereby he was much ſheltred from the rage and malice of his enemies, the popiſh clergy.

The Life of JOHN HUSS, who died Anno Chriſti 1515.

JOHN HUSS was born at a little town called Huſſinets about 18 miles from Prague in Bohemia under the Hercynian wood, of mean but religious parents, who carefully trained him up in religion and learning, and profited much at ſchool, he went to the univerſity of Prague: and whilſt he was ſtudent there, he met with our Wicklief's books, from whence he firſt took light and courage to profeſs the truth.

Anno Chriſti 1393. he commenced batchelor of arts with good approbation of the whole univerſity: and anno 1396. he commenced maſter of arts, about which time two godly noble men of Prague built the church of Bethlehem; and anno 1400. Mr. Huſs was choſen paſtor thereof, who fed his people with the bread of life, and not with the pope's decrees, and other human inventions.

The year after he was choſen dean of the univerſity, and anno 1409. by the conſent of the whole univerſity he was choſen rector of it. He continued in the exerciſe of his miniſtry with admirable zeal and diligence, and faithfulneſs about the ſpace of 12 years, preaching and inſtructing his people in the principles of divinity, which he confirmed by the holy ſcriptures, and adorned by an exemplary and blameleſs life. He vigorouſly oppoſed the pope's proceedings, whereupon the devil envying the peace and progreſs of the goſpel, ſtirred up pope Alexander the V. againſt him, who cited him to Rome to anſwer to ſuch articles as ſhould be laid in againſt him; whereupon Huſs ſent his proctors to Rome, who appeared for him, anſwered the charge, and cleared his innocency; yet did the pope and his cardinals condemn him for an heretic, and excommunicate him; which cauſed the popiſh clergy, and ſome of the barons of Bohemia to oppoſe Huſs, being thus excommunicated; and the king Winceſlaus baniſhed him, but he was entertained in the country, and protected by the lord of the ſoil at Huſſinets, where he preached in the pariſh church, and ſome places adjacent, confuting the popiſh doctrine of merit of works, and againſt the pride, idleneſs, cruelty and avarice of the Roman court and clergy, multitudes of perſons reſorting to his miniſtry.

Sometimes alſo he repaired to his church of Bethlehem, and preached there. But upon the pope's death, the cardinals being divided, choſe three popes, whereupon there was a council held at Conſtance, anno Chriſti 1414. Unto which council the emperor Sigiſmund commanded Huſs to come, giving his ſafe conduct for his coming, and return.

October 15. John Huſs began his journey towards Conſtance being accompanied with two noblemen, John, lord de Chlum, and Mr. Wincelat de Duba, and their followers: and Mr. Huſs relying on the goodneſs of his cauſe, the clearneſs of conſcience, and the emperor's ſafe conduct, with a cheerful mind and undaunted ſpirit went to Conſtance, and in his journey ſet up writings in every city, the tenor whereof was this; "Mr. John Huſs batchelor of divinity, goeth now to the council of Conſtance, there to declare his faith which he hath hitherto holden, and even at this preſent doth hold, and by God's grace will hold and defend to the death; therefore as he hath manifeſted through all the kingdom of Bohemia by his letters and intimations, willing before his departure thence to have ſatisfied and given an account of his faith unto every man which ſhould object or lay any thing againſt him in the general convocation held in the archbiſhop of Prague's court: ſo alſo he doth manifeſt and ſignify, that if there be any man in this noble and imperial city that can impute error or hereſy to him, that he would prepare himſelf to come unto the council; foraſmuch as the ſaid Mr. John Huſs is ready to ſatisfy every man at the ſaid council which ſhall lay any thing to his charge, as touching his faith.

In all cities as he paſſed by, eſpecially when he entred into Germany, a great number of people reſorted to him, and he was every where kindly entertained, eſpecially by the citizens and burgeſſes, that he confeſſed in a certain epiſtle that he found in no place ſo great enemies as in Bohemia: and when he came to Noremberg, certain merchants that went before having given notice of his coming, almoſt all the prieſts that were in the city came to him, deſiring him that they might talk with him in private, to whom he anſwered that he deſired rather to declare his mind openly than in hugger mugger, and ſo from dinner time till night he ſpake before the prieſts, ſenators and many citizens, inſomuch that they all had him in ſingular eſtimation and reverence. One of his great adverſaries Staniſlaus Znoma, a Bohemian, as he was going towards Conſtance to accuſe him, was ſtricken by God with a great impoſthume whereof he died.

When Mr. Huſs came to Conſtance, he was ſent for to appear before ſome cardinals to give an account of his doctrine; but he told them that he came to do it before all the council, yet if they would force him to do it before them, he doubted not but Chriſt would ſtrengthen him to chuſe death for his glorious ſake, rather than to deny the truth, which he had learned out of the holy ſcriptures.

After examination they committed him to a filthy priſon, where, by reaſon of the ſtink, he fell ſick and was like to die: in the mean time his adverſaries preferred articles againſt him, wherein they had forged many things of their own heads, wreſting, and perverting his godly and orthodox ſayings to a ſiniſter ſenſe that they might have whereof to accuſe him: and thereupon deſired of the council that he might be condemned. Mr. Huſs hearing of theſe their malicious proceedings, moved that he might have an advocate, but that was denied him. Whilſt he lay there in priſon, when he had in ſome meaſure regained his health, he wrote ſundry books. From that priſon he was removed by the biſhop of Conſtance to a caſtle on the other other ſide of the Rhine, where in the day time he was ſo laden with fetters on his legs that he could ſcarce go: and every night he was faſtened by the hands up to a rack againſt the wall: hereupon many noblemen of Bohemia petitioned for his releaſe, at leaſt upon bail, but that was denied.

The ſum of the nobles petition was this; 'That whereas Mr. John Huſs is freely of his own accord come to Conſtance under the emperor's ſafe conduct, againſt all right and reaſon he is grievouſly impriſoned before he is heard, and at this preſent, is tormented miſerably with hunger, thirſt, and fetters: though formerly at the council of Piſa, held anno Chriſti 1410. the heretics which were condemned, were ſuffered to remain at their liberty, and to depart home freely; but Mr. John Huſs, neither convicted, nor condemned, no nor ſo much as once heard, is taken and impriſoned, when as neither king nor any prince elector, nor any ambaſſador from any univerſity is yet come or preſent; and though the Lord our king, together with the nobles and lords here preſent, have moſt inſtantly deſired and required that his ſafe conduct might not be violated, and that the ſaid John Huſs might be openly heard, being ready to render a reaſon of his faith; and if he be convicted obſtinately to affirm or maintain any thing againſt the truth and the holy ſcriptures, that he is ready to amend the ſame; yet could he never obtain this: but the ſaid John Huſs, notwithſtanding all this, is moſt grievouſly oppreſſed with fetters and irons, and ſo weakened with hunger and thirſt, that it is to be feared that he will die in priſon. And although the lords of Bohemia here preſent are greatly ſcandalized with the trouble and torments of Mr. John Huſs, contrary to the king's ſafe conduct: yet hitherto they have foreborn to complain to the king that he might ſee his ſafe conduct better obſerved, and the reproach and diſhonour that is done to the kingdom of Bohemia thereby, vindicated; and indeed they ſuffer theſe things patiently, leſt by any means trouble or vexation ſhould ariſe to the ſacred council by reaſon thereof: wherefore we moſt earneſtly deſire and require your fatherhoods, that for the honour of the ſafe conduct granted by the king, and for the preſervation and encreaſe of the worthy fame and renown of the kingdom of Bohemia, and your own alſo, you will haſten the diſpatch of Mr. John Huſs his buſineſs, ſeeing he is in great danger by reaſon of his ſtrait impriſonment if you delay him any longer. And whereas we the nobles of Bohemia are informed that many ſlanderous reports are raiſed by back-biters againſt the famous kingdom of Bohemia, as that the ſacrament is carried up and down in veſſels unhallowed, that coblers do adminiſter it, and hear confeſſions, &c. We therefore require and deſire you that you will give no heed to ſuch tale bearers, who herein report untruths: alſo we require that ſuch back biters may be made known, and we doubt not eaſily to refel the falſe and frivolous ſlanders of theſe naughty perſons, that hereafter they ſhall be aſhamed to appear before the lord king and your reverences.'

But notwithſtanding this, they which were appointed for his judges, in his abſence heard his enemies, examined witneſſes againſt him: judged his doctrine not by the true touch-ſtone of God's word, but by the popiſh canons. Yet when the council would have condemned him without hearing, the emperor interpoſed, requiring that he ſhould be firſt heard; but when he was brought before them, they made ſuch a confuſed noiſe, railing upon him, that he could not ſpeak one word. The next day when he was brought before them again, there fell out ſo great an eclipſe that the ſun was almoſt wholly darkned: but when Huſs ſaw that he was like to meet with no juſtice there, he appealed from them to the pope, and from him to Chriſt, for which they derided him; but when he ſaw the cruelty of his judges, the malice of his accuſers, the falſehood of witneſſes, and the rage of the council againſt him, that breathed forth nothing but fire and fagots, he kneeled down, begging forgiveneſs for his very enemies; yet he earneſtly requeſted even with tears the council that they would convince him of any error by the word of God, and he would willingly retract it: but nothing prevailing, they proceeded to condemn and degrade him; whereupon kneeling down, he ſaid, 'Lord Jeſus Chriſt, forgive mine enemies, by whom thou knoweſt that I am falſely accuſed; forgive them I ſay for thy mercy's ſake.' In degrading him they pared off the crown of his head, and the ſkin with a pair of ſhears; and to juſtify their proceedings againſt him, becauſe the emperor had given him his ſafe conduct, the council made a decree, 'That faith was not to be kept with heretics.'

The Roman agents perſecuted him with ſuch eagerneſs, that his works were condemned to be burnt with him. When he was brought forth to be burned, they put on his head a tripple crown of paper, painted over with ugly devils: but when he ſaw it, he ſaid, My Lord Jeſus Chriſt for my ſake did wear a crown of thorns; why ſhould not I then for his ſake wear this light crown, be it never ſo ignominious? truly I will do it and that willingly. When it was ſet upon his head, the biſhops ſaid, 'Now we commit thy ſoul unto the devil:' But I, ſaid John Huſs, (lifting up his eyes towards heaven) do commit my ſpirit into thy hands O Lord Jeſus Chriſt, unto thee I commend my ſpirit which thou haſt redeemed. As he was going to execution, they burned his books before his face, at which he ſmiled, and ſaid unto the people, 'Think not good people that I die for any hereſy, or error, but only for the hatred and ill will of my adverſaries.' When he came to the place of execution, he kneeled down, and with his eyes towards heaven he prayed, and repeated certain pſalms, and with a merry, chearful countenance cried often, 'Into thy hands O Lord I commend my ſpirit.'

As he lifted up his head in prayer, the crown of paper fell off; but a ſoldier taking it up, ſaid, let us put it on again, that he may be burned with his maſters the devils, whom he hath ſerved. When he roſe from his knees he ſaid, 'Lord Jeſus Chriſt, aſſiſt and help me; that with a conſtant and patient mind, by thy moſt gracious help, I may bear and ſuffer this cruel and ignominious death, whereunto I am condemned for the preaching of thy moſt holy goſpel.' And as they tied his neck with a chain to the ſtake, ſmiling he ſaid, that he would willingly receive the ſame chain for Jeſus Chriſt's ſake, who he knew was bound with a far worſe chain. When the fire was kindled, he began to ſing with a loud voice, 'Jeſus Chriſt the Son of the living God have mercy upon me;' and at the third time that he repeated it, the wind drove the flame ſo in his face, that it choaked him. The heart that was found amongſt his bowels, being well beaten with ſtaves and clubs, was at laſt prick'd upon a ſharp ſtake, and roaſted at a fire till it was conſumed. His aſhes were diligently gathered up, and thrown into the river Rhine. He ſuffered martyrdom, anno Chriſti 1415.

He told them at his death, that out of the aſhes of the gooſe (for ſo Huſs in the Bohemian language ſignifies) an hundred years after God would raiſe up a ſwan in Germany, whoſe ſinging would affright all thoſe vultures: which was exactly fulfilled in Luther, juſt an hundred years after. Upon his death the Bohemians under Ziska roſe in arms, and had admirable ſucceſs againſt the emperor and the papiſts. And this pompous act of theirs had a very tragical event, the Bohemians maintaining war againſt the emperor Sigiſmund for 17. years after, wherein he ſpent abundance of treaſure, loſt many brave armies, and all gallant men: and during theſe wars a thouſand monaſteries were overthrown, many caſtles demoliſhed, and cities burnt: all which was a juſt revenging hand upon him for his perfidiouſneſs and cruelty.

Before his going to Conſtance, Mr. Huſs ſet up this epiſtle upon the gate of the king's palace.

"Unto the king's moſt excellent majeſty, the queen, and to all ſuch as are of his council, and to all other nobles and magiſtrates which are now in the king's court, I John Huſs do ſignify and publiſh, that being certainly informed that letters are come from the pope to the king's majeſty, the contents whereof are theſe: that the king ſhould extirpate all ſuch Hereticks as are lately ſprung up in his kingdom and dominions: but I truſt in God that this fame is blown abroad without any deſert; and it ſhall be our part to foreſee and take heed that neither the king's majeſty, nor the noble kingdom of Bohemia ſhall ſuffer any trouble or reproach and ſlander for my ſake. Wherefore now of late I have ſent my letters to and fro, which with with great labour and diligence I have cauſed to be ſet up openly, with this intent, that I might thereby cauſe the arch biſhop of Prague to be careful and diligent about the matter, ſignifying openly, that if there were any man in all Bohemia, which did know me to be a follower of any falſe or corrupt doctrine he ſhould appear before the archbiſhop's court, and there declare what he thought.

And for as much as there would none be found, or come forth which would accuſe me, the arch biſhop commanded me and my proctors to depart in peace. Wherefore I require and deſire the king's majeſty, which is the defender of the truth, alſo the queen and their counſellers, and all other nobles and magiſtrates, that they would give me a true teſtimonial of this matter; foraſmuch as I have oftentimes willed and attempted this, that no man hath either accuſed or moleſted me. I do it moreover to be known to all Bohemia, and all nations, that I will with the firſt be preſent at the council of Conſtance, in the preſence of the pope, and of all others that will come to that famous place; and that whoſoever hath any ſuſpicion of me that I have either taught or defended any thing contrary unto the faith of Chriſt, let him come thither alſo, and declare before the pope and all the doctors of divinity, what erroneous or falſe doctrine I have at any time maintained or holden. And if he ſhall convince me of any error, or prove that I have taught any thing contrary to the Chriſtian faith, I will not refuſe to ſuffer whatſoever puniſhment ſhall be due to an heretick: but I hope and truſt even from the bottom of my heart that God will not give the victory to unfaithful and unbelieving men which willingly kick and ſpurn againſt the truth.

At the ſame time alſo Mr. Huſs ſent his proctor to the biſhop of Nazareth, who was ordained by the pope, inquiſitor for hereſies in the city and dioceſe of Prague, requiring him that if he had found any error in him, he would declare it openly: but the ſaid biſhop in a publick aſſembly anſwered that he had often talked with John Huſs, and that he never found any thing in him but ſuch as becometh a godly and faithful man which alſo he atteſted by his letter, in writing. Shortly after alſo all the barons of Bohemia being aſſembled in the abby of St. James, the archbiſhop of Prague being preſent alſo, John Huſs preſented a ſupplication to them, wherein he moſt humbly deſired the barons to requeſt the archbiſhop, that if he did ſuſpect him for any error or hereſy, he ſhould declare it openly; for that he was ready to ſuffer correction for the ſame at the archbiſhop's hands; and that if he had found no ſuch thing in him, that then he would give him a teſtimonial thereof, that being armed therewith he might the more freely go into the council; hereupon the archbiſhop did openly confeſs before all the aſſembly, that he knew not that the ſaid John Huſs was guilty of any ſuch thing.

In another Author, I find ſome of theſe afore-mentioned paſſages more largely ſet down as followeth.

JOHN Huſs denied purgatory, auricular confeſſion, the pope's power, and indulgences; he diſproved dirges; he called prayer for the dead, a device of prieſts to get money; he ſpake alſo againſt praying to ſaints; againſt the images of God, and the ſaints; againſt confirmation and extream unction; againſt all the holy days except the Sabbath, &c. He commended John Wicklief, and openly wiſhed, that when he departed this life, his ſoul might be with the ſoul of Wicklief, whom he doubted not but to be in heaven.

Sbinco, archbiſhop of Prague ſent complaints hereof to Rome, whereupon pope Alexander directed his letters, charging the biſhop to forbid all preaching but only in cathedral churches, pariſh churches, or other ſuch conſecrated places; requiring alſo that the articles of Wicklief ſhould not be taught either privately or publicly; and that all ſhould be judged heretics that attempted the contrary. Againſt this bull John Huſs objected many things, urging, that Chriſt uſed to preach to the people on the ſea, in fields, houſes, and ſo did the apoſtles in any place: wherefore, ſaid he, from this mandate of Alexander, I appeal to the ſaid Alexander being better adviſed. Yet did the biſhop diſcharge him from preaching: and he obeyed, and went out of the city to a village called Huſs, where he was born: yet he ceaſed not from preaching, and had many auditors.

Shortly after he was again complained of to pope John, who ſent a legate to try his cauſe in Prague; but Wenceſlaus, and his queen Sophia maintained John Huſs, and himſelf appealed from the legate to the pope: and then fearing envy, more than ſuſpecting his cauſe; he ſent proctors unto Rome, of whom ſome were impriſoned for ſpeaking ſo boldly, and John Huſs was excommunicated as an hereticke.

About this time wars broke out betwixt pope Alexander, and Ladiſlaus, king of Naples, whereupon the pope ſent his bulls of indulgence to all ſuch as would aid him in his wars againſt the king. John Huſs wrote againſt the wickedneſs of theſe pardons, and the people being informed by him, ſpake alſo againſt them, and called the pope antichriſt, for proclaiming wars, and taking the croſs againſt the Chriſtians.

But ſome that were rich, and therefore fearful, were inſtant againſt Huſs, and prevailed with the king to baniſh him the town; and another party cried out againſt the prieſts, and prelates as the author of his baniſhment, accuſing them of Simony, adultery, pride, &c. Not ſparing to lay open their vices, and eagerly craving a reformation of the clergy; the king being moved herewith, required greater exactions of ſuch clerks, as were accuſed, and known to be profane, whereby ſome of them fell into great diſtreſs, and the moſt part were glad, either to fall, or not to fall out with the purer ſort: by this means John Huſs had liberty to return to the church at Bethlehem; but this cauſed him to be more vehemently accuſed at Rome, and the pope directed his bull to the king, to ſuppreſs John Huſs and his doctrine.

John Huſs being reſolved to appear at Conſtance, he affixed letters on the doors of the cathedrals, pariſh churches, abbeys, and cloiſters, ſignifying that he was going to the general council to give an account of his faith; and that if any man ſuſpected his doctrine, he deſired that they would declare their doubts before the biſhop of Prague, or, if they pleaſed, before the council.

Then anno Chriſti 1414. Auguſt 30. Did all the barons of Bohemia aſſemble at St. James's abbey in Prague, the biſhop being preſent. Then John Huſs preſented a ſupplication, craving, that if the biſhop of Nazereth, who was the inquiſitor of hereſy within that dioceſs, had any ſuſpicion of error in his doctrine, that he would declare it, proteſting that he was willing to ſuffer correction therein, if he deſerved it: or, if the biſhop had no accuſation againſt him, that they would give him a teſtimonial, that being armed therewith, he might go with more confidence to Conſtance. The biſhop profeſſed openly, that he knew no offence in him, only he adviſed him to purge himſelf of the excommunication. This was in form of an act, and ſent by him to the emperor.

Alſo about this time the archbiſhop Conrade, held a ſynod with his prelates, where a proctor appeared in the name of John Huſs, requiring, that ſeeing he was ready to give an account of his faith, they, or any of them who would accuſe him, ſhould give it in writing under their names, and, according to the law of God, and man, prepare themſelves to ſuffer the like puniſhment, if they could not prove it learnedly againſt him; as he was ready, with God's help, to anſwer before them, or the enſuing council; he could get no anſwer to this, and therefore he made proteſtation of his proffer, and craved an inſtrument, upon the refuſal, from a notary there preſent.

November 3. John Huſs came to Conſtance, and lodged with an honeſt matron, named Faith. On the morrow the two noblemen informed the pope that they had brought John Huſs, and entreated that he might remain without moleſtation, according to his ſafe conduct; the pope anſwered, that though John Huſs had killed his brother, yet no hurt ſhould be done to him, during his abode there.

November 29. The biſhops, and the burgy maſter were ſent for him, to come before the pope, and his cardinals to render an account of his doctrine, as he had deſired, and they were ready to hear. He anſwered, that he came to do it before all the council, &c.

He

He was firſt queſtioned in general about the errors that were ſpread of him: he anſwered, Reverend fathers, underſtand that my mind is to die, rather than to be found culpable of any error. The cardinals replied, Thou ſpeakeſt modeſtly, and ſo left him with the lord de Chlum under a ſtrong guard of armed men. Then they ſent a ſubtile monk, who under a ſhew of rudeneſs and ſimplicity, ſought to entrap him by captious queſtions: but Huſs perceiving it, told him of his diſſembling, yet anſwered his queſtions. In the evening the pope ſent the provoſt of the court to the lord de Chlum willing him to go unto his lodging, but as for Mr. Huſs, they had diſpoſed otherwiſe of him. Then did the lord John go ſpeedily unto the pope, putting him in mind of his promiſe about John Huſs, and intreating him that he would not ſo lightly falſify his faith, adding, that he was come thither under the emperor's ſafe conduct; to which the pope anſwered, that all was done without his conſent, and ſaid privily, what reaſon is there that thou ſhouldſt impute this act to me, who am in the hands of theſe biſhops and cardinals? and indeed, the pope fearing to be depoſed, or ſeeking to curry favour with the prelates, did thus betray the innocent unto them. So the baron returned, complaining openly of the wrong, but to no purpoſe.

Then was John Huſs led to the chapter houſe of the great church, where he was kept priſoner eight days, and from thence he was led to the Jacobines upon the Rhine, and ſhut up in the vileſt priſon of the abbey, though his cauſe was not yet heard publicly. In this priſon, by reaſon of the ſtink, he fell ſick of a fever, and was like to die; yet leſt he ſhould die, as others in that priſon had done, the pope ſent a phyſician to attend him. The emperor was not yet come to the town.

In the midſt of his ſickneſs, his accuſers, Michael de Cauſis, and another Bohemian, made an importunate ſuit, that the heretic might be condemned; for which end they preſented to the pope ſome articles againſt him; as firſt, that he had taught that the communion was to be adminiſtred in both kinds. Secondly, that he would not acknowlege that the word church was to be underſtood of the pope and his cardinals, but affirmed that the ſenſe, had its beginning from the ſchool men. Thirdly, that he held, that temporal princes might take temporal poſſeſſions from church men. Fourthly, concerning the equality of all princes in power. Fifthly, that the reſervation of cauſes, did proceed from the pride and ambition of the popes. Sixthly, that he had raiſed a ſchiſm, and tumults in Bohemia.

In the time of his ſickneſs four commiſſioners were appointed to hear the accuſation, and to examine witneſſes, who were ignorant prieſts of Bohemia, one contradicting another. John Huſs being informed hereof, he ſent and craved that an advocate might be admitted to anſwer for him, himſelf being hindred by ſickneſs: but this was denied, becauſe, forſooth, there was a canon that forbade, that one accuſed of hereſy, ſhould anſwer by a proctor. When he had recovered his health in ſome meaſure, at the command of the commiſſioners certain articles were ſent unto him, which they ſaid they had gathered out of his books, but indeed they were ſuch as Steven Paletz, a Bohemian, had either forged of his own head, or patched up by wreſting his godly, and orthodox ſayings to a ſiniſter ſenſe.

Thus he continued in priſon, till March twenty eighth, 1415. and then having in ſome meaſure recovered his health, he wrote ſome treatiſes, viz. of the ten commandments. Of love, and the knowlege of God: of marriage: of penance: and of the Lord's ſupper. And when pope John fled from Conſtance, his ſervants delivered the keys of the priſon to the emperor, and the council commanded that the priſoner ſhould be delivered to the biſhop of Conſtance, who removed him to a caſtle on the other ſide of the Rhine, &c.

The biſhop of Luthomiſſen anſwered, that in the ſupplication, he was touched and accuſed as a ſlanderer, and therefore he craved that a day might be appointed, for the clearing of thoſe things which they called ſlanders: the ſeventeenth day of May was appointed; at which time he brought in what he had to ſay for himſelf. The next day the noblemen returned their anſwer, wherein they cleared their preacher of all that the biſhop had objected, concluding their anſwer with another ſupplication, to which they received no return, till the laſt of May; at which time they preſented the teſtimony of the biſhop of Nazaret, beforementioned: as alſo another of the biſhop of Prague: and a third, from the univerſity, all three clearing John Huſs from the calumnies which his adverſaries had raiſed againſt him: and the noble men petitioned that Huſs might have liberty to anſwer in perſon; or that his accuſers ſhould not be ſo lightly believed: the patriarch of Antioch, anſwered in the name of the council, that Huſs ſhould be brought to his hearing, June fifth, where he ſhould have liberty to ſpeak for himſelf: but they failed of their promiſe; therefore the ſame day, theſe noble men preſented another ſupplication unto the emperor, ſhewing the diſcourteous dealing of the four commiſſioners, and intreating, that according to the ſafe conduct, himſelf would hear their former ſupplications: but the emperor was driven from owning his ſafe conduct by the cardinals, becauſe (as they all deſired) 'No ſafe conduct could be given to one who is ſuſpected of hereſy.'

On the ſame day all the cardinals, and biſhops, and moſt of the clergy met in the convent of the Franciſcans, and there it was concluded, that before the priſoner ſhould be brought forth, the articles againſt him ſhould be produced, and the witneſſes examined: but a notary (Madonientz) hearing that they had concluded to condemn the articles, in the abſence of the party, he went with all ſpeed to the Bohemian barons, and informed them of it, and they went and told the emperor; whereupon, he ſent Lewis, count Palatine of Heidleburg, and Frederick, burgrave of Nurenburg, to inquire of them who ruled the council, that nothing ſhould be done in that cauſe till the party was firſt heard, and that they ſhould ſend the articles unto him, and he would cauſe them to be examined by good and learned men: ſo the decree was ſuſpended.

At that time the barons gave to thoſe whom the emperor employed, certain books of John Huſs, that his adverſaries and their accuſations might be tried by them.

The books were by them delivered to the cardinals, and at laſt John Huſs was brought forth, who upon examination, acknowleged the books to be his, ſaying, 'That if there were any error in them, he was willing to retract it.' They had ſcarcely read one article when they called for witneſſes: John Huſs would have ſpoken, but they all cried out ſo againſt him, that he had no liberty to ſpeak one word: and when the tumult was a little quieted, and he would have anſwered out of the ſcriptures, and ancient fathers, ſome ſaid, it was to no purpoſe: others mocked him: and ſome were ſo outragious, that he reſolved to hold his peace, and to be ſilent; and then they all ſaid, 'Now he is dumb, and by his ſilence confeſſes his guilt.'

June ſeventeenth, on which day he was brought before them again, there fell out ſo great an eclipſe, that the ſun was almoſt wholly darkned, and their aſſembly was held in the cloiſter of the Minorites, where his accuſers read ſome articles, and undertook to prove them by witneſſes; but he proteſted that he had never ſpoken ſuch things. Then ſaid the cardinal of Florence, maſter, you know that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes, every word is eſtabliſhed, and here you ſhall ſee many famous witneſſes, againſt you, and for my part, I cannot ſee how you can maintain your cauſe againſt them. Huſs anſwered, 'I take God, and my conſcience to witneſs, that I never taught ſuch things as theſe men alledge againſt me.' The cardinal replied, we cannot judge according to your conſcience, but muſt rely upon evident witneſſes.

Then it was objected, that he had defended the errors of Wicklief: to which he anſwered, that he had never defended any errors of Wicklief; and when they inſtanced in ſome particulars, he denied them to be errors, but agreeable to the ſcriptures. They objected, that he had ſown ſedition between the eccleſiaſtical, and political ſtates in Bohemia? His anſwer was, that pope Gregory had taken the empire from Wenceſlaus, and the college of cardinals, being offended with the pope, had written to the king, that if he would deny obedience to the pope, they would ſo order it, that another pope ſhould be choſen, who ſhould reſtore him to his empire, which he did accordingly, and hence aroſe the diſſention betwixt the king, and the archbiſhop Sbinco, who was a follower of Gregory: and ſaid he, It is eaſy to be known that I am accuſed falſly in this cauſe, as the Germans here preſent can witneſs. Then Albert Warren archdeacon of Prague ſtood up to ſpeak, but they would not hear him. Then was he accuſed of ſpeaking ſome words againſt the emperor, from which he was cleared by the teſtimony of the lord de Chlum.

Then ſaid the emperor, ſeeing we may not defend any man that is an heretic, or accuſed of hereſy, we adviſe thee to ſubmit thyſelf to the council in all things, ſo we will provide that they ſhall ſuffer thee to depart in peace, with an eaſy penance: which if thou refuſe to do, the preſident will have ſufficient cauſe to proceed againſt thee: and for our part, aſſure thyſelf, that we will prepare the fire with our own hand, rather than ſuffer thee to maintain thine opinions any longer; to this he anſwered, 'O moſt noble emperor, I render unto your highneſs immortal thanks, for your letters of ſafe conduct, and I take God witneſs, that I never intended to maintain any falſe opinions obſtinately, and I came willingly hither, that if the meaneſt of the council can lay before me any holier doctrine than what I have taught, I will ſoon change my mind.' Then was he led away by the ſerjeants, and committed to the cuſtody of the biſhop of Rigen, who had Hierom of Prague alſo in priſon.

On the morrow they met again, and the former articles were read in the audience of John Huſs, and they ſaid, that other articles were collected out of his books of Predeſtination and Perſeverance: he acknowleged what they had truly collected out of his books, and gave the reaſons thereof, he ſhewed alſo that in other articles they had perverted and wreſted his words contrary to his meaning. Then Peter de Aliaco, biſhop of Cambray ſaid, thou heareſt what horrible crimes are alleged againſt thee; now therefore it concerns thee to think what to do: thou muſt recant all theſe articles, and ſo thou mayeſt find favour: but if thou wilt ſtand to defend them, I fear it will turn to thy great danger. This I ſpeak to thee by way of counſel, and not as a judge. The like ſaid other cardinals. Then anſwered Huſs, 'Moſt reverend fathers, I have ſaid already that I came not hither to maintain any error obſtinately: but if in any particular I have entertained a falſe opinion, I would gladly be reformed therein. And now I beſeech you, that I may have liberty to declare my mind and if I bring not ſolid and ſufficient reaſons, I will humbly ſubmit myſelf to your better information.'

Then ſaid a cardinal; behold how craftily he ſpeaketh: he calls it information, and not correction, or determination. 'Verily, ſaid Huſs, call it what you will: I take God to witneſs that I ſpeak from my heart.' After ſome other ſpeeches, a prieſt ſaid that he ſhould not be admitted to recant, becauſe he had written to his friends, that though he ſhould be forced to ſwear with his tongue, yet he would keep his opinions unto death. Then did the biſhop of Rigen command him to be had back to priſon.

During his impriſonment, he wrote all theſe paſſages to his friends that the truth might be known, and calumnies prevented. When he was gone, the emperor ſaid to the preſidents, that either he ſhould recant all thoſe things that were alledged againſt him, and abjure all preaching and be baniſhed out of the kingdom of Bohemia, or elſe be burned; and that all his favourers in Conſtance ſhould be apprehended and impriſoned, eſpecially his diſciple Hierom of Prague. Others ſaid, that when the maſter was puniſhed, the diſciples would be more tractable.

July 6th, the emperor ſent to him four biſhops, with the two Bohemian barons, to know what he would do. And when he was brought out of priſon to them, the lord of Chlum ſaid firſt; Mr. John, I am an unlearned man, and therefore unable to inſtruct you a man of learning; nevertheleſs, I require you, if you know yourſelf guilty of any of thoſe errors wherewith you are charged, that you would not be aſhamed to change your mind: yet would I not adviſe you to do any thing againſt your conſcience, but rather to ſuffer any puniſhment than to deny what you know to be truth. Huſs anſwered with tears, 'Verily, as I have often ſaid, I take the moſt high God to witneſs, that I am ready with all my heart, if the council will better inſtruct me by the holy ſcriptures, to change my mind.' Then ſaid a biſhop I would never be ſo arrogant, as to prefer my judgment, to the judgment of the whole council. John anſwered, 'Neither do I: but if the meaneſt of the council will convince me of error, I will perform with all my heart whatſoever the council will enjoin me.' Mark, ſaid another biſhop, how he continues in his errors: ſo they ſent him back to priſon again.

The next day a general congregation was held in the great church, where the emperor was preſent: then were brought in, and laid down, all the veſtments belonging to a prieſt, and John was brought before them. When he came in, he fell on his knees and prayed a good ſpace: and the biſhop of Londenſis went up into the pulpit, and preached upon this text; Rom. vi. 'Let the body of ſin be deſtroyed.' And the whole ſcope of his ſermon was, that John Huſs ſhould be deſtroyed. Then read a biſhop the proceſs which was drawn up at Rome againſt him, as alſo the articles of his accuſation; and when he attempted to anſwer a word or two to the ſeveral articles as they were read, the cardinal of Cambray commanded him ſilence, ſaying, hereafter thou mayeſt anſwer them altogether, if thou wilt. 'Alas, ſaid Huſs, how can I anſwer all theſe things at once? I am not able to retain them all.' The cardinal of Florence ſaid, we have heard thee enough. Yet Huſs beſought them to hear him, leſt others ſhould conceive amiſs, either of them, or of him. And when they would not hear him, he, kneeling down, committed his cauſe to God, and to Jeſus Chriſt, hoping at their hands to obtain all his deſire. Then they charged him, that he had affirmed, that there was a fourth perſon in the deity, alledging, that a certain doctor heard him ſpeak it. Huſs craved the doctor's name. The archbiſhop anſwered, that it was not needful to name him. Then ſaid he, 'Oh miſerable man that I am, who am forced to hear ſuch blaſphemies and ſlanders.' Then they alledged that he had appealed to Chriſt, which, ſaid they, is heretical. Hereupon Huſs ſaid, 'O Lord Jeſus, whoſe word is here openly condemned, I do again appeal unto thee; who, when thou waſt evilly entreated of thine enemies, didſt appeal unto God thy Father, committing thy cauſe unto the moſt juſt judge, that by thy example, when we are oppreſſed with manifeſt wrongs, we ſhould fly unto thee.'

Then was the definitive ſentence read, declaring, That by the council it was ordained for his heretical doctrine, publicly to degrade him from his prieſtly office, &c. As the ſentence was reading, he did now and then interrupt them, but was oft commanded to be ſilent; when they read, that he was obſtinate, he cried out, that he was never obſtinate, but was always ready to embrace the truth, if he might be taught it by the holy ſcriptures. When his books were condemned, he ſaid, 'Why have you condemned thoſe books, ſeeing you have not proved in any one particular, that they are contrary to the ſcriptures, or articles of the faith? and what injury is that to me to condemn my books written in the Bohemian language, which you never ſaw?' Alſo, oft times he looked up to heaven and prayed. When the ſentence was ended, he kneeling down, ſaid, 'Lord Jeſus forgive mine enemies, by whom thou knoweſt I am falſly condemned, and that they have uſed falſe witneſſes and ſlanders againſt me: forgive them for thy great mercy's ſake.' But many of them laughed at it.

Then ſeven biſhops, who were appointed thereunto, put upon him the prieſtly veſtures: and as they put on the albe, he ſpake of the white veſture wherein Chriſt was cloathed and mocked; ſo in all other things he comforted himſelf, with the example of Jeſus Chriſt. When all the veſtments were put on, an archbiſhop exhorted him to change his mind, and thereby to provide for his ſafety and honour; but he refuſing, went up to the top of the ſcaffold, after the cuſtom, and being full of tears, he ſpake unto the people ſaying; 'Theſe lords and biſhops exhort me, that I would profeſs before you, that I have erred; which if it were to the infamy of any man, they might happily perſuade me to it: but now I am in the ſight of the Lord my God, without diſhonouring them, and wounding my own conſcience, I can no way do what they require of me: with what countenance could I look up to heaven? with what face could I look upon them whom I have taught, of whom there is a great number, if by my example thoſe things which formerly they have known to be he moſt true, ſhould now be made dubious? I would never do it, nor give ſuch ſcandal, ſeeming thereby more to eſteem this vile carcaſe of mine, which is condemned to die, than their ſalvation.' Upon this, a biſhop ſaid, behold how he continues in his pernicious errors: then was he commanded to come to the execution; and a biſhop took the chalice from him, ſaying, O accurſed Judas, why haſt thou forſaken the way of peace: we take from thee the chalice of thy ſalvation. John anſwered, 'I truſt in God my Father, and in my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, for whoſe ſake I ſuffer theſe things; that he will not take away his chalice of his redemption, but I have a ſtedfaſt hope that I ſhall drink thereof this day in his kingdom.' The other biſhops took away the other prieſtly ornaments, and each of them accurſed him. To whom he anſwered, 'That he willingly ſuffered their curſes for the name of Chriſt.' At laſt thoſe biſhops began to contend with what inſtrument his ſhaven crown ſhould be unprieſted, whether with a razor, or ſciſſars? John then turning him to the emperor, ſaid, 'I marvel, that when they are all of alike cruel mind, that they cannot agree in the manner of their cruelty?' At laſt they cut off the ſkin of his head with ſciſſars ſaying, Now the church hath taken from thee all her ornaments, and privileges, and nothing remains, but that thou be delivered into the hands of the civil magiſtrate.

Then cauſed they a crown to be made of paper, almoſt a cubit deep, upon which were painted three black devils with this title above them, Hæreſiarchæ: and when he ſaw it, he ſaid, My Lord Jeſus Chriſt, for my ſake, &c.

Before the wood was kindled, the baron of Openhiem, and another gentleman exhorted him that he would remember his ſalvation, and repent of his errors: to whom he anſwered, 'What errors ſhall I renounce, whereas I know myſelf guilty of none? As for thoſe things that have been falſely alledged againſt me, I know that I never did ſo much as think them. For this was my chiefeſt end in all my preaching, to teach all men repentance, and remiſſion of ſins, according to the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and according to the expoſition of the holy fathers. Wherefore I am ready to ſuffer death with a cheerful mind.

As he was tied to the ſtake, it happened that his face was turned towards the eaſt; wher upon on cried that an heretic ſhould not have liberty to look eaſtward. So he was turned the other way.

When he had done praying, the people ſaid, 'What he hath done before, we know not, but now he prayeth devoutly:' and ſome ſaid, It were better that he had a confeſſor: but a prieſt ſitting on horſeback, anſwered, that he might not be heard, being a condemned heretic.

In Prague he ſaw a viſion, wherein he ſeemed to paint the images of Chriſt, and his apoſtles: but the pope came and hindered him, and cauſed his ſervants to blot out thoſe images. Then he ſaw other painters, in a great number, painting the ſame images again: and they were ſo numerous that the pope and his cardinals were not able to blot them out.

The Life of HIEROM of PRAGUE, who died, ANNO Chriſti, 1416.

HIEROM of Prague, a Bohemian born, a man famous for courage, comelineſs, virtue, learning, and eloquence: when he underſtood that the publick faith was violated, his country ſlandered, and Huſs burnt, he travelled to Conſtance, April the 4 anno Chriſti 1415. But no ſooner came he thither, but he underſtood that watch was laid for him to apprehend him, whereupon the next day he went to Iberling a city of the empire, and a mile from Conſtance.

From thence he ſent to Sigiſmund king of Hungary, and his barons, but eſpecially to the council, moſt earneſtly requeſting that they would give him a ſafe conduct freely to come and go, and then he would come in open audience to anſwer every man, if any would appear to charge him with any crime: but this was denied him both by the king and council: whereupon the next day he wrote ſundry inſtimations and ſent them to Conſtance, cauſing them to be ſet upon the gates of the city, upon the doors of churches, monaſteries, of the houſes of the cardinals, and other noble perſonages, the tenor whereof was this: 'Unto the noble emperor, &c. I Jerom of Prague, Mr of arts of the univerſity of Paris, Cullen, Heidleberg and Prague, by theſe my letters do notify to the king and council, and to all others, that becauſe of many crafty ſlanderers, back biters, and accuſers, I am ready of mine own free will to come unto Conſtance, there to declare openly before all the council the purity and ſincerity of my faith and my innocency: but this I will not do in corners, ſecretly before any private or particular perſon; wherefore if there be any of my ſlanderers of what nation ſoever, that will charge me with error or hereſy, let them come forth openly before the council, and in their own names object againſt me, and I will be ready to anſwer them; and if I ſhall be found guilty of any error or hereſy, I will not refuſe openly to ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as ſhall be meet for an heretic: wherefore I humbly deſire a ſafe conduct as afore; but if (ſeeing I offer ſuch equal terms) before any fault be proved againſt me I ſhall be arreſted, impriſoned, or have any violence done to me, that then it may be manifeſt unto all the world that this council doth not proceed according to the rules of equity and juſtice, the rather ſeeing that I am come hither freely, and of my own accord &c.'

But notwithſtanding all this, no ſafe conduct would be granted him: wherefore the lords of Bohemia gave him their letters patent under their ſeals to teſtify the truth of the premiſes; with the which letters he returned again towards Bohemia: but by the treachery and ſubtilty of his enemies he was apprehended by the way in Hirſaw, and by the officers was carried before the duke; who preſently after carried him bound to Conſtance; and for a greater diſgrace they put a bolt of iron upon his wriſts with a long iron chain at it, by which they led him through the city to the cloiſter of the friar Minors, where all the prieſts, ſcribes and phariſees were met together, and when he came before them, ſome of the biſhops ſaid to him: 'Hierom, why didſt thou fly and run away and not appear when thou waſt cited? To which he anſwered, Becauſe I could get no ſafe conduct neither from you, nor the king; and perceiving that I had many bitter enemies in the council, I would not be the author of mine own peril; but had I known of your citation, aſſuredly though I had been in Bohemia, I would have appeared.

Then a great rabble of prieſts cried out againſt him, and Gerſon the chancellor of Paris, and the chancellor of Cullen, and the chancellor of Heidleberg charged him with errors delivered in thoſe univerſities; to which he anſwered, that what he had delivered there, he would juſtify now: yet if any could convince him of error therein, he would willingly be informed; hereupon ſome cried out, Let him be burned, let him be burned; then he was delivered bound to the officers to be put into priſon.

Aſſoon as he came thither, one called him at his window ſaying, Mr. Hierom, be conſtant and fear not to ſuffer death for the truth's ſake, of which when you were at liberty you did preach much good: to whom he anſwered truly brother, I do not fear death, &c. But the priſon-keeper coming to the man, drove him away with ſtrokes from the window: preſently after the biſhop of Rigen ſent for Hierom, ſtrongly bound with chains, both by the hands and neck, and ſent him to a tower, where they tied him faſt to a great block, and his feet in the ſtocks, his hands being alſo made faſt upon them, the block being ſo high that he could by no means ſit thereon but his head muſt hang downwards: where alſo they allowed him nothing but bread and water.

But within eleven days, hanging ſo by the heels, he fell very ſick; yet thus they kept him in priſon a year wanting ſeven days, and then ſent for him, requiring him to recant, and to ſubſcribe that John Huſs was juſtly put to death, which he did, partly for fear of death, and hoping thereby to eſcape their hands: after which they ſent him back to priſon, and kept him guarded with ſoldiers, yet not ſo ſtrictly chained as before. Afterwards they ſent to examine him again, but he refuſed to anſwer in private, except he might be brought before the council; and they (ſuppoſing that he would openly confirm his former recantation) ſent for him thither, May the 25. 1416. ſubſcribing ing falſe witneſſes to accuſe him: but he ſo learnedly cleared himſelf, and refelled his adverſaries, that they were aſtoniſhed at his oration, and with ſhame enough were put to ſilence: he alſo concluded his oration with this, that all ſuch articles as Wicklief and Huſs had written againſt the enormities, pomp, and diſorder of the prelates, he would firmly hold and defend; even unto the death; and that all the ſins that he had committed, did not ſo much gnaw and trouble his conſcience, as did that moſt peſtiferous act of his in recanting what he had juſtly ſpoken, and in conſenting to the wicked condemnation of Huſs, and that he repented with his whole heart that ever he did it.

This ſo enraged them that they proceeded to condemn him; whereupon he ſaid: I after death, will leave a remorſe in your conſcience, and a nail in your hearts; Et cito vos omnes ut reſpondeatis mihi coram altiſſimo, & juſtiſſimo judice poſt centum annos: I here cite you all to anſwer to me before the moſt high and juſt judge within a hundred years. When he was brought forth to execution, they prepared a great and long paper painted about with red devils, which when he beheld, throwing away his hood, he took the miter, and put it on his head, ſaying our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, when he ſuffered death for me moſt wretched ſinner, did wear a crown of thorns upon his head: and I, for his ſake, will willingly wear this cap. As he went to the place of execution, where John Huſs was burned, he kneeled down, and prayed fervently. He was bound to the image of John Huſs, and ſo fire was ſet to him, which he endured with admirable valor: for ſtanding at the ſtake bound, and the executioner kindling the fire behind him, he bade him kindle it before his face. For (ſaid he) if I had been afraid of it, I had not come to this place, having had ſo many opportunities offered to me to eſcape it. The whole city of Conſtance admired his conſtancy, and Chriſtian magnanimity in ſuffering death. At the giving up of the ghoſt he ſaid;

Hanc animam in flammis offero Chriſte tibi:
This ſoul of mine in flames of fire
O Chriſt I offer thee.

The Life of MARTIN LUTHER, who flouriſhed, anno Chriſti, 1500.

MARTIN Luther was born at Iſleben in the earldom of Mansfield, anno Chriſti 1483. of good parents. His Fathers name was John Luther, who firſt lived at Iſleben, and afterwards removed to Mansfield, where he had ſome metal mines, and was choſen a magiſtrate, and was grateful to all for the integrity of his life. His mother's name was Margaret Lindeman, who was adorned with ſuch virtues as became an honeſt matron, but eſpecially ſhe was eminent for chaſtity, the fear of God, and often calling upon his name. Aſſoon as this their ſon was capable of learning, they firſt trained him up in the fear and knowlege of God and other virtues under their own wings: then their care was to educate him in humane learning, for which end they ſent him to ſchool to George Æmilius: and though at this time the darkneſs of popery had much obſcured the light of truth, yet it pleaſed God to preſerve in the ſchools the catechiſms containing the principles of religion, the uſe of ſinging Pſalms, and ſome forms of prayer.

At fourteen years of age, he went to Magdeburg, where he lived a poor ſcholar one year: from thence he was removed by his parents to Ilenach, where was a famous ſchool, and where he firſt taſted the ſweetneſs of learning, and ſo after a while went thence to the univerſity of Erford, anno Chriſti 1501. There he profited ſo much in logick and other learning, that the whole univerſity admired his wit.

At twenty years old, he was made maſter of arts, and profeſſor of phyſicks, ethicks, and other parts of philoſophy. Then he betook himſelf to the ſtudy of the law: but at the age of twenty one (being affrighted at the violent death of a faithful companion of his whom he dearly loved) he betook himſelf in to the Auguſtine monks colledge in Erford, writing to his parents the reaſon why he changed the courſe of his life.

In the library of that colledge he met with a copy of a latine Bible, which he had never ſeen before: and with admiration, obſerved that there were more portions of holy ſcripture, than were read in the churches, which made him wiſh that he had the like book: and it pleaſed God that not long after he obtained his deſire, and fell cloſe to the ſtudy thereof, ſome ſickneſs and fear alſo whetting him on in thoſe ſtudies.

Afterwards falling into a violent diſeaſe which threatned death, an old prieſt came to him, ſaying, ſir, be of good courage, your diſeaſe is not mortal; God will raiſe you up to afford comfort to many others: which alſo came to paſs, and he was much cheared up by conference with that prieſt, who largely diſcourſed with him about juſtification by faith, and explained the articles of the creed to him.

Then did Luther read over Auguſtine's works, where he found the ſame doctrine of juſtification by faith frequently confirmed. He read over the ſchool-men alſo, eſpecially Occam, and in theſe ſtudies he ſpent five years in that colledge.

Anno Chriſti 1507. he was made presbyter: and John Staupicius endeavouring to promote the univerſity of Wittenberg (then lately begun) knowing the wit and learning of Luther, removed him thither, anno Chriſti 1508. when he was but 26 years old, where by his labours he did much good; three years after he was ſent to Rome in the behalf of his convent, where he ſaw the pope, and the manner of the Roman clergy, concerning which he ſaith; at Rome I heard them ſay maſs in ſuch a manner as I deteſt them: for at the communion table I heard courteſans laugh and boaſt of their wickedneſs, and others concerning the bread and wine of the altar, ſaying, bread thou art, and bread thou ſhalt remain; wine thou art, and wine thou ſhalt remain.

Upon his return from Rome, he was made doctor in divinity at the charge of Duke Frederick, elector of Saxony, who heard him preach, and admired the ſoundneſs of his invention, the ſtrength of his arguments, and the excellency of the things which he delivered.

Soon after he began to explain the epiſtle to the Romans, and ſome pſalms, wehre he ſhewed the difference between the law and the goſpel; refuted juſtification by works, &c. And his demeanor agreed with his doctrine; his ſpeech ſeemed to come from his heart, not from his lips only. Then he betook himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek and Hebrew.

This year 1517. was by the account of Sculteſus the 356 from the reformation of religion in France by the Waldenſes: the 146. from the firſt confutation of popiſh errors in England by John Wicklief. The 116, from the firſt year of the miniſtry of John Huſs, who oppoſed the errors of popery in Bohemia. The 36. year from the condemnation of Dr Weſſalia, who taught at Worms the ſame doctrine before Luther was born, that Luther did afterwards.

Anno Chriſti 1517. John Taccius brought indulgences into Germany to be ſold, averring that he had ſo huge a commiſſion from the pope, that though a man had deflowred the bleſſed virgin, yet for money he could pardon his ſin: Luther's zeal being inflamed herewith, it cauſed him to ſet forth ſome propoſitions againſt indulgences, which ſo enraged Teccius, that whereſoever he came he declaimed againſt Luther, and ſet forth contrary poſitions, and not content therewith, he burned openly Luther's propoſitions, and the ſermon which he wrote about indulgences: this cauſed the ſtudents at Wittenberg to burn his poſitions alſo.

The propoſitions which Luther ſet up, were ninety five in number: after which he made this proteſtation, 'I Martin Luther, doctor of the order of the Eremites at Wittenberg, would have it publicly teſtified that I have ſet forth certain propoſitions againſt the pope's indulgences as they call them; but albeit neither the famous and worthy ſchool of ours, nor the civil nor eccleſiaſtical power hath hitherto condemned me: yet, as I hear, there are certain certain men of a violent and bold wit, who dare to pronounce me an heretic, as if they well understood and thoroughly knew the whole matter: but I beseech every one, as I have often done before, so now by the Christian faith, that they either shew me a better way if it be revealed by God to any of them, or else let them submit their sentence to God and his churches judgment. For neither am I so rash that I would have my opinion alone to be preferred before all others, neither am I so doltish that I would have the word of God to be placed after fables devised by human reason.'

Anno Christi 1518. Andrew Bodenstein from his native place called Caralostadius, with many other divines of Wittenberg defended Luther's doctrine by their writings. Also the elector of Saxony of his own accord, without intreaty, took upon him the patronage of Luther, neither would he suffer that he should be drawn to Rome. Also about the same time Luther (contrary to the advice of his friends) went to the chapter of the Augustine fryars held at Heidleberg to defend his doctrine, and shew his obedience to their summons. He was honourably entertained by the bishop of Wurbsturg, and at Heidleberg by Wolfgang the count Palatine.

Amongst the fryars there he disputed of 28 paradoxes which he propounded out of St. Paul's epistles concerning justification by faith without works. Bucer being present, and taking notes at this disputation, wrote thus of it to Beatus Rheanus. 'His sweetness in answering (saith he) was admirable, his patience in hearing was incomparable; you might have seen the acuteness of saint Paul in resolving doubts, so that he brought them all into admiration of him, by reason of his short and pithy answers, and those taken out of the storehouse of God's holy scriptures.'

In his return when he was at Erford, he wrote to Jodocus, a divine of Isenach, who had been his master, wherein he thus expresseth himself: 'the whole university of Wittenberg is of my mind concerning the doctrine of faith and works except one Licenciat, and also the duke of Saxony: the bishop of Brandeaburg (who is my ordinary) and many prelates, and the more ingenous citizens say with one mouth that they never knew Christ and the gospel before.'

August following, Maximilian the emperor, hearing of these controverlies between Luther and others, presently wrote to the pope to provide timely remedies against those spreading evils (as he called them) promising, that whatever he should decree about the same, he would see that it should take place through all the provinces of the empire. Hereupon pope Leo citeth Luther to Rome, which he also signified to his legate cardinal Cajetan in these words, 'Hearing that Luther defendeth certain ungodly opinions, estranged from those of the church of Rome, which is the mistress of faith and religion, out of my fatherly affection desiring to repress his rashness, I have commanded the bishop of Aesculan to cite him to Rome to answer those accusations that are laid against him. This the said bishop hath done, yet Luther is so far from returning to soundness, that being stubborn in his heresy, he hath set out writings much worse than the former, to my great grief and perturbation, &c. Then he proceeds to require the cardinal to see that Luther were brought to Auspurg, and that he should implore the emperor and princes to set a guard upon him, and carry him to Rome: yet withal if he should repent, and voluntarily confess his fault, he bade the cardinal pardon him, otherwise to interdict him from holy services, &c.

The pope also wrote to the duke of Saxony, in which letter after a few flatteries, he tells him that he heareth many and grievous complaints against Luther, (an undone man) who forgetting his order and profession doth many things very saucily against the church of God with great confidence: bragging that he is defended with the favour of his prince, and that he fears the authority of no man; which thing he presumes to be false and scandalous to the prince; yet (saith he) 'I am willing to write to you, to admonish you to be mindful of the dignity and splendor of your ancestors, flying not only the fault, but also suspicion of it,' &c. After which he tells him that it properly belonged to the church of Rome to judge in these causes of religion, and therefore requires him at the request of his legate, to see that Luther be sent to Rome, that there he might be either censured or pardoned according to his deserts.

The pope wrote also to the master of the Augustine monks, exhorting him by his authority to endeavour to recal Luther from his undertakings, and to sollicit him earnestly thereto both by letters and learned men; withal telling him that this must be done speedily, whereby he might quench the flame that was but lately risen, whereas by delays it was to be feared that the danger would grow greater and greater; for the timely suppressing whereof he required him to use all his study, care, and diligence.

When Luther saw that he was called to Rome, he earnestly sollicited that his cause might be heard in Germany, before fit judges appointed thereto, and in a place least subject unto danger. The university also of Wittenberg wrote to the pope, giving a notable testimony unto Luther both for his life and learning: they said also that in regard of his sickliness, and the danger of the way, he could not go to Rome; they beseeched the pope that he would think no otherwise of him than of a good man: that certain things indeed were propounded by him only for disputation sake, not to define them; that his adversaries interpreted him in the worse sense, and thereby much exasperated him; beseeching him to give credit to this their testimony.

They wrote also to Charles Miltitius, a German, who was chamberlain to the pope, highly commending Luther, and desiring him to procure of the pope that indifferent judges might be appointed to hear his cause in Germany: presuming that he being a German, would favour his country-man who was oppress'd with slanders, and in danger of his life in an honest cause.

Prince Frederick also the elector of Saxony, treated with cardinal Cajetan, and so prevailed with him, that Luther should be called to Auspurg, there to plead his cause before the cardinal

About this time the Bohemians sent a book to him written by John Huss, encouraging him to constancy and patience, confessing that what he taught was sound and right.

In a letter to Spalatinus he thus writes; 'In what matter soever I have not so roughly dealt with the romanists, let them not ascribe it to my modesty nor to their deserts, but to my respect of my Prince and his authority, and to the common good of the students of Wittenberg: As for myself, contemptus a me est Romanus & favor, & furor: I contemn Rome's favour and fury: let them censure and burn all my books, I will do the like by theirs, and will put an end to all my humble observance of them, which doth but incense them more and more.'

The elector of Saxony telling Erasmus that he wondred at the monks and pope's extreme hatred of Luther: Erasmus answered, 'Your highness needs not wonder at it, seeing he deals against the monks bellies and the pope's crown.' And the same Erasmus being proffered a great bishoprick if he would write against Luther, answered, 'That Luther was too great a man for him to deal with, and that he learned more from one short page of Luther's writings, than from all Thomas Aquinas' great books.' Erasmus also in a letter to the archbishop of Mentz, saith, 'That many things were in the books of Luther condemned by monks and divines for heresy, which in the books of Bernard and Augustine are reputed sound and godly.'

About the same time Margaret, Cæsar's aunt, who governed the low-countries, when the masters of Lovan complained to her that the writings of Luther overthrew the whole Christian common wealth; she asked them, 'what kind of man that Luther was?' To whom they answered, An unlearned monk:' whereupon she replied: 'Therefore do you who are many learned men, write against that one unlearned fellow: for sure the world will sooner believe many learned, before one unlearned man.'

Luther being cited, as we said before, to appear before cardinal Cajetan at Auspurg, went thither, and having obtained a safe conduct from the emperor Maximilian, he appeared before the cardinal, where he justified his doctrine, and proferred to maintain the same either by disputation or writing: the cardinal being much offended with him for his bold ſpeech, would not ſuffer him to come before him any more: hereupon Luther, after five or ſix days ſtay, when he heard no more from him, appealeth to the pope, and ſo departeth home. But the cardinal wrote after him to the duke of Saxony, that as he tendered his own honour and ſafety, he ſhould expel Luther out of his dominions: this letter the duke ſent to Luther, who wrote back again, that rather than he would any way indanger his prince, he would depart thence, and go whitherſoever it ſhould pleaſe the Lord to lead him. But the whole univerſity of Wittenberg (ſeeing the cauſe of God in danger by this means to decline) wrote to the prince, humbly beſeeching him, that of his princely honour, he would not ſuffer innocency to be thus oppreſſed by meer violence; but that the error might firſt be ſhewed, and Luther be convicted of it, before he be pronounced guilty: hereupon the duke hearing Luther's ſermons, and reading his books with more diligence, began to favour his quarrel more than he did before, and thereupon wrote back to the cardinal to this purpoſe: that whereas he had promiſed that Luther ſhould come to Auſpurg that being done, he could do no more: that the legat had alſo promiſed him that he would diſmiſs Luther in a friendly manner: but that it ſeemed a wonder to him that he would have forced Luther to a recantation before he had pleaded his cauſe: that there were many not only in his juriſdiction, but in other places alſo that were learned and vertuous perſons which did not condemn Luther's doctrine, but they which oppoſed him were men drawn thereto thro' filthy covetouſneſs: but if they would ſhew him his error, he would then do therein the office of a Chriſtian prince, as one that reſpected the glory of God, and deſired to provide for the peace of his conſcience; and that whereas (beyond his expectation) he wrote that Luther ſhould be proſecuted at Rome, and therefore required that either he ſhould be ſent to Rome, or baniſhed his dominions; he anſwered that he could not agree thereto: firſt, becauſe his error is not yet ſhewed him: ſecondly, becauſe it would be an intolerable loſs to the univerſity of Wittenberg, which he had lately founded, wherein were many ſtudents and learned men which loved Luther exceedingly, who had deſerved ſo well of them; that Luther is ſtill willing to come to a diſputation in a place not ſuſpected, and to ſubmit to the judgments of ſuch as can bring any thing more right, or to anſwer by writing; that he thinketh it juſt that this be granted him, and requeſteth that it may be ſo done, that ſo it may appear why he is counted an heretic, and what himſelf ought chiefly to follow, aſſuring him that he will maintain no error: and as he is unwilling to depart from the obſervance of the church of Rome, ſo neither can he condemn Luther, till his errors and crimes be detected.

After the death of Maximilian, and the coronation of Charles the V. the pope ſent to the duke of Saxony by ſome cardinals, requeſting him, that he would cauſe all Luther's books to be burnt; and that he would ſee Luther either to be executed in Saxony, or elſe that he would ſecure him, and ſend him to Rome; to which the duke anſwered, that he was ready to ſhew his obedience to the pope, but yet he could not ſend Luther to him, till his cauſe was heard before the emperor, and till he was convicted of error; and then if he recanted not, he ſhould find no favour at his hands.

About this time, many adverſaries being riſen up againſt Luther, there was a diſputation appointed at Lipſik, to which Luther came accompained with Phil. Melanchthon, who was come to Wittinberg the year before: on the adverſary party came John Eckius, a bold and confident divine: This diſputation laſted fourteen days, which was after publiſhed in print by Luther and Petrus Moſſellanus.

Preſently after, the fryars grievouſly charged the pope with neglect of his duty, in that minding his pleaſures ſo much (whereunto he was wonderouſly addicted) he in the mean time neglected the care of the church, in not timely ſuppreſſing the doctrine of Luther: the biſhops alſo of Germany having condemned the doctrine of Luther, wrote earneſtly to the pope againſt him, whereupon the pope calling together the cardinals, biſhops, divines, and canoniſts, referred the buſineſs wholly to their pleaſure, who after much contention and wrangling amongſt themſelves, at laſt concluded that a certain day ſhould be appointed for Luther's appearing, and that his books ſhould be burnt openly.

The court of Saxony hearing theſe things, was ſomewhat troubled, when Luther perceived, he began to bethink himſelf of retiring into Bohemia: which being taken notice of, Sir Francis of Sickingen, Sir Ulrick of Hutten, and Silveſter of Scavenberg, a noble Franconian, offered him both entertainment and patronage; intreating him not to go into Bohemia, but to come into Franconia, if the Romans curſes did prevail, promiſing him an hundred noble horſemen of Franconia for his guard. Hereupon Luther's courage encreaſeth, and he giveth notice to the cardinal of ſaint George, that if the pope's curſes drave him out of Wittenberg, they ſhould get nothing by it, ſeeing there was now, not only in Bohemia, but in the midſt of Germany ſuch as were able and willing to defend him againſt the pope's power: and then (ſaith he) being ſafe guarded by theſe protectors, I ſhall more cruelly inveigh againſt the Romaniſts than if you let me alone in peace under my prince.

Yet June 15. the pope publiſheth his bull againſt Luther, and all his partakers: forbidding upon pain of excommunication, the reading or keeping any of his books: commanding all men to apprehend him, and bring him to Rome: and interdicting all places where he ſhould come.

This bull in many places of Germany was oppoſed and torn in pieces: and Sir Ulrick Hutten publiſhed it with interlineary gloſſes, and marginal notes to their great diſgrace.

But before this came abroad Luther had publiſhed his book de Captivitate babylonica, wherein he profeſſed that he was daily made more learned, wiſhing that his books about indulgences were burnt, and that inſtead thereof this poſition were ſet forth, 'Indulgences are the wickedneſſes of the flatterers of Rome.' And when the pope's bull came forth, Luther excommunicated the bull itſelf and the authors of it; he alſo publiſhed a defence of all the articles condemned by the pope, appealing from the pope to a council.

After this the cardinals, according to their commiſſion, told the duke, that they could do no leſs than burn Luther's books; which accordingly they did: but Luther hearing of it, being accompanied with all the univerſity, he alſo openly burnt the pope's decrees, and his bull lately ſent out againſt him. At which time he added theſe words, 'Becauſe thou haſt troubled the holy one of the Lord, eternal fire ſhall trouble thee.'

A while after the emperor Charles the V. coming into Germany, prince Frederick of Saxony accompanied him to Worms, from whence he wrote to Luther that he had obtained of the emperor to hear him openly at the diet: to which Luther anſwered, that it was very welcome news to him that the emperor would take to himſelf the hearing of his cauſe, promiſing to do all which he could with a ſafe conſcience, and not wronging the cauſe of Chriſt.

March the ſixth, the emperor ſent for him, and withal ſent him a ſafe conduct, requiring his repair thither within 21 days: but many of his friends diſſuaded him from going, to whom he anſwered, 'That theſe diſcouragements were caſt into his way by Satan, who knew that by his profeſſion of the truth in ſo illuſtrious a place, his kingdom would be ſhaken, and therefore if he knew that there were as many devils in Worms as tiles on the houſes, yet would he go thither,' &c.

April the ſixteenth, Luther came to Worms: whereupon ſome perſuaded the emperor to deal with him as the council of Conſtance had dealt with John Huſs: but the emperor ſaid, 'That the public faith was not to be violated.' The next day Luther appeared before the emperor, and a frequent aſſembly of the princes, at which time Eccius, a lawyer, at the command of the emperor, made a ſpeech, in the end whereof he aſked him whether he would recant and retract his works? To which Luther after deliberation, anſwered, 'Of my books (ſaith he) ſome tend to faith and piety; to theſe my adverſaries give an ample teſtimony: others are againſt the pope and his doctrine; ſhould I revoke theſe, I ſhould confirm his ty-

many: others are againſt private men who defend his cauſe; in theſe I confeſs, I have been too vehement, yet I cannot revoke them, unleſs I will ſet open a gap to the impudency of many.' But Eccius told him that the emperor was not ſatisfied with this anſwer, but required his recantation. To which Luther anſwered, 'I beſeech you, give me leave to maintain the peace of my own conſcience, which, if I ſhould conſent to you, I cannot do. For unleſs my adverſaries can convince me by ſound arguments taken out of the holy ſcriptures, I cannot ſatisfy my conſcience. For I can plainly prove that both popes and councils have often erred grievouſly: and therefore it would be an ungodly thing for me to aſſent to them, and to depart from the holy ſcriptures which is plain and only cannot err.' And ſo he departed at that time.

But the next day the emperor ſent his letter to the aſſembly of the princes, wherein he wrote that his anceſtors had always profeſſed the Chriſtian religion, and had obſerved the church of Rome, which ſeeing Luther now oppoſed, and ſtood ſtifly to his opinion, it behoved him to proſcribe him and his companions, and to provide fit remedies to quench that flame. Yet that he would keep the public faith given him, ſo that he might return ſafe to his own home. The princes were divided in their opinions; but the major part held that he was not raſhly to be condemned, becauſe the emperor being a young man, was inſtigated againſt him by the pope and his miniſters.

A few days after the biſhop of Trevers appointed Luther to come unto him, with whom alſo ſome other of the princes were aſſembled: at which time they uſed many arguments to draw him to a recantation, and concluded that they perceived that if he refuſed, the emperor's purpoſe was to baniſh him out of the bounds of the empire, and therefore they exhorted him ſeriouſly to think upon the ſame. Luther anſwered that he was very thankful to them that ſo great princes would take ſo much pains for his ſake who was ſo mean, and unworthy a perſon: yet he told them that he would rather loſe his life than depart from the maniſeſt truth of the word of God, ſeeing its better to obey God than man, &c. Then was he commanded to withdraw: and there came to him one Væus a lawyer; who perſuaded him to ſubmit his writings to the judgment of Cæſar and the princes: to whom he anſwered, that he would not decline the judgment of Cæſar, and the orders of the empire if they would be guided by the word of God which (ſaith he) makes ſo plain for me, that unleſs they convince me of an error, I cannot depart from mine opinion.

Shortly after the emperor ſent to him to depart home, giving him 21 days for his return, commanding him neither by writing nor word to declare any thing to the people by the way. And after his departure the emperor proſcribed him. After the publication whereof, prince Frederick appointed certain noble men, whom he moſt confided in, to convey him to a ſecret place thereby to avoid the danger, who accordingly conveyed him privately to Wartſburg, which he called his Patmos, where he continued ten months, and wrote divers uſeful treatiſes. The papiſts employed wizards to deſcry him, but they could not certainly deſign the place where he was.

In Luther's abſence, the univerſity of Wittenberg ſolicited prince Frederick to aboliſh the maſs out of his juriſdiction, ſhewing him the impiety of the ſame, and that it was invented but about 400 years before for the pope's profit, to which the prince gave them a very prudent and pious anſwer.

Anno Chriſti 1522. Luther wrote to Melancthon to provide him a lodging at Wittenberg: for (ſaith he) the tranſlation of the Bible will urge me to return. For having tranſlated much of the Bible into Dutch in his Patmos, it was neceſſary for him to confer with learned men, and to have their help and aſſiſtance about the ſame.

In his abſence, Juſtus Jonas, Caraloſtad, Phil. Melancthon, Ampſdorfius, &c. had removed private maſs, images, auricular confeſſion, prayer to ſaints, &c.

March the ſixth, Luther came back to Wittenberg, and preached every day, taxing the reformers in one of his ſermons, as if they had erred in aboliſhing the maſs: not (ſaith he) becauſe it is ſinful to do it, but becauſe they have not done it in a right order, &c. And as touching the pulling down of images, he ſaid, 'If any worſhip images, they are to be aboliſhed; otherwiſe they are to be endured: yet I wiſh they were all taken away becauſe of the abuſe of them, which we cannot diſſemble.'

Caraloſtadius was much nettled with theſe and other ſuch like ſpeeches, who was the chief doer in theſe matters, ſaying that Luther would have all men enſlaved to his authority, and would ſuffer no man to do or write any thing whereof himſelf was not the firſt author.

Preſently after Luther excuſed himſelf by letters to prince Frederick for returning to Wittenberg under a ſtronger protection than the elector could give him; for ſaith he, 'God alone can order and promote the truth without any man's exceſſive care, and helping hand: therefore in this cauſe, he that moſt ſtrongly truſts to God's aſſiſtance, he moſt ſurely defends himſelf and others.

Anno Chriſti 1522. He printed the New Teſtament (tranſlated by him in his Patmos) into the German tongue, and reviſed by Melancthon, whereat our king Henry the VIII. and George duke of Saxony were much troubled.

About this time Thomas Muncer, an anabapriſt, wrote a fanatic book againſt him and his doctrine, and the boors ſeduced by him, roſe in arms, publiſhing their demands, whereof theſe were ſome: That they might chuſe their own miniſters; that they might pay no tithes, but of corn only, which alſo might be diſtributed partly to the poor, and other common uſes. That they ſhould not be uſed as ſervants, who were made free by the blood of Chriſt, &c. To theſe propoſes Luther wrote an anſwer, That indeed princes grievouſly offend by forbidding the ſincere preaching of the goſpel, and for overburdening of their ſubjects: but yet for theſe things the ſubjects may not take arms againſt their magiſtrates: that there was no reaſon why they ſhould place their hope in the multitude, ſeeing God can eaſily deſtroy them: that they abuſed the name of God, pretending it for their ſedition, as if they deſired to promote the ſincere glory of God, the doctrine of the goſpel, juſtice and equity, whereas indeed they go about to take from the magiſtrate the power that God hath given him, and whom God hath commanded them to obey. Afterwards he proceeded to examine their demands, ſhewing that the moſt of them were contrary to the law of nature and equity, telling them alſo how great their confuſion would be, ſhould they be granted. And for the reſt, which ſeemed to be grounded upon an equity, he referred them to be examined by the lawyers. Laſtly, he exhorted them lovingly and brotherly to lay down their arms, and to obey their magiſtrates: telling them that they might remove from thoſe places where the preaching of the goſpel is forbidden: but they may not oppoſe themſelves violently againſt their magiſtrates.

But when this admonition prevailed nothing, he wrote another treatiſe, wherein he exhorted all men to join together for the utter ſubverſion of theſe theiviſh incendiaries, as for the quenching of a common fire.

Thomas Muncer (a phanatical preacher) ſowed the ſeeds of this ſedition, and was holpen much by one Pfeiffer: theſe vented their dreams, and told their followers that they ſhould kill their enemies as mice in a barn. Hereupon ſome of the princes aſſembled their forces, and pitying this wretched ſeduced multitude, offered them peace if they would lay down their arms, and depart home: but Muncer told his followers, that the princes were afraid, and that by a divine revelation he could aſſure them of victory: hereupon they came to a battle, wherein 5000 of them were ſlain, and the reſt fled to Francoſium: but the princes purſuing them, took the city, put 300 more to death: and Muncer being taken, was brought before the princes, who chid him for his proceedings, and then racked him to confeſs his complices: upon the rack he cried out grievouſly, whereupon prince George of Saxony ſaid, 'But think upon the ſlaughter of the poor wretches, who being deceived by you, periſhed yeſterday:' upon this Muncer laughed outright, and ſaid, 'Why? they would be deceived.' When he was to be beheaded, he was ſo faint-hearted that he could not rehearſe the apoſtles creed: with him alſo was beheaded Pfeiffer, and ſome others and ſhortly after was finiſhed that mournful war of the clowns, wherein in ſeveral places were ſlain above fifty thouſand, ſome ſay one hundred thouſand.

Anno Chriſti 1525. Luther married Catherine a Boren; who who had formerly been a nun. This Luther's friends diſliked very much, that he ſhould marry at ſo unſeaſonable a time, when Germany weltred in the blood of the clowns, and Saxony mourned for the death of Frederick their prince: but Phil. Melancthon wrote thus to Camerarius. 'Perhaps ſome will wonder that Luther ſhould marry in theſe unhappy times, as if he cared not for thoſe miſchiefs which are before our eyes: but I think this was the occaſion of it: you know well enough his courſe of life, that he is none of thoſe that ſhun meetings; I think better to leave you to think the reſt, than that I ſhould write it: if any undecent thing be reported by the people of him, it is a lie and a calumny. I judge alſo that nature compelled him to become an huſband. If any thing ſeem unſeaſonable and unadviſed, it muſt not trouble us too much: perhaps there is ſome hidden and divine matter in it, into which it becometh not us curiouſly to ſearch, and becauſe I ſee him ſorrowful for the change of his condition, I labour to comfort him all that I can.'

Anno 1527. Luther fell ſick of a congealing of blood about his heart; but by the drinking of water of Carduus Benedictus, he recovered. Preſently after (on a Sabbath day) he endured a ſpiritual temptation, which he called the buffeting of Satan: 'It ſeemed to him that ſwelling ſurges of the ſea did ſound aloud at his left ear, and that ſo violently, that die he muſt, except they preſently grew calm: afterwards when the noiſe came within his head, he fell down as one dead, and was ſo cold in each part, ut nec calor, nec ſanguis, nec ſenſus, nec vox ſupereſſet: that he had remaining neither heat, nor blood, nor ſenſe, nor voice; but when his face was ſprinkled with cold water by Juſtus Jonas, he came to himſelf, and prayed moſt earneſtly, and made a confeſſion of his faith, ſaying, That he was unworthy to ſuffer martyrdom, which by his proceedings he might ſeem to run upon.' He often mentions this tentation in his letters to his friends, and was confirmed in his faith by receiving abſolution from a miniſter, and the uſe of the ſacrament.

Melancthon knowing the rage of the papiſts, and Cæſar's threats to ſubvert the goſpel, was much troubled at it, and gave himſelf wholly up to grief, ſighs and tears; whereupon Luther wrote to him: 'In private conflicts, you are found weak, and I ſtronger; becauſe I am aſſured that our cauſe is juſt and true: if we fall, Chriſt, the Lord and ruler of the world falleth with us; and ſuppoſe he fall, Mallem ruere cum Chriſto, quam regnare cum Cæſare, I had rather fall with Chriſt than ſtand with Cæſar: I extremely diſlike your exceſſive cares, with which you ſay, that you are almoſt conſumed: that theſe reign ſo much in your heart, it is not from the greatneſs of the danger, but the greatneſs of your incredulity. Si piam, & juſtam cauſam defendimus, cur Dei promiſſis non confidimus? præter vitam hanc miſellam Satanas, & mundus nobis eripere nihil poteſt. At vivit, & in ſempiternum regnat Chriſtus, in cujus tutela conſiſtit veritas: is nobis aderit: is etiam cauſam hanc, quæ non noſtra, ſed ipſius eſt, ad optatum producet finem. If the cauſe be bad, let us revoke it, and flie back: if it be good, why do we make God a liar! who hath made us ſo great promiſes: caſt thy care upon the Lord, &c. Be of good comfort, I have overcome the world. If Chriſt be the conqueror of the world, why ſhould we fear it as if it would overcome us? A man would fetch ſuch ſentences as theſe upon his knees, from Rome or Jeruſalem. Nolite igitur timere, eſſote fortes, & læti, nihil ſolliciti, Dominus prope adeſt: Be not afraid; be couragious and chearful: ſolicitous for nothing. The Lord is at hand to help us. And in another place when our king Henry the VIII. had written bitterly againſt him: Agant quicquid poſſunt Henrici, Epiſcopi, atque adeo Turca, & ipſe Satan, non filii ſumus regni, &c. Let the Henries, the biſhops, the Turk, and the devil himſelf do what they can; we are the children of the kingdom, worſhipping, and waiting for that Saviour whom they, and ſuch as they, ſpit upon and crucify.

Concerning this his anſwer, Eraſmus thus writes, if (ſaith he) Luther commending the king's good intention, had proceeded by ſtrong arguments, without violating the kingly majeſty, in my judgment, he had taken a better courſe for the defence of his cauſe. For what made Luther in his book to the king of England, to uſe theſe words, 'Come hither my lord Henry, and I will teach you?' Truly the king's book was written in Latin, and that not unlearnedly; but Luther thus excuſeth himſelf, 'If any man (ſaith he) be offended at my ſharpneſs againſt the king, let him know that in that book I dealt with ſenſeleſs monſters, who contemned my beſt and moſt modeſt writings, and by my humility and modeſty were more hardened in their errors: beſides I abſtained from bitterneſs and lies, with which the king's book was ſtuffed. Neither is it any wonder, If I contemn and bite an earthly king, when as he feared not at all in his writings to blaſpheme the King of heaven, and to profane his truth with virulent lies.'

Anno Chriſti 1523. A diet was held at Norinberg in the abſence of Cæſar, wherein the edict of Worms was made null; of this the pope's legat complained to the princes, ſaying, 'That Luther was not puniſhed according to the emperor's edict;' to which the princes anſwered; that the court of Rome neglected reformation; that Germany was ſo far enlightened by the ſermons and writings of Luther, that if they ſhould go about to put the edict in execution, great tumults would ariſe, and the people would be ready to think that they went about to oppreſs the truth, and to put out the light of the goſpel, that ſo they might the better defend thoſe manifeſt vices which could be no longer concealed.

The ſame year Luther publiſhed his book of the dignity and office of the civil magiſtrate. He wrote alſo to the Waldenſes about the adoration of the ſacrament. He publiſhed the Pentateuch in the German tongue. He wrote to the ſenate of Prague his book de inſtituendis miniſtris eccleſiæ, and another about the avoiding the doctrines of men; beſides divers others. What was judged of him for his conſtancy and reſolution, may appear by this.

Upon a time a motion was made in the conſiſtory at Rome, that a great ſum of money ſhould be proffered to him to buy him off from oppoſing popery; but one wiſer than the reſt, cried out, Hem! Germana illa beſtia non curat aurum ſed auram: That beaſt of Germay cares for no money, but ſeeks vain-glory.

Anno Chriſti 1529. he ſet forth both his Catechiſms; the leſſer in January, the greater in October following.

The year after the emperor ſummoned a diet at Auſpurg, giving the public faith for the ſecurity of all men that would come to the diet to ſet forth the form of their belief.

Hereupon the prince elector of Saxony to be the better prepared againſt this diet, appointed Luther, Juſtus Jonas, Pomeran and Melancthon, to ſet down the form of doctrine which the Saxon churches, and thoſe which accorded with them, did profeſs. Luther comprehended the ſum of his doctrine in ſeventeen articles, which being reviſed by Phil. Melancthon, and put into a better form, was afterwards called the confeſſion of Auſpurg.

And whereas it was given out that the emperor when he came into Germany would tread the goſpellers under his feet, the proteſtant princes met, and conſulted together whether it were better to go to the diet, or to meet the emperor in arms before he ſhould paſs the Alps.

Luther (who was always a counſellor of peace) diſſuaded them from taking arms under the pretence of religion, perſuading them rather by faith and prayer to beg, and look for help from God, whoſe cauſe (ſaith he) himſelf will defend.

Upon this advice the princes went to Auſpurg, yet left Luther not far off in Coburg caſtle to be near at hand, but out of danger, that his advice might be had in time of need. And when the diet was met, the elector of Saxony ſent to him to know whether the cauſe of religion ſhould be referred to the judgment of the emperor? This Luther would by no means have done: for (ſaith he) this honour is to be given to the word of God only to be judge of holy controverſies.

Anno Chriſti 1535. the landgrave of Heſs ſent for Bucer and Melancthon to Caſells, to reconcile them together about the buſineſs of the ſacrament, where after much conference Melancthon mitigated the rigor of his opinion about Chriſt's preſence; and at his return to Wittenberg he carried with him Bucer's declaration concerning that point, point, which when Luther had conſidered of, he began to hearken to an agreement with Zuinglius, writing moſt friendly to the divines of Straſborough and to others that there might be a meeting appointed, wherein after deliberation, the deſired concord might be confirmed. And accordingly anno Chriſti 1536. Bucer and divers other divines of Germany came to Wittenberg, where a form of concord was drawn up by Bucer, and ſubſcribed by both parties, but Bucer ſtriving to pleaſe both parties pleaſed neither: for the Helvetian divines rejected it; and Luther underſtanding of Bucer's various expoſition of it, was very wroth with him, and would no more reckon him amongſt his friends; and ſo all hope of concord was taken away.

Anno Chriſti 1537. The proteſtants being met at Smalkald drew up, and ſet forth the ſum of their religion and practice in a book called articuli ſmalcaldici, unto which Luther prefixed this preface.

Whereas pope Paul the III. ſummoned a council the laſt year, which was to meet at Mantua, and a little after adjourned it again without nominating time or place, ſo that it is not certain whether he will or can call it; and we alſo hoped that we ſhould have been called to it: or elſe it was to be feared that we ſhould be condemned not called: it was enjoined to me that I ſhould gather and write the articles of our doctrine, that if perhaps the matter went on, it might be known what, and how far we would and could yield to the papiſts, and in what points we would conſtantly perſevere: I have therefore written theſe articles, and delivered them to our party, who have peruſed and received them with one conſent, that they might be publicly preſented, and explain the confeſſion of our faith in the council if any one ſhall at length be aſſembled and held by the pope and popelings without lies and deceit in a true, lawful and Chriſtian manner.

'But ſeeing the court of Rome doth ſo fear a Chriſtian and free council and moſt fouly flieth the light, ſo that all hopes of ſeeing ſuch a council is utterly taken away even from the papiſts themſelves, to the great offence of many of them, taking ill the negligence of the pope herein; yea they eaſily from hence gather that the pope had rather ſee the deſtruction of all Chriſtianity, and the damnation of all ſouls, than to ſuffer a reformation of himſelf and courtiers, and the reſtraint of his tyranny.

'I thought fit therefore to publiſh theſe articles, that if I be taken out of this life before a council be called (which I truſt and hope ſhall ſo come to paſs) ſeeing theſe wicked fliers of the light labour ſo much to drive of and hinder a council, That they I ſay, which live after me, ſhould have my confeſſion and teſtimony, and may adjoin and publiſh it with the confeſſion which I have formerly ſet forth, wherein I have hitherto perſevered, and will (by God's grace) perſevere unto the end.

'What ſhall I ſay? How ſhall I begin my complaint? For being yet alive, I preach and read to others publicly and daily; and yet not only my virulent adverſaries, but my falſe brethren that ſay that they agree with us in opinion, dare bring and alledge my own doctrine and writings againſt me, whilſt I am alive, and ſee it and hear it, albe it they know that I teach otherwiſe; and they go about to adorn their own poiſon with my labours, ſo to deceive and ſeduce the ſimple with my name; good God, what then will be done after my deceaſe?

'I ſhould anſwer to all things whilſt I am alive: but how I pray you, can I alone ſtop all the mouths of the devil? eſpecially of them who being ſo full of poiſon, will neither hear nor heed what I write: but wholly employ themſelves wickedly to prevert and deprave my words even in the leaſt letters: let the devil and God's wrath anſwer them as they deſerve.

'I oftentimes remember good Gerſon, who oft doubted whether any thing that is good might be brought to light by writing. If writing be omitted, many ſouls are neglected which might have been delivered; and if it be done, preſently the devil is at hand with plaguy tongues full of ſlanders which corrupt all things, and fill them with poiſon, that the profit of the writings may be hindred thereby. Yet what commodity they receive by this their malice, is manifeſt; for whereas by loading us with lies they ſeek to draw away the ſimple from us, God ſo ordereth it by his providence for the promoting of his own work, that their company decreaſeth, and ours increaſeth daily; for God hath confounded, and ſtill will confound them and their lies.

'Lately there came a doctor out of France to Wittenberg, who told us openly that his king was made to believe that we had no true church amongſt us, no magiſtrates, no marriages, but that we all live promiſcuouſly together like brute beaſts. With what face will theſe falſe informers look upon us before the tribunal ſeat of Chriſt in his laſt judgment, who have ſo oft told their king ſuch falſe and prodigious lies? Chriſt who is the Lord and judge of us all knows that they beyle us. God convert them that are to be converted that they may repent, and overwhelm the reſt with eternal woe.

'But to return to the matter: I could wiſh with all my heart, that a free and Chriſtian council were aſſembled, that proviſion might be made for many things that are amiſs. Not that we have need of a council; for our churches are ſo enlightned, taught, and confirmed by the grace of God, with the pure word of God and true uſe of the ſacraments, that we need not a council, neither can a council ſhew us a truer or better way: but there is need of one in many other regards; in many biſhopricks divers pariſhes are deſtitute of ſpiritual food: yet the biſhops and canons regard not the life of thoſe poor men, for whom yet Chriſt died, ſo that they cannot hear the true ſhepherd ſpeaking to his ſheep; I fear Chriſt for this will call a council of angels to deſtroy Germany as he deſtroyed Sodom and Gomorrah. Beſides theſe affairs of the church many things need reformation in the civil ſtate: great diſcords are amongſt princes: uſury and covetouſneſs overflow like a deluge; wantonneſs, pride, riot, garniſh-in apparrel, bellycheer, dicing, pomp, malice, ſtubbornneſs of ſubjects, oppreſſion, &c. ſo over flow that they cannot be amended by ten councils, and twenty diets, &c. Our ſins weigh us down, and ſuffer not God to be gracious to us, becauſe inſtead of repenting we defend our abominations.

'O Lord Jeſus Chriſt, do thou ſummon and hold a council, and redeem thy ſervants by thy glorious coming: the pope and popelings are paſt cure: therefore help us poor and diſtreſſed men who groan unto thee, and ſeek thee with our hearts, according to the grace that thou haſt given us by thy holy Spirit, which liveth and reigneth with thee and the Father for ever,' amen.

Luther, leaſt he ſhould ſeem to have yielded any thing to the temperament of Bucer, which we ſpake of before, wrote to Albert of Brandenburg duke of Boruſſia, exhorting him to ſhun the ſacramentaries and their doctrine, and not to ſuffer it to creep anywhere into his dominions, leaſt he ſhould thereby ſo burden his conſcience with ſo great wickedneſs, that perhaps he ſhould never be able to pacify it again. They of Zurick took this very ill, and they wrote alſo to the duke of Boruſſia, requeſting him not to decree any thing againſt the profeſſors of their faith.

A while after Luther wrote an epiſtle to the aldermen of Francfurt, wherein he called the Zinglians, archdevils, and ſaid they were to be driven out of pulpits, and caſt out of the country.

He uſed to be very fervent in prayer; Vitus Theodorus thus writeth of him, no day paſſeth wherein Luther ſpendeth not three hours at leaſt in prayer. Once it fell out (ſaith he) that I heard him: good God! what a ſpirit, what a confidence was in his very expreſſion? with ſuch a reverence he ſueth for any thing, as one begging of God; and yet with ſuch hope and aſſurance, as if he ſpake with a loving father, or friend, &c.

When the papiſts charged him for a liar, a promiſe-breaker, and an apoſtate; Luther denying the former, yielded himſelf to be an apoſtate, but a bleſſed and holy one, who had not kept his promiſe made to the devil; ſaying, That he was no otherwiſe a revolter than a mamaluke turning Chriſtian, or a magician renouncing his covenant made with the devil, and betaking himſelf to Chriſt.

When Philip duke of Pomerania married Mary daughter to the elector of Saxony, Luther being preſent; prayed for a bleſſing, and taking Philip by the hand ſaid, 'The Lord God be with you, and keep your poſterity from failing;' but his wife continuing barren four years, all his male-ſtock was like to be extinct; yet at length, by God's bleſſing, according to Luther's prayer, he had ſeven ſons by her, which wonderfully enlarged that noble family.

Luther falling ſick of the ſtone, made his will, in which he bequeathed his deteſtation of popery to his friends and to the paſtors of the church. He alſo beforehand made this verſe,

Peſtis eram vivus, moriens ero mors tua papa:

I living ſtopt Rome's breath:
And dead, will be Rome's death.

Yet it pleaſed God in a ſhort ſpace to give him eaſe, and to reſtore him to his former health, which brought great joy to all his friends, and eſpecially to Melancton, who in an epiſtle to him congratulated his recovery.

Anno Chriſti 1537. The pope appointed a council at Vincentia for reforming the church, of which Luther wrote a book, and by a picture in the frontiſpiece ſhewed the argument of it; wherein the pope was pictured ſitting in a high throne, with ſome cardinals ſtanding by, with fox-tails on the one end of long poles, as with bruſhes pretending to ſweep the room, but preſently the duſt ſettled again as before.

About this time the new ſect of the Antinomians did ſtart up: the chief ring leader was Joannes Agricola of Iſleben, a familiar friend of Luther's: they held, that repentance was not to be taught from the decalogue: they oppoſed ſuch as taught that the goſpel was not to be preached to any but ſuch as were humbled by the law: and they taught that whatſoever a man's life was, though impure, &c. yet he was juſtified, ſo that he believed the goſpel: Luther confuted theſe.

Anno Chriſti 1540. there was a meeting appointed at Haganaw upon the Rhine, where the divines were to meet, and in a friendly manner to debate their differences: but as Melancthon was going thitherward, he fell ſick at Vinaria, made his will, and prepared for death; whereupon Luther and Cruciger by long journeys haſtened to him: and as ſoon as Luther ſaw how miſerably he was waſted with his diſeaſe, with ſighs and tears he brake out into this ſpeech, Alas! how precious and profitable an inſtrument of the church is miſerably weakned and ready to periſh! and there withall falling upon his knees he prayed moſt earneſtly for him: and Melancthon confeſſed, that if Luther had not come, he had died.

Anno Chriſti 1541. Luther wrote a conſolatory letter to Frederick Myconius, almoſt quite ſpent with a conſumption, affirming that he could have no joy to live if he died, and therefore wiſhed that himſelf might firſt lay down his earthly tabernacle: concluding, that he was verily perſwaded that his prayers ſhould be granted, as indeed it came to paſs; for Myconius out-lived him ſix years, and would often ſay, that Luther obtained this for him by his prayers.

Luther afterwards wrote his mind concerning ceremonies, (which he deſired might be few, and tending to edification) and excommunication, which he wiſhed might be brought into the church as a profitable diſcipline, but could ſcarce hope to ſee it.

Anno Chriſti 1544. Novemb. 17. he finiſhed his explication of Geneſis, which was his laſt publick reading in the univerſity, which he thus concluded: thus end I my explication on Geneſis; God grant that others may more rightly expound it then I have done: I cannot proceed further, my ſtrength faileth; pray for me, that I may have a quiet and comfortable departure out of this life.

This year in Italy was ſpread a moſt impudent lie about Luthers death: which they called Horrendum, & inaud tum miraculum, quod in æternum laudandus deus in fœda morte mart. Lutheri & corpore & anima damnati, exhibuit, in gloriam Jeſu Chriſti, atque in emendationem & conſolationem piorum. The ſubſtance of it was this: that when he ſaw he muſt die, he requeſted that his body ſhould be ſet upon the altar, and worſhipped with devine worſhip: but when his body was laid in the grave, ſuddainly ſo great a ſtir and terror aroſe, as if the foundations of the earth were ſhaken together: whereupon all that were preſent, trembling, and aſtoniſhed, lift up their eyes, and ſaw the ſacred hoſt appear in the air; whereupon they placed that upon the altar: but the night following a loud noiſe and ratling, ſhriller then the former, was heard about Luthers ſepulchre, which terrified all the city, and almoſt killed them with aſtoniſhment: in the morning when they opened the ſepulchre, they found neither body, bones, nor clothes, but a ſulphureous ſtink came out thereof, which almoſt overcame the ſtanders by, &c. This lie coming printed into Germany, Luther ſubſcribed with his own hand, I Martin Luther do profeſs, and witneſs under my own hand, that receiving this figment full of anger and fury concerning my death, I read it with a joyful mind and cheerful countenance: and, but that I deteſt the blaſphemy, which aſcribeth an impudent lie to the divine majeſty; for the other paſſages, I cannot but laugh at Satans, the popes and their complices hatred againſt me. God turn their hearts from their diabolical malice; but if he decree not to hear my prayer for their ſin unto death, then God grant that they may fill up the meaſure of their ſins, and ſolace themſelves with their libels, full fraught with ſuch like lies.

Anno Chriſti 1546. Luther (taking Melancthon and ſome others along with him) went into his own country, and returned in ſafety to Wittenberg again. And not long after he was ſent for back by the counts of Mansfield to compoſe a difference amongſt them about the borders of their countries, and their inheritances. Luther did not uſe to meddle with ſuch buſineſſes, having all his life been accuſtomed only to deal in eccleſiaſtical affairs: yet becauſe he was born in that country he would not be wanting to promote the peace of it. And therefore having preached his laſt ſermon at Wittenberg, January the 17th, upon the 23d day he began his journey; and at Hall in Saxony, he lodged at Juſtus Jonas his houſe; and paſſing over the river with Jonas, and his own three ſons, they were in danger of drowning: whereupon he ſaid to Juſtus Jonas, 'Think you not that it would rejoice the devil very much, if I and you, and my three ſons ſhould be drowned?' He was honourably entertained by the earl of Mansfield, who ſent an hundred horſe that conveyed him to Iſleben, being very weak, whereupon he ſaid, that he never undertook any great buſineſs, but he was attended with ſuch ſickneſs: yet after the uſe of ſome fomentations he was prettily well, and attended the buſineſs about which he came, from the 29th of January to the 17th of February; during which time he preached ſometimes in the church, and twice adminiſtred the Lord's ſupper, and ordained two to the work of the miniſtry; at his table he uſed holy conference, and was daily very fervent in his prayers.

The day before his death he dined and ſupped with his friends, diſcourſing of divers matters, and amongſt the reſt gave his opinion that in heaven we ſhall know one another, becauſe Adam knew Eve at firſt ſight, &c. After ſupper his pain in his breaſt increaſing, he went aſide and prayed; then went to bed and ſlept; but about midnight, being awakened with the pain, and perceiving that his life was at an end, he ſaid, 'I pray God to preſerve the doctrine of his goſpel amongſt us; for the pope and the council of Trent have grievous things in hand:' after which he thus prayed, 'O heavenly Father, my gracious God, and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thou God of all conſolation, I give thee hearty thanks that thou haſt revealed unto me thy Son Jeſus Chriſt, whom I believe, whom I profeſs, whom I love, whom I glorify, whom the pope and the rout of the wicked perſecute and diſhonour; I beſeech thee Lord Jeſus Chriſt receive my ſoul; O my heavenly Father, though I be taken out of this life, and muſt lay down this frail body; yet I certainly know that I ſhall live with thee eternally, and that I cannot be taken out of thy hands, God ſo loved the world, &c. Lord, I render up my ſpirit into thy hands, and come to thee;' and again, 'Lord into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, thou O God of truth haſt redeemed me:' and ſo, as one falling aſleep, and without any bodily pain that could be diſcerned, he departed this life February 18th, anno 1546. and in the great climacterial year of his life.

This was the will which he made concerning his wife with child, and his young ſon; 'O Lord God, I thank thee that thou wouldſt have me live a poor and indigent perſon upon earth; I have neither houſe nor land, nor poſſeſſions, nor money to leave, thou Lord haſt given me wife wife and children: them Lord I give back to thee; nourish, inſtruct, and keep them (O thou the Father of orphans, and Judge of the widow) as thou haſt done to me, ſo do to them.'

When he was ready to die, Juſtus Jonas and Cælius ſaid to him, O reverend father, do you die in the conſtant confeſſion of that doctrine of Chriſt which you have hitherto preached? To which he anſwered Yea, which was the laſt word that he ſpake.

He was ever conſtant in the known truth, from the confeſſion whereof he could never be removed neither by promiſes nor threats.

In the diſmal wars which followed, when Wittenberg was yielded to the emperor Charles, and he came to ſee Luther's tomb, ſome of his Spaniards perſuaded him that the body of Luther ſhould be taken up and burned; the emperor ſaid, Suffer him to reſt till the day of the reſurrection and judgment of all men.

When he was fitting himſelf for his journey to Iſleben, he confeſſed to Melanchthon that he had gone too far in the ſacramentary controverſy; hereupon Melancton perſuaded him to explicate his mind by publiſhing ſome book; but he anſwered, hereby I ſhall bring a ſuſpicion upon all my doctrine as faulty, but when I am dead you may do as you ſee cauſe.

He was full of affections towards his children, gave them liberal education by keeping a ſchoolmaſter in his houſe to train them up in learning and godlineſs.

When he ſaw his daughter Magdalen ready to die, he read to her, Iſa. xxvi. 19. 'Thy dead men ſhall live; together with my dead body ſhall they ariſe, &c. Adding, my daughter enter thou into thy chamber in peace: I ſhall ere long be with thee. For God will not permit me to ſee the puniſhment which hangs over the head of Germany, whereupon he wept plentifully: but when he followed the corps, he ſo reſtrained his affection, that he ſhed not a tear.

He uſed to ſay, that three things make a divine: meditation, prayer, tentation: and that three things were to be done by a miniſter: 1. To read the bible over and over. 2 To pray earneſtly. 3. Always to be a learner. And that they were the beſt preachers, who ſpake as to babes in Chriſt, in an ordinary ſtrain, popularly and moſt plainly. He ſaid, that in the cauſe of God, he was content, totius mundi odium & impetum ſuſtinere, to undergo the hatred and violence of the whole world.

He was very liberal to the poor: A poor ſtudent asking him ſome money, he bade his wife give him ſome: but ſhe pleading penury, whereupon he took up a ſilver cup, and gave it him. Alſo a friend ſending him two hundred angels of gold, he beſtowed them all on poor ſtudents: and when the elector gave him a new gown, he ſaid, that he was made too much of: for (ſaith he) if here we receive a full recompenſe of our labours, we ſhall hope for none in another life. And again he ſaid, turning myſelf to God, Valde proteſtatus ſum, me nolle ſic ſatiari ab eo I ſaid flatly that God ſhould not put me off with theſe low things. And having a vein of metal offered him, he refuſed it, leaſt he ſhould incur the temptation of the devil, who is Lord of treaſure under the earth. He never took any thing of printers for his copies.

On a time one brought him a ſtone that was found in the mines in Mansfield, which had upon it the image of the pope with his tripple crown: whereupon he ſaid, Hem, oportet papam revelari etiam per metalla & metallicos. The pope muſt be revealed even by metals and metal-diggers.

His private life was very exemplary: at dinner and ſupper-time he uſed often to dictate ſermons unto others. ſometimes to correct ſheets from the preſs: ſometimes with muſick to refreſh his friends: he was very temperate both in meat and drink: ſometimes he uſed to faſt four days together: and other ſometimes to eat only a little bread, and an herring. As much as he could he avoided feaſts, that he might not ſpend time. In his converſe with his friends he was pleaſant, courteous and ſociable mixed with gravity. He ſometimes uſed recreations, and amongſt the reſt, turning in a Lathe. He would never be idle. He was very loving to and tender of his children, maintaining a ſchoolmaſter in his houſe to inſtruct them in piety and learning. He was very paſſionate, but ſoon appeaſed: Melancthon ſeeing him once in a paſſion ſaid, Vince animos iramque tuam qui cætera vincis: whereupon he ſmiling, ſaid, we will no longer diſpute of theſe matters, and ſo he diſcourſed pleaſantly of other things. He foretold many things which afterwards came to paſs. He was very healthful, but that ſometimes he was troubled with the head-ach, eſpecially towards his letter end, whereupon he feared an apoplexy: and when his head was ſo out of order he uſed to ſay Feri, Domine, feri clementer: ego paratus ſum: quia verba tua a peccatis abſolutus, & corpore & ſanguine tuo paſtus. He was troubled with frequent tentations, whereupon he uſed to write, Valemus omnes præter Lutherum ipſum, qui corpore ſanus, foris a toto mundo, intus a diabolo patitur, & omnibus angelis ejus.

He was big of ſtature, ſtrong, and had ſuch a ſharp ſight, that few could endure ſtedfaſtly to look upon him. Upon a time one was ſent upon pretence of private conference, to piſtol him: Luther entertained him friendly, but withal, ſtedfaſtly looking upon him, the man was ſo terrified, that he took care for nothing but how he might run away: he had a gentle and clear voice. He lived chaſtly and holily in wedlock above twenty years, and after his death left three ſons, and his widow who lived ſeven years after him; who was much grieved that ſhe was abſent at his death, whereby ſhe could not perform her laſt duty of love to him as ſhe deſired. Preſently after his death the wars breaking forth, ſhe wandered up and down with her children as an exile through many difficulties and dangers, and beſides the inconveniencies of her widowhood which were many, ſhe met with great ingratitute from many, from whom ſhe expected better, conſidering how much her huſband had deſerved from the church.

At length being returned to Wittenberg, after a while the plague brake forth; wherefore removing with her children to Feragaw, as ſhe was paſſing in a waggon, the horſes affrighted at ſomething, ran away, whereupon leaping out of the waggon ſhe bruiſed herſelf, and falling into a lake of water ſhe caught a diſeaſe, whereof ſhe died three months after, anno Chriſti 1552.

One ſaith of him, that Luther a poor fryar ſhould be able to ſtand againſt the pope, was a great miracle: that he ſhould prevail againſt the pope, was greater, and after all, to die in peace, having ſo many enemies, was the greateſt of all.

Again, it was no leſs miraculous that he ſhould eſcape ſo many dangers: for when a certain Jew was ſuborned to kill him by poiſon, Luther had warning of it before hand, and the picture of the Jew ſent him, whereby he knew him, and avoided the danger; concerning which himſelf thus writes: there is, ſaith he, here with us a certain Poloniſh Jew, that is hired with two thouſand crowns to poiſon me; this is diſcovered to me by letters from my friends; he is a doctor of phyſic, and one that dares undertake, and is ready to perform any villainy, of incredible ſubtilty and dexterity.

On a time as Luther was walking in his garden, the devil appeared to him in the ſhape of a black boar, but he ſlighted him, after which he vaniſhed. Another time as he was ſitting in a certain place on his ſtool, there was a great ſtone over his head in the vault which being ſtayed up miraculouſly ſo long as he ſate there, ſo ſoon as he was up, immediately it fell upon the place where he ſate, being able to have cruſhed him in pieces, if it had light upon him.

And again, a young man about Wittenberg, being kept bare and needy by his father, was tempted by the devil to yeild himſelf body and ſoul to him upon condition to have his wiſh ſatisfied with money, and thereupon an obligation was made by the young man, written with his own blood, and delivered to the devil. But preſently after, the man began to decay in his health, ſo that (the thing being ſuſpected,) he was brought to Luther, who examined him about it, but he, through fear and ſhame, long denyed to confeſs any thing, yet at laſt through Gods mercy he revealed the whole matter to him: whereupon Luther much pitying his lamentable condition, called the whole congregation together, where he prayed with ſo much earneſtneſs and affection, that the devil was at laſt compelled to throw in his obligation at the window.

And

And as he was mighty in prayer, ſo in his ſermons, God giving him ſuch a grace, that when he preached, they which heard him, thought every one his own temptations ſeverally to be noted and touched; whereupon ſome of his friends aſking him the cauſe of it: mine own manifold temptations and experiences (ſaid he) are the cauſe of it. Wellerus alſo a diſciple of Luther's recordeth, that he oft heard his maſter thus report of himſelf, 'That he had been often aſſaulted and vexed with all kind of temptations, ſave only unto the ſin of covetouſneſs.'

Lutherus multa Latiora, & vernaculo ſermone ſcripſit, quæ diverſis hinc & temporibus ſeparatim primum edita, et poſtea collecta, et in plures Tomos diſtributa. There is alſo lately printed in Engliſh his Colloquia menſalia of which one thus writes: Præſtitiſſet hos ſermones convivales in lucem nunquam emiſſos: forte adverſariis procurantibus illi editi. Sin minus, videant ii qui Lutheranorum nomine ſuperbiunt, quamodo modeſtiam, judicium, exiſtimationem, et authoritatem Lutheri defendere queant. Sunt enim in iis, non dico multa, ſed plurima, quæ piæ, caſtigatque aures non ſolum in conviviis Theologorum, ſed etiam in ludis, atque theatris comicorum non ferrent, &c.

Concerning his works he thus writes, 'Above all things I requeſt the pious reader, and beſeech him for our Lord Chriſt Jeſus ſake, that he read my books with judgment, yea with much pity; and let him remember that I was ſometime a fryar, and a mad papiſt, and when I firſt undertook this cauſe, ſo drunken and drowned in popiſh doctrines, that I was ready, if I could, to have killed all men, or to have aſſiſted others in doing of it, who withdrew their obedience from the pope but in one ſyllable; ſuch a Saul was I, as there are many at this day; neither was I ſo cold and frigid in defending the pope as Eccius, and ſome like him are; who ſeem to me to defend the papacy rather that for their bellies ſake, then in good earneſt: yea, like Epicures, they ſeem to me to deride the pope, whereas I was ſerious in his cauſe as one that trembled at the thoughts of the day of judgment, and from my very heart deſired to be ſaved.' He would by no means endure that any ſhould be called after his name; for (ſaith he) 'The doctrine which I teach is none of mine, neither did I die for any man; neither would Paul 1 Cor. iii. 4. &c. endure ſuch terms; beſides we are all Chriſtians, and profeſs the doctrine of Chriſt; and laſtly, becauſe the papiſts uſe to do ſo, calling themſelves Pontificians, whom we ought not to imitate.' Melanchthon gave this teſtimony of him; Pomeram (ſaith he) is a grammarian, and explains the force of the words; I am a logician ſhewing the context and arguments of things; Juſtus Jonas is an orator, and ſpeaks copiouſly and eloquently; but Luther is all, even a miracle amongſt men; whatſoever he ſaith, whatſoever he writes, pierceth into the ſoul, and leaveth wonderful ſtings in the hearts of men.

Many epitaphs were made of him, amongſt which theſe were ſome.

Roma orbem domuit: Romam ſibi Papa ſubegit:
Viribus illa ſuis, fraudibus iſte ſuis.
Quando iſto major Lutherus, major & illa,
Iſtum, illamque uno qui domuit calamo!
I nunc! Alciden memorato Græcia mendax:
Lutheri ad calamum ferrea clava nihil.

Lutherus decimum confecit ſtrage Leonem:
De clava noli quærere, penna fuit.

Jo. Major.

He uſed often to ſay, that, through God's goodneſs, there ſhould be no wars in Germany in his life time; but (ſaith he) let the ſurvivours look to it after my death.

Concerning the doctrine of the goſpel he uſed to ſay that three things would deſtroy the Chriſtian religion; firſt, forgetfulneſs of the bleſſings received by the goſpel. Secondly, Security which reigns everywhere. Laſtly worldly wiſdom, which will ſeek to bring all things into order, and to ſupport the public peace by wicked counſels.

He was of a ſharp and quick wit; of a great invincible mind; conſtant in the known truth, from the confeſſion whereof he could not be withdrawn either by threats or promiſes.

Many falſe reports were raiſed of him by the papiſts, inſomuch as king Ferdinands ambaſſador went to ſee what a manner of man he was, telling him that it was reported in his king's court, that he never went abroad but armed and attended with his guard; that he ſpent all his time with whores at dice and taverns; but (ſaith he) I am well accuſtomed to ſuch lies.

He had a very ſharp and ſatyrical ſtile; ſo that Eraſmus uſed to ſay, Deus dedit huic poſtremæ ætati propter morborum magnitudinem acrem medicum: God hath given to this latter age, by reaſon of the greatneſs of its diſeaſes, a ſharp phyſician; and Charles the emperor uſed to ſay, Si ſacrificuli frugi eſſent, nullo indigerent Luthero: if prieſts were not ſo diſſolute, they would not need a Luther.

When this emperor had taken Wittenberg, ſome of his Spaniſh ſoldiers would have digged up Luther's body, and burnt it; but he ſaid to them, Sinite ipſum quieſcere, uſque ad diem reſurrectionis, & judicii omnium. Let him reſt till the day of reſurrection and of the judgment of all things.

The Life of ZUINGLIUS, who died Anno Chriſti 1531.

HULDERICUS Zuinglius was born in Switzerland of godly parents, and by them brought up in learning; being about ten years old, was ſent to ſchool to Baſil to George Bintzlius, where he profited ſo much, that in all diſputations he went away with the victory: he excelled all in muſic. From Baſil he was ſent to Bern, to Henry Lupulus, a moſt learned man, and an excellent poet, under whom he learned rhetoric, and became a good poet.

After two years he went to Vienna in Auſtria, where he ſtudied philoſophy, and profited much therein: after a while he was called back into his own country, and to Baſil he taught others what himſelf had learned, where alſo he commenced maſter of arts, and fell to the ſtudy of ſchool-divinity; and being called to a paſtoral charge, he entred into the miniſtry, and ſtudied divinity very hard: and to furniſh himſelf with examples, he got Valerius Maximus by heart: he eſpecially addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of the Bible: and finding his defect in the knowledge of the tongues, he learn'd Greek: wrote out St. Paul's Epiſtles, and got them by heart, and grew ſo perfect, that he underſtood Greek better than Latin; and reading in St. Peter that no ſcripture is of private interpretation, he betook himſelf by earneſt prayer to God for the Spirit of truth to be his teacher: and leaſt he ſhould be miſled by a falſe ſpirit, he compared ſcripture with ſcripture, and expounded obſcure texts by thoſe which were more clear.

In his miniſtry he ſet himſelf much againſt the ſins of the times, eſpecially againſt penſions which the Swiſſes uſed to receive of princes to ſerve as mercenaries in their armies, which procured him much hatred.

After a while he was choſen to a place called our lord hermitage, by Theobaldus Guolzeggius the baron thereof; to which place there was great reſort of people from all countries, who came on pilgrimage, which much moved him to embrace that call, that he might have opportunity to diſperſe the knowlege of the truth into ſeveral parts: about this time one of the chief miniſters dying at Zurick, they much deſired Zuinglius to ſucceed him, and he coming accidentally to that place, was choſen paſtor there, anno Chriſti 1519. and began to preach unto them the hiſtory of Chriſt out of Matthew. Preſently after there came one Sampſon a Franciſcan fryar, and a preacher of indulgences, who was ſent by the pope into Switzerland to get money: Zuinglius ſtrongly oppoſed himſelf againſt him, ſhewing him to be an impoſtor; the biſhop alſo of Conſtance wrote to Zuinglius to keep this Sampſon out of Zurick, becauſe he had not acquainted him with his authority: yet when this impoſtor came to Zurick, becauſe he was kept out, he went to Badena, ſetting forth the pope's bulls to ſale: often crying out, 'Behold they flie, behold they flie,' as if he had ſeen with his eyes the ſouls which which he had delivered out of purgatory flying into heaven.

Zuinglius alſo cauſed the pope to be admoniſhed by the commiſſary nor to excommunicate Luther, for that he foreſaw the Germans would deſpiſe both him and his excommunication, which alſo came to paſs.

Anno Chriſti 1520. the ſenate of Zurick by the council of Zuinglius, commanded the preachers of their juriſdiction freely to teach whatſoever might be proved by the authority of the prophets and apoſtles, paſſing by the inventions of men. Hereupon the biſhop of Conſtance by public proclamation forbade thoſe of Zurick to innovate any thing, willing them to remain in the faith of the church of Rome, till a council might be conveened: but Zuinglius defended them and his writings: and the magiſtrates of Zurick entreated the biſhop to come to a ſynod where learned men might confer together, and determine what the people ought to believe. Yet the biſhop wrote again to them, ſhewing them what complaints he had heard of Zuinglius, which he could not but take notice of, the city belonging to his juriſdiction: but Zuinglius going to the bench of aldermen, defended his doctrine, and ſatisfied them.

Anno Chriſti 1522. the biſhop wrote again to the college of canons at Zurick, exhorting them to take heed to themſelves, for that pope Leo and the emperor by their proclamations had condemned thoſe doctrines: he put them in mind therefore to obey thoſe decrees, and not to innovate any thing in religion, till thoſe whom it concerned had by common council ſet down ſomewhat. Hereupon Zuinglius wrote back to the biſhop that he underſtood by whoſe ſetting on he did theſe things, but he wiſhed him not to follow their counſel: for, ſaith he, the truth is invincible, and will not be reſiſted. And afterwards ſome others joining with him, they wrote to the biſhop, entreating him to decree nothing againſt the doctrine of the goſpel, and that he would no longer endure the filthy and infamous life of the prieſts, but that he would ſuffer them to marry.

Zuinglius wrote alſo to the Helvetians that they ſhould not hinder the courſe of the goſpel; that they would not trouble miniſters for marrying, for that the command for their living without wives was the doctrine of Satan. He exhorted them alſo, whereas their manner was in their pages, or pariſhes, when they admitted a prieſt, to command him to take a concubine, leſt he ſhould attempt the chaſtity of other women, that inſtead thereof they ſhould command them to take lawful wives.

About this time Luther's books coming abroad, though himſelf abſtained from reading of them, yet he perſuaded his people to buy, and read them; which he did, that they might ſee the agreement that was in their doctrine, being both taught by the ſame ſpirit: there alſo he ſtudied Hebrew, and got the ſenate to erect a ſchool for Latin, Greek and Hebrew; and aſſociating to himſelf Leo Judæ, he got ſuch ſkill in the Hebrew, that he began to explain Iſaiah and Jeremiah.

Shortly after there came to Zurick Franciſcus Lambertus, and diſputed with Zuinglius about the interceſſion of the ſaints, and the ſacrifice of maſs; but being non-plus'd, he left his error, and gave praiſe to God.

Zuinglius began alſo to write about this time; and pope Adrian wrote to him with great promiſes to oblige him to the papal-ſee; but all in vain. Shortly after he perſuaded the ſenate to reſtrain the exorbitant number of prieſts and friars, yet withal to allow them a competent ſubſiſtence for their life time; which was done accordingly: and their revenues were employed for the maintainance of the miniſtry, for advancement of learning, and for the poor: he preſſed alſo the taking away of images, the aboliſhing of the maſs, and the reſtoring of the Lord's ſupper; which the ſenate aſſented to, and performed not only in the city of Zurick, but through all the places within their juriſdiction.

Anno Chriſti 1523. when the ſenators of Zurick underſtood that the doctrine of Zuinglius was traduced every where, as being wicked and ungodly, they commanded all the miniſters of their juriſdiction to meet together on the 29th of January about the differences of their religion, promiſing that every one ſhould be fully heard; they beſeeched alſo the biſhop of Conſtance that he would either come himſelf or ſend thither ſome of his divines.

At the day appointed many met together, John Faber the biſhop's vicar being alſo preſent, who pleaded hard that this place was unfit to handle ſuch cauſes, but that they were to be referred to a general council. But Zuinglius urged him that if he had any thing againſt his doctrine which he had publiſhed in 47 Poſitions, he ſhould produce it, and he ſhould be anſwered either by word of mouth or writting, which when Faber would not conſent to, the magiſtrates diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and proclaimed throughout their juriſdiction that the goſpel ſhould be purely taught out of the books of the Old and New Teſtament, the traditions of men being laid aſide; and in February following Leo Judæ was made preacher in St Peter's church in Zurick, and he married a wife, and the like did other miniſters.

Anno Chriſti 1524. The magiſtrates of Zurick forbad proceſſions, removed the martyrs tombs out of the chief churches in the city, took down the idols and images, and burnt them publicly; the like they did in all places as far as their juriſdiction extended. Alſo Katherine Cimmerin the abbeſs delivered up her nunnery into the hands of the mayor, married an huſband, and was by the magiſtrates endowed with a large eſtate of yearly revennes: converting the nunnary and the revenues of it to the education of youths under a good maſter. This year alſo Zuinglius married Ann Rembart, the widdow of the noble John Mouer.

Anno Chriſti 1525 The maſs was aboliſhed at Zurick, as images had been the year before: concerning which Zuinglius thus telleth the ſtory; When (ſaith he) we deale before the bench of ſenators conſiſting of two hundred about the aboliſhing of the maſs, a certain Scribe or notary ſtood up and ſpake thus; 'O ye fathers, I am not of that rank to ſpeak before you when any cauſe of the commonwealth is handled; but when matters of ſalvation are treated of, and the faith itſelf is in danger, it concerns every man to ſpeak what he thinks; I therefore profeſs that I am of opinion that the true fleſh and blood of Chriſt is received in the ſacrament, and I hope that you will by no means force me to the opinion of Zuinglius.

To this Zuinglius anſwered, that no man at Zuric had been compelled to the faith; that he uſed no ſophiſtical interpretation, when he expounded this is my body. For this ſignifies my body: and ſo he went on to confirm his own opinion, and to refel the others. Then Henry Englhard, formerly a popiſh doctor, but now a diſciple of Chriſt, ſaid, I ſhall prove by ſcripture that the bread cannot be the body of Chriſt, for it is neither the natural, nor glorified, nor myſtical body of Chriſt, therefore not his body, &c. After this conflict was ended, the aldermen appointed that after dinner four of them ſhould confer with Zuinglius and his brethren, that ſo weighty a buſineſs might be gravely diſcuſſed for the better ſatisfying of ſome that ſtill doubted. When they were met together, the buſineſs was variouſly debated, and in the end reſolved that it ſhould again be referred to the hearing of the bench of aldermen. And the next day when they were again met together, Zuinglius and his brethren ſtill deſired that the maſs might wholly be aboliſhed: whereupon the ſcribe ſtood up again, and told Zuinglius that he had ſaid indeed with theſe words, 'This is my body,' Chriſt meant, this ſignifies my body, but had not ſufficiently proved it by teſtimonies of ſcripture, for, ſaith he, whereas you have inſtanced, 'This ſeed is the word; the field is the word; the enemy is the devil, &c.' Theſe make not to the purpoſe; for there Chriſt ſpake parabolically, but this is no parable when he ſaith, 'This is my body.' To this Zuinglius anſwered, that though he ſpake not parabolically, yet he ſpake tropically. Upon this the aldermen decreed that hereafter the euchariſt ſhould be celebrated according to Chriſt's inſtitution, and that the maſs ſhould be no more uſed amongſt them. At this the whole church much rejoiced; only a few of the ruder ſort repined, urging that the proteſtant miniſters ſhould produce ſome example out of the ſcripture; wherein the words ought to be in like manner expounded: hereupon they began to reſolve all things, yet no example came into their minds; but a few nights after Zuinglius dreamed that he contended again with the ſcribe till he was aweary, and at laſt was ſo dumb that he could not ſpeak; whereupon he was exceedingly troubled: but after a while a monitor came to him from above, who ſaid, 'O ſluggard, why doſt thou not anſwer him with that which is written in the 12 of Exod. This is the paſſover of the Lord?' Immediately he awakened, and leaping out of his bed, examined the text; and next day diſputed it before the whole aſſembly, which was entertained with ſuch approbation that all were well ſatisfied; and, ſaith he, the three next days we had the greateſt ſacraments that ever I ſaw; and the number of thoſe that looked back to the garlic and fleſh-pots of Egypt, was far leſs than men thought they would have been.

Anno Chriſti 1526. The other pages of the Helvetians had often ſent to Zurick to caſt off their new religion, and to return to the old. The ſenators anſwered that they would obey if they might be convinced of error; whereupon the Helvetians invite Eccius to diſpute with Zuinglius, and Eccius himſelf wrote a bitter letter to the ambaſſadors of Zurick, met at Baden, wherein he accuſed Zuinglius of hereſy, requiring them to appoint a time and place whither he might come to prove it.

Zuinglius hearing of it, wrote an apology for himſelf to the ambaſſadors, ſaying, that Eccius dealt both inhumanely and ungodly with him: for (ſaith he) if I be an heretick, Eccius ſhould have admoniſhed me either by letters, or face to face to convince me of hereſy, and not have traduced me to the magiſtrates before I was heard: he wrote alſo that he was ready to diſpute with Eccius before his own auditors, not admitting any other judge than the word of God.

Eccius replyeth to this epiſtle, interweaving many ſlanders, and deſiring that the place for diſputation might be either Lucern or Baden. Zuinglius anſwered that if Eccius refuſed to come to Zurick. He had much more reaſon to refuſe thoſe places where he was already condemned of hereſy, and where his death and deſtruction was ſought after. Then did the ſenators of Zurick write to Eccius, to come thither upon the public faith: but Eccius refuſed, now accuſing Oecolampadius alſo.

At length the twelve pages decreed that they muſt needs diſpute, and after much conteſt the meeting was at Zurick: the diſputants were Eccius and Oecolampadius: but no good iſſue came of it; ſo that the nine pages concluded that Zuinglius the chief man of the new religion muſt be excommunicated, and all others that had not been reformed by this conference.

The year after they of Bern appointed a diſputation, which the popiſh pages oppoſed, but they proceeded in it, and the iſſue was that (the diſputation being ended) by public conſent they decreed that maſſes, altars, images, and all ſuperſtitions brought in contrary to the word of God ſhould be at once taken away out of their city and large territories. Monaſteries and nunneries they turned into ſchools. Then they renounced the league of the French king, forbidding him to leavy any mercenaries in their dominions, contenting themſelves only with that pay which he giveth to every page for friendſhip, as they of Zurick had alſo done. Laſtly, they write the day and year of their aboliſhing the popiſh religion upon a pillar in golden letters, that an everlaſting memorial might remain there to future poſterities. The like reformation was effected at Baſil.

Not long after quarrels aroſe between the popiſh and proteſtant cantons of the Switzers, and armies were raiſed on both ſides: they of Zurick publiſhing the cauſes why they took arms: as firſt that the popiſh Switzers beat their men when they came to require their debts. Then that the Underwalds hung the arms of Bern, Baſil and Strasborough upon the gallows. Then that they had made a league with their ancient enemy king Ferdinand to oppreſs their religion: whereby they violate not only the law of nature, but alſo their own covenants: but when the armies drew near, by the mediation of their neighbours the differences were compoſed, and arms laid down for the preſent.

Anno Chriſti 1529. Philip Landgrave of Heſs endeavoured to reconcile the differences between the Saxon and Helvetian divines concerning the euchariſt: for which end he called from Wittenberg, Luther, Juſtus Jonas, and Melancthon; from Helvetia, Zuinglius and Oecolampadius. From Norenberg, Oſiander: from Hall, John Brentius: from Strasborough, Bucer and Hedio. At their coming, all were courteouſly entertained by the landgrave: after dinner Oecolampadius and Bucer went to ſalute Luther, who ſpake friendly to Oecolampadius; but being ſaluted by Bucer, he anſwered, 'You are naught, and a knave;' the diſputation continued many days, but in the beginning of it Luther told them that he would not depart an hair's breadth from his opinion; and when they could not agree, yet the Helvetians deſired Luther that he would account of them as of brethren; which he would by no means aſſent unto: then did Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, and Bucer proteſt before the aſſembly that Luther had not defended his opinion by the word of God, that his error had been clearly ſhewed him, and that the truth of their cauſe had been abundantly demonſtrated both out of the word of God and the moſt ancient fathers: and ſo (the ſweating ſickneſs breaking out) the diſputation ended, and they returned home. Yet it pleaſed God, that this fruit the conference had, that they agreed in thirteen other articles, and promiſed mutual love each to other; and to join in prayer to God to diſcover his truth to them. The landgrave of Heſs alſo was converted to the true opinion hereby; ſo that he was hardly drawn to ſubſcribe the Auguſtine confeſſion, proteſting that he was not ſatisfied about the tenth article. Alſo Francis Lambert his preacher, who had formerly been addicted to Luther, being now overcome with the truth of God's word, changed his opinion about the ſacrament, ſignifying his opinion to the whole church by a confeſſion which he wrote, and delivered it to the miniſters of Strasborough when he lay upon his death-bed, who after publiſhed it.

About that time there aroſe up the cata-baptiſts, which denied the baptiſm of infants, and re-baptized themſelves and fell alſo into many other abominable errors and hereſies: with theſe Zuinglius at firſt dealt very mildly and brotherly; but when they began to aſperſe him with lies, to ſeduce his hearers, and make a ſchiſm in the church, he was forced to oppoſe them more ſtrongly in his public miniſtry and by diſputations: but though he had ſilenced them, they raged the more againſt him; whereupon the ſenate impriſoned ſome, proſcribed others, and (for ſatisfying their faith) put ſome to death: the firſt father of Balthaſar Hucmerus, an apoſtate, and one that for Zuinglius, his kindneſs, loaded him with lies and reproaches.

The monks and fryars being caſt out of their houſes, and brought to penſions, ſought to enſnare him; and for that end, ſuborned ſometime ſome to ſeize upon him, and to carry him away, others to kill him; ſo that he could not ſtir abroad in ſafety in the night, whereupon his friends guarded him when he was abroad at ſupper, and the ſenate were fain to appoint a guard about his houſe in the night time.

Anno Chriſti 1531. They of Zurick and Bern ſtopped proviſion from being carried to the five popiſh pages, and withall ſet out this declaration: that being compelled by the wrongs of the five cities, they had barred them from proviſion, and becauſe they refuſed the conditions of peace which were propounded by the interceſſors, violating the covenants of the former years, by which order was taken that no man's religion ſhould be prejudicial to him: wherefore, ſay they, it is lawful for us to deny them food; and if any conteſt ſhould ariſe about it, it ought to be imputed to them who deſire nothing but diſſentions.

But when by reaſon hereof thoſe five cities were pinched with want, they levied troops, and came forth with banners diſplayed, and ſooner than was expected entered into the bounds of them of Zurick, where was a garriſon of one thouſand men placed: this garriſon diſcerning its own weakneſs, ſent meſſenger after meſſenger into the town to haſten to help them: but ſuch was the ſpeed of the enemy that the ſuccours came late: yet when they came to the top of the mountain, they ſaw their ſoldiers fighting, and in preſent danger, whereupon exhorting and encouraging one another, they ran down the hill with all ſpeed: but the paſſage was ſo narrow that they could go but ſingle, ſo that wanting time to rank themſelves, they were oppreſſed with multitude: about three hundred and eighty of them were ſlain, and the reſt eſcaped by flight.

Zuinglius

Zuinglius was in this battle; for it is the cuſtom of the Switzers that their chief miniſter goeth out with them to battle; and Zuinglius being wiſe, courageous, and valiant, conſidered with himſelf that if he ſhould ſtay at home and the battle prove ill, he ſhould be expoſed to much envy, as if he had encouraged others before danger approached, and then proved faint-hearted himſelf.

The truth is, he never approved this cutting off proviſion from the five pages; and when he ſaw the magiſtrates would needs do it, he went to them and craved leave to depart from Zurick, becauſe his counſel was not obeyed; but they being troubled at this motion, ſent certain choice men to him to requeſt that he would not forſake their church, which at laſt he aſſented to, 'though (ſaid he) it be to the danger of my life.'

About fourteen days before the fight, in a ſermon he foretold his own death: and a comet appearing about that time, he told a friend privately that the comet was fatal to him, and one other, meaning as was ſuppoſed Oecolampadius.

Zuinglius in the battle was overthrown thrice, and yet ſtill got up again: the fourth time being wounded with a ſpear, he fell on his knees, and ſaid well, 'they can kill the body, but they cannot kill the ſoul.'

As the ſoldiers were ſpoiling the ſlain, Zuinglius was found alive lying upon his back, his arms folded, and his eyes lift up to heaven, whereupon they aſked him whether he would have a prieſt to confeſs to, which he denied; then they willed him to call upon St. Mary, which he alſo refuſed, ever looking up to heaven, whereupon one gave him his death's wound: and when his body was known, the enemies condemned him to be cut into four parts and burnt. This fell out anno Chriſti 1531, and of his age 44. after he had been paſtor at Zurick twelve years. Three days after his death, ſome of his friends coming to the place, found his heart untouched by the fire.

He began to preach at Glarona anno Chriſti 1516. againſt many of the popiſh errors and abuſes, before the name of Luther was ſo much as heard of in thoſe parts.

Beza made this epitaph on him,

Zuinglius arderet gemino cum ſanctus amore,
Nempe Dei imprimis, deinde ſuæ patriæ:
Dicitur in ſolidum devoviſſe duobus,
Nempe Deo imprimis, deinde ſuæ patriæ,
Quam bene perſolvit ſimul iſtis vota duobus,
Pro Patria examinis, pro Pietate cinis!

He had a wit fitted for great matters, honeſt, candid, ſound, and vehement, yet not cruel, or bloody, but heroical and chearful. His doctrine and judgment were ſound; his ſtudy of piety, and reforming religion from popiſh ſuperſtitions is ſeen in his works. In his ſermons he was very methodical, teaching the truth with great perſpicuity: he was very ſharp in reproving vices, eſpecially the penſions of the Switzers, oppreſſion of the poor, and prodigality. He uſed to ſay that it was a wicked warfare, and nothing more hateful to God than for the hire of foreign princes to ſpill blood: when he thundred moſt againſt ſin, leſt the innocent ſhould be affrighted, he uſed to ſay, Bone vir, hæc te non moveant, nihil ad te quod dico: ne cures igitur: Honeſt man, be not affrighted at theſe things, I ſpeak not to thee, therefore care not for it. He uſed to ſtudy ſtanding, and tied himſelf to certain hours, which he would not omit except neceſſity compelled him. From his firſt riſing till ten o'clock he employed himſelf in reading, writing, interpreting the ſcripture, and making his ſermons: after dinner till two o'clock, he conferred with his friends, or gave counſel to ſuch as ſought it: and ſo to his ſtudy till ſupper: after which (having walked a while) he buſied himſelf in writing letters, which many times held him till midnight.

The Life of JOHN FRITH, who died Anno Chriſti 1531.

JOHN FRITH was born at Weſtram in Kent, and had from his childhood a marvellous love to learning; a wonderful promptneſs of wit, and was of a ready capacity to receive and underſtand any thing; neither was there any diligence wanting in him, equal to that worthy diſpoſition that God had given him. He was firſt a ſtudent in Cambridge, where he profited exceedingly in the knowlege both of the arts and tongues, where it pleaſed God he fell into acquaintance with William Tindal, through whoſe inſtructions, he firſt received into his heart the ſeed of the goſpel, and ſincere godlineſs. About the ſame time cardinal Wolſey undertaking to build a ſtately college in Oxford, ſought out the moſt learned men to be fellows in the ſame, and amongſt others John Frith (though but batchelor of arts) was appointed for one; but when divers of them were perſecuted for religion, and accuſed of hereſy; he, together with ſome others, who were choſen with him out of Cambridge, was committed to priſon, in a dark cave where ſalt fiſh was then kept, the ſavour whereof infected them all, whereof ſome of them died; but Mr Frith, by God's providence, eſcaped the danger, in the ſame year wherein Queen Elizabeth was born, having been diſmiſſed out of his former priſon by means of Cardinal Woolſey's letter, whereupon he went beyond ſea to avoid the ſtorm: but after two years he came back, and having ſome buſineſs in Reading, he was there taken for a vagabond, and ſet in the ſtocks, where they ſuffered him to ſit till he was almoſt pined with hunger: at laſt he deſired to ſpeak with the ſchool-maſter of the town, who when he came to him, Frith, in Latin, bewailed his captivity. The ſchool-maſter being overcome with his eloquence, began exceedingly to affect and pity him, the rather when he ſpake in Greek to him alſo, and repeated divers verſes out of Homer: upon this the ſchool-maſter repaired ſpeedily to the magiſtrates, and procured his enlargement: yet neither then was he in ſafety; for Sir Thomas Moor (the then lord chancellor) perſecuted him both by land and ſea, promiſing great rewards to thoſe that could bring any news of him: Frith, to avoid this ſtorm, changed place and apparel often; yet at laſt he was betrayed by one William Holt, a taylor, who Judas like pretended great friendſhip to him, and ſo was ſent to the tower, where he had many conflicts with the biſhops, but eſpecially in writing with Sir Thomas Moor: and in his diſputations he uſed ſuch ſtrength of reaſon, and evidence of ſcripture, that doctor Canner archbiſhop of Canterbury, never gave more credit to any author than to John Frith, and at Frith's candle he lighted his lamp; alſo he converted Raſtal to his part, who was Moor's ſon in law.

During his impriſonment in the tower it happened that doctor Curreine, chaplain in ordinary to king Henry the VIII. preached a ſermon in Kent before his majeſty, wherein he inveighed bitterly againſt the ſacramentaries, as they then were called, which denied the real preſence: and he proceeded ſo far herein, as that he ſaid, 'It is no marvel though this abominable hereſy doth ſo much prevail amongſt us, ſeeing there is now one in the tower which is ſo bold as to write in the defence of it, and yet no man goeth about his reformation,' &c. This doctor was ſet on work by Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, on purpoſe to procure the deſtruction of Mr Frith: they alſo ſuggeſted to the king that he was kept in the tower rather for his ſafeguard than for his puniſhment by ſuch as favoured him, as by the lord Cromwel and others; hereupon the king called to him the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the lord Cromwel, willing them forthwith to call Frith to examination, that ſo he might either be compelled to recant, or to ſuffer condign puniſhment: but when as they delayed time, the king took it ſo hainouſly, that he ſent a commiſſion to the archbiſhop, to Stokeſly biſhop of London, and ſome others, without further delay to proceed to examination of him; and that there ſhould be no concourſe of citizens at the ſad examination; the archbiſhop removed to Croydon, whither Stokeſly and the reſt of the commiſſioners reſorted.

But before the day for his examination came, the archbiſhop ſent one of his gentlemen and one of his porters to fetch Frith from the tower to Croydon. This gentleman had the archbiſhop's letter, and the king's ring to the lord Fitz-Williams conſtable of the tower for the delivery of the priſoner; the lord Fitz-William's lodging then at Weſtminſter, underſtanding for what end they were come, fell a curſing and banning Frith, and all other heretics, ſaying, 'Take your heretic with you, I am glad that I am rid of him.'

fell

Frith being delivered to theſe two men, as they went in a wherry towards Lambeth, the gentleman being very ſorry for his condition, ſaid to him; conſider the ſtate wherein you are, a man altogether caſt away in this world if you do not the more wiſely behave yourſelf. but tho' your caſe be very dangerous, yet may you help yourſelf by giving way for a time, and ſomewhat relenting of your opinion, which hereafter when occaſion and opportunity ſhall ſerve, you may promote again. You have many friends which will ſtand for you, ſo far as they are able and dare do. It is great pity that one which hath ſuch ſingular knowlege in Greek and Latin, and is ſo ready and ripe in all kinds of learning, as well in the ſcriptures as in the ancient fathers, ſhould now ſuddenly ſuffer all thoſe excellent gifts to periſh, with little profit to the world, and leſs comfort to your wife, children, and kindred. And as for your opinion about the ſacrament, it is ſo unſeaſonably vented at this time in England, that it is like to do more hurt than good: therefore be ruled by good counſel till a fitter opportunity may ſerve. This I am ſure of, that my lord Cromwel, and my lord of Canterbury much favour you, knowing you to be an eloquent and learned young man, young in years, but old in knowlege, and likely to be a profitable inſtrument of much good in this realm; and therefore they will never ſuffer you to ſuſtain any open ſhame if you will be adviſed by their counſel; but if you ſtand ſtiff in your opinion, it is not poſſible for them to ſave your life; for as you have good friends, ſo you have mortal foes.

I moſt heartily thank you Sir (ſaid Mr Frith) for your good will and counſel, whereby I ſee your love to me; yet my cauſe and conſcience is ſuch, that in no wiſe I either may, or can for any worldly reſpect without danger of damnation ſtart aſide, and fly from the truth whereof I am convinced, and which I have publiſhed concerning the Lord's ſupper; ſo that if I be aſked what my judgment is about it, I muſts needs declare my knowlege and conſcience therein, as I have formerly written, though I were ſure to loſe twenty lives if I had ſo many; and further, you ſhall underſtand that I am furniſhed with ſcriptures, fathers, ſchoolmen, and others, for the proving of it, ſo that if I may be indifferently heard, I am ſure my adverſaries can neither juſtly condemn me nor mine aſſertion, but that with me they muſt condemn ſaint Auguſtine, and moſt of the ancient writers; yea the very biſhops of Rome of ancient time ſpeak for me, and defend my cauſe. Yea marry (quoth the gentleman) you ſay well, if you might be indifferently heard: but I much doubt thereof, for that our maſter Chriſt was not indifferently heard, nor ſhould I think, if he were now preſent in the world, eſpecially in this your opinion, the ſame being now ſo odious in the world, and we ſo far from the true knowlege thereof. Well (ſaid Mr Frith) I know aſſuredly that this doctrine of the ſacrament is very hard meat to be digeſted both of the clergy and laity: but this I will ſay to you, that if you live but twenty years more, whatſoever ſhall become of me, you ſhall ſee this whole realm of mine opinion, though happily ſome particular perſons ſhall not be fully perſuaded therein; and if this come not to paſs, then count me the vaineſt man that ever you heard ſpeak with a tongue. And whereas you ſay my death would be very grievous to my friends, I grant that for a ſmall time it would be ſo: but if I ſhould ſo moderate my cauſe that I ſhould only be kept in priſon, that would not only be a longer grief unto me, but would breed no ſmall diſquietneſs to my friends both in body and mind: therefore all things well conſidered, my death in this cauſe ſhall be better to me and all my relations, than life in continual bondage and penury: and almighty God knoweth what he hath to do with his poor ſervant, whoſe cauſe I now defend, and not mine own; from the which (through God's grace) I never intend to ſtart, nor otherwiſe to give place ſo long as God will give me life.

When they were landed at Lambeth, after they had refreſhed themſelves with victuals, they all three went on foot towards Croydon; the gentleman ſtill with himſelf lamenting the peril that Frith was in, and therefore he deviſed with himſelf by what means he might deliver him out of the biſhop's hands; and having in mind contrived the way, he walked with the porter, and privately imparted his thoughts to him, and finding him forward to join with him therein, he went again to Mr Frith, and told him that the buſineſs which he had undertaken, to lead him as a ſheep to the ſlaughter, ſo grieved him, that he was overwhelmed with cares and ſorrows, whereupon he was reſolved, what danger ſoever he incurred, to find out a way to deliver him out of the Lyon's mouth; and yet ſaid he, yonder good fellow and I have contrived a means whereby you may eaſily eſcape from this imminent danger, and we alſo be cleared from any vehement ſuſpicion for when we come to yonder hill, called Briſtow-cauſway, where are woods on each hand, you ſhall turn into that on the left hand which leads into Kent, and ſo by the help of your friends convey yourſelf away, and we will ſo order the matter that they ſhall never ſeek that way for you &c. Mr Frith having diligently hearkened to his ſpeech, ſaid with a ſmiling countenance, and is this the effect of your ſecret conſultation all this while? Surely, ſurely you have loſt more labour formerly, and ſo you are like to do this alſo; for if you ſhould both leave me here, and go to Croydon, declaring to the biſhops that you had loſt Frith, I would ſurely follow after as faſt as I could, and bring them news that I had found and brought Frith again: do you think that I am afraid to declare mine opinion before the biſhops in ſo manifeſt a truth? you are a fond man (quoth the gentleman) thus to talk; do you think, that your reaſoning with the biſhops will do any good? But I much marvel you were ſo willing to flie the realm before you were taken, and now ſo unwilling to ſave yourſelf when you may. Marry (quoth Frith) there is a great difference between eſcaping then and now: for then I deſired to eſcape becauſe I was at liberty, and yet not attached, which liberty I would fain have enjoyed for the improvement of my ſtudies beyond ſea, where I was reader of the Greek tongue: but now being taken by the higher powers, and that by almighty God's permiſſion and providence I am fallen into the biſhop's hands only for religion's ſake, and for ſuch doctrine as I am bound in conſcience under pain of damnation to maintain, if I ſhould now ſtart aſide and run away from my God, and from the teſtimony of his word, I ſhould deſerve a thouſand hells. And therefore I moſt heartily thank you both for your good wills towards me, beſeeching you to bring me where I was appointed to be brought, or elſe I will go thither all alone. And ſo with a chearful and merry countenance he went with them, ſpending the time with pleaſant and godly communication till they came to Croydon, where for that night he was well entertained in the porter's lodge. On the morrow he was called before the biſhops to be examined, at which time he ſhewed himſelf exceeding ripe and ready to anſwer all objections, even beyond all mens expectations: and his allegations out of St. Auguſtine and other ancient fathers were ſuch, as ſome of them much doubted of Auguſtine's authority in that caſe: and when they had done, doctor Heath in private confeſſed to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, that no man could avoid his allegations out of St. Auguſtine; yet after this, without any regard to his piety, learning, or merit, he was turned over to Stokeſley biſhop of London, who would not hear what St. Auguſtine or any other ſaid for his opinion: but calling him into his conſiſtory, after he had witneſſed there a good confeſſion he condemned him, and ſo delivered him over to the major and ſheriffs of London to be burnt.

When he came into Smithfield where he was to ſuffer, he ſhewed much conſtancy and courage: and being tied to the ſtake, and the fire kindled, he willingly embraced the ſame: but the wind blowing away the flame, made his death ſomewhat the longer: yet (through God's grace) he bore it with ſuch patience even as though he felt no pain in that long torment, and ſo at laſt quietly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti 1531. While Mr Frith was beyond the ſeas, he much help Mr Tindal in the tranſlation of the New Teſtament.

At the time of his burning, one doctor Cook (a perſon in London) admoniſhed the people that they ſhould no more pray for him then they would pray for a dog: whereupon John Frith ſmiling, prayed God to forgive him: this this ſpeech of the doctor much moved the people to anger, and this mild anſwer of the martyr ſunk deeply into their minds.

The books that were written by this bleſſed martyr were many, and much ſought after in king Henry VIII. and queen Mary's reign, to be burned; and in the time of king Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth, for the inſtruction and comfort of the godly. But it pleaſed God by a marvellous occaſion to cauſe three or four of his moſt uſeful treatiſes to be reprinted of late, which was this.

On midſummer eve, anno Chriſti 1626. a codfiſh being brought into the market of Cambridge, and there cut up for ſale, in the maw of the fiſh was found wrapt up in canvas a book in decimo ſexto containing three treatiſes of Mr. Frith's: the fiſh was caught about the coaſt of Lin, called Lin-deeps, by one William Skinner; when the fiſh was cut open, the garbiſh was thrown by, which a woman looking upon, eſpied the canvas, and taking it up, found the book wrapped up in it, being much ſoiled and covered over with a kind of ſlime and congealed matter. This was beheld with great admiration, and by Benjamin Prime, the batchelor's beadle (who was preſent at the opening of the fiſh) was carried to the vice-chancellor, who took ſpecial notice of it, examining the particulars before mentioned. By Daniel Boys, a book-binder, the leaves were carefully opened and cleanſed: the treatiſes contained in it were,

A Preparation to the Croſs.
A Preparation to Death.
The Treaſure of Knowlege.
A Mirrour, or Glaſs to know thyſelf:
A brief inſtruction to teach one willingly to die, and not to fear death.

How uſeful the reviving of theſe treatiſes by ſuch a ſpecial providence hath been, may eaſily be diſcerned by ſuch as have lived ſince thoſe times.

The Life of WILLIAM TINDAL, who died anno Chriſti 1536.

WILLIAM Tindal was born about the borders of Wales, and brought up from a child in the univerſity of Oxford, where he grew up and encreaſed in the knowlege of the tongues and liberal arts, but eſpecially in the ſcriptures, whereunto his mind was ſingularly addicted: inſomuch as being in Magdalen-hall, he read privately to ſome fellows and ſtudents ſome parts of divinity, inſtructing them in the truth and knowlege of the ſcriptures: his life alſo was ſo blameleſs, that he acquired much love and eſteem thereby.

After he had profited exceedingly, and taken his degrees there, he removed to Cambridge, and being well ripened in the knowlege of God's word, he went to live with one Mr. Welch in Gloucesterſhire, where he was tutor to his children; and many abbots and doctors reforting thither, Mr. Tindal diſcourſing with them of Luther, Eraſmus, &c. ſhewed them plainly his judgment in religion, proving the ſame by the word of God, and confuting their errors; which cauſed them to bear a ſecret grudge in their hearts againſt him. Not long after it happened that ſome of theſe great doctors invited Mr. Welch and his lady to a banquet, where they had talk at will, uttering their blind ſuperſtitions without gainſaying. Then Mr. Welch and his lady coming home, and calling for Mr Tindal, began to reaſon with him about thoſe matters whereof they had talked before with the prieſts. Mr. Tindal anſwering by the ſcriptures maintained the truth and confuted their errors, whereupon the lady Welch ſaid, there was ſuch a doctor as may expend 100l. per annum, and ſuch a one as may ſpend 200l. per annum, and ſuch another as may ſpend 300l. per annum, and is it reaſon think you that we ſhould believe you before them? Mr. Tindal gave her no anſwer at that time, and talked but little afterwards of thoſe matters, becauſe he ſaw it was in vain; but fell upon tranſlating a book called Enchiridion militis Chriſtiani, and having finiſhed it, he gave it to the knight and his lady, who after they had well read and peruſed the ſame, did no more ſo often invite the doctorly prelates to their houſe as before, neither had they that chear and countenance when they came as formerly, which they well perceiving, ſuppoſed that it was by the means of Mr. Tindal, whereupon they utterly withdrew themſelves and came no more thither.

Then did the country prieſts cluſter together, ſtorming and railing againſt Mr. Tindal in their alehouſe-meetings, concerning whom himſelf writes thus: 'I was, ſaith he, in that country much moleſted by a company of unlearned prieſts that had never ſeen more Latin than in their portheſſes and miſſals, which yet many of them can ſcarcely read: and if they be but ſorrily learned, they get Albertus Magnus de ſecretis mulierum, which they pore night and day upon, making notes therein, &c.'

Theſe men railed and raged againſt him, affirming that he held heretical opinions, and thereupon accuſed him to the biſhop and chancellor, whereupon the chancellor appointed thoſe prieſts and Mr Tindal to appear before him: Mr Tindal ſuſpecting the matter, as he went, prayed heartily unto God to give him ſtrength to ſtand faſt to the truth: when he came, the chancellor threatened him grievouſly, reviling and rating him, as though he had been a dog, accuſing him of many things whereof no proof could be brought, and ſo diſmiſſed him for the preſent.

Not long after Mr. Tindal happening into the company of one that was eſteemed a learned doctor, in diſputing with him he drave him to that iſſue that the doctor burſt out into theſe blaſphemous words, we had better be without God's laws, than the popes. Mr. Tindal hearing this, full of godly zeal, replyed, I defy the pope and all his laws; and if God ſpare me life, ere many years I will cauſe a boy that drives the plough to know more of the ſcripture than you do.

The rage of the prieſts encreaſing, Mr. Tindal told Mr Welch, that he well perceived that he could ſtay there no longer with ſafety, and that his ſtay might be prejudicial to his family; and therefore with his good leave he departed and went to London, where he preached a while, as he had done in the country before: and then hearing a great commendation of Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of London, he endeavoured to get into his ſervice, but the Lord ſaw that it was not good for him, and therefore he found little favor in the biſhop's ſight.

Remaining thus in London about the ſpace of a year, and being deſirous for the good of his country to tranſlate the New Teſtament into Engliſh, he found that there was no place for him to do it in England, and therefore being aſſiſted by maſter Humphry Munmouth, a godly citizen, and other good men, he left the land and went into Germany; where this good man being inflamed with a tender care of and zeal for his country, refuſed no travel nor pains, if by any means poſſible he might reduce his brethren and countrymen of England to the ſame taſte and underſtanding of God's holy word and truth which the Lord had endued him withall: then conferring with Mr. John Frith he thought in his mind that no way would more conduce thereunto, than if the ſcriptures were tranſlated into their vulgar language that ſo the people might ſee the plain text before them; becauſe the knowlege of the ſcriptures was hidden from the people's eyes; upon theſe conſiderations he there ſet upon this work: tranſlating the New Teſtament anno Chriſti 1527. and then ſetting upon the old, he finiſhed the five Books of Moſes, with ſundry moſt learned and godly prologues prefixed before every one of them: the like alſo he did upon the New Teſtament: beſides divers other godly treatiſes which he wrote there; which being publiſhed, and ſent over into England, became exceeding profitable to the whole Engliſh nation.

At his firſt going over into Germany, he went into Saxony, and had much conference with Luther, and other learned men in thoſe quarters: and then returning into the Netherlands, made his greateſt abode at Antwerp: he wrote alſo divers other books under ſundry titles, amongſt which is that moſt worthy monument of his called, The obedience of a Chriſtian man, with divers other of treatiſes, as the wicked mammon, the practice of prelates, with divers expoſitions upon portions of ſcripture: as alſo ſome anſwers to ſir Thomas Moore, and other adverſaries of the truth, no leſs delectable then right fruitful to be read: theſe books being ſent over and diſperſed in England, it cannot be imagined what a door of light they opened to the eyes of all the nation, which for a long time had been ſhut up in darkneſs. He wrote alſo one book of the Declaration of the ſacrament and againſt the maſs, but he kept it by him, and did not print it, conſidering how the people for the preſent were held under their groſs idolatry; and therefore judging that it would be odious to them to hear theſe things at the firſt, he waited a fitter time for the publication of it.

Theſe godly books, but eſpecially his tranſlation of the New Teſtament coming abroad, as they brought ſingular profit to the godly: ſo the ungodly clergy diſdaining and envying that the people ſhould be wiſer than they, and withall fearing leaſt by the ſhining beams of the truth, their hypocriſy and works of darkneſs ſhould be unmasked, they began to make a great ſtir: but eſpecially the devil envying the progreſs of the goſpel, fought by all means to hinder the bleſſed travels of this worthy man: for when he had finiſhed his tranſlation of Deuteronomy, minding to print it at Hamborough, he ſailed thitherward. But by the way upon the coaſt of Holland he ſuffered ſhipwreck, by which he loſt all his books and writings, and ſo was compelled to begin all again to his great hinderance and doubling of his labors.

Thus having by that ſhipwreck loſt all his money, copies and time, yet (through Gods mercy) he was not diſcouraged, but taking the opportunity of another ſhip, he went to Hamborough, where he met with Mr. Coverdal, who aſſiſted him in the tranſlation of the five books of Moſes, the ſweating ſickneſs being in that town all the while, which was anno Chriſti. 1526. and during their imployment in that work, they were entertained by a religious widow, Mrs. Margaret Van Emerſon.

When his Engliſh Teſtament came abroad, ſatan's and the pope's inſtruments raged exceedingly, ſome ſaying that there were a thouſand hereſies in it: others that it was impoſſible to tranſlate the ſcriptures into Engliſh: others, that it was not lawful for the lay people to have it in their own language, &c. and at laſt the biſhops and prieſts procured of king Henry the eight a proclamation prohibiting the buying or reading of it, anno Chriſti 1527. Yet not ſatisfied herewith, they ſuborned one Henry Philips to go over to Antwerp to betray him: who, when he came thither, inſinuated himſelf into Mr. Tindal's company, and pretended great friendſhip to him; and having learned where his abode was, he went to Bruxels, and there prevailed ſo far, that he brought with him the emperor's attorney to Antwerp, and pretending to viſit Mr. Tindal, he betrayed him to two catchpoles, which preſently carried him to the attorney; who, after examination, ſent him to priſon in the caſtle of Filford, eighteen miles off, and withal they ſeized upon all his writings, and what elſe he had at his lodging.

The Engliſh merchants at Antwerp, who loved Tindal very well, did what they could to procure his releaſe; alſo letters were ſent by the lord Cromwell and others out of England in his behalf: but Philips ſo beſtirred himſelf that all their endeavours came to nothing: and Tindal was at laſt brought to his anſwer, after much reaſoning, although he deſerved not death, yet they condemned him to die.

When he was brought forth to the place of execution, whilſt he was tied to the ſtake, he cried with a fervent and loud voice, 'Lord open the king of England's eyes.' And ſo he was firſt ſtrangled by the hangman, and then burnt, Anno Chriſti 1536.

The power of his doctrine, and the ſincerity of his life was ſuch, that during his impriſonment (which was about a year and an half) he converted his keeper and his daughter, and ſome others of his houſhold: and Philips that betrayed him, long enjoyed not the price of innocent blood, but by God's juſt judgment was devoured by lice.

The emperor's attorney that proſecuted againſt him, left this teſtimony of him, that he was Vir doctus, pius, & bonus, a learned, pious, and godly man: whilſt Mr. Tindal was priſoner in the caſtle, there was much writing, and great diſputations betwixt him and them of the univerſity of Lovain, which was but nine or ten miles from thence, ſo that they had all enough of him, not knowing how to anſwer the authorities and teſtimonies of ſcriptures, whereupon he grounded his doctrine.

On a time the company of Engliſh merchants being at ſupper together at Antwerp, there was a juggler amongſt them who by his magical art could bring all kind of dainty diſhes, and wine, from any place they pleaſed, and ſet it on the table incontinent before them, with many other ſuch like things: this being much talked of abroad, Mr. Tindal hearing of it, deſired of ſome of the merchants that he might be preſent at ſupper to ſee the jugler play his pranks. Accordingly ſupper was apppointed, and Mr. Tindal with the merchants went to it: and the jugler being requeſted to play his pranks, and to ſhew his cunning, he after his wonted boldneſs began to utter all that he could do: but all was in vain; ſo that at laſt after all his ſweating, toiling and labour, when he ſaw that nothing would go forewards, but all his enchantments were void, he openly confeſſed that there was ſome man preſent at ſupper which diſturbed and hindered all his doings.

Concerning his tranſlation of the New Teſtament which was ſo villified by his adverſaries, he thus writes in an epiſtle to John Frith: I call God to record againſt the day we ſhall appear before our Lord Jeſus, to give up reckoning of our doings, that I never altered one ſyllable of God's word againſt my conſcience, nor would do it for all that's in the earth, whether honour, pleaſure, or profit, &c.

Moſt of his works are mentioned before in his life.

The Life of THOMAS CROMWELL, Earl of Eſſex, who died anno Chriſti, 1541.

THOMAS Cromwel was born at Putney in Surrey: his father was a ſmith, and therefore could beſtow no great coſt in his education, ſo that his poverty was a great hindrance at firſt to his virtue; yet ſuch was the activity, and foreward ripeneſs of nature in him; his wit ſo pregnant; his judgment ſo ſound; his tongue ſo eloquent; his ſervice ſo faithful: his ſtomach ſo couragious, and his pen ſo active, that he could not be long concealed, nor hindred from favour, and friends to employ him: nothing was ſo difficult which his wit and induſtry could not compaſs; he had alſo a very fine memory in retaining whatſoever he had once gotten, inſomuch as in a journey to and from Rome, he learned the whole New Teſtament tranſlated by Eraſmus without book.

As he grew towards ripeneſs of years, he had a great mind to travel into foreign countries to ſee the world, and learn experience; and ſo paſſing over the ſea, he went into France, from thence into Italy, at laſt he came back to Antwerp, where he was entertained by the Engliſh merchants to be their ſecretary.

It happened about the ſame time, that the inhabitants of Boſton in Lincolnſhire, were minded to ſend to Rome for the renewing of their two pardons, which, though it would coſt them great expences, yet they found ſuch gain by that Roman merchandize, that they choſe one Jeffrey Chambers, and another, whom they furniſhed with writings, and good ſtore of money, and ſo ſent them to Rome to diſpatch that buſineſs: by the way when they came to Antwerp, Chambers ſuſpecting his own weakneſs for ſo weighty a work, conferred and prevailed with Thomas Cromwell to aſſiſt them therein: Cromwel, though he knew the difficulty of the enterprize, and what it was to have to deal with ſuch greedy cormorants, as the pope, and his cardinals were, yet having ſome ſkill in the Italian tongue, and as yet being ungrounded in the true religion, he conſented to go along with them.

Coming to Rome, he gat information, that the pope's holy tooth greatly delighted in new fangled diſhes, and ſtrange delicates, whereupon he prepared certain fine diſhes of jelly, made after the beſt Engliſh faſhion, but never before ſeen at Rome; and taking his time, with his two companions, when the pope was newly come from hunting, and gone into his pavilion, they brought their Engliſh preſents in with a three mans ſong (as it was then called.) The pope marvelling at the ſtrangeneſs of the ſong, and underſtanding that they were Engliſhmen, and came not empty handed, he willed them to be called in: Cromwell doing his obeiſance, offered him his jolly-junkets, telling him, him, that they were ſuch as none but kings and princes in England uſed to feed upon; deſiring him to accept of the preſent which he, and his companions, that were poor ſuiters to his holineſs, had preſented as novelties for his recreation, &c. The pope ſeeing the ſtrangeneſs of the diſhes, bade one of his cardinals to taſte of it, who liked it ſo well, that he commended it to the pope; the pope alſo was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he aſked them what their ſuits were, and commanding them to teach his cook the making of that meat, he incontinently confirmed both their pardons according to their requeſts: all this while Cromwel had no ſound taſte of religion, and himſelf would often after tell doctor Cranmer what a ruffian he was in his young days: how he was in the wars with the duke of Burbon in the ſiege of Rome; as alſo how he aſſiſted Chamber's in publiſhing, and ſetting forth the pardon of Boſton every where in churches as he went, and ſo he continued, till at laſt, learning the New Teſtament by heart, it pleaſed God to begin to touch, and affect his heart with the knowlege, and ſavour of the truth: in the mean time, cardinal Woolſey began to rule all under the king, or rather with the king in England; ſo that men of the beſt wits, and ableſt parts, ſought to get into his ſervice: amongſt whom Thomas Cromwel alſo gat preferment under him, and having faithfully ſerved him divers years, the cardinal at laſt preferred him to be his ſollicitor: about which time Woolſey was building his ſtately college in Oxford (now Chriſt church) for the furtherance whereof, he pulled down ſome ſmall monaſteries, and priories in divers parts of the realm, the charge whereof he committed to Cromwel, wherein he was ſo induſtrious, that he gat him much hatred amongſt many ſuperſtitious perſons, and with ſome of the nobility that were about the king.

Shortly after the cardinal grew into diſgrace with the king and fell into a premunire: ſo that his houſhold being diſſolved, Thomas Cromwel amongſt others, ſought to get into the king's ſervice: and Sir Chriſtopher Hales maſter of the rolls (though a great papiſt) yet liked Cromwel ſo well, that he commended him to the king, as a man moſt fit for his purpoſe, having then to do againſt the pope. But the king having had former complaint made to him againſt Cromwell for his homely dealing with the monaſteries, images, altars, &c. he deteſted his very name, and ſome that ſtood by alſo, with railing, and reviling words, ſought more to inflame the king's hatred againſt him: but there being preſent at the ſame time, the lord Ruſſel, earl of Bedford, with a vehement boldneſs he ſtood forth, and took upon him the defence of Cromwel, uttering much in his commendation before the king; and withal, telling him, that when himſelf was at Bohemia, about the king's affairs, he was in extream peril of his life, had not Cromwel by his ſingular device and policy freed him from the ſame: adding, that foraſmuch as his majeſty had now to do with the pope, there was in all England none ſo fit for the king's purpoſe, which could ſay or do more in that matter than he: the king hearing this, was content to ſee, and ſpeak with him, and to hear what he could ſay: Cromwel having private notice that he ſhould be ſent for to the king, provided himſelf before hand, and gat in a readineſs the copy of the biſhop's oath, which they uſed to make to the pope at their conſecration, and ſo being called for, he was brought to the king in his garden at Weſtminſter, anno Chriſti 1530. the king propounding ſundry queſtions to him, he anſwered him very ſatisfactorily, and withal ſhewed him how his princely authority was abuſed within his own realm by the pope, and his clergy, who being ſworn to him, were afterwards diſpenſed with, and ſworn anew unto the pope, ſo that he was but an half king, &c. He alſo ſhewed him how he might accumulate himſelf whatſoever the clergy in England was worth, if he pleaſed to take the occaſion now offered unto him: the king giving good ear to this, and liking his advice, aſked him, if he would ſtand by what he had told him: yea ſaid he, I can avouch it to be certain, and therewith he ſhewed the biſhop's oath unto the king: hereupon the king preſently admitted him into his ſervice, and taking his ring off his finger, he ſent him therewith into the convocation houſe amongſt the biſhops; Cromwel coming boldly into the houſe, placed himſelf amongſt the biſhops, where he made an oration, and declared unto them the authority of a king, and the office of ſubjects, eſpecially of biſhops and churchmen under the public laws, which laws (ſaith he) you have all tranſgreſſed, and highly offended by derogating from the king's royal eſtate, falling under a premunire, by conſenting to the power legantine of the cardinal, as alſo by being ſworn to the pope, contrary to your fealty to the king, to whom therefore you have forfeited all your goods, chattels, lands, poſſeſſions, and whatſoever livings you have: the biſhops hearing this, were much amazed, beginning to excuſe, and deny the fact: but Cromwel ſhewing to them the very copy of the oath given to the pope at their conſecration, they could not deny the matter any longer, but fell to intreaty: and after a ſhort debate amongſt themſelves were content to give to the king 100884. li. to free them from the premunire.

After this Cromwel growing into great favour with the king, he firſt knighted him: then made him maſter of his jewel-houſe: then of the privy council: then maſter of the rolls; then knight of the garter: and laſtly, earl of Eſſex: great chamberlain of England, and the king's vicegerent to repreſent his own perſon: which office is ſeldom conferred upon any ſubject in England, and was never better diſcharged than by this lord.

Neither did his honours make him grow proud, or remiſs in his duty, but he was rather quickened thereby to work more abundantly for the good both of church and ſtate: and above all his other vertues, he is chiefly to be commended for his ſingular zeal, and laborious travel beſtowed for the reſtoring of the truth, and demoliſhing the ſynagogues of Antichriſt, the abbies, and religious houſes; for it pleaſed almighty God to make him an inſtrument to perſuade the king to ſuppreſs, firſt the chauntries, then the ſmaller monaſteries, and at length all the abbies in England, both great, and leſs: and though the buildings might have been beſtowed to much better, and more godly uſe, viz. to the relief of the poor, and to many public uſes of piety, and charity: yet herein the ſecret judgment of God is to be admired, and adored, in that thoſe houſes that were ſo full of all manner of abominations (as appeared to the king's commiſſioners upon examination, remains upon record) ſo horrible to be heard, ſo incredible to be believed, ſo ſtinking before the face of God and man, that no marvel it is, if God's vengeance from heaven, ſo highly provoked thereby, would not ſuffer any monument of thoſe houſes to be unplucked up: the doctrines, laws, and traditions alſo of ſuch as inhabited them, was rebellion againſt Chriſt, derogatory to his glory, pernicious to man's ſalvation: ſo that of both we may ſay with Matthew Paris: Cujus fetor uſque ad nubes fumum teterrimum exhallabat. i. e. whoſe filthy ſtink did breathe up a moſt peſtiferous fume even to the clouds of heaven, and with Sodom's ſins cried loud for vengeance, &c.

The biſhop of Rome's power being thus aboliſhed out of England, there were yet divers popiſh biſhops, his creatures, which privily watched all opportunities to reſtore it again: but Cromwel (as a mighty wall, and defence of the church) reſiſted it continually, and ſo fruſtrated all their expectations, and endeavours: about this time ſome tumults began to ariſe about religion: whereupon the king ſummoned, and aſſembled moſt of his biſhops, and learned men to meet, and treat ſoberly, and modeſtly about moſt of the controverſial points: to this convocation, Cromwel went, and accidentally by the way he met with Alexander Aleſius, a Scotchman, whom he took along with him: and having taken his place as the king's vicegerent, at the upper end of the table, he made an oration to them, wherein in the king's name he thanked them for their ready, and cheerful meeting together, told them that the king deſired that they ſhould debate about the preſent controverſies of religion, for that he would ſuffer no alteration but by the advice, and conſent of them, and his parliament; 'Therefore (ſaith he) he deſires you for Chriſt's ſake, that all malice, obſtinacy, and carnal reſpects being ſet apart, you will friendly and lovingly diſpute amongſt yourſelves of the controverſies moved in the church, and that you will conclude all things by the word of God; neither will his majeſty ſuffer the ſcriptures to be wrested by any falſe gloſſes, papiſtical laws, or by any authority of doctors, or counſels, much leſs will he admit any articles, or doctrine not contained in the ſcripture, but only founded upon continuance of time, and old cuſtoms, or by unwritten verities, as ye were wont to do, &c. The only way to unity is to determine all things by the rule of God's word, as himſelf requireth, &c.

In this convocation many points were debated, wherein Aleſius, being a godly, and learned man, did the church good ſervice, and ſo through Cromwel's induſtry, though religion could not be wholly reformed, yet the reformation of it was well begun at that time through all England. And this good lord was always very ſtudious how to advance the cauſe of Chriſt; his whole life was nothing elſe but a continual care and travel to further the true knowlege of the goſpel, and to reform the houſe of God; he cauſed all the people through the kingdom to be inſtructed in the Lord's prayer, and creed, in Engliſh; then he procured the ſcriptures to be tranſlated, and publiſhed for every Engliſh man to underſtand; then he reſcued the vulgar ſort from damnable idolatry, cauſing many of their groſſeſt pilgrimages to be deſtroyed: he procured, that divers idle holy-days ſhould be aboliſhed; that liberty ſhould be given to eat eggs, and white-meats in lent; by him it was provided, that for the better inſtruction of the people, beneficed men ſhould be reſident on their cures to teach, and keep hoſpitality. Infinite almoſt were the private benefits which he did in helping poor godly men, and women out of trouble, and great diſtreſſes; yea, his whole life was full of ſuch examples, being a man ordained of God to do many good, eſpecially to deliver ſuch as were in danger of perſecution for religion ſake. Some examples are ſet down by Mr Fox in his book of Martyrs, Vol. 1. page 507 &c.

Uſually men advanced from mean and baſe degree, to high and ample dignities, grow proud and inſolent, forgetting what they were, and from whence they came, and ſo calling off their old friends that were formerly beneficial unto them; but it was far otherwiſe with this courteous and Chriſtian earl, as may appear by theſe examples: on a time he was riding in his coach with archbiſhop Cranmer through Cheapſide, where ſpying a poor woman of Hounſlow, to whom he was indebted for certain old reckonings, to the value of forty ſhillings, he cauſed her to be called unto him, where queſtioning with her what was her name, and where ſhe lived; withal he aſked her whether he was not ſomewhat indebted unto her, ſhe ſaid yea, but ſhe durſt never call upon him for it, though now ſhe ſtood in great need of it: he therefore preſently ſent her to his houſe with one of his men, and when he came from the court, he did not only diſcharge his debt, but gave her an yearly penſion of four pound, and a livery every year ſo long as ſhe lived after.

Another example was this: at what time Thomas Cromwel went with the French army into Italy, the army being overthrown, he fell into much want, and being in the city of Florence, he met a rich merchant, called Francis Freſcobald's, and aſked of him an alms for God's ſake; the merchant under his tottered attire, ſeeing an ingenuous countenance, moved with pity, demanded of what country he was, &c. To whom he anſwered, 'I am Sir of England, my name is Thomas Cromwel, my father was a ſheerer of cloth, and I ſtraying from mine own country, came with the French army into Italy, by whoſe overthrow I am fallen into this want:'

The merchant conſidering the ſtate of the young man, and loving the Engliſh nation, amongſt whom he had formerly lived, and from whom he had received many courteſies, took him into his houſe, entertained him kindly, and when he was deſirous to return into his own country, he gave him an horſe, a new ſuit of apparel, and other neceſſaries, and ſixteen ducats of gold to bear the charges of his journey.

It ſo fell out after, that at what time the lord Cromwel was ſo highly in favour with his prince, and advanced to ſo many dignities, that this Francis Freſcobald, was by many great loſſes that befel him in his merchandizing, become very poor, yet remembring that in England ſome merchants owed him fifteen thouſand ducats, he purpoſed, if he could get that money, to content himſelf to live upon it, and to give over trading, and for this end he came into England; and it fell out that whilſt he was here, endeavouring to get in his debts, he met with the lord Cromwel, whom he had forgotten, as alſo the kindneſs which he had ſhewed him.

The lord Cromwel, as he was riding to the court, eſpied him in the ſtreet, and eying him well, he remembred him, and alighting from his horſe (to the admiration of his followers) he went, and in a moſt kind manner embraced him, and ſcarcely refraining from tears, he aſked him whether he was not Francis Freſcobald the Florentine: yea Sir, ſaid he, and your humble ſervant: my ſervant (quoth Cromwel) no, as you have not formerly been my ſervant, ſo will I not now account you other than my ſpecial friend, aſſuring you, that I have cauſe to be ſorry, that you knowing what I am (or at leaſt ſhould be) would not make known your arrival to me, that I might have paid part of that debt that I confeſs I owe you: but being now upon urgent affairs for my prince, I muſt intreat you to excuſe my leaving of you, deſiring you with the faithful mind of a friend, that you come this day to my houſe to dinner, and ſo remounting he went to the court.

Francis wondering with himſelf who this lord ſhould be, at laſt, called to mind, that it was the ſame man, whom he had formerly relieved at Florence, for which he was wondrous joyful, hoping that by his authority he ſhould the ſooner recover his debts; about dinner time he repaired to the lord Cromwel's houſe, and there walking in the court, he attended his coming; the lord ſhortly returning, he no ſooner diſmounted, but he again embraced this gentleman with ſo friendly countenance, that the lord admiral, and the other lords that were with him, marvelled at it, which he perceiving, turning towards them, and holding Freſcobald by the hand, he ſaid, my lords, marvel not that I am ſo glad to ſee this man, for by his means I have attained to this preſent dignity, and that you may not be ignorant of his courteſy to me, I will relate it to you, and ſo he told them every thing in order, as is before recited: and ſo, ſtill holding him by the hand, he had him into his dining room, and placed him next to himſelf at the table: when dinner was ended, and the lords departed, he would needs know of what occaſion had brought him to London: Francis related his great loſſes to him, and told him that all that remained was this money that he came to ſue for: Cromwel having comforted him againſt his afflictions, and told him that he ſympathized with him in the ſame, ſaid further, you ſhall receive in this your diſtreſs ſome conſolation for your old courteſies that you ſhewed me in times paſt, and I further profeſs in the word of a true friend, that during this life, and ſtate of mine, I will never be wanting to do for you, wherein my authority may prevail to ſupply your lack and neceſſity: and ſo taking him by the hand, he led him into his chamber, and commanding all to depart, he opened a cheſt, and firſt gave him ſixteen ducats which he had given him in money, then ten ducats that he diſburſed on his apparrel, and ten other that he paid for his horſe; and further, ſaid he, for the intereſt of your money, take theſe four bags, in each of which is four hundred ducats, theſe you ſhall receive from the hand of your aſſured friend; Freſcobald, though brought to low ebb, yet expreſſing the vertue of a modeſt mind, would have refuſed the kindneſs offered, but that the other enforced him againſt his will to receive it.

Then he cauſed him to give him a note of the names of his debtors, which he gave to one of his ſervants, charging him diligently to enquire out the men, and then to require them to make payment of thoſe debts within fifteen days, or to abide the hazard of his diſpleaſure: the ſervant ſo carefully performed his lord's command, that in a ſhort time he procured Freſcobald all his debts: who willingly forgave the intereſt:

And all this while he lodged in the lord Cromwel's houſe, who gave him noble entertainment, and profered, that if he would continue in England, and make his bank here, he would lend him 60000 ducats for four years gratis.

But Freſcobald, deſirous to return into his own country, and to live a private life, with many thanks for his extraordinary extraordinary favours, he took his leave, and went to Florence, where he died the year following; alſo at another time, being with other lords at the monaſtery of Sheen, examining ſome monks that denied the king's ſupremacy, as he ſat at dinner, he ſpied afar off a certain poor man, that uſed to ſweep their cells and cloiſters, and to ring the bell, &c. whom when the lord Cromwel had well noted, he called him to him, and before all the table, took him by the hand, aſked him kindly how he did, and turning to the lords, ſaid; my lords, ſee you this poor man, this man's father was a great friend to me in my neceſſity, and hath given me many a meal's meat.

Then ſaid he to the poor man, come unto me, and I will ſo provide for thee, that thou ſhalt not lack whilſt I live: thus this worthy and noble lord excelled in divers eminent vertues, eſpecially in a flouriſhing authority, excellent wiſdom, and fervent zeal to Chriſt, and his goſpel: his great care was to preſerve, and nouriſh peace abroad in forreign realms.

In all neighbouring princes courts he kept ſpecial intelligence, that nothing was there done, or intended, whereof he had not notice: nor was any ſpark of miſchief kindled againſt our king, or kingdom, which he by wit, and policy did not quench, and keep down; and if policy prevailed not, he would purchaſe peace by money, ſo that during the time of his advancement the king never had war with any forreign nation, though many great princes were much incenſed againſt him: he employed his authority no leſs alſo in keeping all things in good order at home: hampering the popiſh prelates, and diſappointing their ſubtile devices: then in bridling other unruly perſons, forcing them to ſubjection by the laws: he was a ſuccour, and refuge to all godly perſons; a terror to evil doers, ſo that the very report that Cromwel was coming quieted many fraies, and much evil rule: a company of ruffians appointing to fight in Pater Noſter row, and having blocked up the ends of the ſtreet with carts, that none ſhould interrupt them, Cromwel hearing of it, in the heat of the fight came down Pannier alley towards them, but ſo ſoon as the report of Cromwel's coming was heard, the cars could not keep them in, but they ran away, and ſo the fray was ended.

Alſo there was a ruffianly ſerving man, who to put himſelf into the gallanter garb, as he conceived, nouriſhed his hair till it hung down upon his ſhoulders; on a time the lord Cromwel met this fellow as he walked in the ſtreets, who ſeeing his diſguiſed habit, which he judged might be of bad example unto others, he called him to him, and enquired whoſe man he was and with all aſking him whether his maſter, or any of his fellows wore their hair ſo long, or no; he anſwered no. but to excuſe himſelf, he pleaded that he had made a vow not to cut his hair for ſuch a time; to whom the lord Cromwel anſwered, that ſince he had made himſelf a votary, he would not force him to break his vow, but yet he would lay him in priſon till the time was expired, and ſo preſently ſent him to the marſhal-ſey, where he lay till his maſter having perſuaded him to cut his hair, petitioned for his releaſe, and ſo being brought before the lord Cromwel with his ſhort hair, he diſmiſſed him: alſo a fryar wearing his cowle after the diſſolution of the monaſteries, Cromwel meeting him in Paul's churchyard, ſaid to him, will not this coule of yours be left off yet:

If I do not hear by one o'clock that this apparrel of thine is changed, thou ſhalt be hanged immediately for example to all others, and ſo he durſt never wear his coule after: innumerable were the benefits which this worthy lord did, by his prudent policy, grave authority, and godly zeal for the good both of the church, and ſtate; what good orders he eſtabliſhed, what wickedneſs he ſuppreſſed, what corruptions he reformed, what abuſes he diſcovered, what crafty juglings, and ſuperſtitious deluſions he detected, and aboliſhed out of the church; as the rode of grace, wherein a man ſtood incloſed with an hundred wyers, wherewith he made the image roll his eyes, nod his head, hang the lip, move, and ſhake his jaws, according as the value of the gift offered, pleaſed, or diſpleaſed the prieſt: if it were a ſmall piece of ſilver, he would hang the lip, if it were a good piece of gold, his chaps ſhould go merrily, &c.

But Cromwel diſcovering this forgery, cauſed the image, with all his engines to be openly ſhewed at Paul's croſs, and there to be torn in pieces by the people: alſo the blood of Hale's he cauſed to be brought to the ſame place, where it was proved to be the blood of a duck: he alſo proved the holy maid of Kent to be a notorious whore: alſo the roode of Cheſter, of Thomas Becket, our lady of Walſingam, with many more curſed monuments of idolatry, this good man, ſtirred up by the providence of God, removed out of the peoples way, that they might walk more ſafely in the ſervice of almighty God.

About this time Edmond Bonner was a Lutheran, and a great profeſſor of the goſpel, whom therefore the lord Cromwel much favoured, and procured for him the biſhoprick of Hereford; then obtained of the king that he ſhould be ſent over as ambaſſador into France, and ſent over by him a letter which he procured of our king to the king of France, wherein he deſired him to licenſe a ſubject of his to print a large Bible in Engliſh at Paris, becauſe paper was eaſilier to be had there than in England: as alſo becauſe they had more ſtore of good workmen to diſpatch the ſame.

Bonner much beſtirred himſelf in this buſineſs, and outwardly ſhewed great friendſhip to the merchants that had undertaken this work, entertaining them often at his table, and ſo rejoiced in the printing of thoſe Bibles, that himſelf would oft overſee the preſs; yea he was ſo zealous, that he cauſed them to print a New Teſtament in Engliſh, and Latin, and himſelf took off many of them, and gave them to his friends: then did the lord Cromwel procure his advancement to the biſhoprick of London, and Bonner took the oath of ſupremacy before theſe Engliſh men that printed the Bible, and before maſter Coverdale, who was the over-ſeer of the preſs; to whom he promiſed, that when the Bible was printed, he would have at leaſt ſix of them to ſet up in ſeveral places in Paul's church.

Afterwards, by the procurement of Cromwel, the bible of Tindal's tranſlation was printed at London, one of which he preſented to king Henry, and obtained that the ſame might be freely read of all his ſubjects: but the ſetting forth hereof did exceedingly incenſe the popiſh biſhops, eſpecially becauſe of the prologues to the books, and a large table in the end of it, wherein were ſet down texts about the Lords ſupper, and to prove the lawfulneſs of miniſters marriage, and againſt the maſs: but whilſt Cromwel was thus labouring for the public good, and endeavouring to deliver the poor ſaints out of their troubles, the malice of theſe popiſh biſhops encreaſed ſo againſt him, that they continually laboured by falſe trains, and crafty ſurmiſes to caſt him out of the king's favour.

About this time, there was one John Lambert, a godly, and learned miniſter, called in queſtion for his religion, the king himſelf ſat amongſt the biſhops, whilſt he was examined, and after a long diſputation betwixt the biſhops, and him, in the cloſe of the day, the king ſaid to him: 'What ſayeſt thou now after all this pains that hath been taken with thee? wilt thou live or die? thou haſt yet free choice:' to whom Lambert anſwered, I wholly ſubmit myſelf to the will of your majeſty: the king replied, if you ſubmit yourſelf to me, you muſt die, for I will be no patron to heretics; and ſo, by the ſecret, and crafty counſel of Stephen Gardner, turning himſelf to the lord Cromwell, he ſaid, Cromwell, read the ſentence of condemnation againſt him; which through human frailty, and being ſurprized on the ſudden, he did read.

But when the day came wherein Lambert was to be burnt, Cromwell ſent for him into his houſe, and taking him into his ſecret chamber, he aſked him forgiveneſs for that which he had done.

The ſubtile malicious prelates ceaſed not, all this while, by themſelves, and their agents about the king, to calumniate and traduce this good lord, inſomuch that a parliament being ſummoned, anno 1541. Cromwell being in the council chamber, was ſuddenly apprehended, and committed priſoner to the tower, which was much lamented by all good men, who prayed heartily for him: but the popiſh party much rejoiced, eſpecially the clergy, whom he could not abide for their popery and maſked hypocriſy: ſhortly after he was attainted by parliament: the crimes which they laid to his charge were theſe; firſt he was accuſed of hereſy, and for a ſupporter of ſuch perſons, as

Barns, Clark, and many others, whom by his authority, and letters written to the sheriffs, and justices in divers shires, he had rescued out of the hands of their adversaries, and discharged out of prison: then, that he had dispersed amongst the king's subjects many books, containing much heresy in them; thirdly that he had caused to be translated into English many books, comprizing matters against the sacrament of the altar, and that he had commended it as good and Christian doctrine; fourthly they pretended that about two years before, he had spoken some words against the king, but the witnesses to prove this did not agree amongst themselves. But the truth was, the king was a weary of his queen, the lady Anne Bullen, a virtuous and religious woman, to whom he had been married but a few months, and cast his wanton affections upon the lady Katharine Howard, which Cromwell laboured to dissuade him from, and therefore he must be taken out of the way. This storm Cromwell did foresee at least two years before, considering the variable affections of the king, and the subtle malice of Stephen Gardner, and his associates; and thereupon he called together his servants, and shewed them in what a slippery state he stood, and therefore required them to look diligently to their order and doings, lest through their default any occasion might arise against him: also he took such order for them, that most of them, especially his gentlemen that were younger brethren, which had little but his service to take to, he well provided for, by leaving money in the hands of their friends for them; and having twelve boys that were his musicians, he gave them twenty pound apiece, and so returned them to their friends; and as his great prosperity had not puffed him up with pride, so neither was he at all dejected in his adversity, but bore it with admirable constancy, and Christian fortitude, and patience.

Some commissioners coming to examine him whilst he was in the tower, he carried himself so gravely, and patiently, and answered them so discreetly, that they could put no interrogatories to him, either concerning ecclesiastical or civil affairs, wherein he was not exceeding ripe, and well furnished with an answer. Amongst the commissaries, there was one whom the lord Cromwell desired to carry from him a letter to the king, which he refused; saying, That he would carry no letter to the king from a traitor: then he desired him at least to carry a message from him to the king, which request he assented to, provided that it were not against his allegiance: the lord Cromwell taking witness of the other lords what he had promised. 'You shall, said he, commend me to the king, and tell him; by that time he hath so well tried and proved you, as I have done, he shall find you as false a man as ever came about him.' His enemies durst not bring him to his answer, nor try him by his peers, but procured an act of attainder, whereby he was condemned before he was heard; yet the king not long after his death repented his haste, wishing that he had his Cromwell alive again; when he came upon the scaffold on tower-hill, he spake thus unto the people.

'I am come hither to die, and not to purge myself, as some perhaps may expect that I should, and will; for if I should so do, I were a very wretch; I am by the law condemned to die, and I thank my Lord God that hath appointed me this death for mine offence, for I always lived a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for which I ask him hearty forgiveness. It is not unknown to many of you, that I was a great traveller, and being but of mean parentage, was called to high estate, and now I have offended my prince, for which I heartily ask him forgiveness, beseeching you to pray with me to Almighty God, that he will forgive me, &c.'

'And once again I desire you to pray for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I may waver nothing in my faith:' then kneeling down on his knees he spake these words: 'O Lord Jesus, which art the only health of all men living, and the everlasting life of them which die in thee; I wretched sinner do submit myself wholly to thy blessed will, and being sure that that thing cannot perish, which is committed to thy mercy; willingly now I leave this frail and wicked flesh, in sure hope that thou wilt in better wise restore it unto me again at the last day, in the resurrection of the just; I beseech thee most merciful Lord Jesus Christ, that thou wilt by thy grace make strong my soul against all temptations, and defend me with the buckler of thy mercy against all the assaults of the devil. I see, and know that there is in myself no hope of salvation, but all my confidence, hope, and trust is in thy most merciful goodness; I have no merits, nor good works that I may alledge before thee; of sins, and of evil works, alas! I see a great heap, but yet through thy mercy I trust to be in the number of them to whom thou wilt not impute their sins, but wilt take, and accept me for righteous and just, and make an inheritor of thine everlasting kingdom. Thou merciful Lord was born for my sake, didst suffer hunger and thirst for my sake, didst teach, pray, and fast for my sake: all thy holy actions and works thou wroughtest for my sake: thou sufferedst most grievous pains and torments for my sake: finally, thou gavest thy most precious blood to be shed upon the cross for my sake: now most merciful Saviour, let all these things profit me, that thou hast freely done for me, who hast also given thyself for me: let thy blood cleanse and wash away the spots and foulness of my sins; let thy righteousness hide and cover my unrighteousness; let the merits of thy passion and blood-shedding be satisfactory for my sins; give me Lord thy grace, that my faith waver not, but be firm, and constant to the end; that my hope in thy mercy, and life everlasting may not decay; that love wax not cold in me: finally, that the weakness of my flesh be not overcome with the fear of death: grant O most merciful Father, that when death shall shut up the eyes of my body, yet the eyes of my soul may still behold and look upon thee, and when death hath taken away the use of my tongue, yet my heart may cry, and say unto thee, Lord into thy hands I commend my soul, Lord Jesus receive my soul, Amen.' Having ended his prayer, he made a godly exhortation to those that were about him on the scaffold, and so quietly commended his spirit into the hands of God, anno Christi 1541.

Upon his monument was this engraven, Cromwel, surnamed the great, whom Woolsey first raised from the forge to eminent good fortunes; whom Henry the VIII. used as his instrument to suppress the pope's supremacy, and to dissolve religious structures: whom he advanced to the highest pitch of honour and authority: whom he cast down suddenly, and bereft both of life, and dignities, lyes here interred.

This Cromwel, this pillar of the state was born in Putney, a village in Surrey, by the Thames side, four miles distant from London. He was son to a blacksmith, but in his latter days a brewer. Whose mother, after his father's decease, was married to a shere-man.

He was a man of an active, and forward ripeness of nature, ready and pregnant of wit, discreet, and well advised in judgment, eloquent of tongue: faithful and diligent in service: of an incomparable memory; of a reaching politic head; of a noble, and undaunted spirit. Whose good parts, being perceived by cardinal Woolsey, he took him straight into his service, made him his solliciter, and employ'd him in matters of greatest importance: after whose fall, he was presently advanced to the king's service, wherein he so industriously, and wisely demeaned himself, as that he was thought worthy by the said king, to have the ordering of all his weighty affairs. Whereupon, at several times, he heaped these several offices and honours upon him. He made him master of his jewel-house: baron Cromwel of Okeham: principal secretary: master of the rolls: chancellor of the exchequer: keeper of the privy seal: justice of the forests, and chases from the river of Trent northward: great chamberlain of England: earl of Essex; knight of the garter; vice gerent, or his vicar general.

Thus fortune raised him in a short time for a sudden fall. For upon the eighteenth day of April, anno 1540. he was invested with the honour of the earldom of Essex, and high chamberlain-ship of England: upon which day also the king made his son Gregory, lord Cromwel. Upon the ninth of July next, and immediately following (being envied of many for his honour, and authority, and hated for his religion) he was suddenly arrested in the council chamber, and committed to the tower: upon the nineteenth of the said month he was attainted by parliament of of hereſy and high treaſon. And upon the eighth and twentieth of the ſaid month, he was beheaded on the tower-hill.

Many lamented this great man's fall, but the popiſh party much rejoiced, eſpecially they of the clergy, for that he was an enemy to popery, and could never endure the ſnuffing pride of the prelates. Thankful he was and liberal, never forgetting former benefits. Careful he was of his ſervants for whom he had provided competent livelyhoods, notwithſtanding the ſuddenneſs of his fall: and always faithful and forward he was to do his friends good.

Sanders, that Engliſh runnagate, that never ſpeaks well of any godly man, or zealous profeſſor, or of the truth, will have him to die for the breach of a law made by himſelf, viz. That one appeached of treaſon, ſhould not come into the king's preſence till he had proved himſelf not guilty; but this is but a popiſh lie, for neither did he ever ſuch an act, neither was any ſuch thing charged upon him in his attainder.

The Life of JOHN BRADFORD, who died anno Chriſti 1555.

JOHN BRADFORD was born at Mancheſter in Lancaſhire, and by his parents brought up in learning; and afterwards he ſerved Sir John Harrington, a man much employed under Henry the 8th and Edward the 6th; in which place he had opportunity of much advantaging himſelf, for his maſter found him ſo active, and fit for his employments, that above all others he made uſe of his faithful ſervice. And thus he continued with him for ſeveral years. But God intending him for better employment, having given up a juſt account to his maſter, with his good approbation, he went to Cambridge, where by his diligence in ſtudy, he profited ſo much in knowledge, and ſo pleaſed all by his godly and blameleſs converſation, that, after one year's abode in the univerſity, he was made maſter of arts, and choſen fellow into Pembroke hall. There Mr Bucer falling into acquaintance with him, highly prized, and perſuaded him to enter into the miniſtry, which he moſt modeſtly excuſed, for want of learning; to whom Bucer ſaid, 'If thou have not fine manchet, yet give the people barley bread, or ſuch as thou haſt.' Being thus perſuaded to enter into the miniſtry, Biſhop Ridley made him a prebend in St Paul's, where he continued preaching three years faithfully, reproving ſin ſharply, yet ſweetly preaching Chriſt crucified, and powerfully impugning errors and hereſies, and perſuading to a godly life.

In the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, Bourn, biſhop of Bath made a ſeditious ſermon at Paul's croſs, which ſo moved the people to indignation, that they were ready to pull him out of the pulpit, and one threw a dagger at him; whereupon Bourn requeſted Mr Bradford (who was behind him) to ſtand in his place, and to quiet the people, which accordingly he did; whom, when the people ſaw, they cried, 'Bradford, Bradford; God ſave thy life, Bradford.' Bourn not yet thinking himſelf ſafe, requeſted Mr Bradford to convey him into the ſchool-maſter's houſe, which accordingly he did, going at his back, and ſheltering him from the people; whereupon one ſaid to him, 'Ah Bradford! Bradford! thou ſaveſt him that will help to burn thee.'

In the afternoon Mr Bradford preached at Bow-church, and ſharply reproved the people for their ſeditious carriage. Yet, within three days after, he was ſent for before the council, and charged with ſedition for this act, and by them was ſent priſoner, firſt to the tower, then from thence they removed him to the King's Bench in Southwark; and after his condemnation he was ſent to the Counter in the Poultry: in which places, for the time that he remained priſoner, he preached twice a day, unleſs ſickneſs hindered, and often adminiſtered the ſacrament.

Preaching, reading, and praiſing, was his whole life. He eat but one meal a day, and that a ſpare one too; and his continual ſtudy was upon his knees.

In the midſt of dinner he uſed to meditate, with his hat on his eyes, from which flowed plenty of tears dropping on his trencher. He was in ſuch credit with his keeper at Southwark, that at an evening he would give him leave, upon his bare word, to go into London and viſit a ſick friend; and he was ſo mindful of his promiſe, that he uſed to return to priſon again, rather preventing his hour, than breaking his fidelity.

He was of perſon ſomewhat tall and ſlender, ſpare of body, of a faint ſanguine colour, with an auburne beard. He ſlept not above four hours in the night, and till ſleep came, his book went not out of his hand. His recreation was honeſt company, and Chriſtian diſcourſe a little after dinner; and ſo to prayer and his book again. He counted that hour ill ſpent wherein he did not ſome good, either with with his pen, ſtudy, or exhorting others, &c. He was no niggard of his purſe, but would liberally communicate what he had to his fellow priſoners.

Once a week he viſited the thieves on the other ſide of the priſon, giving them godly exhortations, and diſtributing ſome money amongſt them. An intimate friend of his aſked him, if he ſhould procure his liberty, what he would do, and whither he would go? To whom he anſwered, that he cared not whether he were delivered out of priſon or no: but if he ſhould that then he would marry, and abide ſecretly in England, and teach the people as the time would ſuffer him.

He was had in great reverence and admiration of all good men, ſo that many which knew him not but by fame only, much lamented his death. Yea, many papiſts wiſhed heartily that he might live. Few days paſſed wherein he ſhed not ſome tears before he went to bed; nor was there any priſoner with him, but received ſome profit by him. He had many opportunities of eſcaping, but would not embrace them.

The night before he was carried to Newgate, he dreamed that chains were brought for him to the counter, and that the day following he ſhould be carried to Newgate and that the next day he ſhould be burned in Smithfield, which accordingly came to paſs; for that day in the afternoon, the keeper's wife came running into his chamber, ſaying, O Mr. Bradford, I bring you heavy news, for to morrow you muſt be burned, your chain is now a buying and preſently you muſt go to Newgate. With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, lift up his eyes to heaven, and ſaid, I thank God for it, I have looked for this a long time, it comes not now to me ſuddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour: the Lord make me worthy thereof.

He ſpent the reſt of the evening in prayers, well watred with tears, whereby he raviſhed the minds of the hearers. The morning before he ſhould be burnt as he was putting on a clean ſhirt, in which he was to ſuffer, he made ſuch a prayer of the wedding garment that ſome preſent were in ſuch great admiration, that their eyes were as throughly occupied in looking on him, as their ears were attentive to hear his prayer.

At his departing out of his chamber he prayed earneſtly, and gave money to every ſervant and officer in the houſe, exhorting them to fear and ſerve God continually, labouring to eſchew all manner of evil. Then turning to the will he prayed vehemently, that his words might not be ſpoken to them in vain, but that the Lord would work it effectually in them for his Chriſt's ſake. The priſoners with weeping tears took their farewel of him, whilſt he remained a priſoner. he was oft examined before the biſhops and proffered life if he would recant; to whom he anſwered, life with God's diſpleaſure is worſe than death; and death in his true favour is true life. When he came into Smithfield, (where another young man was to ſuffer with him) he fell flat on his face and prayed; then taking a fagot in his hand, he kiſſed it, and the ſtake alſo; then putting off his raiment, he ſtood by the ſtake and lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, ſaid, O England, England, repent of thy ſins, repent of thy ſins: beware of idolatry, beware of falſe antichriſts, take heed they do not deceive thee: and turning his head to the young man, he ſaid, be of good comfort brother, for we ſhall have a merry ſupper with the Lord this night; and then embracing the reeds, he ſaid: ſtrait is the way, and narrow is the gate that leadeth to eternal ſalvation, and few there be that find it; and ſo he ſlept in the Lord.

He was very charitable, in ſo much as in a hard time he ſold his chains, rings, and jewels to relieve thoſe that were in want. He was ſo humble from the ſenſe of his corruptions, that he ſubſcribed ſome of his letters out of priſon thus, the moſt miſerable, hard hearted, unthankful ſinner John Bradford. A very painted hypocrite John Bradford. Miſerrimus peccator John Bradford; the ſinful John Bradford, &c. He ſuffered martyrdome anno Chriſti 1555.

In his examination before the biſhop of Wincheſter, he often told him, that he had ſworn ſix times never to admit of the authority of the biſhop of Rome; and therefore (ſaid he) I dare not anſwer you, if you examine me as a delegate from him, leſt I ſhould break my oath. To which Gardiner anſwered, that he pretended ſtoutly to defend the doctrine taught in king Edward's days; yet (ſaid he) thou dareſt not anſwer me.

Bradford.] That all men may know that I am not afraid, ſaving mine oath, ask me what you will, and I will plainly anſwer by God's grace, although I ſee my life lieth thereon. But, oh Lord, into thy hands I commend it, come what will, only ſanctify thy name in me, as in an inſtrument of thy grace. Now ask me what you will.

Gardiner.] What ſay you to the bleſſed ſacrament? Do you not believe Chriſt's real preſence there in his natural body?

Bradford.] my Lord, I do not believe that Chriſt is corporally preſent in the ſacrament; but that he is preſent there to the faith of the due receiver. As for tranſubſtantiation, I plainly and flatly believe it not.

At another time, one of the earl of Darby's men came to him ſaying, Ah maſter Bradford, conſider your mother, ſiſter, friends, kinſfolk, and country, what a great diſcomfort will it be to them to ſee you die as an heretic? To whom he anſwered, I have learned to forſake father, mother, brother, ſiſter, friends, and all that ever I have; yea, and my own ſelf; for elſe I cannot be Chriſt's diſciple. And in a letter to his mother and brethren, he thus writes: I am now in priſon, ſure enough from ſtarting, and I thank God I am ready with my life and blood to ſeal thoſe truths which I have preached unto you, if God ſhall account me worthy of that honour; for it is a ſpecial benefit of God to ſuffer for his name and goſpel, as now I do, I heartily thank him for it and am ſure that I ſhall be partaker of his glory: if we ſuffer with him, we ſhall alſo reign with him, as St. Paul ſpeaks. Therefore be not faint hearted, but rather rejoice, at leaſt for my ſake, who am now in the highway to heaven for through many afflictions we muſt enter into that kingdom. Now will God make known who are his: when the wind doth blow, we cannot diſcern the wheat from the chaff; but when the blaſt comes the wheat remains, but the chaff flyes away, and the wheat is ſo far from being hurt by the wind, that it is more cleanſed and known to be wheat. Gold, when it is caſt into the fire, is made more precious, ſo are God's children by the croſs of afflictions. God's children are now chaſtiſed here, that they may not be condemned with the world: but ſure great plagues from God hang over this realm for it. And no marvel if God's hand lies ſo heavy upon us; for lately, as there was never more knowledge, ſo never leſs godly living. It was counted a fooliſh thing to ſerve our God truly; and fervent prayer was not paſſed upon. Preaching was but a paſtime; the communion was counted too common; faſting to ſubdue the fleſh was far out of uſe; almes were almoſt nothing: malice, covetouſneſs and uncleanneſs were common every where, with ſwearing drunkenneſs, and idleneſs; and therefore all this evil is come upon us, &c. Yea I my ſelf loved not his truth as I ſhould, therefore God thus puniſheth me, nay in puniſhing bleſſeth me: and I thank him more for this priſon than for any parlour; yea than for any pleaſure that ever I had; for in it I finde God, my ſweet, good God always.

And in another place.

Let us repent, and be heartily ſorry that we have ſo carnally, ſo hypocritically, ſo covetouſly, ſo vain gloriouſly profeſſed the goſpel: let the anger, and plagues of God, moſt juſtly fallen upon us, be applyed to our ſins, that from the bottom of our hearts every one of us may ſay, it is I Lord have ſinned againſt thee; it is my hypocriſy, my vain glory, my covetouſneſs, uncleanneſs, carnality, ſecurity, idleneſs, unthankfulneſs, ſelf-love, &c. that hath deſerved the taking away our good king, of thy word and true religion, of thy good miniſters by exile, impriſonment, and death. It is my wickedneſs that cauſeth ſucceſs, and encreaſe of authority, and peace to thine enemies. O be merciful, be merciful unto us, &c.

The

The Life of NICOLAS RIDELY, who died Anno Chriſti 1555.

NICHOLAS Ridely was born in Northumberland of worſhipful parents, and bred at ſchool in Newcaſtle, and from thence ſent to Cambridge, where he grew ſo famous for his learning, that after diverſe other offices whereunto he was called in the univerſity, he was choſen maſter of Pembroke-Hall, and made doctor in divinity. From thence he was called by archbiſhop Cranmer to be vicar of Herne in Eaſt-Kent, where he was a fruitful and faithful preacher, at which time it pleaſed God to reveal to him the true doctrine concerning the Lord's ſupper; and amongſt others to convert by his miniſtry the lady Phines, who proved an eminent inſtrument of God's glory. After a while he was made a prebend of the cathedral church of Canterbury; but not liking his ſociety there, he travelled into France, and at his return was made chaplain to king Henry the VIII. and biſhop of Rocheſter, and from thence (in Edward the VI. days) he was removed to be biſhop of London; in which places he took ſo great pains in preaching, that he was dearly beloved of his flock, to whom alſo he was ſingularly examplary in his life; ſo that his very enemies had nothing to ſay againſt him. Every Sabbath, and holy day he preached in one place, or other, except extraordinary occaſions hindred him; and to his ſermons multitudes of people reſorted, ſwarming about him like bees to gather the ſweet flowers, and wholſome juice of his fruitful doctrine.

He was paſſingly well learned, and of ſuch reading, that he deſerved to be numbred amongſt the greateſt ſcholars that theſe latter ages produced, as appeared by his notable works, pithy ſermons, and ſundry diſputations in both univerſities, which drew an acknowlegment of his learning from his very adverſaries.

He was of a ſtrong memory, and of great reading, of a deep wit, very judicious, and very merciful. He was of perſon right comely, and well proportioned in all points, both in complexion and lineaments of his body; he was free from malice, and ſoon forgat all injuries and offences done againſt him; very kind to his kindred; yet withal telling them, that if they did evil, they ſhould look for nothing from him, but ſhould be as ſtrangers to him.

He uſed all means to mortify his fleſh; being much in prayer, and contemplation; was ſober in diſcourſe, and ſometimes merry at meals, after which he uſed to play at cheſs about an hour, and then returned to his ſtudy till five o'clock at night, when coming down, he had prayers in his family, then went to ſupper, then plaid a game at cheſs, and ſo returned to his ſtudy till eleven o'clock at night.

His manner was daily to read a lecture to his family at prayer-time, giving to every one that could read a New Teſtament, and hiring them with money to learn chapters by heart, being marvellous careful that his family might give an example of godlineſs and vertue to others.

He called biſhop Bonner's mother, his mother, and when he was at Fulham, had her conſtantly at meals with him, ſetting her at the upper-end of the table, who ever was preſent. And as he was godly himſelf, ſo nothing appeared in his family, but vertue, and godlineſs.

He was firſt converted by reading Bertram's book of the ſacrament, and much confirmed by conferrence with Dr Cranmer, and Peter Martyr. In the beginning of queen Mary's days, he was impriſoned with the firſt, firſt in the tower, and from thence he was ſent to Oxford with Cranmer, and Latimer, and there kept in the common goal, till at length being ſevered from his brethren, he was committed to the cuſtody of one Iriſh, with whom he remained till the day of his death, which was October, 16.

Anno Chriſti 1555. Writing to Latimer in priſon he ſaith, 'I pray you good father, let me have ſomething more from you to comfort my ſtomach, for except the Lord aſſiſt me in his ſervice, I ſhall play but the part of a white-liver'd knight; but he can make a coward in his cauſe, to fight like a man.' In a letter to Mr Bradford he ſaith, as far as London is from Oxford, yet thence we have received both meat, money, and ſhirts, not only from our acquaintance, but from ſome ſtrangers alſo. I know for whoſe ſake they do it, &c.

And again, ever ſince I heard of our dear brother Roger's his ſtout confeſſion, and departing (bleſſed be God for it) I never felt any lumpiſh heavineſs in my heart, as ſometimes I did before. And again,

'Sir, bleſſed be God, notwithſtanding our hard reſtraint, and the evil reports raiſed of us, we are merry in God, and all our care is, and ſhall be (by God's grace) to pleaſe and ſerve him, from whom we expect, after theſe temporary, and momentary miſeries, to have eternal joy, and perpetual felicity, with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, &c. As yet never a learned man, ſcholar or other, hath viſited us ſince our coming to Bocardo, which now may be called the college of Quondam's; for we be no fewer than three, and I dare ſay every one well contented with his portion, which is our heavenly Father's good and gracious gift. Farewel, we ſhall by the grace of God one day meet and be merry together; which day aſſuredly approacheth, the Lord grant it may ſhortly come.'

Writing to his maſter Grindal, who was now in exile, he thus gives him an account of his condition. I was (ſaith he) 'about two months cloſe priſoner in the tower, after that without (my ſeeking) I had the liberty of the tower granted me, and ſo I continued about half a year, till refuſing to be preſent at maſs, I was ſhut up cloſe priſoner again. The laſt lent but one, by reaſon of the riſing in Kent, the tower was ſo full of priſoners, that my lord archbiſhop of Canterbury, Mr Latimer, Mr Bradford, and myſelf, were all put into one priſon, where we remained till almoſt Eaſter, and then Dr Cranmer, Mr Latimer, and myſelf, were ſent down to Oxford, and were ſuffered to have nothing with us, but what we carried upon us. About Whitſunday following was our diſputation at Oxford, after which he had pen, ink, and all things taken from us, yea, and our own ſervants were removed from us, and ſtrangers ſet in their ſteads, and all of us kept apart, as we are unto this day. God be bleſſed we are all three in health, and of good cheer, and have looked long ago to have been diſpatched; for within a day or two after our diſputations we were condemned for heretics: the Lord's will be fulfilled in us, &c.

When he was brought before the pope's delegate (the biſhop of Lincoln) in the divinity ſchool in Oxford, whilſt the commiſſion was reading, he ſtood bare till he heard the cardinal named, and the pope's holineſs, and then he put on his cap, and being admoniſhed by the biſhop to pull it off, he anſwered, I do not put it on in contempt to your lordſhip, &c. but that by this my behaviour, I may make it appear that I acknowlege in no point the uſurped ſupremacy of Rome, and therefore I utterly contemn and deſpiſe all authority coming from the pope. Then the biſhop commanding the beadle to pull off his cap, he bowing his head, ſuffered him quietly to do it.

After diverſe examinations, he was at laſt degraded, condemned, and delivered to the bailiffs to be kept till the next day, when he ſhould be burnt.

The night before he ſuffered he cauſed his beard to be ſhaven, and his feet waſhed, and bade his hoſteſs, and the reſt at the board to his wedding: he aſked his brother alſo whether his ſiſter could find in her heart to be preſent at it? Yea, ſaid he, I dare ſay with all her heart. His hoſteſs (miſtreſs Iriſh) weeping, he ſaid, 'O miſtreſs Iriſh, I ſee now that you love me not; for in that you weep, it appears that you will not be at my marriage, nor are therewith content; I ſee you are not ſo much my friend as I thought; but quiet yourſelf, though my breakfaſt be ſomewhat ſharp, and painful, yet I am ſure my ſupper ſhall be more pleaſant and ſweet.'

His brother profering to watch with him he refuſed it, ſaying, I intend to go to bed, and ſleep as quietly as ever I did in my life. In the morning he came forth in a fair black gown, faced with foins, and ſippet of velvet, &c. and looking behind him, he ſpied Mr Latimer coming after, to whom he ſaid, 'O! be you there? Yea, ſaid Latimer, have-after as faſt as I can follow.' Coming to the ſtake, he lift up his hands and eyes, ſtedfaſtly to heaven, and eſpying, Mr Latimer, he ran with a cheerful countenance to him, embraced, and kiſſed him, and comforted him, ſaying, 'Be of good heart brother, for God will either aſſwage the fury of the flame, or give us ſtrength to abide it.' So he went to the ſtake, kneeled by it, kiſſed it, and prayed earneſtly, and being about to ſpeak to the people, ſome ran to him, and ſtopped his mouth with their hands.

Afterwards being ſtripped, he ſtood upon a ſtone by the ſtake, ſaying, 'O heavenly Father, I give thee hearty thanks, for that thou haſt called me to be a profeſſor of thee even unto death, I beſeech thee Lord God have mercy upon this realm of England, and deliver it from all its enemies.'

As a ſmith was knocking in the ſtaple which held the chain, he ſaid to him, 'Good fellow knock it in hard, for the fleſh will have his courſe.' Then his brother brought a bag of gunpowder, and would have tied it about his neck. Dr Ridley aſked what it was? His brother anſwered, gunpowder; then ſaid he, I take it as being ſent of God, therefore I will receive it as ſent from him. And when he ſaw the flame a coming up to him, he cried with a loud voice, 'In manus tuas, &c. 'Into thy hands, Lord, I commend my ſpirit, Lord receive my ſoul.' but the fire being kept down by the wood, he deſired them for Chriſt's ſake to let the fire come to him, which his brother in law miſ-underſtanding, ſtill heaped on faggots, whereby his nether parts were burnt, before his upper parts were touched. At laſt his upper parts fell down into the fire alſo, and ſo he ſlept in the Lord.

Biſhop Ridley upon a time croſſing the Thames, there roſe on a ſudden ſuch a tempeſt, that all in the boat were aſtoniſhed, looking for nothing but to be drowned: 'Take heart, ſaid he, for this boat carrieth a biſhop that muſt be burnt, and not drowned.' He ſuffered martyrdom anno Chriſti, 1555.

He was a man ſo reverenced for his learning, and knowlege in the ſacred ſcriptures, that his very enemies were enforced to acknowlege that he was an excellent clerk, and if his life might have been redeemed with money, the lord Dacre's of the north, being his kinſman, would have given 10000l. for the ſame, rather than that he ſhould be burnt. But ſo unmerciful and cruel was queen Mary, that notwithſtanding Dr Ridley's gentleneſs towards her in king Edward the ſixth days, ſhe would by no intreaties, nor other means be perſuaded to ſpare his life. 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruelty.'

'In a letter which he wrote to his friends, he hath this paſſage: 'I warn you my friends, that ye be not aſtoniſhed at the manner of my diſſolution, for I aſſure you I think it the greateſt honour that ever I was called to in all my life: and therefore I thank the Lord God heartily for it, that it hath pleaſed him of his great mercy to call me to this high honour, to ſuffer death willingly for his ſake, and in his cauſe; wherefore all you that be my true lovers and friends, rejoice, and rejoice with me again, and render with me hearty thanks to God, our heavenly Father, that for his Son's ſake my Saviour and Redeemer Chriſt, he hath vouchſafed to call me, being elſe without his gracious goodneſs, in myſelf but a ſinful and vile wretch, to call me (I ſay) to this high dignity of his true prophets, faithful apoſtles, and of his holy and choſen martyrs to die, and to ſpend this temporal life in the defence, and maintainance of his eternal and everlaſting truth.'

Whilſt he was Mr of Pembrook-hall, he uſed to walk much in the orchard, where he learned without book almoſt all Paul's Epiſtles, and the Epiſtles of James, Peter John and Jude, concerning which himſelf ſaid, 'Though in time I did forget much of them again, yet the ſweet ſmell thereof I truſt I ſhall carry with me into heaven, and the profit thereof I have felt in all my life time hitherto.'

The Life of HUGH LATIMER, who died Anno Chriſti 1555.

HUGH Latimer, born at Thirkeſton in the county of Leiceſter, being of a prompt and ſharp wit, was by his parents brought up in learning, and at the age of fourteen he went to Cambridge, where, after he had profited in other ſtudies, he gave himſelf to the ſtudy of ſchool-divinity, commenced batchelor in divinity, and was a very zealous papiſt, made an oration againſt Philip Melancthon: railed againſt Mr Stafford, divinity-lecturer, and willed the ſcholars in no wiſe to believe him.

He was ſo zealous in his popiſh religion, and therewith ſo ſcrupilous, that being a prieſt, and uſing to ſay maſs, he was ſo ſervile an obſerver of the Romiſh decrees, that he thought he had never ſufficiently mixed his maſſing wine with water, and that he ſhould never be damned if once he were a profeſſed fryar. He uſed to carry the croſſe before the proceſſion.

Mr Thomas Bilney, ſeeing Mr Latimer to have a zeal in his ways (although without knowlege) was ſtricken with a brotherly pity towards him, thinking by what means he might beſt win this ignorantly zealous brother to the true knowlege of Chriſt. And thereupon going to his ſtudy, he deſired him to hear him make a confeſſion of his faith, which Latimer conſenting to, was ſo touched thereby, that he gave over ſchool divinity and ſtudied more orthodox divines. So that whereas before he was an enemy to, and almoſt a perſecutor of Chriſt, he was now a zealous ſeeker after him; changing his old manner of cavilling and railing, into diligent conferring with Mr Bilney, and others: and aſked Mr Stafford forgiveneſs before he died.

Being thus won to Chriſt, he was not ſatisfied with his own converſion, but pitying the miſery of others, he became a powerful public preacher; and an inſtructor of many in private alſo; whereupon the devil raiſed up many doctors and fryars againſt him, and the biſhop of Ely forbade him to preach, anno Chriſti 1529: yet he continued three years preaching with much applauſe; yea the biſhop himſelf hearing him upon a time, commended him, and wiſhed that he had the like gifts himſelf.

He uſed often to viſit the priſoners, to relieve the needy, and feed the hungry. Amongſt the adverſaries which the devil raiſed againſt him, one was doctor Redman, who wrote to him to divert him from the truth: to which he made this ſhort anſwer; 'Rev. Mr Redman, it is enough enough for me that Chriſt's ſheep hear no man's voice but Chriſt's; and as for you, you have no voice of Chriſt againſt me; whereas for my part I have an heart ready to hearken to any voice of Chriſt that you can produce. Thus fare you well, and trouble me no more from talking with the Lord my God. But ſhortly after, complaint was made againſt him to the cardinal, who ſent for him; but by the means of Dr. Buts the king's phyſician, a favourer of good men, he was choſen into the number of thoſe which laboured in the cauſe of the king's ſupremacy: whereupon he went to the court, and lodged in Dr Buts his chamber, preaching many times in London. At laſt being weary of the court, by the lord Cromwell's means he had a living given him in Wiltſhire, whither he preſently removed; the place was called Weſt-Kingſton, near Sarum, where with much diligence he inſtructed his flock, and preached zealouſly many times abroad in the country. Whereupon ſome popiſh prieſts drew up articles againſt him; and he was much moleſted by the biſhop of London, and Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, by whom he was cited to appear before him, and the biſhop of London. Theſe malicious perſons detained him for a long ſpace from his cure at home, calling him three times every week before them, which much troubled him, ſeeing they would neither preach themſelves, nor ſuffer him to do his duty: hereupon he wrote to the archbiſhop, expoſtulating with him, for ſo detaining him from his charge, and that for no juſt cauſe, but only for preaching the truth againſt ſundry abuſes which were crept into the church. Yet this nothing prevailed till the king reſcued him out of their hands, and at the requeſt of the lord Cromwell made him biſhop of Worceſter. In which place he buſily employed himſelf in inſtructing his flock, and giving them a good example by his holy life. He ſpent all his time in ſtudy, teaching, preaching, exhorting, viſiting, correcting, and reforming to the utmoſt of his power, and as the times could bear, and though he could not utterly extinguiſh the reliques of popery, yet he ſo wrought that they ſhould be uſed with as little hurt, and with as much profit as might be. Yet neither there was he quiet; for one of great place accuſed him to the king for for preaching ſedition, but the king reſted ſatisfied with his anſwer.

At New-years-tide the biſhops uſed to preſent the king with a New-years gift, and biſhop Latimar, amongſt the reſt, preſented him with the New Teſtament, wrapped up in a napkin, with this poſy about it, Fornicatores, & adulteros judicabit Dominus: whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. But the ſix articles coming out, and he ſeeing that he could not retain his office with a good conſcience, of his own accord he reſigned his biſhoprick: and when he put off his rochet in his chamber amongſt his friends, he gave a skip in the floor for joy, feeling his ſhoulders lighter, and being (as he ſaid) diſcharged of ſo heavy a burthen. This was anno Chriſti 1539. after which he betook himſelf again to his mean partonage at weſt-Kingſton in Wiltſhire, not far from Briſtow: yet by the malice of certain popiſh prieſts who ſlandered his doctrine, he was much endangered; whereupon he had recourſe to Mr. Ralph Morrice, who was Dr. Cranmer's right hand, by whoſe intreaties the archbiſhop ſo prevailed with the king for him, that for the preſent he was freed out of his troubles; yet neither then would the biſhops ſuffer him to be quiet, till he was laid up in the tower, where he remained till Edward the ſixth's reign. At which time being reſtored to his liberty, he continued a faithful and painful preacher all that king's days; preaching twice every Sabbath, though 67 years of age. He roſe to his ſtudy winter, and ſummer, at two a clock in the morning. He evidently fore-ſaw, and fore-told all thoſe plagues which England afterwards felt under Queen Mary; and fore-told concerning himſelf, that his preaching of the goſpel would coſt him his life; and that Wincheſter was kept in the tower for the ſame purpoſe, which afterwards proved ſo. In the begining of Queen Mary's reign he was ſent for up by a purſuivant, whereof he had notice ſix hours before he came to his houſe, yet inſtead of flying, he prepared himſelf for his journey. And when the purſuivant came, he ſaid to him; my friend, you are welcome; I go as willingly to London to give an account of my faith, as ever I went to any place in the world; and I doubt not but as God hath made me worthy formerly to preach his word before two excellent princes, ſo he will enable me to bear witneſs to the truth before the third, either to her eternal comfort, or diſcomfort. The purſuivant having delivered his letter, told him, that he was commanded not to ſtay for him, and ſo immediately departed: his adverſaries hoping that he would have fled; but Latimer haſted after to London, and as he rode through Smithfield, he ſaid, that Smithfield had groaned for him a long time. Coming before the council, after many mocks and ſcorns, he was ſent to the tower, where the Lord gave him ſuch a valiant ſpirit, that he did not only bear the terribleneſs of impriſonment, but derided and laughed to ſcorn the doings of his enemies.

This aged father being kept in the cold winter without a fire, bade the lieutenant's man to tell his Mr that if he did not look better to him, perchance he would deceive him. The lieutenant, thinking that he intended to make an eſcape, charged him with his words, to whom he anſwered, you think I ſhall burn, but except you let me have a fire, I will deceive your expectation, for I am here like to ſtarve with cold. Thus he continued a long time in the tower, with as much patience as a man in his caſe could poſſibly do; and at laſt from thence he was carried to Oxford, with Cranmer and Ridley where they ſpent their time in brotherly conference, fervent prayer, and fruitfull writing. Yea, many times he continued ſo long in fervent prayer, that he was not able to get up without help. Three things he more eſpecially prayed for.

1 That as God had appointed him to be a preacher of his word, ſo that he would give him grace to ſtand to his doctrine, that he might give his heart's-blood for the ſame.

2 That God of his mercy would reſtore his goſpel to England once again, once again, which he often inculcated in his prayer, and that with ſo much ardour, as though he had ſeen God before him, and ſpoken to him face to face.

3 That the Lord would preſerve queen Elizabeth, and make her a comfort to this comfortleſs realm of England. The Lord moſt graciouſly anſwering all thoſe his requeſts. At laſt he was condemned, and with doctor Ridley was carried to be burned. When he came to the ſtake, he lift up his eyes with an amiable and comfortable countenance, ſaying, fidelis eſt Deus, &c. God is faithful, who will not ſuffer us to be tempted above that which we are able &c. when the fire was brought, he ſaid to Dr Ridley, be of good comfort brother, and play the man, we ſhall this day light ſuch a candle by God's grace in England, as I truſt ſhall never be put out. When he was ſtripped into his ſhroud, he ſeemed a very comely perſon to all that were preſent: and whereas in his cloathes he appeared a withered, and crooked, ſilly old man, he now ſtood bolt-upright, as comely a father as one might likely behold. As he was burning, his blood ran out of his heart in ſuch abundance, as if all the blood in his body had been gathered thither, to the great aſtoniſhment of the beholders, according to his former requeſt, that he might be ſo happy as to ſhed his heart's-blood for the truth. When the fire was firſt kindled, he cried, O father of heaven receive my ſoul: And ſo receiving the flame, and, as it were embracing it, having ſtroaked his face with his hands, and bathed them a little in the fire, he ſoon died with very little pain, or none at all, anno Chriſti 1555.

In a letter to king Henry the eighth, he thus concludes; wherefore, gracious king, remember yourſelf, have pity upon your ſoul, and think that the day is even at hand when you ſhall give an account for your office, and of the blood that hath been ſhed with your ſword: in the which day that your grace may ſtand ſtedfaſt, and may have your quietus eſt ſealed with the blood of our Saviour Chriſt, which will only ſerve at that day, is my daily prayer, &c.

The Life of THOMAS CRANMER, who died anno Chriſti, 1555.

THOMAS Cranmer was a gentleman by birth, of a very ancient family, born at Arſelacton in Nottinghamſhire, brought up at ſchool, and from thence ſent to Cambridge, where profiting much in learning, he was choſen fellow in Jeſus college. After which he married a wife, and thereby loſing his fellowſhip, he was choſen divinity reader in Buckingſham college, but not long after his wife dying in child bed, the maſter and fellows choſe him again fellow into Jeſus college. After which he commenced doctor in divinity.

From thence he was choſen a fellow in the foundation of Cardinal Wolſey's college in Oxford, but foreſeeing the danger which after followed, he refuſed that place. Whilſt he was in Cambridge, the queſtion aroſe about king Henry's divorce from his brother's widow; and the plague breaking forth at Cambridge, Dr Cranmer retired to Waltham-abby. At which time this fell out.

The king to recreate himſelf, and to take private counſel with thoſe in whom he moſt confided, who were the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and ſome others, went on hunting to Waltham, at which time he ſignified his mind to Steven Gardiner his ſecretary, and to Fox his almoner, willing them to ſearch what was moſt expedient for him to do; to end well that controverſy about his marriage and as God would have it, theſe two men lodged in the houſe of one Mr. Creſſie at Waltham, where alſo Dr. Cranmer was, having left Cambridge upon the forementioned occaſion, and being tutor to Mr. Creſſie's two ſons. Gardiner and Fox thus meeting with him, and knowing him to be famous for learning, and piety, invited him to their good cheer, and aſked his advice concerning the king's cauſe. Dr Cranmer was at firſt very loth to deliver his judgment, but being much importuned by them, he at laſt ſaid:

'I cannot ſay much on the ſudden in ſo weighty a buſineſs without ſtudy and meditation, but in my opinion, ſeeing trouble of mind and conſcience, nothing can more encreaſe it than ſo great delays, and wandering in Romiſh ſuits, in which whoſoever are once entangled, can ſcarce ever extricate themſelves out of the ſnares. I think it better therefore, that laying aſide all delays, and court ſuits, wherein the king hath been too long toſſed with great affliction of mind, the judgement of divines, both in our own and foreign univerſities, be ſearched out, which may be ſtrengthened with the law of God; and as they ſhall, by God's word, prove it lawful or unlawful, ſo let the king proceed, and have the cauſe then determined in his own country, whereby he may live in lawful matrimony, with a cheerful mind and quiet conſcience; which is much to be deſired by all his faithful ſubjects.'

When he had thus ſpoken, with great gravity and wiſdom, Gardiner and Fox preſenting that excellent counſel, as given from God, wiſhed that the king had had ſuch counſel given him before he ever ſent to Rome.

The day after, when they came to the king, he aſked them what was done in his buſineſs; whereupon Fox told him of their meeting, and conference had with Dr Cranmer. But proud Gardiner, ſeeking to inveſt himſelf in the praiſe which was due unto another, would have made himſelf the author of that council; but the king neglecting his ſpeech, aſked Fox if Cranmer was at Waltham ſtill? and being told that he was, he preſently ordered him to be ſent for, ſaying, 'I judge his counſel right; if I had known it two days ago, I had ſaved infinite charges, and had lived with a more ſafe and quiet conſcience.

When Dr Cranmer came to him, he much excuſed himſelf as inſufficient to be engaged in ſo great a matter, yet beſought him to commit the trial of it to the beſt learned men in both univerſities: which advice the king liked well; yet required him to write his judgment upon it alſo; and commanded the Earl of Wiltſhire to provide him retired lodgings, books, and whatever elſe was neceſſary for ſo great a work. Which taſk being finiſhed, and confirmed by ſcriptures, councils, and fathers, he preſented it to the king; who (having read it) aſked him, whether he would juſtify it before the pope? Dr Cranmer profeſſing his willingneſs, the king haſtened his diſpatch to Rome; and ſent other learned men abroad to foreign univerſities, to diſpute this queſtion amongſt the divines there, where it was concluded, that no ſuch matrimony was lawful by the word of God.

When the king's ambaſſadors came to Rome, the pope proffering them his foot to kiſs, the Earl of Wiltſhire's ſpaniel caught his great toe in his mouth; whereupon the ambaſſadors ſcorned to kiſs after the dog, and the pope pulled in his foot again. There Cranmer and the reſt proffered to defend, that, jure divino, the brother ought not to marry the brother's wife. But none appearing againſt them, the pope made Dr Cranmer his penitentiary, and ſo diſmiſſed them.

From thence Dr Cranmer travelled to the emperor's court at Vienna, proffering to diſpute with his divines upon the ſaid queſtion; but Cornelius Agrippa, in private conference, receiving full ſatisfaction from him thereupon, eaſily perſuaded other learned men, that were in the emperor's court, not to contend with Cranmer, who (as he ſaid) was in the truth; ſo that no man contradicting him, Cranmer departed from the emperor; and, having travelled all over Germany, he brought home with him into England the opinions and ſentences of the moſt learned men that lived in the univerſities and courts of princes. And (in the mean ſeaſon, others ſent from the king) paſſing through all the univerſities of Italy and France, brought home likewiſe their determinations in that point, confirmed with their public and authentic ſeals, agreeing with thoſe that Cranmer had brought out of Germany. In this journey, to and fro, he learned all the New Teſtament by heart.

Auguſt 23. anno Chriſti 1533 William Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, and the king reſolved to place Dr Cranmer in his room, who was at this time in Germany about the king's buſineſs, and was loath to take upon him an office of ſuch dignity in the church: for he knew that there was an oath to be taken to the pope of Rome, before he could be inſtalled in that place. He feared alſo what iſſue the king's divorce might have, and was not ignorant of the king's violent diſpoſition. He knew that ſudden and great changes were dangerous, and that the court, to which he was not accuſtomed, was full of deceits and counterfeitings. That he muſt in all things obey the king's will; and that if he tripped in any thing never ſo little, there would be ſome, who, out of envy at his felicity, would tumble him down headlong when he began to fall.

He alſo having buried his firſt wife, was now fallen in love with a young maid, who was niece to Oſiander's wife, whom he determined to marry, though he knew it was forbidden by law for a prieſt to marry, or for a man to be made a prieſt who had married a ſecond wife.

Weighing theſe things ſeriouſly with himſelf, when he was ſent for by the king to return home ſo ſoon as he could, he ſtayed in Germany ſix whole months, framing one excuſe or other; hoping, that in the mean time, ſome or other would get the archbiſhopric. But ſuch were the times then, that every man feared the ſlipperineſs of that place, and therefore declined it.

At laſt Dr Cranmer privately marrying his wife at Norimberg, returned home, and was made archbiſhop, tho' againſt his will: for he had refuſed the dignity offered him, becauſe he was to be tied to the pope, againſt all right and equity, and therefore he gave the pope's bull into the king's hands, ſaying, that he would never receive biſhopric of England, but from him who was the head of England; nor take an oath that was derogatory to the king's authority. And thus being made archbiſhop, he carried himſelf as formerly he had done, riſing every morning at five o'clock to his ſtudy, and never being idle all the day. After dinner, if he had no ſuitors, he ſpent an hour at cheſs, and ſo to his ſtudy again. He was by nature very charitable, and gentle; ſo prone to forgive and forget wrongs that it grew into a proverb, 'Do my lord of Canterbury a ſhrewd turn, and he will be your friend as long as you live.'

He ſtoutly oppoſed the ſix bloody articles, and yet with ſuch humility and modeſty, that the king could not be offended with him for it. He was ſo free from paſſion, that he never miſcalled the meaneſt of his ſervants. He was juſt in paying all men, ſo that when he was caſt into priſon, he owed no man a farthing. He relieved many that were in want.

The whole weight of reforming religion lay upon his hands, ſo that for ſixteen years together his houſe was never empty of learned men, to aſſiſt in deciding eccleſiaſtical controverſies. His charity to the poor was very great, for whom he provided lodgings, being ſick, lame, wounded, &c. and appointed an almoner, phyſician, and chirurgion, to attend them, having daily hot broth and meat ſent them from his own kitchin.

He had many and great enemies of the papiſts, eſpecially wily Wincheſter, and his companions, who laid a train to take away his life, at leaſt his archbiſhopric, by bringing him within the compaſs of the ſix articles; which by Dr Parker, the firſt archbiſhop of Canterbury in Queen Elizabeth's days, is thus related. 'Dr Cranmer (ſaith he) being in great heavineſs for the death of Lord Cromwel, was accuſed by the papiſts, and much threatened by them; and though he knew that he was not ſafe for one moment of time, yet he changed not the cheerfulneſs of his countenance, becauſe as yet he kept the king's right in the defence of the goſpel, by his ſingular wiſdom, gravity and modeſty.'

But the king being ſoon entangled by converſing with Wincheſter, and his popiſh party, they daily ſo deafened him with their continual complaints againſt the archbiſhop, that, through wearineſs he was almoſt conſtrained to grant unto them the life of that moſt innocent man. Yet, by God's ſpecial providence, he was ſo rooted in his heart, that when the papiſts moſt preſumed and the godly moſt feared his ruin, the king reſolved to provide for his ſafety and welfare.

In the mean time, proud and malicious Gardiner, whoſe favour and authority was thought to be greateſt with the king, provoked him often to diſputations about points of divinity in the preſence of the king: in which the king obſerved that Cranmer never departed from his innate gravity and modeſty, whereas Gardiner always rather affected a little glory than the truth. And when Gardiner, that he might leſſen the authority of the ſcriptures, had, by many ſophiſtical arguments, endeavoured to prove, that thoſe called the Apoſtles Canons were of equal validity and authority with the ſacred ſcriptures; Cranmer ſo enervated the force of all his arguments in the king's hearing, by his ſolid, ſolid, calm, and moderate anſwers, that the king ſaid, in the preſence of many, unto Gardiner, that Cranmer was an old weather-beaten ſoldier in divinity, and was not to be encountered by ſuch freſh water ſoldiers as himſelf.

But this Gardiner, ſwelling with pride, ſtirred up as many againſt Cranmer as poſſibly he could, judging that nothing could hinder their counſels and purpoſes, if he were taken out of the way.

At Canterbury, and all over Kent, by the procurement of Gardiner, many were ſuborned to accuſe Cranmer of hereſy.

In the parliament, one Goſwick, a knight for Bedfordſhire, ſaid openly, that all heretical ſedition flowed from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his family. Some great men about the king hereupon laboured much to perſuade him, that, by reaſon of theſe imputations, Cranmer ſhould be excluded from the council board, and committed to the tower of London, till enquiry could be made concerning the truth of thoſe reports; for (ſaid they) ſo long as he ſits in council, for fear, men will conceal that which they know, not daring to utter or reveal it. They alſo diſperſed rumours, that Cranmer was already condemned in the judgment of the king, and ſhould ſhortly be beheaded as Cromwel had been a little before.

All this while, Cranmer, though he ſet a good face on't, yet privately, amongſt his friends, much bewailed the condition of thoſe evil times, rather than his own. But the king diligently ſearched out all theſe treacherous deſigns of the papiſts, and marked whereunto they tended.

Once, for recreation's ſake, after ſupper, the king would go in his barge upon the Thames, and being there, commanded his barge-men to land him at Lambeth ſtairs. Some of the archbiſhop's ſervants obſerving that he drew thitherward, preſently informed their maſter, who haſted to the bridge, either to ſalute the king as he paſſed by, or to entertain him into his houſe. The king ſeeing him, bid him come into his barge; and ſetting him by him, had much private conference with him, the barge men, in the mean ſeaſon, rowing hither and thither.

In this conference, the king feignedly complained, that ſince the death of Cromwel, England was much troubled with heretical factions and parties; that it was to be feared, that if theſe wranglings about religion were nouriſhed, more grievous miſchiefs and civil wars would ariſe; and therefore that the diſſentions about religion were to be appeaſed: for which end, by the advice of his biſhops and nobles, he would endeavour to find out the arch heretic, who was the author of this miſchief; and whom, being found, he intended ſeverely to puniſh; yea, cruelly to burn him, thereby to prevent further diſorders.

Cranmer, though he was ſomewhat affrighted, yet anſwered with a mild countenance, that he liked the counſel as wholeſome, that the whole flock of hereticks was to be reſtrained by the death of the arch heretic. But he admoniſhed the king, with fatherly gravity and modeſty, that he would not judge them heretics, who relied wholly upon the word of God, and not to the traditions or laws of men. Well (quoth the king) to deal plainly, we are told by many, that you are the arch-heretic of our kingdom; and that in Kent, and all your province, you hinder the faith, eſtabliſhed in parliament by the ſix articles, from being received by our people; and therefore tell us plainly, both what you think, and what you have done concerning them?

To this the archbiſhop ſtoutly replied, that he was ſtill of the ſame opinion that he had expreſſed in parliament when that law was made; and that yet he had not offended againſt that law ſince it was made. Then the king, by little and little, moderating the ſeverity of his ſpeech, aſked him pleaſantly, whether his private bed-chamber was free from the breach of the ſix articles. Cranmer (though he underſtood by the ſix articles, that it was a capital offence for a prieſt to be married, and that the king knew well that he was a married man, yet) anſwered, That though he had married a wife, yet it was in Germany, before he took upon him the archbiſhopric; but for all that, he had done nothing againſt that ſevere law: for (ſaith he) when the law was once made, I never touched my wife, but ſent her into Germany, to her kindred and friends.

By this plain anſwer, without daubing, Cranmer begot in the king's mind ſuch an opinion of his learning and honeſty, that he cheered him up, telling him that thoſe articles were not ordained for his ſake; and ſhewing him what were the chief accuſations laid in againſt him, which Cranmer knowing to be falſe, and forged by the envy and malice of his popiſh adverſaries, intreated the king to appoint inquiſitors, whereby the truth might be ſifted out; for, ſaith he, I am not afraid to undergo the hazard of a judgment.

The king, truſting to his ingenuity, bade him ſearch, and try out his own cauſe himſelf. But Cranmer replied, that it would ſeem unequal to his adverſaries, that he ſhould be made cenſor of his own acts, and therefore ſtill deſired another judge. But the king ſtill affirmed, that he would make none other the inquiſitor of his life, having put ſo much truſt and confidence in him alone, knowing that he would certainly and fully relate the truth, without a lie, of his own deeds, whether they were good or bad. After which words the king diſmiſſed him.

Preſently after Dr Cranmer ſent Dr Cox, his vicar general, and Mr Anthony Huſſey, his ſecretary, with ample commiſſion to ſearch out the plots which were contrived againſt him by the papiſts of Canterbury, who ſpent a month or two, and yet did little; being perſons that favoured the popelings.

In the mean time his adverſaries at court urged much that he might be impriſoned, and might then be examined of the hereſies laid to his charge; preſuming, that if once he were removed out of the king's ſight, they might eaſily overwhelm him with feigned crimes, and ſo work his deſtruction. And the king, being tired with their daily importunities, granted, that if he was manifeſtly convinced of any crimes, either againſt church or ſtate, he ſhould be carried to priſon.

Hereupon Gardiner and his aſſociates reſolved the next day to ſend him priſoner to the tower; and the king concealed his purpoſe, that he might ſee how far their malice would extend, and yet reſolved to ſecure him: For about midnight he ſent Mr Denny, one of his bed-chamber, whom he moſt confided in, as not liking the popelings, to Lambeth, for Dr Cranmer; who, being rouſed out of his ſleep, came preſently to the king; who, in theſe words, told him what he would have him do. Almoſt all my counſellors, ſaith he, are urgent to have you impriſoned, becauſe almoſt all England is defiled with hereſies, which, they ſay, proceeds from you, and certain learned ſtrangers whom you keep in your houſe; and therefore they would have you under cuſtody, whilſt the cauſe is enquired after, without which they cannot find out the original; and to-morrow is the day appointed for your commitment; and therefore conſider whether it be well done or no.

Dr Cranmer heartily thanked the king for giving him this warning, ſaying, that he refuſed not to go to priſon, nor to ſtand in judgment, truſting to his innocency and clear conſcience; affirming, that he would rather hazard a juſt judgment, than ly under unjuſt ſuſpicions. Only he deſired, that ſince his doctrine and faith were called into queſtion, he might have learned and equal judges to hear the ſame. But the king, pitying the plain ſimplicity of the man, who would thus expoſe himſelf to the malice of his mortal enemies, ſaid to him; Are you ſo fooliſh? for if you be once led away from your dignity, and from the light and ſight of men, many falſe and perjured witneſſes will ariſe againſt you, which otherwiſe durſt not come into your preſence? Wherefore, ſeeing you neither provide for your dignity nor ſafety, I will give you counſel, that you be not overwhelmed by your ſpiteful adverſaries. To-morrow they will ſend for you; they will object againſt you the crimes of hereſy, and commit you to priſon; then do you requeſt them, that ſince you are one of my privy council, they would deal with you as they would be dealt by in the like caſe, viz. That they would produce your accuſers in open judgment, whom if you be not able to anſwer, you will patiently endure impriſonment. But if they regard not this, your juſt and equal requeſt, but will proceed to impriſon you, appeal to my preſence and audience, by delivering this token to them to ſuperſede their decree; with which words he drew off his ring from his finger, and delivered it to Cranmer; and ſo diſmiſſed him.

The next morning, Gardiner and his accomplices met in the council chamber, ſent to Lambeth for Cranmer; but when he came, would not let him in. The nobles and courtiers that paſſed by, marvelled much thus to ſee the primate of all England, and the moſt inward counſellor of the king, thus ſhut out, and ſitting amongſt ſerving men that waited for their maſters. This being told to Dr Butts, the king's phyſician, being moved with the indignity of the fact, he went preſently to drive away the gazers, and to honour the preſence of ſo worthy a father.

But preſently Dr Butts was ſent for to the king, and when he came to him, he ſaid, I have ſeen an unuſual matter, and ſuch a thing as was never before heard of. What's that? (quoth the king). Cranmer, ſaid he, the primate of the kingdom, is become ſome bodies ſerving man, and hath ſtood almoſt this hour before the door of the council-chamber waiting upon ſome maſter. Ha! (ſaid the king) do my counſellors ſo diſgracefully uſe the primate? and being moved with the indignity of the thing, he preſently ſent a command that Cranmer ſhould be admitted into the council-chamber.

When he was entered, it was declared to him, that the king and his counſellors were informed, that all England was turned from the catholic faith, and depraved with hereſy, which proceeded from him and his family, and that therefore he muſt be committed to the tower, whilſt a ſpeedy inquiſition was made to know whether thoſe things were true or not. Cranmer deſired that his accuſers, witneſſes, and proofs that they had againſt him, might be produced, and that it might be lawful for him to anſwer preſently, and thereby to defend himſelf; alledging that it was very unequal, that the primate of England, and a counſellor, whoſe faith was never doubted of, nor came into queſtion, ſhould be thus diſgracefully thruſt into priſon, upon bare ſuſpicions, to the prejudice of his cauſe: urging many other reaſons why they ſhould deal more gently and mildly with him.

But when neither intreaties nor arguments could prevail, but that he muſt needs go to priſon, Cranmer ſaid, that he was very ſorry that they forced him to appeal to the king from themſelves, with whom he had ſo often communicated in counſel, and from whom he expected equal dealing upon all occaſions; and thereupon, delivering the king's ring to them, he commanded them to ſuſpend their decree, and to preſent themſelves before the king.

Then ſaid the Lord Ruſſel (afterwards Earl of Bedford) Did not I tell you that the king would never ſuffer him to be impriſoned, unleſs he were guilty of high treaſon againſt his majeſty? and ſo they went with Cranmer to the king.

The king ſharply rebuked them, telling them, that he looked for more wiſdom and gravity amongſt them, than to keep Cranmer out of the council-chamber, to force him to ſtand at the door amongſt ſerving men: aſking them, whether any of themſelves would endure ſuch a diſgrace? and withal ſwore (ſtriking himſelf upon the breaſt) that he was more beholden to Cranmer than to any man whatſoever; and that he had tried him, and knew that no prelate could exceed him in his fidelity to his king; and therefore that all that loved him, ſhould hold Cranmer in higheſt price and eſtimation.

The king ſpeaking thus, when all others held their peace through fear, the duke of Norfolk anſwered, It was not our purpoſe to hurt the archbiſhop at all; but that keeping him in cuſtody, whilſt the inquiſition depended, his innocency being known, he might come out with greater credit. But, ſaid the king, I will not have Cranmer ſo handeld, nor any that are dear to me. But I perceive ſome crooked and cankered hearts raiſe theſe tragedies, which, unleſs they be quiet, I will interpoſe my authority to reſtrain them; and ſo he departed in a chafe, and all the counſellors ſhook hands with Cranmer, deſiring to be reconciled to him: And he, being of a moſt ſweet and mild diſpoſition, eaſily forgave all offences, blotting them utterly out of his mind; and from that time forward he lived ſecure from all treacheries, being in ſuch high favour with the king.

But when Dr Cox and Huſſey lay loitering at Canterbury (not without ſuſpicion), and did nothing in the inquiſition, the king ſecretly ſent Dr Lee, to ſearch out what was done in Cranmer's behalf; who, going ſpeedily to Canterbury, acquainted himſelf with ſome godly perſons, by whoſe directions he ſearched the houſes of ſome popiſh prieſts at midnight, where he found letters written from Gardiner, which opened the whole plot againſt Cranmer. Theſe he immediately carried to the king, who viewing of them, from that time forwards began to withdraw his affections from thoſe popelings; and withal acquainted Cranmer with thoſe letters, bidding him beware of his enemies, now he knew them.

Amongſt the letters that were found in Kent, one was written by the ſuffragan of Dover, another by Dr Barber, a civilian; which two men were well eſteemed of by the archbiſhop, and promoted by him, and he always ſhewed them great favour.

When the archbiſhop had their letters, he called theſe two men into his ſtudy, and ſaid unto them, You two are men in whom I have always put moſt confidence, and to whom I have always communicated all my ſecrets; you muſt now give me ſome good counſel; for I am ſhamefully abuſed by one or two whom I have truſted as myſelf; but theſe perſons have not only diſcloſed my ſecrets, but alſo have taken upon them to accuſe me of hereſy, and are become witneſſes againſt me. I require you therefore to give me faithful advice how I ſhall behave myſelf towards them, &c. 'Mary, (quoth Dr Barber) ſuch villains and knaves deſerve to be preſently hanged, without further trial.' 'Hanging is too good, (ſaith the ſuffragen); and if there want an executioner, I would be the hangman myſelf.'

At theſe words, the archbiſhop, lifting up his eyes to heaven, ſaid, 'O Lord, and moſt merciful God, whom may a man truſt in theſe days? It's true which is ſaid, 'Curſed be he that truſts in man, and makes fleſh his arm.' There was never man uſed as I am; but, Lord, thou haſt evermore defended me, and lent me one good maſter (meaning the king), without whoſe protection I could not be ſafe for one day: I praiſe thy holy name for it.' Then did he pull out of his boſom thoſe two letters, ſaying, 'Know you theſe my maſters? With that they fell down on their knees, aſking forgiveneſs with many tears. 'Well, (ſaid the gentle archbiſhop) God make you both good men; I never deſerved this at your hands: but aſk God forgiveneſs, againſt whom you have highly offended.

Thus we ſee how his enemies, from time to time, endeavoured, by all means, to have brought him into diſpleaſure with the king. Yet it pleaſed God ſo to overrule the king's heart, that he would never be alienated from him: Which favour the king continued to him as long as he lived. And in king Edward the ſixth's days he continued in his place, and much helped forward the work of reformation. But in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, he was a principal man whom ſhe maligned.

——Manet alta mente repoſtum
Judicium cleri, ſpretæque injuria matris.

Her mother's wrongs were ſtronly laid to heart,
And clergy's doom; for which they now muſt ſmart.

And therefore ſhe appointed commiſſioners to examine him, who commanded him to bring to them an inventory of all his goods, which they ſeized upon; and ſhortly after he was ſent priſoner to the tower, for treaſon (as was pretended), but for religion indeed.

Before he was committed to the tower, ſome of his friends perſuaded him to fly, and to reſerve himſelf for better times; but he anſwered ſtoutly, 'If I were accuſed of theft, murder, or any other wickedneſs, perhaps I could more eaſily be perſuaded to fly; but now I ſee that I muſt be queſtioned, not for my faithfulneſs towards men, but for my faith towards God; and concerning the truth of the holy ſcriptures againſt papiſts; and therefore I will rather loſe my life in the defence of the truth, than by flying out of the kingdom to deſert ſuch a cauſe. From thence he was removed to Oxford; where again he was called called before the pope's delegate, and the queen's commiſſioners; to the latter he did obeiſance, but to the pope's delegate he would do none. Before them he made a worthy confeſſion of his faith.

When they proceeded to degrade him, he pulled forth an appeal from the pope to the next general council; but his death being determined, his appeal was rejected, and he degraded. When he came back into priſon, he deſired to eat; for he had eaten nothing that day before; for, ſaid he, 'I was ſomewhat troubled, but now I thank God my heart is quiet.' He had not one penny in his purſe to help himſelf, but the Lord ſtirred up a gentleman's heart to give him ſome money, for which he had like to have come into great trouble. He was kept in priſon almoſt three years, and the doctors in Oxford laboured by many ſubtle tricks to draw him to a recantation; removing him to the dean's houſe of Chriſt Church, where he had dainty fare, recreations, and what elſe might entice him from Chriſt to the world: they promiſed him life, the queen's favour, his former dignity, and what not, if he would but with his hands ſubſcribe to a few words by the way of recantation, which if he refuſed, there was no hope of pardon.

With many ſuch provocations, and flatteries, they at laſt prevailed with him to ſubſcribe it. After which he neither had inward quietneſs in his own conſcience, nor any outward help from his adverſities: for the queen being glad of his recantation, yet preſently reſolved his death, appointed the time (when he leaſt expected it) and the perſons that ſhould ſee it performed. He had no notice of his death, till the very morning a little before he was to ſuffer. At which time there was a great concourſe of people, ſome expecting that he ſhould make his publick recantation at his death, others hoping better of him.

From priſon he was brought to St Mary's church, where Dr Cole (by the queen's order) preached, and in his ſermon affirmed, that God was ſo incenſed for the ſlaughter of Sir Thomas Moore, and Dr Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, (who were beheaded in the reign of king Henry the 8.) that he could not be appeaſed by any other means, but by the ſacrificing of Cranmer. During his ſermon, Cranmer was ſet on a ſtage before him; which ſad ſpectacle much affected many, to ſee him, who had lived in ſo great honour and favour, to ſtand there in a ragged gown, ill favour'd clothes, an old cap, and expoſed to the contempt of all men. Cole, in his ſermon, ſhewed for what Dr Cranmer was condemned, encouraged him to take his death patiently, and rejoiced in his converſion to popery. But that joy laſted not long. The ſermon being ended, Dr Cranmer entreated the people to pray for him, that God would pardon his ſin, eſpecially his recantation, which moſt of all troubled his conſcience, which he ſaid was contrary to the truth which he thought in his heart, and written for fear of death, and upon the hope of life. And, ſaid he, that hand of mine which hath written contrary to my heart, ſhall firſt be puniſhed. At theſe words the doctors began to rage and fume, and cauſed him to be pulled down from the ſtage, and his mouth to be ſtopped that he ſhould not ſpeak to the people.

The place appointed for his martyrdom was the ſame where Dr Ridley, and Mr Latimer had before ſuffered; and when he was brought to it, he kneeled down, and prayed; and ſo put off his cloaths. When the fire was kindled and came near him, he ſtretched out his right hand, which had ſubſcribed, holding it ſo ſtedfaſt, and immovable in the fire (ſaving that once he wiped his face with it) that all might ſee his hand burned before his body was touched: when the fire came to his body, he endured it patiently, ſtanding ſtedfaſt always in one place, moving no more than the ſtake which he was bound to: ſo long as he could ſpeak, he repeated, Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit: and ſo in the flames he gave up the ghoſt, anno Chriſti, 1556. and of his age, 72.

Dr. Cranmer's works were theſe.

He corrected the Engliſh tranſlation of the Bible in many places.

He wrote Catechiſmum Doctrinæ Chriſtianæ.

The Life of Sir PHILIP SIDNEY, who died anno Chriſti 1586.

PHILIP Sidney, was ſon and heir to Sir Henry Sidney, lord deputy of Ireland, preſident of Wales, and knight of the moſt noble order of the garter: a perſon of great parts, and in no mean grace with queen Elizabeth: his mother was daughter to the duke of Northumberland, and ſiſter to the earls of Warwick and Leiceſter ſo that his deſcent was apparently noble of both ſides. In his very childhood there appeared in him ſuch excellent parts, and endowments of nature, that his father conceiving great hopes of him, was very careful of his education, ſo that having ſoon drunk in the principles of learning at home, he was ſent to the univerſity, where he profited exceedingly in the knowlege of the arts, ſo that after an incredible proficiency in all the ſpecies of learning, he left the academical life, for that of the court, whither he came by the invitation, and inſtigation of his uncle the earl of Leiceſter, at that time a great favourite of the queen's: fame had before hand blazed abroad his noble accompliſhments; he was of a comely preſence, and framed by a natural propenſion to arms, ſo that he ſoon attracted the good opinion of all men, and ſo highly prized in the good opinion of the queen, that ſhe thought the court wanted a great ornament, when he was abſent from it.

Whilſt he was at court, at his ſpare hours he compoſed that incomparable book for fancy, and language, called his Arcadia, when he was but one and twenty years old; the queen thought him ſo fit for the greateſt employments, that ſhe ſent him upon an embaſſy to the emperor of Germany at Vienna, which he diſcharged to his own honour, and her good content; yea, his fame was ſo renowned through Chriſtendom, that he was in election for the kingdom of Poland, but our queen refuſed to further his advancement, not out of emulation, but out of fear to looſe the jewel of her times; he married the daughter and ſole heir of Sir Francis Walſingham, then ſecretary of ſtate, a lady deſtinated to the bed of honour, who after his death was married to the earl of Eſſex, and after his death to the earl of St. Albans: during his abode at court, he became of intimate acquaintance with Sir Fulk Grevil, afterwards lord Brook, who thought himſelf ſo much honoured by his friendſhip, that having erected for himſelf a ſtately monument in St. Mary's church in Warwick, he cauſed to be engraven upon his tomb: 'Fulk Grevil, ſervant to queen Elizabeth, counſellor to king James, and friend to Sir Philip Sidney.' The ſtates of the Netherlands having obtained aid of our queen againſt the Spaniards, they agreed to deliver up to her ſome cautionary towns for her ſecurity, whereupon ſhe ſent over Sir Philip Sidney to be governor of Flushing, and of the caſtle of Ramekins; afterwards his uncle the earl of Leiceſter was ſent over as deputy-general for the queen, who was honourably entertained by the ſtates: and not liking to lye ſtill, and do nothing, he made his preparation for the taking in of Zutphen, whereupon the prince of Parma ſought to furniſh the place with victuals, ſending with it a convoy of ſeven hundred horſe, and two thouſand foot: to intercept theſe, Leiceſter ſent Sir John Norris, to whoſe aſſiſtance came the earl of Eſſex, the lord Willowby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir William Stanely, and Sir William Ruſſel, in all two hundred horſe, and one thouſand five hundred dred muſketteers and pikes: the day being dark by reaſon of great foggy miſts, the Spaniards whilſt their wag gons made foreward, ſtaid in a place of advantage near Zutphen, upon whom the Engliſh were entered before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of ſhot, which notwithſtanding they abode, and ſo valiantly followed the ſkirmiſh, that they overthrew, put back, ſlew, and took priſoners many of them, but herein the day proved doleful, that the worthy Sir Philip Sidney as he was changing his horſe, was ſhot by the muſket above the left kee, which ſo ſhivered the thigh bone, that the bullet could not be got out; being thus wounded, he was carried to Arnheim in Gelderland. Whilſt he lay thus upon his wound, Mr Humphray Fen, a godly and able miniſter, being at this time chaplain to the earl of Leiceſter, went to viſit him, who found him carefully fitting and preparing himſelf for death: wherein he was much holpen by that faithful ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt; and after Mr. Fen had been a while with him, Sir Philip told him that he had made his will, and that he was now minded to be his own executor, and ſo cauſing a cabinet to be brought to him, he gave him a good ſum of gold, which he had formerly bequeathed to him in his will: in this his laſt ſickneſs, his Arcadia came into his mind, and he conſidered that in it were divers light, and amorous paſſages, which might tend to the corrupting of the incautious reader: it was not as yet printed, neither was there any copy of it, but only one, which was in the hands of his entire friend, Sir Fulk Grevil, and therefore to ſhew his repentance for the vanity of his youth, he ſent to Sir Fulk Grevil, and conjured him by all the obligations of friendſhip that were betwixt them, that he ſhould preſently burn that copy, that ſo it might never go abroad into the world, which earneſt requeſt of his dying friend, ſir Fulk Grevil had intended to have fulfilled, but that the importunity of ſome about him, prevented it: ſir Philip Sidney lay thus languiſhing upon his wound for the ſpace of five and twenty days, bearing the pains of it with admirable patience and Chriſtian fortitude, at the end whereof he quietly reſigned his ſpirit into the hands of his merciful redeemer anno Chriſti 1586.

His death was much bewailed both by the queen and all good men, for the great hopes that they had of this worthy gentleman, in whom were compleat all the vertues, and valour which could be expected in him: his body was brought over into England, where he was honourably interred with his anceſtors. I have many years ago ſeen this epitaph hanging up in Paul's church of him.

England, Netherland, the heavens, and the arts,
The world, and the ſoldiers have made ſix parts
Of noble Sidney, for who can ſuppoſe,
That a ſmall heap of ſtones can Sidney incloſe?

England hath his body, for ſhe it bred;
Netherland hath his blood, in her defence ſhed;
The heavens have his ſoul: the arts his fame;
The ſoldiers the grief, the world his good name.

I have alſo ſeen this epitaph of him.

Carmen Apollo dedit, belli Mars contulit artes:
Sed juveni vitam mors rapit ante diem.

Apollo made him wiſe,
Mars made him very ſtout,
Death made him leave the world,
Before his youth was out.

Certain it is, ſaith one, that he was a noble and matchleſs gentleman, and it may be juſtly ſaid of him without hyperboles of fiction, as it was of Cato Uticenſis: that he ſeemed to be born to do that only which he went about.

The Life of JOHN CALVIN, who died anno Chriſti 1562.

MASTER John Calvin was born at Noviodune, a famous city of France, June the ſixth, anno Chriſti 1509 His father's name was Gerard Calvin, his mother's Joan Franca, both of good repute, and of a competent eſtate. Gerard was a very prudent man, and therefore well eſteemed of, both by the nobility and others of the country; he gave his ſon John very liberal education from his childhood.

From the grammar ſchool, he ſent him to Paris, and placed him with Maturinus Corderius, a man well eſteemed both for his probity and learning, and of chiefeſt account amongſt all the ſchool maſters in France for his training up of youth. From thence John Calvin was tranſlated to the ſchool at Montacute, where he had Hiſpanus for his maſter, under whom, by reaſon of his ſharp wit, he profited ſo much, that from the Grammar, he proceeded to the ſtudy of Logic, and other arts.

His father from the beginning, deſigned him to the ſtudy of divinity, which he judged him to be very much inclined to, being religiouſly addicted from his childhood, and a ſevere reprover of his ſchool-fellows faults. And being thus reſolved, he procured a benefice of the biſhop for him, in the cathedral church of Noviodune, as alſo a cure in a neighbour village, called Biſhops bridge, where himſelf was born, though afterwards he removed to the city of Noviodune, in which place our John before his ordination preached divers ſermons to the people. But this purpoſe of his (both their minds changing) was afterwards altered; for his father ſeeing that the ſtudy of the law was a certainer ſtep to riches and honour, altered his mind upon that account, and his ſon growing into acquaintance with a certain kinſman of his, called Peter Robert Olevitane, was by him inſtructed in the true reformed religion, whereupon he addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures, and began to abominate and withdraw himſelf from the ſuperſtitious ſervices in the popiſh church.

Upon this occaſion he went to Orleans, where Peter Stella the moſt famous lawyer in France, read his lectures, whoſe auditor John Calvin was, and in a ſhort ſpace, wonderfully profited in that ſtudy: ſo that many times, occaſionally ſupplying his maſter's room, he rather ſeemed a doctor, than a learner of the law: and when he was about to depart, all the profeſſors in that univerſity, proffered freely to beſtow the degree of a doctor upon him as having ſo well deſerved of the univerſity. But all this while he neglected not the ſtudy of the ſacred ſcriptures, and divinity; inſomuch as few in that city, that were addicted to the reformed religion, but they came to him to be ſatisfied in their doubts, and went away admiring his learning and zeal. And ſome that were intimately acquainted with him at that time, teſtified that his manner was conſtantly to continue his ſtudies till mid night, and in the morning ſo ſoon as he awakened, to ruminate what he had read over night, whereby he fixed it in his memory, neither would he ſuffer himſelf to be diſturbed during the time of his meditation: and the better to fit him for his ſtudies, he always ſupped very ſparingly. By which practice he attained to excellent learning, and a very good memory: yet withal hereby he contracted ſuch weakneſs of ſtomach, as brought upon him many diſeaſes, and at laſt an immature death.

About this time the univerſity of Biturg grew famous, for that they had procured out of Italy the eminenteſt lawyer of his time, Andrew Alcait, whom our John alſo would needs be a hearer of: thither therefore he went, and during his abode there he grew into familiar acquaintance with Melchior Wolmarus, a German, the public profeſſor of Greek in that univerſity, a man famous for religion and learning. Under him he ſtudied the Greek tongue, for which benefit he ſo much prized him, that afterwards he dedicated to him his comment upon the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians.

Whilſt he was employed in theſe ſtudies, he neglected not that of divinity, ſo that he preached divers ſermons in a neighbour town called Liverta. But whilſt he was thus buſied, news came to him of his father's death, which called him back into his own country; and having ſettled his affairs there, he went back to Paris, being now about four and twenty years old, at which time he wrote that excellent commentary upon Seneca de Clementia, being much affected with that author, whom he uſed to ſay agreed very well with his genius. After a few months ſtay at Paris, he grew acquainted with all that profeſſed the reformed religion; and amongſt the reſt with Stephen Forgeus, a famous famous merchant, who afterwards ſealed the truth with his blood.

From thence forward, at the earneſt requeſt of all the godly that held their private meetings in Paris, he laid aſide all other ſtudies, and wholly applied himſelf to that of divinity, wherein alſo he found the ſpecial aſſiſtance of God.

At this time alſo Nicholas Cope was rector of the univerſity at Paris, who being to make an oration upon the Kalends of November, at which time the pontificians uſed to celebrate their All-ſaints day, at the inſtigation of John Calvin, he ſpake of religion more purely and clearly than they uſed to do. This the Sorboniſts could not bear, and the parliament of Paris was angry at it, inſomuch as they cited him to appear before them, which accordingly he was about to ſubmit to; but as he went, ſome of his friends adviſed him to take heed of his adverſaries; whereupon he returned home, and immediately after left France, and went to Baſil, where his father was a profeſſor of phyſic.

The officers ſent by the parliament, ſearching for Cope, went into Mr Calvin's houſe, who, by chance, not being at home, they ranſacked his ſtudy; and amongſt his papers found many of his friends letters, which had like to have endangered the lives of many; ſo bitterly were the enemies of the church at that time enraged againſt the people of God, eſpecially one John Morinus, whoſe abominable cruelty is infamous till this day. But it pleaſed God to divert that ſtorm, by the prudent and pious diligence of the queen of Navar, the only ſiſter of king Francis, a woman of an admirable wit, and exceeding tender of the welfare of the profeſſors of the reformed religion. She alſo ſent for Mr Calvin to her court, uſed him very honourably, and heard him gladly.

But Mr Calvin finding Paris too hot for his abode, went to Xantone, where ſojourning with a friend, at his requeſt, he drew up ſome ſhort admonitions, which were diſperſed amongſt certain prieſts, to be taught to their people, that ſo their people might, by little and little, be drawn to ſearching out of the truth.

Shortly after he went to Nerac, a city of Aquitain, where he viſited that good old man James Faber Stapulenſis, who being formerly a profeſſor of the mathematics and philoſophy in Paris, was perſecuted for the truth by the Sorboniſts; but by the friendly help of the queen of Navar, was delivered and ſent to this town of her juriſdiction. This good old man received young Mr Calvin with very fatherly affections, propheſying, that in time to come he would prove a famous inſtrument for the building up of the French church.

From thence Mr Calvin went again to Paris, being called thereto by the ſpecial providence of God. For at this time that wicked Servetus was come thither, diſperſing his poiſon againſt the ſacred Trinity; who hearing of Calvin, pretended that he was deſirous to confer with him; and a time and place was appointed for their meeting, whether Calvin went, not without peril of his life, who was fain to hide himſelf from the rage of his enemies: but when he had waited long for him, Servetus came not, being indeed afraid of the very ſight of Mr Calvin; this was anno Chriſti 1534, infamous for the abominable cruelty exerciſed againſt the poor ſaints of God, eſpecially againſt Gerard Ruffus, a maſter of art of Sorbon, and Caroldus an Auguſtine monk, who, under the protection of the Queen of Navar, had, for a year or two, very much propagated the truth; which the devil envying, now ſtirred up his inſtruments to pull them out of the pulpit, and to caſt them into priſon. Yea, king Francis himſelf was ſo irritated, by reaſon of certain papers againſt the maſs ſcattered about the city, and fixed to his chamber door, that he preſently commanded a public proceſſion, wherein himſelf and his three children aſſiſted, with a bare head, carrying a torch in his hand, to expiate that wickedneſs; and commanded eight of the ſaints of God to be burned alive, in four principal parts of the city; ſwearing publicly, that he would not ſpare his own children, if he knew them to be infected with thoſe damnable hereſies.

Calvin beholding theſe ſad ſpectacles, went preſently after to Orleans, where he publiſhed his famous book, which he called Pſychopannychia, againſt that error long before broached, and now again revived, of them which held 'The ſoul's ſleeping after they were ſevered from their bodies.' And ſo purpoſing to bid adieu to France, he aſſociated to him his old friend, with whom he had ſojourned at Xantone, and travelling through Lorain, went towards Baſil: but being not far from the city of Menton, they fell into great ſtraits; for one of their ſervants, who had gotten all their money, being mounted upon a luſty horſe, ran away from them, and could by no means be overtaken, ſo that they were fain to ſend their other ſervant to borrow ten crowns, which, with much ado, carried them to Straſburgh, and from thence to Baſil. There Mr Calvin became an intimate friend to thoſe famous men Simon Grynæus, and Wolfgang Capito. He ſtudied alſo the Hebrew tongue; and though he endeavoured by all means to conceal himſelf, yet was he forced to publiſh his inſtitutions, which he called but the foundation of a far greater work.

The proteſtant princes in Germany hearing of this bloody act of king Francis, were much provoked by it: yet did the king, at this time, ſeek their friendſhip; and to excuſe his cruelty, by the advice of William Bellaius Langæus, he ſent them word that he had only puniſhed certain Anabaptiſts, who ſet up their fanatic ſpirits inſtead of ſcripture, and ſhewed themſelves contemners of all magiſtrates. Which diſgrace, put upon the true religion, Mr Calvin not enduring, took occaſion from thence to publiſh that his incomparable book, prefixing a preface to king Francis, which ſurely he never read, or elſe it would have provoked him to have given a great wound to the Babyloniſh whore; for that king (therein not like his ſucceſſors) was a great weigher of matters, had a good judgment to diſcern the truth, was a favourer of learned men, and not altogether eſtranged from the profeſſors of the goſpel. But neither he, nor the people of France, either ſaw or heard thoſe things, the ſins of the king and people haſtening God's wrath againſt them.

Mr Calvin having publiſhed this book, and performed that office of duty to his country, had a great deſire to viſit the dutcheſs of Ferrara, the daughter of Lewis XII. of France, a woman famous for her piety, and thereby alſo to have a ſight of Italy. To her therefore he went, and endeavoured to confirm her in the truth; ſo that ſhe loved him dearly all his life after; yea, even after his death honoured his memory.

Returning out of Italy (into whoſe borders he uſed to ſay, that he went that he might return again), he came into France, where ſettling his affairs, and taking along with him his only brother Anthony Calvin, he intended to return to Baſil or Straſburgh; but all other ways being ſtopped by reaſon of wars, he went to Geneva, without any purpoſe of ſtaying there: yet preſently after it appeared, that it was ſo ordered by divine Providence; for a little before, the goſpel of Chriſt was almoſt miraculouſly brought into that city, by the labour and induſtry of two excellent men, William Farell of the Delphinate, ſometimes a ſcholar of Faber Stapulenſi's, and Peter Viret, a Bernate, whoſe labours God afterwards wonderfully bleſſed and proſpered.

Calvin hearing of theſe worthy men, (as the manner is among the godly) went to viſit them; to whom Mr Farell (being a man endued with an heroical ſpirit) ſpake much to perſuade him rather to ſtay with them at Geneva, than to go any further. But when he ſaw that perſuaſions would not prevail, he ſaid thus unto him, 'I proteſt unto thee, in the name of the omnipotent God, that if thou proceedeſt to frame excuſes, and wilt not join with us in this work of the Lord, that the Lord will curſe thee, as ſeeking thy own, rather than the things of Jeſus Chriſt.' Calvin, being terrified with this terrible threatening, ſubmitted to the judgment of the preſbytery, and of the magiſtrates, by whoſe ſuffrages, together with the conſent of the people, he was choſen not only their preacher, but alſo profeſſor of divinity: the firſt he refuſed, the ſecond he accepted of, anno Chriſti 1536, in the month of Auguſt. This year became famous by a ſtricter league between the Bernates, and the city of Geneva; as alſo by the entertainment of the goſpel at Lauſanna, where a free diſputation was already held between the pontificians and the proteſtants, at which Mr Calvin was preſent.

Then did Mr Calvin publiſh a certain form of Chriſtian doctrine, fitted for the church of Geneva, as yet ſcarce crept out of the pollutions of popery. He added alſo a catechiſm, not that which we have by way of queſtion and anſwer, but one much ſhorter, containing the chief heads of religion. Then did he, together with Mr Farrel and Carolus (moſt of their colleagues, through fear, forſaking them) attempt to form a church amongſt the citizens; for which end he propoſed, that all the people being gathered together, ſhould publicly forſwear popery, and withal ſhould ſwear to obſerve the Chriſtian religion and diſcipline, contained in a few heads; which thing, through God's mercy, was effected, anno Chriſti 1537, though many of the citizens refuſed, the city being yet ſcarce free from the ſnares of the Duke of Savoy, and the dregs of popery, and many being much inclined to factions. Yet a public ſcribe reading them, the ſenate and people of Geneva ſwore together to thoſe heads of Chriſtian religion and diſcipline.

The devil being much enraged at this excellent work, having tried a thouſand ways by open enemies to overthrow it; and not prevailing by thoſe ways, he ſought under the pretence of piety to deſtroy it; ſtirring up firſt the Anabaptiſts, and then Peter Caroli, not only to diſgrace them, but as much as in them lay, utterly to have ſubverted it. But the Lord was wiſer and ſtronger than Satan, as the event ſhewed; for Calvin, with his colleagues, in a public and free diſputation, did, with great gravity, out of the word of God, confute the Anabaptiſts, March the 18th, 1537, that, which is ſeldom ſeen, from that time forwards there never appeared any of them in that church. But the other diſturber of their church's peace, Peter Caroli, cauſed greater and longer troubles, whereof this is a brief account.

This impudent ſophiſter was bred in the college of Sorbon, from whence at laſt he was caſt out for an heretic; whereupon he went firſt to Geneva, then to Lauſanna, and from thence to Neocom; but ſo infected and inflamed by the devil, that whereſoever he came he left an impreſſion of his foul ſpirit; and when he ſaw himſelf oppoſed by the proteſtants he went to the papiſts, and from thence to the proteſtants again; and at laſt brake forth into open railing againſt Mr Farrel, Viret, and Calvin, as if they held ſome corrupt opinions about the ſacred trinity.

Hereupon there was a full ſynod aſſembled at Berne, in which Peter Caroli was condemned for his calumny, and thereupon removed. But ſhortly after he went to Mediomatrice, that he might hinder the work of the Lord happily there begun by Mr Farrel. From thence writing an epiſtle, he rallied upon the godly, giving hopes to the papiſts that he would return to them again: yet he was ſent to Rome, that he might give ſatisfaction to the pope himſelf. There he was received with ſcorn, and being oppreſſed with poverty, and infected with the French pox, at laſt, with much ado, he gat into an hoſpital, where ſhortly after he died miſerably; and this truly was his unhappy end.

About the ſame time Mr Calvin obſerving that there were many in France that knew, and were convinced of the truth, and yet indulged themſelves, as if it were enough that they reſerved their hearts for Chriſt, though they were preſent at the popiſh ſervices, publiſhed two elegant epiſtles, one to exhort the flying of idolatry, directed to Gerard Ruffus, whom we mentioned before: the other of the popiſh prieſthood, directed to the ſame man, who was now made a biſhop, and was fallen from his former zeal: but whilſt Mr Calvin was thus employed, he met with grievous ſeditions at home.

The goſpel indeed was entertained, and popery abjured in Geneva; but many were not reformed of the prophane ſcandalous courſes in which they had been indulged, and which they had learned of the impure popiſh clergy; and thoſe antient feuds which had ſprung up by reaſon of the Savoyan wars, amongſt the chiefeſt families, were not yet laid aſide. Theſe at firſt were gently admoniſhed; and when that prevailed not, more ſharply reprehended: and when yet they continued to be ſtubborn and refractory, and that the city, by the factions of certain private perſons, was divided into parties, ſo that by no means they would endure to be brought into that order to which they had been ſworn, Mr Farrel, Calvin, and Caroldus, inſpired with an heroical ſpirit, did openly profeſs that they could by no means adminiſter the holy ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper to perſons who were at ſuch bitter enmity amongſt themſelves, and ſo utterly averſe to all eccleſiaſtical diſcipline.

Another evil that fell out was this: A difference there was in ſome eccleſiaſtical rites between the Bernates and the Genevians; the Genevians uſing common bread at the ſacrament, and a different ſort of fonts; they alſo aboliſhed all holy days but the Lord's day; whereupon the Bernates aſſembling a ſynod at Lauſanna, decreed, that wafers ſhould be uſed in the ſacrament, and required that in Geneva the ſame practice ſhould be obſerved. But the college of miniſters at Geneva deſired that they might firſt be heard; and for this end appointed a ſynod at Zurick.

Upon this occaſion, the ſyndics, which were choſen for that year at Geneva, (who, for the time, are the chief magiſtrates), aſſembling the captains of the ſeditious perſons, ſo far prevailed, (though Mr Calvin and his colleagues interpoſed, and deſired firſt to be heard), the greater part overcoming the better, that theſe three worthy ſervants of Chriſt were commanded within two days to depart the city, becauſe (as was alledged) they refuſed to adminiſter the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper. When this decree was brought to Mr Calvin, he ſaid, 'Truly, if I had ſerved men, I ſhould have had but an ill reward; but it is well that I have ſerved him who doth always perform to his ſervants what he hath once promiſed.'

Who would not now have thought that this buſineſs muſt needs have brought deſtruction upon the church of Geneva? but the event ſhewed the wonderful wiſdom of God in turning it to good; partly by employing the labours of theſe his ſervants elſewhere, by variety of experiences to fit them for greater employments; partly, that the ſeditious perſons in Geneva overthrowing themſelves by their own violence, that church might be purged from many pollutions. So wonderful doth God ſhew himſelf in all his ways, eſpecially in the admirable government of his church.

At the time appointed, theſe three worthy fathers, to the great grief of all good men, left Geneva, and went to Zurick; where gathering a ſynod of the Helvetian churches, the ſynod decreed, and by the interceſſion of the Bernates, tried the minds of the Genevians for their re-admiſſion; but when they prevailed not, Calvin went to Baſil, and from thence to Straſburgh; where, by the deſire of the ſenate, and the importunity of thoſe bright ſtars which at that time ſhined in that church, Bucer, Hedio, Capito, Niger, and their colleagues, he was deſigned to be the profeſſor of divinity, with a competent ſalary allowed; which place he diſcharged with the great applauſe of learned men: and, by the conſent of the ſenate, he planted the French church there, and ſettled diſcipline in it.

Thus was the expectation of Satan fruſtrated, Calvin ſettled in another place, and a new church erected for the former ſubverted. Yet, in the mean time, did not the devil ceaſe to endeavour wholly to eradicate the church of Geneva; for which end he ſtirred up ſome wicked men, (yet under the pretence of piety, to bring in that deceit of changing common bread into wafers; indeed only to ſtir up new controverſies. Wherein alſo Sathan failed not of his purpoſe, many godly men upon this occaſion abſtaining from the ſacrament, till Mr Calvin, by his holy letters had perſuaded them not to contend for a thing ſo indifferent in itſelf. By this means unleavened bread was again brought into uſe in the Genevian church; concerning which, Calvin being afterwards reſtored, would never contend, and yet withal did not diſſemble his judgment about the ſame.

But behold! preſently after fell out a far greater evil, anno Chriſti 1539, which yet, by the prudent diligence of Mr Calvin, was quickly extinguiſhed; which was this: There was the biſhop of Carpentoratum, called James Sadolet, a man of great eloquence, which yet he abuſed to the ſubverſion of the truth, for which cauſe he was made a cardinal. This man ſeeing the flock deprived of ſuch able and vigilant ſhepherds, thought it a fit time to inſnare them; for which end he wrote letters under the pretence pretence of his neighbourhood, directed to his dear friends (as he called them) the ſenate, council, and people of Geneva, in which he omitted no arguments whereby he might perſuade them to return into the boſom of the Romiſh church. At this time there was no man in Geneva that would undertake to anſwer the ſame; ſo that probably they would have done much miſchief, but that they were written in a foreign language. But when Mr. Calvin at Straſborough had read them, forgetting all the wrongs which had been done him, he returned an anſwer ſo ſpeedily, truly, and eloquently, that the cardinal deſpairing of accomplishing his end, wholly gave over his deſign.

Neither indeed did Mr Calvin defer till this time the manifeſting of his paſtoral bowels, which he yet retained to the Genevians, eſpecially to thoſe that ſuffered with him in the ſame cauſe, as may appear by thoſe excellent epiſtles which he wrote to them the ſame year wherein he was baniſhed, wherein his principal ſcope was to exhort them to repentance, to bear with the wicked, to maintain peace with their paſtors, and to be frequent in calling upon God; as alſo to ſtir them up to expect light after thoſe deadly miſts of darkneſs, which he told them would follow, as alſo the event ere long made to appear.

About the ſame time alſo he publiſhed his Inſtitutions much enlarged, and his Commentary upon the Romans, dedicated to Simon Grynæus his dear friend, and that golden book of his concerning the Lord's ſupper, which he made for the uſe of his French church, which Galaſius afterwards turned into Latin. In which he handled the doctrine of the ſacrament ſo dextrouſly, and learnedly, that it ſerved to determine the unhappy controverſies about it, to the ſatisfaction of all good and learned men. Neither was his happineſs leſs in reclaiming many anabaptiſts from their errors, amongſt whom were theſe two principal men, Paul Voliſius, who afterwards was a paſtor in the church of Straſborough; the other was John Stordee, who afterwards dying of the plague, Mr. Calvin by the advice of Bucer married his widow, called Idellita, a very grave and honeſt matron.

In theſe ſtudies and labours did Mr Calvin continue at Straſborough to the year 1541. In the which year the emperor Charles V. aſſembled two diets, the one at Worms, the other at Ratiſbone, for compounding the differences about religion: at both which, by the deſire of the divines of Straſborough, Mr Calvin was preſent, to great advantage of the churches, eſpecially of his own French congregation, and where he was moſt lovingly entertained, and highly prized by Philip Melanchthon, and Gaſper Cruciger, ſo that Philip called him his divine. He alſo had much conference with them about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and they could not but very well approve of his opinion therein.

But now the time was come wherein the Lord purpoſed to ſhew mercy to his poor church at Geneva: for one of the Syndics, who had promoted the decree for their baniſhment, did ſo miſdemean himſelf in his office, that being found guilty of ſedition, whilſt he thought to eſcape out at a window, being a fat man, he fell down, ſo bruiſed himſelf, that within a few days after he died. Another of them had his head cut off for a murder; the other two having done the common wealth much diſ-ſervice in an ambaſſy wherein they were employed, were fain to fly their country, and were condemned in their abſence.

Thoſe evil inſtruments being thus removed, the city of Geneva began to call for their Farell and Calvin; but when by no means they could recover Farell from Neocom, where he was now ſettled, they uſed all their endeavours to procure Calvin; and for that end they ſent ambaſſadors to Straſborough, uſing alſo the interceſſion of thoſe of Zurick, to requeſt that Mr. Calvin might be ſent back to them.

The ſenate of Straſborough were exceeding unwilling to hearken to it. Calvin himſelf, although he had not changed his mind towards the Genevans for the miſcarriages of ſome wicked men, yet abhoring to enter into new troubles, but eſpecially becauſe he found the Lord bleſſing his miniſtry at Straſborough, did abſolutely refuſe to return. Beſides Bucer, and the other paſtors, did profeſs their great unwillingneſs to part with him.

But the Genevans ſtill preſſing hard for him, Bucer at laſt thought that their requeſts ſhould be condeſcended to, at leaſt for a time; which yet was not granted by Mr Calvin himſelf, till they had urged him with the judgment of God in caſe he refuſed, and with the example of Jonah. But this falling out juſt at the time when Calvin, with Bucer was going to viſit the diet at Ratiſbone, his return was delayed for a time; and in the mean time the Genevans obtained of the Bernates that Peter Viret ſhould go from Lauſanna to Geneva; and indeed this made Mr Calvin far more willing to return to Geneva, when he ſaw that he was to have ſuch a colleague, by whoſe labours and counſels he might be much furthered in reforming that church.

So after ſome months Mr Calvin went to Geneva Sept. 13 anno Chriſti 1541, being ſingularly welcomed by the people, and eſpecially by the Senate, who acknowledged the wonderful mercy and goodneſs of God towards them, in reſtoring him to them again. And whereas the Senate of Straſborough had decreed that after a time he ſhould return to them again, they of Geneva would never give over till they had reverſed that decree, which at laſt was yielded to by them of Strasborough, yet with this proviſo, that that penſion which they had ſettled upon him ſhould ſtill be continued to him; but Mr Calvin could never be perſwaded to receive it, caring for nothing leſs than for riches. Mr Calvin being reſtored to his church, and perceiving that the city needed ſuch bridles, he profeſſed that he could not comfortably exerciſe his miniſtry amongſt them, except together with the doctrine of the goſpel, they would embrace the presbyterian government, for the well regulating of the church. Hereupon elders were choſen, and a model of the preſbyterial government was drawn up conſonant to the word of God, and grateful to the citizens, which the devil afterwards fought by all his artifices to deſtroy, but all in vain.

He wrote alſo a catechiſm in French and Latin, not ſo much different from the former, but much larger, divided into queſtions and anſwers, which indeed was an admirable piece, and found ſuch approbation and entertainment abroad, that it was turned into high Dutch, Engliſh, Scotiſh, low Dutch, Spaniſh, yea and Immanuel Tremelius turned it into Hebrew, and Henry Stevens turned it into Greek alſo.

His ordinary labours were theſe: every other Sabbath he preached twice, Monday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday, he read his divinity lectures. Every Thurſday he aſſiſted in the conſiſtory for the exerciſe of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. On Fridays he read a lecture for the clearing of ſome hard places of ſcripture. Beſides which, he wrote many commentaries upon the ſcriptures: anſwered many adverſaries to the truth; wrote many letters to ſundry places, of advice, and direction, in weighty buſineſſes. So that we have cauſe to wonder how it was poſſible for one man to undergo ſo many buſineſſes.

He made very much uſe of Farell and Viret, and yet himſelf contributed much more to them. And truly their familiarity, as it was much envied by the wicked, ſo it was very grateful to all good men. And it was a very pleaſant ſight to behold theſe three men, ſo famous in the church, and all agreeing in the work of the Lord, and yet ſo excelling in ſeveral gifts of the ſpirit, Farell exceeded in a certain greatneſs of mind, whoſe thundering ſermons could not be heard without trembling, and whoſe ardent prayers would lift a man up into heaven. Viret did ſo excel in ſweet eloquence, that he chained his hearers to his lips. Calvin, look how many words he ſpake, with ſo many grave and pithy ſentences he filled the minds of his hearers: ſo that, ſaith Mr. Beza, 'I often thought that the gifts of theſe three men meeting in one, would make up a compleat paſtor.

Beſides the forementioned labours of Mr. Calvin, he had alſo the charge and buſineſs of a family to look after; beſides many forein buſineſſes; for God ſo bleſſed his miniſtry, that from all parts of the Chriſtian world he was ſought to, partly for advice in matters of religion, and partly to hear him preach: ſo that at the ſame time there was an Italian church, an Engliſh church, and a Spaniſh church, beſides the church of Geneva, that that city ſeemed too little to entertain all that came to it for his ſake.

Thus, though he was loved of the good, and feared of the the wicked; and things were excellently ſettled; yet he did meet with many oppoſitions for the exerciſe of his graces: for as ſoon as he returned to Geneva, being mindful of that ſaying of our Saviour, 'Seek firſt the kingdom of God and his righteouſneſs, and all other things ſhall be added unto you:' his firſt and chiefeſt care was by the conſent of the ſenate to ſettle ſuch an eccleſiaſtical polity as was moſt conſonant to the word of God: from which afterwards it ſhould not be lawful either for the miniſters or people to recede. But before proof was made of it, not only ſome of the common people, but even of the chief men that had caſt off popery, and given their names only to Chriſt, ſhewed their hatred againſt it. Yea ſome of thoſe miniſters which continued there when theſe three good men were caſt out, though the chiefeſt of them left their ſtations, being found guilty of ſundry wickedneſſes, although, being convinced in their conſciences, they durſt not oppoſe it, yet, underhand they manifeſted their diſlike of it, and would by no means be brought into order: and that pretending the example of other churches, wherein no excommunication was uſed. Yea ſome of them cried out that it would introduce the popiſh tyranny again.

But Mr Calvin overcame theſe difficulties by his conſtancy, joined with ſingular moderation; ſhewing that not only the true doctrine, but eccleſiaſtical diſcipline was alſo to be fetched out of the word of God, and that his had the approbation of the moſt learned men of that age, as Occolampadius, Zuinglius, Zuichius, Melancthon, Bucer, Capito, and Myconius, which he proved out of their writings: withal telling them that other Chriſtian churches were not to be condemned which had not proceeded ſo far, nor thoſe paſtors which found that their people needed not ſuch a bridle: and laſtly ſhewing what a vaſt difference there was between the popiſh tyranny, and the eaſy yoke of the Lord: ſo that he at laſt obtained that his diſcipline was written, read, and confirmed by the ſuffrages of the people, and generally received, Nov. 20th, 1541.

But though theſe things were ſo happily carried on, yet Mr. Calvin, conſidering that he was like to meet with ſome difficulties in the exerciſe of it, did his utmoſt endeavour that Viret, who was only lent them by the Bernates for a time, and Farell, who was now ſettled at Neocom, might be joined with him as his perpetual fellow-paſtors; but he could not poſſibly effect it; Viret preſently returning to Lauſanna, and Farell remaining at Neocome, ſo that the whole praiſe of ſettling the Genevian church is due to Mr Calvin alone,

The year following, viz. 1542, Mr Calvin met with many afflictions, ſome at home, but eſpecially by the enflamed fury of the adverſaries of the truth abroad, in France and Italy, whence they drave away many profeſſors of the goſpel, for the comforting of whom, he laid out himſelf exceedingly, writing many encouraging letters every way, both to thoſe that were eſcaped, and to thoſe alſo that yet remained within the reach of the lions jaws.

The ſame year alſo there fell out two other great evils, Famine, and Peſtilence its uſual companion, and at this time the cuſtom of Geneva was, that ſuch as were infected with the peſtilence, ſhould be removed into an hoſpital out of the city, where, being in need of a conſtant and ſedulous paſtor, when, by reaſon of the danger moſt men refuſed it, there were three that offered themſelves, viz. Calvin, Sebaſtian Caſtalio, and Blanchet; and lots being caſt between theſe three, it fell upon Caſtalio, who notwithſtanding his former forwardneſs, now ſhamefully drew back, and refuſed it; and when Calvin would have caſt lots again, the ſenate, and Blanchet, who now took this work upon him, would not ſuffer it.

About this time alſo other miſchiefs fell out; for Peter Toſſanus, the paſtor of Montbelgard, was much troubled about the controverſy of the Lord's ſupper; and at Baſil, where the foundation of church government was ſcarce laid (do Myconius what he could to the contrary) it was by ſome evil affected perſons ſubverted; and both theſe men had recourſe to Calvin for his counſel. And at Neocome, though Mr. Farell laboured with great ſucceſs, yet the work of the Lord was much obſtructed, partly by open force, and partly by the apoſtate Peter Caroli, of whom we ſpake before; about which buſineſs we may diſcern Mr Calvin's labours, partly by his printed letters, and partly by the teſtimony of ſuch as were eye witneſſes of it.

But there was a far more audacious act of the Sorboniſts at this time, who neither having authority from God nor man, yet dared to impoſe ſundry articles of Chriſtian religion, as they called them, but ſuch indeed as were ſtuffed with ſo many errors, and fooleries, wherein that ſociety of men did abound, as that it was a wonder how any man that had the uſe of reaſon ſhould aſſent thereunto, yet many, partly through fear, and partly through ignorance ſubſcribed them. Wherefore Mr Calvin anſwered them, learnedly confuting their errors by ſolid arguments, and ſo ſet forth their fooleries, that every man which was not wilfully blind might eaſily diſcern the ſame.

Thus ended this year, to which the next ſucceeded, no whit milder, either in regard of the famine or peſtilence, which infeſted all Savoy; and Mr Calvin proceeded according to his accuſtomed manner, confirmed his own at home, and ſtrongly oppoſed the adverſaries abroad; publiſhing his four books about free-will, which he dedicated to Phil. Melancthon, againſt Albert Pighius, the greateſt ſophiſter of his age, and who had ſingled out Calvin for his antagoniſt, being promiſed a cardinal's hat if he could carry away the victory from him. But being fruſtrated of his labour, he gat that which the enemies of the truth only deſerve, viz. That he ſtank amongſt learned and good men, himſelf being deceived by the devil How much Melancthon eſteemed of thoſe books of Mr Calvin, himſelf teſtifies in his epiſtles which are in print. Mr Calvin alſo the ſame year wrote to the church at Montbelgard, whereby the mouths of calumniators may be ſtopped, who accuſe him of too much rigidneſs in the exerciſe of Eccleſiaſtical diſcipline,

The year following, which was anno Chriſti, 1544. Mr Calvin declared his opinion about the purpoſe of the church of Neocome in eccleſiaſtical cenſures; and at home Sebaſtian Caſtalio, whom we mentioned before, being a light man, and very ambitious, having tranſlated the New Teſtament into French, was exceedingly diſpleaſed that Mr. Calvin did not approve of it; yea, he grew ſo angry, that he vented divers errors, and not content therewith, he publicly preached that the Canticles of Solomon was an impure and obſcene ſong, and therefore would needs have it expunged out of the ſacred canon; and becauſe the miniſters oppoſed him, he railed exceedingly againſt them; which they judging unfit for them to bear, called him before the ſenate, where being heard with much patience, he was at laſt condemned of ſlanders, and commanded to depart out of the city.

From thence he went to Baſil, where being at laſt admitted. What his carriage was there, is beſides my purpoſe. The year before the emperor Charles the fifth being to war againſt the king of France, had promiſed the Germans that they ſhould not be moleſted for their religion, till a general council ſhould be called, which as he told them, he would take care to be effected. This the pope Paul the third was much incenſed at, and publiſhed a harſh expoſtulation againſt the emperor, becauſe he had equalized the heretics with the catholics, and had thruſt his ſickle into another man's harveſt: the emperor anſwered, that which he thought to be reaſon: but Mr Calvin becauſe he ſaw in the pope's letters, that the truth of the goſpel did ſuffer, together with the innocency of good men, took him up very roundly, and repreſſed his impudence.

At this time a dyet was aſſembled at Spires, upon which occaſion Calvin publiſhed the book of neceſſity of reforming the church, than which that age produced not a book of that ſubject, that was more weighty and nervous. The ſame year alſo Mr. Calvin in two books did ſo confute the Anabaptiſts and Libertines, who had revived the monſtrous hereſies of the former ages, that whoſoever read them, except he was willing to it, could not be deceived by them, and they which had been formerly deceived could not but be reclaimed to the truth. Yet the queen of Navar was offended with his book againſt the Libertines, being ſo bewitched with two of the chief patrons of that hereſy; Quintinus and Poquetus, whom Calvin had noted by name, that though ſhe was not otherwiſe tainted with their errors, yet ſhe had a great opinion that they were good men, and therefore took herſelf to be wounded thro' their ſides: which when Mr Calvin underſtood, he wrote to her with admirable moderation, as not unmindful of her dignity, nor of all the good ſhe had done for the church church of God, and yet withal became a faithful servant of Jesus Christ; he reprehended her imprudence for admitting such men, and asserted the authority of his ministry; and he so far prevailed, that the men of that abominable sect of libertines, which began apace to flock into France, afterwards kept themselves in Holland and the countries adjacent.

The labours of this year being finished, the succeeding year 1545, brought new and greater labours with it, for the plague, increasing in the city and neighbouring villages, seemed as if it would devour all before it; and covetousness so prevailed with the poor people, who were employed to attend the rich in their sickness, and to cleanse their houses, that by an horrible conspiracy amongst themselves, with a pestilentious ointment they anointed the posts, thresholds, and doors of many houses, whereby a more grievous pestilence ensued; and these wicked instruments of the devil had bound themselves to Satan by an oath, that by no torments they should confess their wickedness: yet many of them being taken in the city and villages were punished according to their deserts.

It is almost incredible what envy and reproach this act brought upon Geneva, and especially upon Mr Calvin, as if the devil should rule there altogether where he was most opposed. This year was also infamous by that abominable and cruel edict which the parliament of Aquitain set forth against the poor Waldenses of Merindol, Cabriers, and those parts, whereby most unheard of cruelties were exercised, not against some few, but against all of them, without any distinction of ages or sex, yea, to the very burning of their towns.

Some of these that escaped flying to Geneva, Mr Calvin was the more afflicted for them, and careful of them, because a little before he had written consolatory letters to them, and sent them faithful pastors for the instructing of them purely out of the gospel, and had also (where they were in danger before) preserved them, by his intercession to the German princes and Helvetians.

The unhappy controversy also of the Lord's supper sprang up again; Osiander, a man of a proud and monstrous wit, reviving it out of the ashes: for the quenching of which flame Mr Calvin did what possibly he could, as may appear by his letters which he wrote to Melancthon about the same. But the intemperancy of Osiander was such, that he would by no means hearken to the wholesome counsel that was given him by those two men.

In the mean while the plague, still raging in the city, took away many good men; whereupon Mr Calvin, out of the pulpit, thundered against many wickednesses, especially against whoredom, which was not laid aside, notwithstanding that judgment of God amongst them. Good men assented to this which Mr Calvin spake; but some there were of the great men of the city which hindered the reformation hereof, till at last they ruined themselves thereby: And to all these evils this was added to compleat them, that now (though very unseasonable) the controversy about the privileges of the city sprang up, neither could the faithful pastors be suffered to dispose of the ecclesiastical goods taken from the pontificians, as they ought to be. About this business were many clamours, many complaints, and much pains taken by writing and conference, but they proved all in vain: whereupon Mr Calvin did publicly profess that he could not endure so many sacrileges, which he knew would at length be severely punished by God, yet withal, he acknowleged the justice of God, in that the goods which were formerly so unjustly gotten by the massprists, God would not suffer them to be brought into the church's treasury.

Master Calvin yet met with two more things which did afflict him this year. A wicked fellow was returned to Geneva, his own country, who for a time had lived as an hermit in France. This man pretending to the reformed religion, Mr Calvin (who was very acute in prying into mens minds, and manners) taking notice of him, admonished him first gently, and afterwards more freely, and at last reproved him for carrying himself more proudly in the congregation than beseemed him. The man not bearing this, easily found out such as had been reproved for their wickedness by Mr Calvin, by whose favour and help he might be assisted; so that a pastor being to be chosen in the room of one that was dead, this man by the help of his companions, sought the place, and so far prevailed that the senate commanded that in the election regard should be had of him. Mr Calvin with his colleagues opposed it, shewing how far this his seeking to intrude himself was dissonant from the word of God, and at length obtained of the senate, that they should proceed in their election according to the ecclesiastical constitutions formerly agreed upon.

At this same time also there were many in France, who being fallen at first through fear of persecution, began at last to please themselves with this conceit, that it was no sin to be present with their bodies at the popish services, so they kept the true religion in their hearts. This pernicious error was long since condemned by the fathers: against these Mr Calvin wrote, and confuted that error; and because these persons thought him too rigid, he adjoined to his own, the opinions of these learned and godly divines, Philip Melancthon, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and the church of Zurick, so that the name of these Nicodemites stank amongst all good men, for so were they called who cloaked their errors with his example.

The next year, being 1546. proved nothing milder than the former. For frequent intelligence came of the preparations of the emperor, and the pope's frauds against the protestants: wherefore Mr Calvin judged it necessary to confirm the minds of the citizens against the terror of these reports, especially considering the impudency of many wicked men, who were so far from being curbed by all the bridles of ecclesiastical discipline, that on the contrary they raged the more, and sought to break them all in sunder. These men having gotten one Amedius Perrinus, a vain, bold, and ambitious man, for their captain; (for indeed he had long before procured to be chosen the captain general by the suffrages of the people,) this man supposing (as the truth was) that neither he, nor such like himself could stand whilst the ecclesiastical laws were in force, and especially whilst Mr Calvin did so thunder against their lascivousness, began now to discover what he, and his associates had been long contriving; which being taken notice of, and speedily prevented by the authority of the senate, he indeed held his peace, but the contrived wickedness presently brake out more openly.

For shortly after one of the senators in a public assembly of the people blamed Calvin as one that taught false doctrine; suborned (as was supposed) hereunto privately by the two of the college of pastors, both of them being drunkards, and therefore no whit less fearing the severity of the laws than the others forementioned. But Mr Calvin made little account of this barking. Yet this man that thus accused him, was called before the senate, and his cause being heard, was condemned for slander, and those two drunken ministers which had set him on, were removed out of their places, being forbidden going into taverns: whereby we see, that the wickedness of the wicked returns upon his own pate.

The troubles of this year being thus ended, the next year, which was 1547, proved far worse, indeed that age saw not a more calamitous time than that was; the churches of Germany seeming utterly subverted, the protestant princes taken, and cities yielding up themselves, after so great labour used, and so great difficulties passed through in planting the gospel amongst them, with what great grief the godly soul of Mr Calvin was afflicted for the desolations of the churches is not easy to express, especially if we consider that great affection which he bore to them, though far remote from him, which indeed was no other than if he had bore them all upon his shoulders. And indeed he was wonderfully grieved when he heard of those holy men, his worthy friends, Philip Melancthon, Bucer, Peter Martyr, &c. in so great danger that they seemed nearer to death than life.

But yet, that Mr Calvin bore up with a valiant mind in this tempest, appears both by his writings and by his carriage; for being much vexed at home by sundry wicked men, yet would he not start at all from his fixed course. To speak somewhat of his domestic troubles, Mr Calvin wholly employed himself to shew, that the life of Christianity did not so much consist in vain speculations, as in practice, he necessarily met with those enemies which did not not only oppoſe all piety and honeſty, but threatened war to their own country. The chief of theſe was that Perrinus before mentioned, who, with his companions had brought themſelves into this condition, that they muſt needs uſe extremity; for which end they appealed from the preſbytery to the ſenate. The preſbytery, on the contrary, pleaded their eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions, agreeable to the word of God, and ſettled by authority; and therefore they deſired the ſenate, that their privileges might not be infringed. The ſenate concluded, that the eccleſiaſtical laws, being eſtabliſhed, ought not to be violated. But when this audacious fellow would not otherwiſe be ruled, the ſenate decreed that he ſhould be depoſed from his captainſhip, and live a private life.

Though all theſe things were tranſacted before the ſenate, yet was Mr Calvin wonderfully afflicted by them; for once, upon a public hearing, there was ſuch a tumult raiſed, that they were very near embruing their hands each in other's blood; which ſedition Calvin, with his colleagues, hearing of, interpoſed themſelves, though it was with the peril of his life, (the faction of the wicked being moſt againſt him) and ſtopped it.

Yet theſe men proceeding in their wickedneſs hated him the more for it; ſo that Mr Calvin ſharply reproved them for it in his ſermons, and God's judgments threatened by him proved not in vain; for one of them writing an infamous libel, and affixing it to his pulpit, wherein were contained many railings againſt the ſacred miniſtry, and particularly againſt Mr Calvin, that he deſerved to be thrown into the river Rhodanus; this man being apprehended and convicted of theſe and many other blaſphemies, had his head cut off. And after his death there was another libel found written by his own hand, containing blaſphemies againſt Moſes and Chriſt himſelf; with which impiety there was no doubt but that he had infected others.

At this very time, and in the midſt of theſe troubles Calvin wrote his Antidote againſt the ſeven ſeſſions of the Council of Trent. He alſo ſending letters to the church of Chriſt in Roan, confirmed them againſt the fraud of a certain Franciſcan friar, who had ſpread the poiſonſome doctrines of the Libertines and Carpocratians amongſt them.

The year following, which was 1548, the evil of the aforenamed faction in Geneva brake forth again; the devil (which is almoſt incredible) abuſing thoſe perſons to be inſtruments thereof, who indeed were the greateſt enemies to it, viz. Farell and Viret. Theſe men coming to Geneva, made a grave oration in the ſenate about compoſing their differences. Mr Calvin requiring nothing but that thoſe men ſhould mend their manners, and Perrinus, with his aſſociates, promiſing any thing ſo he might be reſtored to his former place. For Perrinus being reſtored to his place, he and his wicked companions grew ſo impudent, that they cut their cloaths croſs on their breaſts that they might know each other; others of them called their dogs by the name of Calvin; others inſtead of Calvin called him Cain; others, out of an hatred to Mr Calvin, profeſſed that they would not come to the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper.

All which Mr Calvin and his colleagues did boldly and faithfully reprove, and when they were called before the ſenate, the innocency of the good men eaſily carried away the victory. So that the Amneſtie (or forgetfulneſs of wrongs) was ſolemnly ſworn to December 18. But it afterwards appeared that all this was done through diſſimulation, and that Perrin ſought nothing thereby, but to be choſen a ſyndic, that he and his might, by that means have the more liberty to act all their wickedneſs, as the event declared.

Mr Calvin, in the midſt of theſe broils, was ſo far from giving over his accuſtomed labours, that (as if nothing had moleſted him) he wrote learned commentaries upon ſix of Paul's epiſtles; as alſo, by weighty arguments confuted the interim, which was publiſhed for the deſtruction of the German churches, ſhewing withal the right courſe for reſtoring of thoſe churches.

He diſcovered alſo, in a book, the vanity of judicial aſtrology, which many began now to give too much heed to; and being ſaluted by letter from Brentius, now in exile, he wrote conſolatory letters to him, in which friendſhip it had been happy if Brentius had continued. Bucer alſo being a baniſhed man in England at this time, Calvin wrote to him to declare and open his mind more fully about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and comforted him in a moſt friendly manner.

He alſo wrote letters of advice to the duke of Somerſet, now protector of England, (who afterwards ſuffered an unworthy death) about ſuch matters, as if his council had been hearkened to, it had been happy for England, and perhaps the church there had happily avoided many of thoſe ſtorms which afterwards befel it.

In the midſt of theſe contentions the church of Geneva did wonderfully increaſe, which did exceedingly torment the devil and his inſtruments, and Mr Calvin was very ſolicitous to entertain and provide for ſuch as were baniſhed for the name of Chriſt; which care of his it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs the year following, that the fury of thoſe wicked men, though it was not quite extinct, yet for the preſent it was laid aſleep. And truly he had need of ſuch a truce, being grievouſly afflicted with a domeſtic accident; for at this time he loſt his dear wife, a very choice woman; yet did he bear this accident with ſuch conſtancy, that therein he gave an excellent example of fortitude to the whole church.

The ſame year there aroſe a great contention in the Saxon church about things indifferent; whereupon ſending to Mr Calvin for his judgment, he freely declared his opinion to them. He alſo admoniſhed Melanchthon of his duty, whom ſome accuſed for too much ſofneſs in this point; but Mr Calvin afterwards found it to be a falſe charge: for at this time it was unknown with what mind and ſpirit the whole troop of Flaccians were carried, which afterwards raiſed ſuch great troubles to the church, and were acted with ſuch fury and impudence, as if they had been hired by the pope of Rome to carry on his cauſe.

But it pleaſed God to compenſate this wound inflicted upon the churches of Germany, by a great bleſſing upon the Helvetians; for Farrell and Calvin going to Zurick, when many thought that Mr Calvin did too much favour the doctrine of conſubſtantiation, in a ſynod of all the Helvetian and Rhetian churches, he ſhewed his agreement with them: And indeed there was no great difficulty to bring good men and lovers of the truth into an harmonious concord.

This agreement of the Helvetian and Rhetian churches was written, which did more and more unite Bullinger and Calvin, and the church of Zurick with that of Geneva. Mr Calvin alſo, about this time, wrote two learned epiſtles to Lælius Socinus, the poiſon of whoſe opinions did not appear till after his death; for, in his life-time, going through the churches, he had deceived Melanchthon, Calvin, and Camerarius; but afterwards it appeared that he had favoured Servetus, Caſtalio, and Ochin, and their mad opinions; for his commentary upon the firſt chapter of John coming forth, ſhewed that he went beyond the impiety of all thoſe heretics, which had corrupted the moſt divine portion of ſcripture.

Anno Chriſti 1550 ſucceeding, the church of Chriſt enjoyed peace; and then it was decreed in Geneva, that the miniſters, not only in their ſermons, which many neglected, and others heard with ſmall profit, but from houſe to houſe, at many ſeaſons of the year, ſhould divide the city amongſt them, and require of every family an account of their faith; by which means its ſcarce credible what profit came to the people thereby. Another decree for the aboliſhing of Chriſtmaſs-day, and that no holy day ſhould be obſerved but the Sabbath only; which did ſo offend ſome looſe perſons, that they bruited abroad that Mr Calvin had aboliſhed the Sabbaths, to bring the greater odium upon him. This offence taken by ſome, occaſioned Calvin to write his book of Scandals, dedicated to Laurence Normendius, his intimate friend.

Anno Chriſti 1551, great contentions brake out in the church; and this year was begun with the death of Bucer, to the great grief of the whole church, and of Mr Calvin eſpecially, who always highly prized him. About the ſame time died Joachim Vadian, a ſenator of Geneva, a man endued with ſingular learning and piety; whereupon the wickedneſs of the factious perſons brake forth again which which had ſlept a great while. Theſe men would by no means ſuffer the exiles which fled thither for religion to enjoy the privileges of the city; and not content therewith, Mr Calvin having been forth to preach beyond the Rhodanus as he came home they entertained him with ſcorns; and one Raimund his colleague, having occaſion one evening to paſs the bridge over the Rhodanus, they had almoſt caſt him into the river; and laſtly, they raiſed a great tumult in the church of St Gervaſe, becauſe a child being brought to be baptized, the miniſter refuſed to give him the name of Belthazar (which name had been, for ſome reaſon, forbidden by their law); neither could Mr Calvin tell how to cure thoſe evils, but by his invincible patience.

About the ſame time another miſchief invaded the church of Geneva, which was occaſioned by one Jerome Bolſec, a friar Carmelite of Paris, who had indeed laid aſide his coul, but not his monkiſh mind. This man firſt fled to the dutcheſs of Ferrara, whom he deceived, till being found out he was driven from thence. Then, pretending to be a phyſician, he came to Geneva; but the learned phyſicians there rejecting him, that he might manifeſt himſelf a divine, he vented ſome falſe and abſurd opinions about predeſtination firſt in private, and then in the public congregation. Him therefore did Mr Calvin confute, firſt with a moderate reproof only; then ſending for him to him, he laboured to inſtruct him better; but he, either puffed up with his monkiſh pride, or provoked by the ſeditious perſons, ſeeking by him to provoke Mr Calvin, took the boldneſs, upon the ſixteenth of October, to preach upon this text, 'He that is of God, heareth the words of God; and they which hear them not are not of God;' whence he took occaſion to preach up free will, and that predeſtination was out of works foreſeen, withal reproaching the true doctrine, and ſhewing himſelf ſeditiouſly proud: and he became the more bold, becauſe ſeeing Mr Calvin's ſeat empty, he judged him to be abſent. But indeed, Mr Calvin, coming too late, ſate behind ſome others; and when the friar had done, Mr Calvin ſuddenly ſtanding up, though he had thought of no ſuch thing before, then truly, if at any time, he ſhewed what a man he was, confuting the friar with ſo many teſtimonies of ſcripture, with ſo many places out of St Auguſtine; and laſtly, with ſo many weighty arguments, that all were aſhamed of what he had taught, but only the impudent fellow himſelf; inſomuch that one of the magiſtrates of the city apprehended him and committed him to priſon for a ſeditious perſon; and after hearing and examining his cauſe, the judgment of the ſenate of the Helvetian churches being alſo requeſted, upon the 23d day of December he was publicly condemned for ſedition and Pelagianiſm, and baniſhed the city, being threatened with ſevere puniſhment if he were afterwards found either in the city, or territories belonging to it.

After this, going into a neighbouring town, he was the cauſe of many and great ſtirs there, till he was twice expelled the country of the Bernates. From thence going into France, he ſought to get into the miniſtry in the reformed churches, which he found in a peaceable condition, firſt in Paris, then in Orleans, pretending great penitency for his former miſcarriages, and of his own accord ſeeking reconciliation with the church at Geneva: but preſently after, when he ſaw the churches under affliction, he fell back to his popery, loading the reformed churches with many reproaches.

At the ſame time, the college of miniſters at Geneva, in a public meeting, aſſerted the true doctrine of predeſtination, which Calvin put into writing; ſo that all the devil got by theſe contentions was, that that head of Chriſtian religion, which before was very obſcure, was now very clearly opened to the underſtanding of all that were not contentious.

The year following, which was 1551, it further appeared what a flame this wicked varlet had kindled, though condemned by the common judgment of ſo many churches. For the difficulty of the queſtion not having been ſufficiently explicated by the ancients, did ſtir up, eſpecially ſome curious wits, to make enquiry into the ſame; by which means the factious perſons, ſuppoſing that they had gotten an excellent advantage againſt Mr Calvin, thought, that by removing him they might ſubvert all things; ſo that it cannot be imagined what ſtirs aroſe, not only in the city, but alſo in other places, as if the devil had ſet all his engines on work to raiſe contentions. For though there was a ſweet agreement amongſt the chief paſtors of the churches, yet there were not ſome wanting in the country of the Bernates which accuſed Calvin, as if he had made God the author of ſin, being forgetful how far he had profeſſedly oppoſed that curſed tenet, when he had confuted the Libertines.

At Baſil, Caſtalio, a good and ſimple man, though he did all things cloſely, yet it was diſcerned that he defended Pelagianiſm, and Melancthon had ſo begun to write of theſe things, that tho' he had formerly ſubſcribed Calvin's book againſt Phigius, yet he ſeemed to brand the Genevians, as if they held the Fate of the Stoics. The Pontificans alſo, though they had been a thouſand times confuted, yet renewed their old ſlanders. Theſe things did much trouble Mr. Calvin's mind, and ſo much the rather, becauſe the efficacy of error was ſo great at this time, that the mouth of truth in ſome places ſeemed to be ſtopt by public authority. Neither was this a controverſy of a few years.

This ſame year that good Hermit, whom we mentioned before, appeared publicly to diſpute with Calvin, who had ſuffered a repulſe when ſome years before he had ſought to creep into the miniſtry; whereupon he turned lawyer, and the patron of factious perſons. Their cauſe came to be heard before the ſenate, with a great contention on both ſides; the firſt fighting with impudency, and the favour of the wicked; but Mr Calvin defending his doctrine only with the authority of truth. And the truth prevailed, Mr Calvin's writings being judged pious and orthodox by his very adverſaries. But the repentance of this his adverſary is not to be paſſed over in ſilence; for a few years after, when he lay upon his death bed, he profeſſed that he could have no peace of conſcience till Mr Calvin had forgiven him, which he not only did ſpeedily, but comforted and confirmed him to his laſt hour.

Anno Chriſti 1553. The malice of the factious brake out ſo impetuouſly, that not only the church, but even the common-wealth, was brought into extream hazard thereby; for they proceeded ſo far by the clamours and threats, and by their number oppreſſing the liberty of good men, that the ancient edicts about conſtituting of ſenators was by them diſſolved; and pretending that they were afraid of the foreign exiles, they took from them all their weapons and ſwords (except when they travelled abroad) ſo that nothing ſeemed remaining, but when they had got all the power into their own hands, that they ſhould then effect what they had often aimed at.

The devil alſo then miniſtered another occaſion of troubles, for the ancient enemy of the ſacred trinity, and of the true God, Michael Servetus, a very monſter, compoſed of many ancient and prodigious hereſies, having gone about a long time as a phyſician, and ſpread his blaſphemies under the name of Michael Villanovanus, at laſt publiſhed a great book at Vienna, belonging to Geneva, the printer whereof was Arnollet of Lions, the corrector to the preſs William Guerotius, long ago addicted to the factious Geneviſts, but a few months before being like to be puniſhed for his whoredoms, and other wickedneſſes, was fled from Geneva to Lions.

This Servetus having publiſhed his book, ſtuffed with blaſphemies, was at Vienna caſt into priſon for the ſame, but making an eſcape he came (by a ſecret providence) to Geneva, thinking to paſs further, but (as God would have it) being diſcovered, and Mr Calvin acquainting the magiſtrates with it, they caſt him into priſon: much means was uſed to bring him to a ſight of his wickedneſs, and to repentance for the ſame; but when this deſperate wretch (encouraged by ſome of the chief of the factious perſons) would not be brought to a recantation of his abominable blaſphemies, by the common conſent of all the Helvetian churches, he was condemned to death, and upon the ſeven and twentieth of October, without any ſign of repentance, was burned alive.

The ſame year Mr. Farell being very ſick, Mr. Calvin went to Neocome to viſit him; but his diſeaſe prevailing, he left him for dead; yet it pleaſed God wonderfully beyond expectation to raiſe him up again, to the great joy of the church.

Whilſt

Whilſt the buſineſſes of Servetus were in agitation, there roſe up one amongſt the factious, one Bertelerius, a moſt impudent man, who for many wickedneſſes was ſuſpended from the ſacrament by the preſbytery; whereupon he went to the ſenate, deſiring by them to be abſolved, which being effected, there was no doubt but the reins of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline being let looſe, all things would grow into confuſion; therefore Mr. Calvin in the name of the preſbytery oppoſed it, ſhewing that the Chriſtian magiſtrate ought to preſerve, not to deſtroy the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions: yet the falſe clamours of the adverſaries prevailed, who ſaid that the preſbytery encroached upon the authority of the magiſtrate, ſo that in a meeting of the common council it was decreed, that the laſt appeal ought to be to the ſenate, who might abſolve whom they thought fit. After which the ſenate not much minding the buſineſs, ſuffered this Bertelerius ſurreptitiouſly to get letters of abſolution from them, confirmed by the ſeal of the commonwealth. But Perinus and his companions, hoped that one of theſe two things would follow, viz. that either Calvin would not obey this mandate of the ſenate, and ſo he would be oppreſſed by the people in a tumult; or elſe that he would obey it, and then it would be eaſy for them to diſſolve the decrees of the preſbytery, and ſo open a door to all licentiouſneſs.

But Mr Calvin (though he had notice of this but two days before the ſacrament was to be adminiſtred, in the month of September) in the time of his ſermon, lifting up his voice, and ſtretching forth his hand, ſpake much againſt the contemners and profaners of thoſe ſacred myſteries: 'But I, ſaith he, following Chryſoſtome, will rather ſuffer myſelf to be ſlain, than this hand of mine ſhould reach the holy elements to thoſe that have been judged contemners of God.' This ſpeech, which is wonderful to obſerve, did ſo far prevail with them, who othewiſe were head-ſtrong enough, that Perinus ſent privately to Bertelerius, commanding him not to obtrude himſelf upon the Sacrament, and ſo, through God's mercy, the ſacrament was peaceably adminiſtred, and received with a certain trembling, as if God himſelf had been preſent in their ſight.

In the afternoon Mr Calvin preached upon that text in the Acts, wherein Paul took his leave of the church of Epheſus, wherein he profeſſed that he was not the man that would himſelf oppoſe the decree of the magiſtrate, exhorting the congregation to perſevere in that doctrine wherein they had been taught, as if he had taken his laſt farewel of Geneva. And ſeeing, ſaith he, things are come to this paſs, give me leave, brethren, to uſe the words of the apoſtle to you, 'I commend you to God, and the word of his grace;' which words as they wonderfully daunted the wicked, ſo they prevailed much more with the godly party, to put them in mind of their duty.

The day after Mr Calvin with his colleagues, and the whole preſbytery intreated the ſenate, and the common-council that they might be heard before the people, whilſt they ſhould give in reaſons for the abrogating of that forenamed law. This was eaſily aſſented to, their minds being wonderfully changed; and it was decreed, that that law ſhould be ſuſpended, and that the judgment of the four Helvetian cities ſhould be deſired therein; and that nothing in the mean time ſhould be acted that was prejudicial to the laws formerly eſtabliſhed.

Thus this tempeſt was rather diſperſed than wholly quieted, which beyond hope, being diverted from Mr Calvin, the factious ſought to bring it upon the head of Mr Farell: for Mr. Farell, as ſoon as he was recovered of his great ſickneſs, came to Geneva, and there in a ſermon ſharply reproved the factious, partly relying upon the juſtneſs of the cauſe, and partly upon his age, and that ancient authority which he had amongſt them. But they, complaining that he had done them much wrong, when he was returned to Neocome, appointed him a day to anſwer it before the ſenate, and withal ſent to the ſenate at Neocome that he might appear at the day appointed. He came therefore again to Geneva, yet not without danger, whilſt the factious cried out that he deſerved to be thrown into the river of Rhodanus: but an honeſt young man of the citizens adviſed Perinus, that Mr. Farell, the common father of the city, might be no way wronged; joining alſo with himſelf another honeſt young man, they gave notice to the well affected citizens, that they ſhould ſtand by Mr Farell at the day of hearing, which alſo they did; ſo that his adverſaries being aſtoniſhed and deterred hereat, of their own accord craved pardon, and Mr Farell was diſmiſſed.

About this time a grievous calamity befel the church of England by the immature death of that godly prince, king Edward VI. which was a grievous wound to all the reformed churches. Yet at this time Mr. Calvin wrote his learned commentaries upon the goſpel of St. John.

Geneva (as we heard before) having inflicted deſerved puniſhment upon Servetus, not as upon a ſectary, but as upon a monſter for his horrible impieties and blaſphemies, by which for thirty years ſpace he had infected the Chriſtian world both by his teaching and writings: it cannot be imagined how this ſtirred up the rage of Satan, ſuch a flame ariſing from hence as ſet Poland firſt, then Tranſylvania and Hungary all on a fire, which himſelf ſeemed to foretel by the ſpirit of Satan, when in the beginning of his book he ſet this ſentence out of the Revelation, 'There was a great battle in heaven, Michael, and his angels fighting with the dragon:' for his aſhes being ſcarce cold, a great controverſy ſprung up about the puniſhing of heretics: ſome holding that they ought to be reſtrained, but not to be puniſhed with death. Others thinking that it could not be clearly ſtated out of God's word, what was hereſy; thereupon ſaid, that it was lawful to hold either part in all the heads of religion, and that all men, though holding a wrong opinion, were to be left to the judgment of God. This latter opinion ſome good men inclined to, fearing that the contrary tenet might kindle the cruelty of tyrants againſt the godly. The principal of theſe were Sebaſtian Caſtalio, and Lælius Socinus, therein pleading their own cauſe: the former indeed more cloſely, and the latter more openly, as one that ſtudied to vindicate the clear authority of the ſcripture, in a certain preface, to the perverting of the Holy Bible; and in his annotations upon the firſt epiſtle of Paul to the Corinthians had endeavoured to draw men from the written word of God, as an imperfect rule, as if Paul had taught to ſome of his diſciples that were more perfect than the reſt, a certain more hidden divinity than that which he had committed to writing. Hereupon Mr Calvin anno Chriſti 1554. ſet forth a copious confutation of all the doctrine of Servetus, which was ſubſcribed by all his collegues: adding many reaſons why, and how far a magiſtrate might proceed in puniſhing ſuch an one as was lawfully convicted of hereſy. The adverſaries on the contrary publiſhed a rhapſody, collected partly out of the writings of the ancient fathers, which they perverted to their own ends, and partly out of the writings of certain unknown fanatics, and under the name of Martin Bellius, which indeed was Caſtalio, though afterwards he foreſwore it, and falſifying alſo the name of the city, in which they falſely pretended that it was publiſhed.

To this book, ſwarming with many errors and blaſphemies; Mr. Beza anſwered, thereby to free Mr. Calvin from that labour, who was now buſy in writing his learned commentaries upon Geneſis, and in diverting other dangers from the church: for the factious went on to innovate things in the city, and though the amneſtie was again renewed before the ſenate upon the ſecond of February, yet they daily grew worſe and worſe, ſo that Mr Calvin was much buſied both in blaming and reproving them for their wickedneſs, and in endeavouring to ſtrengthen the godly againſt the poiſon of their impiety; for they had proceeded to ſuch a height of wickedneſs, that they turned part of the ſacred ſcriptures into obſcene ſongs, and uſed to beat ſtrangers whom they met in the night, and ſometimes alſo to rob them.

They alſo privately uſed the books of Bolſecus, Caſtalio, and other corrupt men, that they might renew the controverſy about Predeſtination; yea, they proceeded to ſcatter abroad a falſe and ſcandalous libel, wherein they grievouſly aſperſed that worthy ſervant of Chriſt, Mr Calvin. Caſtalio alſo ſent another Latin book to be privately printed at Paris, to which Mr Beza anſwered, and Mr Calvin alſo confuted ſome of the fooleries of the ſame kind. About this time the care of the Engliſh exiles lay heavy upon him, ſome of which were come to Verſalia; others to Embden, and and others to Frankford, all sending to Mr. Calvin for advice and counsel: neither was he a little troubled for the audaciousness of some of the pastors (encouraged by the secret favour of others) of the French church, long since planted by him at Strasborough: and in short how great pains he took this year for several churches, may appear by the multitude of epistles wrote by him, by which he stirred up many noblemen to embrace the gospel, and strengthened many of the brethren, some of which were in extreme danger, and others already cast into bonds.

We spake before of the sweet harmony that was between the Helvetian and Rhetian churches, about the doctrine of the sacrament. This concord did exceedingly displease the spirit of error; therefore he easily found out one that might easily rekindle the fire which was before extinguished, viz. Joachim Westphalus, who was seconded by Hesshusius, then a minister of the word, but afterwards a bishop, of whom we shall speak more afterwards: hereupon Mr Calvin published an explication of that argument, which, by how much it imbittered their spirits, by so much the more it satisfied all good men that were lovers of the truth.

The year following, viz. 1555. By the special mercy of God, brought peace along with it to the church of Geneva, which was now quiet from its domestic stirs; for the factions ruined themselves: God discovering their horrible treason to the state, by the means of one of the conspirators, who in his drunken fit discovered it; whereupon some of them were beheaded, others of them were banished, who though a while after they vexed the city, yet perished shamefully in the end, leaving an example of the just judgment of God upon such persons, though it may be deferred for a time. Thus the common wealth was freed from these pests. To which another mercy was added by the answer of the four Helvetian cities, to whom the question about the discipline (which we spake before) had been proposed, who unanimously confirmed the ecclesiastical polity as it had been before settled, contrary to the expectation of the factions.

Yet something was not wanting whereby Mr Calvin might be further exercised: for he took great pains in constituting the church in Polonia by the will of the king: in comforting the afflicted in England, who were much troubled by reason of the cruel burning of those three bishops and martyrs, incomparable for piety, viz Nicholas Ridley, John Hooper, and Hugh Latimer, who suffered amongst many other worthy men, and shortly after that great Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury: as also in comforting the imprisoned brethren in France; especially those five valiant martyrs who this year were burned at Cameracum.

But at home the errors of Servetus began to spring up again, whose blasphemies Matthews Gribaldus was observed to favour, a lawyer of some note, and the Lord of a town not far from Geneva: this man coming to Geneva, was brought to Mr Calvin by some Italians who had been his scholars when he taught at Padua; but Mr Calvin refused to give him his hand, till they could agree about some of the chief heads of divinity, viz. about the sacred trinity, and divinity of Christ, till when he would by no means be perswaded to do it; and because he refused Mr Calvin told him that an heavy judgement of God hung over his head for his pertinacious impiety, which shortly after came to pass: being first forced to fly to Tubing, where he was entertained by the favour of Vergerius, and being afterwards taken at Berne, upon a feigned submission was dismissed: but returning to his old course, and entertaining and favouring Gentilis (of whom we shall speak anon) God found him out, and prevented his punishment by man, by striking him with the plague whereof he died. About this time also Mr Calvin met with another trial: for certain neighbour ministers, who were underhand encouraged by Bolsecus, thinking to get themselves a name by opposing so great a man, and indeed they lay under many other scandals, railed exceedingly against Mr Calvin, as if he made God the author of sin, because he would exclude nothing from the eternal foresight and ordination of God. Mr Calvin being little moved with these calumnies, was yet at last provoked by their importunities, so that he obtained of the senate leave to go with their ambassadors to Berne, there to defend himself and the truth before the Bernates, which accordingly he did, and so prevailed, that one Sebastian was branded with infamy, and banished; Bolsecus also was commanded to depart out of their coasts; so all these calumnies ended in smoke: and one Andreas Zebedaus, who had been his most bitter accuser, after Mr Calvin's death, himself also lying upon his death bed at Novidune, a town four miles distant from Geneva, sending for some of the chief citizens, did of his own accord confess the truth which before he had opposed, and detesting his former actions, caused all his papers to be burnt before his, and their faces.

The next year, viz. 1556. A certain ague seized upon Mr Calvid as he was preaching, which handled him so roughly, that it made him come down from the pulpit: hereupon many false rumours were spread abroad, which were so grateful, especially to the papists, that at Noviodune, his own country, the priest had returned public and solemn thanks for the death of Calvin; but the prayers of good men prevailed for his health, and he was so far from dying of that disease, that rather being increased in his strength, he undertook a longer journey than he was used to do, viz. to Frankford, being invited thither to pacify some controversies which were sprung up in the French church there. At length returning home, though something impaired in his health, yet remitted he nothing of his daily labours, publishing the next year his very learned commentaries upon the psalms, to which he prefixed a very precious preface.

The rest of the year being very full of tumults by reason of some factious ministers, and God sending a famine also, yet Mr Calvin spent it in defending the truth against Joachim Westphalus, and when notwithstanding Westphalus continued his prattle, Mr Beza answered him, and stopped his mouth. Then also Mr Calvin and Beza, both confuted the calumnies of Castalio, against the eternal predestination of God which he had spread abroad, yet concealing his name.

At this time a grievous persecution arising at Paris against the godly, it was a great affliction to Mr. Calvin; many being taken when they were assembled in St James's street for the celebration of the Lord's supper, being about eighty in number (the rest escaping by the benefit of the dark night) who the next morning were led to prison, loaden with scorn and reproaches, though some of them were noble women of good account. Against these sheep of Christ the king's anger was enflamed, not only by those about him, but by the very occasion of the times: for this fell out at the same time when the king's army had received such a notable defeat at St Quintan: besides these godly persons were forced to meet in the night, because they could not do it in the day, which further irritated him: hereupon also these old lying scandals were raised against them, especially by one Democarus a doctor of Sorbon, who charged the Christians as the cause of all the evils which befel this kingdom.

There were also some false witnesses suborned against them, which the credulous multitude was too apt to believe; there were therefore seven of them brought forth to be burned, amongst whom there was a noble woman, who with six others shewed admirable patience: and whereas they were accused for promiscuous whoredoms at their meetings, especially by the Sorbonists, who thought the more to incense the king thereby, a godly and learned man, who had lately been their pastor, easily confuted those lies, and the German princes interceeding in their behalf (which Mr. Calvin procured with admirable celerity) the tempest was in a good measure blown over.

The next year being 1558, proved very happy to the commonwealth of Geneva, by reason of that strict league made betwixt them and the Bernates. But a grievous persecution brake out against the church in France again; and at home the heresies of Servetus were revived by Valentine Gentilis, mentioned before. To stop the former, Mr Calvin sent letters to the German princes, which opened to them the great calamities which the churches groaned under, requesting them to intercede for them, and in the mean time himself endeavoured by his daily letters to support them under their afflictions. And for Gentilis, who was a man of an unhappy, but sagacious, and subtil wit, presently after the burning of Servetus, he gat his book, Calvin's confutation of it, and not weighing the truth in the balance of the ſanctuary, but of carnal wiſdom and reaſon, he concludes that the Father was the only one God of himſelf, who propagated eſſence to the other two perſons; ſo that he began to profeſs that there were three Gods, three Eternals, Omnipotent and Immenſe Gods: and to prove it, he wreſted not only the ſacred ſcriptures, but the council of Nice alſo, and rejected Athanaſius his creed, as alſo the teſtimony of all the ancients, viz. of Ignatius. Tertullian, Irænæus, and Lactantius, by a certain unheard of impudence; yea, did not only reject all the orthodox writers which followed the Nicene council, but reproached them as wicked men. Other blaſphemies alſo followed this about the hypoſtatical union.

He firſt vented theſe things in private (as he pretended, for diſputation ſake) to ſome of the Italian congregation; whereupon an aſſembly being called on purpoſe, Mr Calvin, before ſome choice ſenators, and all the miniſters and elders, having patiently heard them, confuted them ſo fully out of the word of God, that all the Italians preſently ſubſcribed to the orthodox faith, except only ſix, who afterwards being called one by one, ſubſcribed with their hands, but not with their hearts as time made to appear. Gentilis therefore returning to his old courſe, and going on to ſpread his former blaſphemies, is apprehended, diſſembles not his opinion, being heard as much, and as long as he would. At length, ſeeming to be convinced by Mr Calvin, he feigned incredible repentance, and gave in a recantation ſigned under his own hand. Hereupon he was diſmiſſed, firſt taking an oath that he would not go forth of the gates of the city; but preſently, contrary to the ſame, he flies into Savoy to Matthew Gribaldus, and preſently after two of his diſciples, Alciat and Blandatra followed him, who afterwards proved the infectors of Tranſylvania, and the countries adjacent.

But God's judgment hanging over the head of Gentilis, he ſtaid with Gribaldus (both of them caſting off the other two as illiterate fellows) and there he wrote a book againſt Athanaſius and Calvin, and ſo going to Lions, he there printed it, dedicating it to Gaienſis a præfect, who was altogether ignorant of the blaſphemies contained in it. Whilſt he was at Lions he was apprehended by the papiſts, but when he ſhewed them that he had written a book againſt Calvin, he was diſmiſſed, as one that had deſerved well of their church.

From thence he went into Tranſylvania to Blandatra, Alciat, and their companions; but they having now ſucked in the hereſies of Samoſatenus, and he not well agreeing with them therein, Chriſt indeed drawing him forth to condign puniſhment, he returned into Savoy to his friend Gribaldus; but God's plague had now ſwept away that peſt, and Mr Calvin alſo was dead at Geneva. Hereupon Gentilis, either infatuated by God, or thinking that there was none left at Geneva that could anſwer him, went ſtrait to Galenſis, who was juſtly offended with him; who therefore preſently apprehending him, by the juſt judgment of God, ſent him to Berne, there to be tried; where being convicted of perjury and many manifeſt impieties, after many ways were uſed to bring him to repentance, but in vain he had his head cut off, thereby ſuffering a juſt reward for all his impieties.

Towards the latter end of this year, in October, Mr Calvin was taken with a quartane ague, which phyſicians ſay, is deadly to old perſons, which though it held him but eight months, yet it ſo debilitated his lean, and overworn body with his inceſſant labours, that he never thoroughly recovered his health again: yet all this time, though his phyſicians warned him, and his friends diſſuaded him from his preaching and lectures, yet did he continually buſy himſelf night and day in dictating, and writing letters every way, often ſaying, 'That nothing was more troubleſome to him than an idle life.' At this time alſo he publiſhed the laſt edition of his Inſtitutions in French and Latin, and his learned Commentary upon Iſaiah.

The year following, viz. 1559, was famous for the league entered into between the two moſt potent kings of Spain and France, which was ſtrengthened by affinity betwixt them, which was likely to prove fatal to Geneva, but that the council of the Pontificans, who abuſed the ſimplicity of king Henry of France, hindered it. For king Henry publiſhed moſt ſevere decrees, and caſt ſome of his ſenators into priſon, who had declared their judgment freely, that he ought to proceed gently in matters of religion, till a general council could be called; having this in his eye principally, to reſtore the duke of Savoy to his country, that by his help he might utterly deſtroy Geneva.

In the mean time Mr Calvin (though ſickly) laboured hard at Geneva, comforting and confirming the afflicted churches and brethren; as alſo by his frequent and fervent prayers craving help of God. And behold the wonderful work of God? whilſt all things were full of terror, the king of France in the great marriage ſolemnity which was made for the confirmation of the peace, in his running a tilt, received his death's wound, and that by the hand of the captain of his guard, by whom a little before he had apprehended and impriſoned the aforeſaid ſenators. This death of the king was expiated (as he thought) by the cardinal of Lorraine, who upon the one and twentieth of December, cauſed that learned lawyer, faithful counſeller, and holy martyr of Chriſt, Annas du Bourg, to be unjuſtly and cruelly burned. But by the ſingular bleſſing of God, in the midſt of theſe calamitous times, the hearts of the Genevians were ſo raiſed up, and confirmed, that in the very ſame year, and almoſt moment of time in which two ſuch potent kings had contrived their deſtruction, by the encouragement of Mr. Calvin they laid the foundation, and built a famous ſchool, adorning it with eight maſters for boys, as alſo with Hebrew, Greek, philoſophy, and divinity profeſſors; which being finiſhed to the honour of God Omnipotent, Mr Calvin in a great aſſembly in the chiefeſt church, read, and declared thoſe things which conduced to the perpetual eſtabliſhment of ſo holy and profitable a foundation, whereby he did as it were ſolemnly conſecrate it.

The year after, which was 1560. Mr Calvin was by ſome loaden with much envy, as if he had ſtirred up an aſſembly againſt Francis II. the heir of his father's kingdom; which aſſembly was called, The tumult of Amboiſe; whereas indeed Mr. Calvin never underſtood what it was, as alſo both by word of mouth, and by his letters to friends, he diſliked it. This year one Sancarus of Mantua (Italy byeing fatal to the Polonians) began to teach, that Chriſt was mediator only according to his humane nature; accuſing all of Arianiſm, that ſhould ſay that he was mediator according to his deity, as if thereby they made the Son leſs than the Father. This calumny, and all his other doctrine was notably confuted, as by Philip Melanchon, and Peter Martyr, ſo alſo Mr Calvin, at the requeſt of the Polonians, did briefly, but ſtrongly confute the ſame; and foreſeeing what ſhortly after came to paſs, that whilſt ſome more unſkilful perſons would take upon them to confute Sancarus, if they took not heed, would fall into an error of them which held three Gods: he eloquently admoniſhed them, that taking heed of Blandatra, and his followers, they ſhould ſo aſſert Chriſt to be our Mediator according to both his natures, that in the mean time they ſhould not multiply deities: but this labour of his was vain towards them that were to periſh.

About this time the Bohemian Waldenſes ſent two of their brethren to Mr Calvin to deſire his judgment about ſome matters of religion, whom he lovingly ſatisfied, exhorting them alſo that they would enter into a nearer conjunction with other reformed churches. At the ſame time alſo queen Mary being dead, and queen Elizabeth ſucceeding, many of the godly French relying upon her piety and humanity, fled for refuge into England, with the conſent of that reverend man, Edmund Grindal, biſhop of London, they craved leave of her that one might be ſent from Geneva to plant a French church there; whereupon Gabion was ſent.

Towards the latter end of this year king Francis of France died ſuddenly, and that in ſuch a juncture of time, when all things ſeemed ſo deſperate, that they could not be cured by God himſelf; and king Charles the ninth, a child, was ſcarce entred into his kingdom, when by a herald letters ſubſcribed with his name were brought to Geneva, wherein he complained that many were ſent out from thence, that infected his kingdom, deſiring that they might be presently called back, threatning that otherwise he would not let pass the revenging of that injury.

Mr Calvin being hereupon sent for by the senate, answered in his own, and in his colleagues names that at the request of the churches of France, they had exhorted certain men that were sound in the faith, and of an holy life, whom they judged fit for the work, that they should not be wanting to lend their help to their country in so holy a cause, especially the churches craving assistance from them for their further edification: and that this they had done, not to disturb the kingdom, but that the people might be taught the gospel of peace; and if they were accused for any thing further than this, that they were ready to answer their accusers before the king: so this business went no further.

The same year Mr Calvin and Mr Beza, answered the impudent book of Tileman Hushusius. Mr Calvin also confuted those blasphemies which Gentilis had published at Lions against him, and Athanasius: he published also his lectures upon Daniel, which he dedicated to the French churches; and as he interpreted that prophet, so in his preface he was himself a prophet, foretelling the tempest that hung over them. At which time also Francis Balduines, afterwards called Ecebolius, because he had changed his religion three or four times, being suborned by the Cardinal of Lorain, by evil means reconciled to the king of Navar, dispersed a certain book up and down the court, written either by himself, or (as some rather thought) by Cassander, wherein he stiled himself a pious and moderate man, which book was worse than the emperor's Interim; for that under the specious pretence of restoring moderation, he sought to bring in all the popish corruptions. Mr Calvin being informed hereof published an answer to this book, to which some other answers were shortly after added, which made a full discovery of the wit and purpose of Balduians; which this railer could by no means digest, whereupon he never gave over to brand Calvin and Beza with his impudent reproaches; till the year after being grown odious both to God and men, of both religions whom he had so often deceived by his turning, whilst he was following a suit of law at Paris, he wore away, and ended his wretched life.

In the year 1562. God gave peace and liberty to the French churches, by a public edict of the king's; but not long after, the king of Navarre being suborned by popish subtilty, presently after the duke of Guise had committed that abominable massacre at Vassy, began that civil war, which continued many years after, to the miserable devastation of France; and it cannot be spoken how much Mr Calvin was affected and afflicted therewith, which so far increased his disease, that it was easy to divine, that it would not be long before he was translated to a better life; yet did he not desist from exhorting and comforting every one, no nor from preaching and reading his ordinary lectures. And the same year he published that excellent confession of faith, which was sent to the states of the empire met together at Franckford, in the name of the prince of Conde, and of all the godly in France, who besides the injuries which they sustained by an unjust war, were unworthily traduced to the Germans, as if they held many false and monstrous opinions.

One thing also is not to be pretermitted, that on the nineteenth of December. Mr Calvin lying in bed sick of the gout, being the Sabbath day, and the North-wind having blown two days strongly, said to many that were present, truly I know not what is the matter, but I thought this night I heard warlike drums beating very loud, and I could not perswade myself but it was so: let us therefore go to prayers, for surely some great business is in hand. And this very day there was a great battle fought between the Guisians and the protestants not far from Paris, news whereof came unto Geneva within a few days after.

The year after, which was 1563. Mr Calvin's disease did so far increase, that it was almost incredible that so weak a body, exhausted with so many labours, and worn out with so many diseases, should yet retain so valiant and generous a mind: so that even then he could not be perswaded to favour himself, and if at any time he abstained from his public labours (which yet he never did but when by necessity he was enforced thereto) yet he was busy at home, either in giving counsel to those that fought it, or in dictating to his scribes; the witnesses whereof are those two serious admonitions to the Polonians, to take heed of those blasphemous persons which denied the sacred Trinity. The answers which he returned to the brethren's messengers, who were now met in a synod at Lions; his commentaries upon the four books of Moses, which himself turned out of Latin into French: and lastly, his commentary upon Joshua, which he now began, and finished a little before his death.

In the year 1564, Feb. 6. Mr Calvin being short-winded, by reason of a stopping in his lungs, preached his last sermon, and from thence forward he spake little, only now and then he would be carried to the congregation, the last time being March the last. His diseases, being attracted by the incredible labours both of his mind and body, were very many; for (besides that naturally he was but of a weak body, lean, and inclineable to a consumtion) he slept little, and spent a great part of the year in preaching, teaching, and dictating.

For at least ten years together he abstained from dinner, taking no food at all till supper; so that it was wonder how he could escape a phthisic so long. He as often troubled with the head-ach, which his abstince only could cure, whereupon he sometimes fasted thirty six hours together. But partly through straining his voice, and partly through his too frequent use of ale, (which was taken notice of too late) he was first troubled with the hemorrhoids, which at length proved ulcerous and then five years before his death he did many times pisse blood: and when his quartan ague left him, the gout took him in his right leg, then the cholic, and last the stone, which yet he never discerned till a few months before his death.

The physicians applied what remedies possibly they could, neither was there ever man that was more observant of their rules; but in respect of the labours of his mind, he was extreme negligent of his health, so that the violent pains of headach could never restrain him from preaching: And though he was tormented with so many and violent diseases, yet did never any man hear him utter one word that did unbeseem a valiant or Christian man: Only lifting up his eyes to heaven, he used to say, 'How long, Lord?' for he often used this motto in his health, when he spake of the calamities of his brethren, which always more afflicted him than his own.

When as his colleagues admonished, and earnestly entreated him, that in his sickness he would abstain from dictating, but especially from writing himself, he answered, 'What? would you have me idle when my Lord comes?'

March 10. when all the ministers came to him, they found him cloathed, and sitting at his little table where he used to write and meditate: he beholding them (when he had rubbed his forehead a while in his hand as he used to do when he meditated) with a cheerful countenance, said, 'I give you hearty thanks, my dear brethren, for the great care you have of me; and I hope, within these fifteen days (which was the time they were to meet about church censures) I shall be present at your consistory; for then I believe God will declare what he will do concerning me, and that he will receive me to himself.' Accordingly he was present that day, which was March 14. And when all their businesses were quietly dispatched, he told them that God had given him some further help, and so taking a French testament in his hand, he read some of the annotations upon it, and asked the ministers judgments about the same, because he had a purpose to amend them. The day after he was somewhat worse, as being tired with the former day's labour.

March 27. he caused himself to be carried in his chair to the senate door, and then leaning upon two, he walked into the court, and there presented to the senate a new rector for the school: and, with a bare head, he returned them thanks for all their former favours; and, in particular, for the great care they had taken of him in his sickness, 'For I perceive (saith he) that this is the last time that I shall come into this place:' which words he could ſcarce utter, his voice failing him; and, with ſo many tears on both ſides, he bade them farewell.

April 2. which was Eaſter-day, though he was very weak, yet he cauſed himſelf to be carried to the church in his chair, where, after ſermon, he received the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper at Mr Beza's hands; and, with a cheerful countenance, though weak voice, ſang the pſalms with the reſt of the congregation, ſhewing, though in a dying countenance, ſigns of much inward joy.

April 25 he made his will in this form: 'In the name of God, Amen, anno Chriſti 1564, April 25. I Peter Chenaat, citizen and notary of Geneva, do witneſs and proſeſs, that being ſent for by that reverend man John Calvin, miniſter of the word of God in the church of Geneva and a free denizon of the ſame city, who then truly was ſick in body, but ſound in mind, told me that his purpoſe was to make his teſtament, and to declare his laſt will deſiring me to write it down as he ſhould dictate unto me with his tongue, which I profeſs I did preſently, ord by word, as he told me; neither did I add or diminiſh any thing from that which he ſpake, but have followed the very form ſuggeſted by him; which was this:

'In the name of the Lord, Amen. I John Calvin, miniſter of the word of God in the church of Geneva, oppreſſed and afflicted with divers diſeaſes, ſo that I eaſily think that the Lord God hath appointed ſhortly to lead me out this world, I therefore am determined to make my teſtament, and to commit to writing my laſt will, in this form following:

'Firſt I give thanks to God, that taking pity on me whom he created and placed in this world, hath delivered me out of the deep darkneſs of idolatry into which I was plunged, and that he brought me into the light of his goſpel, and made me a partaker of the doctrine of ſalvation, whof I was moſt unworthy: Neither hath he only gently and graciouſly born with my faults and ſins, for which I yet deſerved to be rejected by him, and driven out; but hath uſed towards me ſo great meekneſs and mildneſs, that he hath vouchſafed to uſe my labours in preaching and publiſhing the truth of his goſpel. And I witneſs and profeſs, that I intend to paſs the remainder of my life in the ſame faith and religion which he hath delivered to me by his goſpel, and not to ſeek any other aid or refuge of ſalvation than his free adoption, in which alone ſalvation reſteth. And with all my heart I embrace the mercy which he hath uſed towards me for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, compenſing my faults with the merit of his death and paſſion, that ſatisfaction may be made, by this means for my ſins and crimes, and the remembrance of them may be blotted out. I witneſs alſo and profeſs, that I humbly beg of him, that being waſhed and cleanſed in the blood of that higheſt Redeemer, ſhed for the ſins of mankind, may ſtand at his judgment ſeat under the image of my Redeemer.

'Alſo, profeſs that I have diligently done my endeavour, according to the meaſure of grace received, and bounty which God hath uſed towards me, that I might preach his word holily and purely, both in ſermons, writings, and commentaries, and interpret his holy ſcripture faithfully. I alſo witneſs and profeſs, that I have uſed no juggling, no evil and ſophiſtical arts in my controverſies and diſputations, which I have held with the enemies of the goſpel; but I have been converſant candidly and ſincerely in maintaining the truth.

'But (out alas!) that ſtudy and zeal of mine, if it be worthy ſo to be called, hath been ſo remiſs and languiſhing, that I confeſs innumerable things have been wanting to me to the well performing of my duty, and unleſs the unmeaſureable bounty of God had been preſent, my ſtudies had been vain and vaniſhing away. Moreover, I acknowledge, that unleſs the ſame bounty had been preſent unto me, the goods of the mind which God hath given me, would have made me guilty of the greater ſin and ſlothfulneſs before his judgment-ſeat. For which cauſes I witneſs and profeſs, that I hope for no other help for ſalvation but this only, that ſeeing God is a Father of mercy, he ſhewed himſelf a Father unto me, who acknowledge myſelf a miſerable ſinner.

'As for other things; After my departure out of this life, I would have my body committed to the earth in that order and manner which is uſual in this church and city, till the bleſſed day of reſurrection cometh.

'As touching that ſlender patrimony which God hath given me, concerning which I have determined thus to diſpoſe: Let Anthony Calvin, my moſt dear brother, be mine heir; but, only for honour's ſake, let him take before hand, and have to himſelf, the ſilver charger which was given me by Varannius for a gift, wherewith I deſire him to be contented: For whatſoever things remain in mine inheritance, I requeſt and commit them to his faith, that he return them to his children when he ſhall die.

'I bequeath ten golden ſcutes to the ſchool of bo s, from the ſame my brother and heir. Alſo, ſo much to poor ſtrangers. So much to Joan, the daughter of Charles Coſtan, and of my kinſwoman. But to Samuel and John, the ſons of my ſaid brother, I deſire to have given to them forty golden ſcutes by mine heir when he dieth. To Ann, Suſan, and Dorothy, his daughters, thirty ſcutes of gold. But to David their brother, becauſe of his lightneſs and miſcarriages, but five and twenty ſcutes of gold. This is the ſum of the whole patrimony and goods which God hath given me, ſo near as I can eſtimate it, ſetting a price upon my library, my moveables, and all my houſhold goods, with all my other faculties. If there be found any thing above, I would have it to be diſtributed to all thoſe children, the ſons and daughters of my brother; neither do I exclude that David, if he prove a good huſband.

'If there ſhould be any ſurpluſage above that ſum, I believe there will be no great matter, eſpecially when my debts are paid, the care whereof I have committed to my ſaid brother, upon whoſe love and fidelity I rely. For which cauſe I will and appoint him to be the executor of my teſtament; and, together with him, the worſhipful man Laurence Normandy, giving them power to take an inventory of my goods, without any more accurate diligence of the court. I alſo permit them to ſell my moveables, that, out of the money made thereof, they may execute my will above written. Dated this 25th of April, anno Chriſti 1534.'

When this will was made and confirmed, Mr Calvin ſent to the four ſyndics, and all the aldermen, deſiring to ſpeak with them all yet once more in the court before his death, whether he hoped to be carried the next day. The ſenators anſwered, that they would rather come to him, deſiring him to have a regard to his health. And the day after when they came all to him from the court, after mutual ſalutations, and pardon craved for their coming to him, whereas he rather would have come to them, and profeſſing that he had long deſired to ſpeak with them, though he had deferred it till now, even till he found the approaching of his departure out of this world, he ſaid:

'Honoured Maſter,

'I give you great thanks, that you have honoured me thus far, having not deſerved it from you; and for that you have ſo often borne with mine infirmities, which to me has always been an argument of your ſingular good will towards me: and albeit, in performance of mine office, it could not be but that I muſt undergo many bickerings, and divers aſſaults, becauſe every good man muſt be exerciſed therewith; yet I know, and acknowledge, that none of theſe things have fallen out through your default: And I earneſtly beſeech you, that if I have not always done that which behoved me, you rather would have regard of my will than of my ability; for I can truly teſtify, that I have been heartily ſtudious of the welfare of your common wealth; and howſoever I have not fully performed mine office, yet ſurely I have ſtudied the public good according to mine ability, and except I ſhould acknowledge that the Lord hath uſed my ſervice ſometimes not unprofitably, I could not avoid the crime of diſſembling. But this I requeſt of you again and again, that I may be excuſed by you for that the things are ſo little that I have publickly and privately performed, in compariſon of thoſe things which it behoved me to have done. Certainly, of mine own accord, I acknowledge that I am much indebted to you for this cauſe alſo, that ye have patiently borne with my my too much vehemency fometimes; which fin alſo I truſt God that he hath forgiven me.

'But as touching the doctrine that you have heard from me, I take God to witneſs, that I have not raſhly and uncertainly, but purely and ſincerely taught the word of God entruſted to me, whoſe wrath I would otherwiſe have felt now hanging over me, as I am certainly aſſured that my labours in teaching it hath not been diſpleaſing to him. And I teſtify this the more willingly, both before God and you, becauſe I doubt not but that the devil, according to his cuſtom, will raiſe wicked, light, and giddy headed people, to corrupt the ſincere doctrine which you have heard from me.'

Then conſidering the unmeaſurable benefits which God had conferred on that city, he ſaid:

'I am a very good witneſs out of how many great dangers the hand of the great and beſt God hath delivered you. Moreover, you ſee in what eſtate you now are; therefore, whether your affairs be proſperous or adverſe, let that be always converſant before your eyes, that God is he alone that eſtabliſheth kingdoms and cities, and therefore will be worſhipped by mortal men. Remember what that great David doth teſtify, that when he enjoyed a deep peace he fell fouleſt; and ſhould never have riſen again, if God of his ſingular goodneſs had not reached out his hand to him. What then ſhall become of ſuch punies, if he fell, being ſo ſtrong and powerful a man? Ye had need of great humility of mind, that ye may walk circumſpectly, and with great reverence before God, and truſt upon him only, being ſure that it will always be, as ye have often found, that by his aid you may ſtand ſure, although your ſafety and welfare may be hung, as it were, upon a very ſlender thread. Wherefore, if proſperity befal you, take heed, I pray you, that you be not puffed up with pride like prophane perſons, but rather give thanks to God with lowlineſs of mind. But if adverſity ſhall happen unto you, and death ſhall ſtand before you on every ſide, yet truſt in him that raiſeth up the dead; yea, then eſpecially, think that ye are ſtirred up by God, that ye may more and more truſt in him alone. And if ye deſire that this your common wealth may be preſerved in a firm eſtate, ſee that ye be not defiled with any filthineſs; for he is only the higheſt God, King of kings, and Lord of Lords; he will honour thoſe that honour him, and caſt down thoſe that deſpiſe him. Honour him therefore, according to his own precepts, and daily think of this, that we are far from doing that which is required of us.

'I know the diſpoſitions and converſations of every one of you, and I know that you have need of exhortation. There is none of thoſe that excel moſt, unto whom many things are not wanting; therefore, let every man look about him, and let him aſk of the Lord thoſe things which he underſtands himſelf to ſtand in need of. We ſee what vices reign in the greateſt councils of the world; ſome are ſtark cold, and neglect the public, taking care only for their own private affairs; others are indulgent to their private affections; others uſe not the excellent gifts God hath beſtowed upon them as they ought; others proudly boaſt of their own parts, and upon a certain confidence therein, expect that every man ſhould ſubſcribe to their opinions.

'I exhort old men that they envy not the younger, whom they find adorned with excellent gifts from God: I admoniſh the younger, that they carry themſelves modeſtly, without arrogance, and let not one moleſt another. Avoid contentions, and all bitterneſs of ſpirit, which diverts many from the right way in the government of the common-wealth: and ye ſhall the better avoid theſe things if every man contain himſelf within his own ſphere, and all adminiſter that part of the common-wealth faithfully which is committed to him. I pray you, for God's ſake, let there be no place for favour or hatred in the judgment of civil cauſes. Let none pervert right by ſubtile and cunning tricks. Let no man hinder the laws from prevailing. Let no man depart from that which is juſt and equal. If ſiniſter affections begin to ariſe, let him reſiſt them conſtantly, looking upon him that hath placed him in his throne, and beg of him his holy ſpirit.

'To conclude: I beg of you again, that you pardon mine infirmities, which I acknowlege and confeſs before God, angels, and your worſhipful ſelves.'

Having thus ſpoken, he prayed unto God to multiply his gifts and bleſſings upon them more and more, and to govern them by his Holy Spirit, for the ſafety and good of the common-wealth. And giving his hand to every one of them, he diſmiſſed them all, who departed, full of ſorrow and heavineſs, as from their common father, with many tears.

April 28. the miniſters of Geneva being come to him, he ſpake thus unto them:

'Brethren, after my deceaſe ſtand faſt in this work of the Lord, and be not diſcouraged; for the Lord will preſerve this church and common-wealth againſt the threatenings of the enemies. I pray God keep you from diſſentions. Embrace one another with mutual charity. Think again and again what you owe to this church wherein the Lord hath placed you, and let nothing divert you from your duty, otherwiſe it will be eaſy for ſuch as ſeek them to find out evaſions; but ſuch ſhall find that God cannot be deceived. As ſoon as I came to this city the goſpel indeed was preached, but the affairs were very troubleſome, many conceiting that Chriſtianity was nothing elſe but to overthrow images. And there were not a few wicked perſons from whom I ſuffered many moſt unworthy things; but the Lord our God ſo confirmed and ſtrengthened me, (though by nature I was not bold) that I gave not place to any of their endeavours. Afterwards, when I returned hither from Straſburgh, I followed this vocation with an unwilling mind, becauſe it ſeemed to me that it would prove unfruitful; for I knew not what the Lord had determined, and the matter was full of many and great difficulties; but going on, at laſt I found that God had much bleſſed my labour. Stand faſt, therefore, in this your vocation; retain that order that is begun, and do your utmoſt endeavours that the people may be kept in ſubjection to your wholeſome doctrine, for ſome are wicked and ſtubborn. Things as you ſee are, through God's mercy, well ſettled, and therefore ye ſhall be left without excuſe before God, if, through your ſlothfulneſs, they be unſettled again.

'I profeſs, brethren, that I have lived with you conjoined in true love and ſincere charity; and that I now ſo depart from you. If you have found me any whit pettiſh in this my diſeaſe, I crave pardon of you; and give you very great thanks, that ye have ſuſtained the burden impoſed upon me during the time of my ſickneſs.'

Having thus ſpoken, he gave his hand to each of them, who departed from him with much ſorrow, and weeping.

A while after, Mr Calvin underſtanding, by letters from Mr Farell to Mr Viret, who was now an old man of eighty years old, and ſickly, was yet determined to viſit him, and was now onward on his journey; he wrote thus to him to ſtay him.

'Farewel, my beſt and ſincereſt brother; and ſeeing God will have you to outlive me in this world, live mindful of our friendſhip; which, as it hath been profitable for the church of God here, ſo the fruit thereof tarrieth for us in heaven. I would not have you weary yourſelf for my ſake. I hardly draw my breath; and I expect daily when it will wholly fail me. It is enough that I live and die to Chriſt, who is gain to his, both in life and death. Again farewel. May 11. anno Chriſti 1564.'

Yet, for all this letter, the good old man came to Geneva, and having fully conferred with Mr Calvin, returned back to Neocome.

The reſt of his days, even till his departure, Mr Calvin ſpent almoſt in perpetual prayer, with his eyes fixed upon heaven, and his voice full of ſighs, by reaſon of his ſhort breath.

May 27. being the day whereon he departed, he ſeemed to ſpeak more ſtrongly, and with leſs difficulty; but this was but a lightening before death. In the evening about eight o'clock, on a ſudden, certain ſigns of preſent death appeared; at which time Mr Beza being newly departed from him, ſome ran to acquaint him therewith; whereupon he preſently returned, but found him to have yielded up his ſpirit into the hands of God, without the leaſt ſtruggling; yea, not ſo much as ſending forth one groan, having had his underſtanding, memory, and voice even to the laſt gaſp, being much more like to one that was fallen aſleep than dead. So that day, at ſun-ſetting, that great bright light was taken out of this world.

That night, and the day following, there was great weeping and wailing all over the city. Many citizens and ſtrangers deſired to ſee him after he was dead, and amongſt the reſt queen Elizabeth's ambaſſadors, who being ſent into France, were then there.

The next day after, being the Sabbath, his body was coffined; and in the afternoon he was carried forth, the ſenators, paſtors, and profeſſors of the ſchool, and almoſt the whole city following the corpſe, not without abundance of tears. He was buried in the common church-yard, without much pomp, no tomb-ſtone being added, as himſelf had commanded; whereupon Mr Beza made theſe verſes:

Romæ ruentis terror ille maximus,
Quem mortuum lugent boni, horreſcunt mali,
Ipſa a quo potuit virtutem diſcere virtus;
Cur adeo exiguo, ignotoque in ceſpite clauſus
Calvinus lateat rogas?
Calvinum aſſidue comitata modeſtia vivum,
Hoc tumulo manibus condidit ipſa ſuis.
O te beatum ceſpitem tanto hoſpite!
O cui invidere poſſunt cuncta marmora!

He was a man of an incredible and moſt ready memory, in the midſt of almoſt infinite diſtractions, and of a moſt exact judgment. He was very regardleſs of means and preferment, even when it was offered: he eat little meat, took very little ſleep, was wholly compounded of ſweetneſs and gravity: diſcreet and mild was he in bearing with men's infirmities; yet would he ſeverely, without diſſimulation, reprove their vices, which freedom he always uſed from a child. Such a preacher he was, that, like another Orpheus, he drew England, Spain, and Italy to him, filling Geneva with ſtrangers.

Such a voluminous writer, that (as it was ſaid of St Auguſtine) he wrote more than another could well read. His writings were ſo eagerly received, that, as moſt rare and precious pieces, they were forthwith tranſlated into all languages.

What ſhall I ſpeak of his indefatigable induſtry, even beyond the power of nature, which being parallelled with our loitering, I fear will exceed all credit? and may be a true object of admiration, how his lean, worn, ſpent, and wearyiſh body could poſſibly hold out.

He read every week in the year three divinity lectures, and every other week, over and above, he preached every day; ſo that (as Eraſmus ſaith of Chryſoſtome) 'I do not know whether more to admire the indefatigableneſs of the man or his heart.' Yea, ſome have reckoned up, that his lectures were yearly 186, his ſermons 286; beſides every Thurſday he ſat in the preſbytery.

Every Friday, when the miniſters met in conference to expound hard texts, he made as good as a lecture. Yea, beſides, there was ſcarce a day wherein he ſpent not ſome part, either by word or writing, in anſwering the queſtions and doubts of ſundry paſtors and churches, that ſought unto him for advice and council. Over and above which, there was no year paſſed wherein came not forth from him ſome great volume or other in Folio, ſo that in a few years (beſides many golden tractates, and ſundry exquiſite anſwers, which upon ſhort warning he made to principal adverſaries) his huge explications upon the five books of Moſes, Joſhua, Job, Pſalms, all the prophets, and upon the whole New Teſtament, came forth into the world fuller of pithy ſententious matter than of paper. Theſe things conſidered, what breathing time could he find for idleneſs or looſe thoughts?

In his laſt grievous ſickneſs, procured by his intolerable labours, he could ſcarce be compelled by his friends to pretermit his daily taſk of preaching, and reading his divinity lectures; and at home, when he could not go abroad, he rather wearied others with continual dictating to them, than himſelf. Nothing was more frequent in his mouth than this, 'Of all things an idle life is moſt irkſome to me;' and when his friends uſed all their endeavours to perſuade him to favour, and to reſpect himſelf; 'Why (ſaith he) will ye have God to find me idle at his coming?' Yea, ſuch conſcience did he make of miſpending a minute, that he was loath to detain the miniſters that came to viſit him from their public exerciſes. What wonder then is it that he ſcarce attained to the age of 56? yea, rather it is a wonder that he lived ſo long. Indeed he lived but 54 years, ten months, and ſeventeen days, the half of which time he ſpent in the holy miniſtry of the goſpel.

Many ſlanders were caſt upon him, as that he was ambitious; but how could that be? whereas he preferred his abode in the common-wealth and church of Geneva, before all other places, which he called the ſhop of poverty. Others charge him, that he ſtudied to heap up riches, whereas his laſt teſtament ſhews that he was a very poor man; for all his goods, yea, and his library, being ſold very dear, (ſaith Mr Beza) ſcarcely amounted to three hundred crowns; and Calvin himſelf, in his life time, hearing of this impudent ſlander, anſwered; 'If I cannot perſuade men whilſt I am alive that I am no great monied man, yet my death will ſhew it.' And the ſenate of Geneva can teſtify, that, his ſtipend being very ſmall, he was ſo far from being not contented therewith, that when they offered to enlarge his penſions, he utterly refuſed the ſame: and, by the ſmall eſtate which he left at his death, it appears alſo, that either his gifts were not great, or elſe that he ſpent as God ſent.

Some reproached him for his brother A. Calvin, becauſe he was divorced from his wife, who was proved an adultereſs. What could theſe men have ſaid, if he had kept an adultereſs in his houſe? May they not as well reproach Jacob, David; yea, and Chriſt himſelf, for that one of his diſciples was a devil, as himſelf told them? Some ſaid that he was given to delights and luxury; his many great books eaſily confute this ſlander. Some gave out, impudently, that he ruled in Geneva both in church and common-wealth, ſo that he ſometimes ſat upon the tribunal. But for theſe things, neither they which knew him, nor enſuing ages, who may collect his manners out of his writing, will give any credit to them. But it is far more eaſy to calumniate than to imitate him.

Omnia Calvini opera, quæ diverſis chartarum formis edita, ſi uno formæ genere imprimerentur, juſtæ magnitudinis, tomos 20. in folio efficerent. Moſt of them are mentioned particularly in his life.

The Life of John Knox, who died Anno Chriſti 1572.

JOHN KNOX was born at Gifford, in Lothian, in Scotland, Anno 1505, of honeſt parentage: brought up firſt at ſchool, then ſent to the univerſity of St Andrews to ſtudy under Mr John Mair, who was famous for learning in thoſe days, and under whom, in a ſhort time, he profited exceedingly in philoſophy and ſchool divinity, and took his degrees, and afterwards was admitted very young into orders: then he betook himſelf to the reading of the fathers, eſpecially Auguſtine and Hierom's works; and laſtly to the earneſt ſtudy of the holy ſcriptures, by which being, through God's mercy, informed of the truth, he willingly embraced it, and freely profeſſed it, and imparted it to others.

But the biſhops and friars could by no means endure that light which diſcovered their darkneſs, and therefore preſently raiſed up a perſecution againſt him; eſpecially David Beton, archbiſhop and cardinal, who cauſed him to be apprehended and caſt into priſon, purpoſing to have ſacrificed him in the flames. But it pleaſed God, by a ſpecial providence, that he was delivered, and therefore preſently fled to Berwick to the Engliſh, where he preached the truth of the goſpel with great fruit, and defended it againſt the popiſh party, ſo that his fame ſpread abroad exceedingly. He preached alſo at Newcaſtle, London, and in ſome other places; ſo that king Edward VI. taking notice of him, profered him a biſhopric, which he rejected, as having aliquid commune cum Antichriſto, ſomething in it common with Antichriſt.

King Edward being dead, the perſecution raiſed by queen Mary made him leave England, and go to Frankfort upon Maine, where, for a time, he preached the goſpel to the Engliſh congregation; but meeting with oppoſition there, both from papiſts and falſe brethren, he went to Geneva, where where alſo he preached to an Engliſh congregation, and was very intimate with Mr Calvin, continuing there ſome years.

Anno Chriſti 1559, and of his age 54, the nobility of Scotland, with ſome others, beginning the reformation of religion, ſent for him home; and at his coming to Edinburgh he was lodged in the houſe of that worthy man James Syme, where he began privately to inſtruct ſuch as reſorted to him, amongſt whom was the laird of Dun, David Forreſs, and Elizabeth Adamſon, the wife of James Baranne, burgeſs of Edinburgh, and ſome others.

After a while Mr Knox perceiving that divers, who willingly entertained the doctrine of Chriſt, yet made no ſcruple to go to maſs, and to communicate in the abuſed ſacraments after the papiſtical manner, he began as well in private conference, as in his miniſtry, to ſhew the impiety of the maſs, and the great danger of communicating with idolatry, wherewith ſome being terrified in conſcience, the buſineſs began to be agitated from one to another. Hereupon the laird of Dun invited Mr Knox to ſupper, where were preſent David Forreſs, Mr Robert Lockart, John Willock, and William Maitland; at which meeting the queſtion was propoſed and debated, and Mr Knox did ſo fully and learnedly anſwer whatſoever was objected againſt his doctrine, that Mr Maitland concluded in theſe words, 'I ſee very well that all our ſhifts will ſerve nothing before God, ſeeing that they ſtand us in ſo ſmall ſtead before men.

After theſe reaſonings the maſs began to be abhorred, and Mr Knox at the requeſt of the laird of Dun went with him to Dun, where he remained a month, preaching every day to the people, the principal men of that country reſorting to his miniſtry.

At the month's end he went to Calder, whither reſorted to him the lord Erſkine (afterwards earl of Argyle) lord James the prior of St Andrews (afterwards earl of Murray) where they heard, and ſo approved his miniſtry, that they wiſhed it had been more public.

A while after the earl of Glencairn ſent for Mr Knox to his place of Finlayſton, where after he had preached to them, he adminiſtered the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper to the earl, his lady, two of his ſons, and ſome others; and ſo he went back to Calder; to which place many reſorted to him from Edinburgh, and the country round about, not only to hear his doctrine, but alſo to partake of the holy ſacrament which before they had never received.

From thence he departed the ſecond time to the laird of Dun's, where he preached the goſpel with more liberty and boldneſs than he had before, and many of the gentlemen of the country after they had heard his doctrine, deſired alſo to be made partakers of the Lord's ſupper, and (thro' God's mercy) his miniſtry had ſuch an impreſſion on their hearts, that they preſently refuſed all ſociety with idolatry and bent themſelves to the uttermoſt of their powers to maintain the truth of Chriſt.

This ſo vexed the friers, that from all quarters they flocked to their biſhops to complain of Mr Knox, ſo that he was ſummoned to appear in the Black Fryars church in Edinburgh the fifteenth of May following, and accordingly he appeared; thither came alſo John Erſkine of Dun, with divers other gentlemen, which the biſhops taking notice of, durſt not proceed againſt him: inſomuch that Mr Knox the ſame day that he ſhould have appeared before them, preached in Edinburgh in a greater audience than ever he had before. The place where he preached was in the biſhop of Dunkellin's great lodging, in which place he preached ten days together, both forenoon and afternoon. Then did the earl of Glencairn ſolicit the earl Marſhall to hear Mr Knox, which he with his counſellor Drummond did, and ſo liked his doctrine, that he willed Mr Knox to write unto the queen regent ſomewhat that might move her to hear the word of God. This Mr Knox was willing to do, and wrote that which was afterwards printed, called, A Letter to the Queen Dowager, which was delivered by the earl of Glencairn into her own hands: the queen after ſhe had read the latter, delivered it to that proud prelate Bacon, biſhop of Glaſgow, ſaying in ſcorn, 'Pleaſe you my lord to read a paſquill?

Whilſt Mr Knox was thus occupied in Scotland, there came a letter to him from the Engliſh congregation which was ſettled at Geneva, anno Chriſti 1555, being ſeparated from the contentious and ſuperſtitious company at Frankfort, requiring him in the name of God, that he was their choſen paſtor, ſo he ſhould repair to them for their comfort.

Upon this he took his leave in every congregation where before he had preached, exhorting them to fervent prayer, frequent reading of the ſcriptures, and mutual conference, till God ſhould give them greater liberty; and then he ſent before him to Diep his mother in law Elizabeth Bows, and his wife; but himſelf by the importunity of Robert Campbell ſtaid a while in Scotland, going to the earl of Argyle, then in Campbell caſtle, where he taught certain days, the laird of Glenurquaire being one of his auditors, who entreated the earl of Argyle to retain him in Scotland: but he was reſolved upon his journey, and would by no means ſtay at that time; yet promiſing, that if the Lord bleſſed thoſe ſmall beginnings, whenſoever they pleaſed to command him, they ſhould find him obedient to their call.

Shortly after he paſſed over into Fance, and from thence went to Geneva, whereupon the biſhops of Scotland ſummoned him, and for non appearance, condemned him, and burnt his effigies at the croſs of Edinburgh. From which unjuſt ſentence, when Mr Knox heard of it, he ſent an appellation, which he directed to the nobility and commons of Scotland.

March the tenth, anno Chriſti, 1556, certain of the nobility of Scotland ſent this enſuing letter to Mr Knox at Geneva.

"Grace, mercy and peace for ſalvation.

"Dearly beloved in the Lord, the faithful that are of your acquaintance in theſe parts (thanks be to God) are ſtedfaſt in the belief wherein you left them, and have a godly thirſt and deſire from day to day to enjoy your preſence again, which if God ſo move your heart, and give you life, we deſire you in the name of the Lord that you return to us again into this place, where you ſhall find all faithful that you left behind you; who will not only be glad to hear your doctrine, but ready to jeopard their eſtates for the ſetting forth of the glory of God, as he will permit time. And albeit the magiſtrates of this country be as yet but in the ſtate you left them; yet at the writing hereof we have no experience of any more cruelty uſed than was before; but rather believe that God will augment his flock, becauſe we ſee daily the friars (enemies to Chriſt's goſpel) in leſs eſtimation both with the queen's grace and the reſt of the nobility of the realm. This in few words is the mind of the faithful here preſent, and of others abſent The reſt of our minds this faithful meſſenger will ſhew you, when he comes to you. Fare you well in the Lord.

Mr Knox upon the receipt of this letter adviſed with Mr Calvin, and other miniſters, who upon mature deliberation, told him that he could not refuſe this call, unleſs he would ſhew himſelf rebellious againſt God, and unmerciful to his country: whereupon he returned anſwer, that he would come to them ſo ſoon as he could ſettle the affairs of that dear flock that was committed to his charge.

Shortly after he began his journey, and arrived in Scotland that very day whereon the biſhops ended their provincial council; and hearing that the brethren were met at Dundee, he went to them, and earneſtly requeſted that he and his brethren might join together to make a confeſſion of their faith; which being aſſented to, he went to St. Johnſton to them, where alſo he preached to to the people; but preſently came a ſummons that the preachers ſhould appear before the queen regent at Stirling, which being known abroad, the proteſtants repaired in a peaceable manner to St. Johnſton to accompany their preachers to the queen; and leſt ſuch a multitude ſhould affright her, the laird of Dun, a zealous, godly and prudent man, went before to Stirling, to acquaint the queen that the cauſe of their meeting was only with their preachers to give in a confeſſion of their faith, and to aſſiſt them in their juſt defence:

The queen very craftily ſolicited him to ſtay the multitude,

tude, and the preachers alſo, promiſing to take ſome good order about their affairs; yet when the preachers appeared not upon the day appointed, ſhe put them to the Horn, prohibiting all men upon pain of rebellion, to aſſiſt, comfort, relieve or receive any of them; which treacherous dealing of hers ſo inflamed the multitude, that neither the exhortations of the preachers, nor the command of the magiſtrates could reſtrain them, but that they pulled down the images, and all other monuments of idolatry in St Johnſton. This being told the queen, ſhe was ſo much enraged at it, that ſhe vowed to deſtroy man, woman, and child in that place, then utterly to burn the town, and to ſow it with ſalt for a perpetual deſolation.

The proteſtant congregation hearing hereof, preſently wrote a letter to the queen, and cauſed it to be laid on her cuſhion where ſhe ſat at maſs, wherein they declared, that except ſhe moderated her wrath, and ſtayed her intended cruelty, they ſhould be compelled to take the ſword in their juſt defence againſt all that ſhould purſue them for matters of religion, and for their conſcience ſake, which ought not to be ſubject to any mortal creature, farther than God's word doth command, &c. They further requeſted that ſhe would permit them to live in that peace and liberty which Chriſt had purchaſed for them by his blood; but that they might have his word truly preached, and the holy ſacraments rightly adminiſtered to them, for that they had rather expoſe their bodies to a thouſand deaths, than to hazard their ſouls to perpetual damnation by denying Chriſt, and his manifeſt truth.

They wrote alſo another letter to the nobility of Scotland, which coming abroad, the brethren in Cunningham and Kile met together at the church of Craggy, where Alexander earl of Glencairn, ſaid to them, 'Let every man do as his conſcience ſhall direct him, I will by God's grace ſee my brethren at St. Johnſton, yea though never a man will go along with me, though I have but a pike on my ſhoulder; for I had rather die with that company, than live after them.' This ſpeech ſo encouraged the reſt, that they all reſolved to go forward.

In the mean time the queen ſent her French forces, and the biſhops and prieſts their bands againſt St. Johnſton; whereupon the brethren repaired thither from all quarters for their relief; which the queen hearing of, ſent the earl of Argyle, and the prior of St. Andrews to them to know the cauſe of that great meeting? They anſwered that it was only to reſiſt the cruel tyranny decreed againſt them, and to protect the town from ruin.

The lords anſwered, that they were far otherwiſe informed.

Then Mr. Knox ſpake thus unto them: 'The preſent troubles (honourable lords) ought to move the hearts of all the true ſervants of God, and ſuch as bear any true love to their country, and countrymen, deeply to conſider what will be the end of this intended tyranny. The rage of Satan ſeeks the deſtruction of all thoſe in this realm that profeſs the name of Chriſt. Therefore I moſt humbly require you, my lords, in my name to tell the queen, that we, whom ſhe in her blind rage doth perſecute, are faithful ſervants to God, and obedient ſubjects to the authority of the realm, whereas that religion which ſhe maintains by fire, and ſword, is not the religion of Jeſus Chriſt, but expreſsly contrary to the ſame, a ſuperſtition deviſed by man's brain, which I offer myſelf to prove againſt all men in Scotland which will maintain the contrary, God's word being admitted for a judge. Tell her alſo from me, that this her enterprize ſhall not proſperouſly ſucceed in the end, and that herein ſhe fights againſt God.'

The lords promiſed to deliver his meſſage; yet did the queen ſtraightway ſend her herald to them, to command them preſently to depart the town upon pain of treaſon. But when ſhe perceived their number to encreaſe, and their reſolutions, fearing the event of a battle, ſhe upon a parly and large promiſes, prevailed with them to depart home. But before their departure, Mr Knox preached a ſermon, wherein he exhorted them to conſtancy, adding, 'I am perſuaded that this promiſe ſhall be no longer kept, than till the queen and her Frenchmen can get the upper hand.' Which ſhortly after fell out accordingly; but when ſhe was entered St Johnſton, ſhe, contrary to promiſe, garriſoned it, ſaying, 'That ſhe was not bound to keep promiſe with heretics.' This was ſo diſtaſteful to the earl of Argyle and the prior of St Andrews, that they forſook the queen, and went towards St Andrews, ſending to the laird of Dun and ſome others to meet them there, which accordingly they performed, taking Mr Knox along with them, who in the way preached at Carrel one day, in Anſtruther the ſecond, intending the third day to preach at St Andrews.

The biſhop of St Andrews hearing thereof, preſently raiſed one hundred ſpearmen, and went thither on the Saturday, whereas the lords had none but their houſhold ſervants about them; and at the ſame time the queen and her Frenchmen lay at Falkland, twelve miles from St Andrews. The biſhop ſent word to the lords, that if John Knox offered to preach the next day, he ſhould be ſaluted with a dozen of caeliivrs, whereof the moſt part ſhould light on his noſe. The lords after long deliberation ſent for Mr. Knox, to hear his opinion herein; yet withal adviſed him to forbear for his own ſafety, and not to preach that day in contempt of the biſhop.

To which Mr Knox anſwered, 'God is my witneſs that I never preached Chriſt Jeſus in contempt of any man, neither do I now intend to preſent myſelf in that place with reſpect to my own commodity, or for the hurt of any creature; but to forbear preaching to-morrow, except I be violently withholden, I cannot out of conſcience conſent to it: for in this town and church God was pleaſed firſt to call me to the honour and office of a preacher, from which I was driven by the tyranny of the French, and procurement of the biſhop, as ye all know well enough. How long I continued priſoner, what torments I ſuſtained in the French gallies, and what were the ſobs of my heart is now no time to relate: this only I cannot conceal, which many heard me ſpeak when my body was far from Scotland, that I certainly hoped in open audience to preach in St. Andrews before I departed this life. And therefore, my lords, ſaith he, ſeeing God above the expectation of many hath brought me to this place where firſt I was called to the office of a preacher, and from which I was moſt unjuſtly removed, I beſeech your honours not to hinder me from preſenting myſelf to my brethren: and as for the fear of danger that may come to me thereby, let no man be ſolicitous; for my life is in the cuſtody of him whoſe glory I ſeek, and therefore I cannot ſo fear their boaſts and tyranny, as thereby to be deterred from doing my duty when God of his mercy offereth me ſuch an occaſion: I deſire the hand and weapon of no man to defend me, only I crave audience; which if it be denied me here at this time, I muſt ſeek further where I may have it.'

Upon this ſpeech the lords were fully content that he ſhould ſupply the place, which accordingly he did without interruption; and his ſermon ſo wrought upon the magiſtrates and people, that preſently after ſermon they removed all the monuments of ſuperſtition and idolatry out of that church. The biſhop advertiſed hereof, preſently departed to the queen, who with her French ſoldiers lay within twelve miles; and by his grievous complaints did ſo far incenſe her, that it was reſolved without delay to aſſault St Andrews and the two lords, who were but ſlenderly accompanied: and accordingly order was given immediately to provide quarters for the queen and her army at Couper, ſix miles from St Andrews.

The lords being informed hereof, reſolved to meet them before they came to Cowper, and withal gave ſpeedy advertiſement to all the brethren to repair towards them with all poſſible expedition; which alſo they did with ſuch diligence, that God's wonderful work appeared therein: for when at night the lords came to Cowper; there were not a hundred horſe, and ſome few foot; and before the next day at noon, their number was above three thouſand; and that number did ſo continually encreaſe, as if men had rained from the clouds: but the enemies being not informed hereof, aſſured themſelves of the victory, and therefore haſted away in the night; yet when by their ſcouts they were informed of the number and order of the proteſtants who were ready to receive them, their hearts failed, and interceſſors were ſent to make an agreement, and a truce was taken for eight days, till an agreement might be finiſhed.

But all this was done but in policy by the queen, that ſhe ſhe might gain time to draw off her ordnance, and to make a handſome retreat over the water of Forth. The proteſtants finding themſelves thus deluded, took counſel now they were together, to free St Johnſton from the French garriſon, that their exiled brethren might return home, and accordingly they ſent a trumpet to ſummon the town; but the captains anſwered, that they would keep and defend it according to their promiſe made to the queen: yet as ſoon as they were beſieged, they required a truce for twelve hours, at the end whereof they delivered it up to the lords; and the ſame day being Sabbath, thanks were publickly returned unto God, and preſently the monuments of idolatry were demoliſhed, and the rude multitude ſet fire to the abbey, though Mr Knox would have prevented it. A poor old woman ſeeing the fire rage ſo furiouſly, and run ſo ſwiftly, ſaid I ſee that God's judgments are juſt, and no man is able to ſave where he will deſtroy; ever ſince my remembrance this place hath been nothing but a den of whoremongers: it is incredible to believe how many wives have been adulterated, and virgins deflowred by thoſe filthy beaſts, and eſpecially by that wicked man called the biſhop. If all men knew as much as I, they would praiſe God for this deſtruction.

The queen hearing of theſe proceedings, fearing what might follow, reſolved to ſend ſome French bands to Stirling, to hinder their coming over the Forth; which the lords having intelligence of, privately in the night with great expedition poſſeſſed themſelves of the town before the French came, whereupon the queen and her party preſently left Edinburgh, and went to Dunbar. Then did the proteſtants march to Edinburgh, where alſo the monuments of idolatry were demoliſhed by the rude multitude. Coming thither they wrote to the queen deſiring that they might enjoy liberty of their conſciences; That Jeſus Chriſt might be truly preached, and the ſacraments duly adminiſtered, and that ſcandalous and unable miniſters might be removed; but ſhe returning no anſwer, the proteſtants returned home, the lords only ſtaying, who were now called, The lords of the congregation.

In the mean time the French being informed hereof, and preſuming that they ſhould meet with no reſiſtance, haſtened to Edinburgh; which the lords hearing, called upon God for aſſiſtance in that ſtrait. It is true, they might have retired themſelves, but then they had expoſed the brethren of Edinburgh to danger, and therefore they rather reſolved to hazard the uttermoſt extremity.

The French firſt marched to Leith, and as the lords were advancing for their aſſiſtance, the townſmen ſurrendered the town to the French, without making any reſiſtance; whereupon the lords retreated to Cragingate, there to oppoſe the enemy.

Divers mediators paſſed to and fro in the mean time to have ſettled peace, and at laſt ſundry articles were agreed upon, and the duke of Caſtleherald, and the earl of Huntley promiſed the lords, that if the queen brake any one of her articles, they would forſake her party, and join with them. The next day the lords left Edinburgh, and when it was judged dangerous for Mr Knox ſtill to abide miniſter at Edinburgh, the brethren requeſted Mr John Willock to remain with them, to which he gladly aſſented, deſiring to make it appear, that he preferred the comfort of the brethren before his own life.

Shortly after open war brake forth between the queen regent, and the proteſtants; and the queen having more French forces, with money, and ordnance ſent her, the Scotiſh nobility were fain to ſend to queen Elizabeth for aid, and till it came, to retire themſelves towards the Highlands for their ſafety.

In the mean time the queen Regent with her French men went from place to place, plundering, ſpoiling, and making havock of all without reſiſtance; which ſo puffed her up with pride, that ſhe boaſtingly ſaid? where is now John Knox his God? my God is now ſtronger than his, yea, even in Fife. But her brags laſted not long: for the earl of Arran, and the lord James, went to Dyſert, having not above five hundred horſe, and a hundred foot; whereas the French were above four thouſand, beſides Scots as adhered to them; and yet the proteſtants ſkirmiſhed daily with them, ſometimes from morning till night, and ever went away with the better, killing four for one; which continued for one and twenty days together, during all which time they never put off either clothes or boots.

And at the end of that time came into Edinburgh Frith a fleet of the Engliſh to aſſiſt the proteſtants, which filled their hearts with joy, and the French with rage and madneſs. Thither came alſo ſome forces by land under the command of lord Grey: and after an agreement made with the Scotiſh lords, ſome of the Engliſh and Scots attempted to take Leith by ſtorm, and in a cruel conflict ſome of them gat upon the walls, but the ſcaling ladders proving too ſhort, they were not ſeconded by their fellows and ſo after divers hours fight were forced to retire, which the queen regent beholding from Edinburgh caſtle walls, burſt out into a great laughter, ſaying, Now will I go to maſs and praiſe God for that which mine eyes have ſeen. And when the French had ſtripped the ſlain, and laid their naked bodies along their walls, the queen looking on them ſaid, Yonder are the faireſt tapeſtries that ever mine eyes beheld; I would that the whole fields which are betwixt Leith and this place were all ſtrewed with the ſame ſtuff. But this joy laſted not long; for a fire kindling in Leith, many houſes, and much of their proviſion was conſumed thereby; whereupon the king of France ſent ambaſſadors to queen Elizabeth to conclude a peace, which was effected, and the Engliſh and French armies were drawn out of Scotland; to the great joy of that nation, inſomuch that thankſgivings for their great deliverance by the help of the Engliſh were inſerted into their liturgy. And preſently after ſome commiſſioners of the Scottiſh nobility were appointed to ſettle miniſters in their places, by whom Mr Knox was ſettled at Edinburgh, where he preached many excellent ſermons.

Anno Chriſti 1566. The earl of Murray being ſlain on the Saturday, Knox preaching at Edinburgh the next day, amongſt the papers given in of thoſe that deſired the prayers of the church, he found one with theſe words, Take up the man whom he accounted another God. At the end of his ſermon he bemoaned the loſs which the church and ſtate had by the death of that virtuous man, adding further, 'There is one in this company that makes this horrible murder the ſubject of his mirth, for which all good men ſhould be ſorry, but I tell him he ſhall die where there ſhall be none to lament him. The man that had written thoſe words was one Thomas Matellan, a young man of excellent parts, but bearing ſmall affection to the earl of Murray: he hearing this commination of John Knox, went home to his ſiſter and ſaid, That John Knox was raving, to ſpeak of he knew not whom. His ſiſter replied with tears, If you had taken my advice, you had not written thoſe words; ſaying further, That none of John Knox his threatenings fell to the ground without effect; and to indeed this came to paſs; for ſhortly after this gentleman going to travel, died in Italy, having none to aſſiſt, much leſs to lament him.

Towards Mr Knox his latter end, his body became very infirm, and his voice ſo weak, that people could not hear him in the ordinary place, wherefore he choſe another place wherein he preached upon the hiſtory of Chriſt's paſſion, with which, he ſaid, It was his deſire to cloſe his miniſtry. Finding his end near, he importuned the council of the city to provide themſelves a worthy man to ſucceed in his place: Mr James Lawſon profeſſor in Aberdeen was the man pitched upon, and commiſſioners were ſent from the church of Edinburgh, to requeſt him to accept of the place. Mr John Knox alſo ſubſcribed that requeſt, adding, Accelera mi frater, alioqui ſero venies: Haſte my brother, otherwiſe you will come too late: this made Mr Lawſon to haſten his journey, and when he was come, he preached twice to the good liking of the people, whereupon order was taken by the rulers of the church for his admiſſion, at which time John Knox would needs preach, though very weak, which alſo he performed with ſuch fervency of ſpirit, that he was never before heard to preach with ſuch great power, or more content to the hearers. In the end of his ſermon he called God to witneſs, That he had walked in a good conſcience with them, not ſeeking to pleaſe men, nor ſerving either his own, or other mens affections, but in all ſincerity and truth had preached the goſpel of Chriſt. He exhorted them in moſt grave and pithy words to ſtand faſt in the faith they had received; and ſo having prayed zealouſly for God's bleſſing upon them, and the multiplying of God's ſpirit upon their new paſtor, he gave them his laſt forewel.

Being conveyed to his lodging, that afternoon he was forced to betake himſelf to his bed; and was viſited by all ſorts of perſons in his ſickneſs, to whom he ſpake moſt comfortably: amongſt others the earl of Morton came to ſee him, to whom he ſaid, 'My lord, God hath given you many bleſſings, wiſdom, honour, nobility, riches, many good and great friends, and he is now about to prefer you to the government of the realm (the earl of Marr, the late regent, being newly dead.) In his name I charge you, uſe theſe bleſſings better than formerly you have done, ſeeking firſt the glory of God, the furtherance of his goſpel, the maintainance of his church, and the miniſtry, and then be careful of the king to procure his good, and the welfare of the realm. If you do thus, God will be with you, and honour you: if otherwiſe, he will deprive you of all theſe benefits, and your end ſhall be ſhame and ignominy.' Theſe ſpeeches the earl called to mind about nine years after, at the time of his execution, ſaying, That he had found John Knox to be a prophet.

A day or two before Knox's death, he ſent for Mr David Lindſey, Mr Lawſon, and the elders and deacons of the church, to whom he ſaid, the time is approaching, which I have long thirſted for, wherein I ſhall be releaſed from all my cares, and be with my Saviour Chriſt for ever. And now God is my witneſs whom I have ſerved with my ſpirit in the goſpel of his ſon, that I have taught nothing but the true, and ſincere word of God; and that the end that I propoſed in my miniſtry was, To inſtruct the ignorant, to confirm the weak, to comfort their conſciences who were humbled under the ſenſe of their ſins, and born down with the threatenings of God's judgments. I am not ignorant that many have, and do blame my too great rigour, and ſeverity; but God knoweth that in my heart I never hated thoſe againſt whom I thundered God's judgments; I did only hate their ſins, and laboured according to my power to gain them to Chriſt. That I did forbear none of what condition ſoever, I did it out of the fear of my God, who hath placed me in the function of his miniſtry, and I know will bring me to an account. Now brethren for yourſelves, I have no more to ſay, but to warn you that you take heed of the flock over which God hath placed you overſeers, which he hath redeemed by the blood of his only begotten Son. And you Mr Lawſon fight a good fight, do the work of the Lord with courage, and with a willing mind, and God from heaven bleſs you and the church whereof you have the charge: againſt it (ſo long as it continues in the doctrine of the truth) the gates of hell ſhall not prevail. Having thus ſpoken, and the elders and deacons being diſmiſſed, he called the two preachers to him and ſaid There is one thing that grieveth me exceedingly, you have ſometimes ſeen the courage and conſtancy of the laird of Grange in the cauſe of God; and now that unhappy man is caſting himſelf away; I pray you go to him from me, and tell him, That unleſs he forſake that wicked courſe that he is in, the rock wherein he confideth ſhall not defend him, nor the carnal wiſdom of that man be counted half a god (which was young Lethington) ſhall yield him help; but he ſhall be ſhamefully pulled out of that neſt, and his carcaſe hung before the ſun (meaning the caſtle, which he kept againſt the king's authority) for his ſoul it is dear to me, and if it were poſſible, I would fain have him ſaved. Accordingly they went to him, conferred with him, but could by no means divert him from his courſe; but as Knox had foretold, ſo the year after the caſtle was taken, and his body was publicly there hanged before the ſun: yet at his death he did expreſs ſerious repentance.

The next day Mr Knox gave order for the making of his coffin, continuing all the day (as he did alſo through all his ſickneſs) in fervent prayer, crying, Come Lord Jeſus, ſweet Jeſus into thy hands I commend my ſpirit. Being aſked whether his pains were great? He anſwered, That he did not eſteem that a pain which would be to him the end of all troubles, and the beginning of eternal joys. Oft after ſome meditation he uſed to ſay, Oh ſerve the Lord in fear, and death ſhall not be troubleſome to you; bleſſed is the death of thoſe that have part in the death of Jeſus.

The night before his death, he ſlept ſome hours with great unquietneſs, often ſighing and groaning, whereupon when he awaked, the ſtanders by aſked him how he did, and what it was that made him mourn ſo heavily? To whom he anſwered, In my life I have been aſſaulted with temptations from Satan, and he hath oft caſt my ſins into my teeth to drive me to deſpair, yet God gave me ſtrength to overcome all his temptations: but now the ſubtile ſerpent takes another courſe, and ſeeks to perſwade me, that all my labours in the miniſtry, and the fidelity that I have ſhewed in that ſervice hath merited heaven and immortality: but bleſſed be God that brought to my mind theſe ſcriptures, What haſt thou that thou haſt not received? And, Not I, but the grace of God in me, with which he is gone away aſhamed and ſhall not return: and now I am ſure that my battle is at an end, and that without pain of body, or trouble of ſpirit, I ſhall ſhortly change this mortal, and miſerable life with that happy and immortal life that ſhall never have an end. After which one praying by his bed, having made an end, aſked him; if he heard the prayer? yea, ſaid he and would to God that all preſent had heard it with ſuch an ear and heart as I have done: adding, Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit: with which words, without any motion of hands or feet, as one falling aſleep rather than dying, he ended his life.

Never was man more obſervant of the truth and juſt authority of the church rules according to the word of God, and the practice of the pureſt primitive times: he always preſſed due obedience from the people to the faithful paſtors, and elders of the church. He died anno Chriſti 1572. and of his age 62. men of all ranks were preſent at his burial: the earl of Morton, when the corps was put into the ground, ſaid, here lies the body of him who in his life time never feared the face of any man.

He was a man no leſs learned than endued with virtue; a conſtant preacher of the truth, and a valiant defender of the ſame through his whole life.

His zeal, learning, and courage, did notably appear in this example. Anno Chriſti 1550. he was called before Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, and his doctors to give an account of his opinion about the maſs, where preaching before them, he did ſo ſharply tax their idolatries, and blaſphemies, and by ſuch ſolid arguments confute the ſame, that his adverſaries were ſilenced, and had not wherewithal to reply againſt him.

The Life of GALEACIUS CARACCIOLUS, Marquiſs of Vico who died, anno Chriſti, 1592.

GALEACIUS Caracciolus was born at Naples, anno Chriſti, 1517. His father's name was Calantonio deſcended of the ancient, and noble family of the Caracciolis of Capua: his mother was deſcended of the noble family of the Caraffi, whoſe brother was afterwards pope Paul IV. His father was very careful of his education in his youth, and then being well known to, and in favour with the emperor Charles V. he requeſted him to entertain this his ſon into his ſervice, which the emperor willingly did, and liked him ſo well, that ſhortly after he made him his gentleman ſewer; in which place, and office he demeaned himſelf ſo well, that he won the favour of the nobility, and reſt of the court, and grew to be of ſpecial account with the emperor himſelf: and indeed few were to be compared with him for innocency of life, elegancy of manners, ſound judgment, and knowlege of many things: his father alſo being deſirous to continue his name, and advance his houſe, provided for him a wife, a virgin of noble birth, called Victoria, daughter to the duke of Nuceria, with whom he had in portion 6500l. his his father's eſtate being worth 5000 l. per annum. By this wife he had ſix children, four ſons and two daughters.

But God intending to advance him to an higher dignity than that to which he was born, was pleaſed, in mercy, by degrees to reveal himſelf and his truth to him. The firſt beginning of it was this: There lived about this time in Naples, a noble Spaniard, called John Waldeſius, who having got ſome knowlege of the truth of the goſpel, eſpecially in the doctrine of juſtification, he uſed often to confer with, and inſtruct divers other noblemen, his companions and familiar friends, in points of religion, confuting the falſe opinion of our inherent juſtification, and merit of good works, and thereby deteſting the vanity and fondneſs of ſome popiſh points, by which means (the Lord bleſſing his labours) many of theſe noblemen began to creep out of darkneſs, and to diſcern the truth, amongſt whom was one John Francis Cæſarta, a kinſman to Galeacius: he diſcourſing often with Galeacius, began to convince him of the vanity of wordly privileges; of the true means of our juſtification; of the excellency and power of God's word, and of the folly of moſt of the popiſh ſuperſtitions. Now Galeacius much eſteemed this kinſman, yet the world hung ſo heavy upon him, that for the preſent theſe things ſeemed to make but ſmall impreſſion upon his ſpirit.

At this time Peter Martyr was a public preacher, and reader at Naples, whoſe holy life, and ſweet copious teaching, made him very famous. Hereupon, Galeacius was once content, at Cæſarta's motion, to go and hear his ſermon; yet, not ſo much out of a deſire to learn, as tickled with a curious humour to hear ſo famous and learned a man. Peter Martyr, at this time, was ſhewing out of 1 Corinthians, the weakneſs and deceitfulneſs of the judgment of man's reaſon in ſpiritual things, and the power, and efficacy of God's word in thoſe men in whom the Lord works by his Spirit, which he illuſtrated by this compariſon:

If a man ſhould ſee men and women dancing together afar off, and hear no inſtrument, he would judge them mad or fooliſh; but if he come near and hear the muſic, and mark their meaſures, &c. he will then not only delight to ſee them, but feel a deſire in himſelf to bear them company: Even ſo, many men, when they behold in others a ſudden and great change of their looks, apparel, behaviour, and whole courſe of life, at firſt he will impute it to melancholy, or ſome fooliſh humour; but if he look nearer, and begin to hear, and perceive the ſweet harmony and conſent of God's ſpirit and word in them, then they change their opinion, and begin, firſt, to like them, and that alteration in them; and afterwards feel in themſelves a deſire to imitate, and be of the number of ſuch men, as forſaking the world's vanity, walk according to the rule of the goſpel, that they may come to true and ſound ſanctification.

This compariſon, by the wonderful power and efficacy of God's ſpirit, wrought wonderfully in Galeacius, (as he often confeſt to his friends) that from that hour he reſolved to forſake his former pleaſures and practices, and to ſet himſelf to ſeek out true happineſs; and, for that end, he read the ſcriptures every day, as the fountain whence it muſt be drawn, and wherein the way to heaven was diſcovered. He choſe ſuch company, by whoſe life and conference he might be edified in the true religion, and in his moſt holy faith.

But this great alteration being obſerved in Naples, his old companions were much amazed at it: ſome judged it a melancholy paſſion; others eſteemed it plain folly, and feared that he would become ſimple and doting. But ſuch as feared God, as they wondered much to ſee ſo great a change in ſo great a man, ſo they exceedingly rejoiced to ſee it, and praiſed the Lord in his behalf. But the more courageouſly this worthy ſervant of Chriſt went on in the ways of godlineſs, the more the devil raged againſt him by his temptations, endeavouring thereby to ſtop his courſe; or, if it were poſſible, to drive him back again, that 'having begun in the ſpirit, he might end in the fleſh.' Firſt, his zealous profeſſion procured him a great number of mocks, and made him the ſubject of moſt vile ſlanders: many took occaſion thereby extremely to hate him; his father was much diſpleaſed and vexed, ſeeing how the honour and advancement of his houſe was like to be eclipſed thereby, and therefore he often and ſharply chid him, charged him, with his fatherly authority, to put away his melancholy conceits: this much grieved him, being always very ſubmiſſive and obedient to his parents. His wife Victoria alſo (though a wife, kind, and dutiful wife) yet would ſhe by no means yield to his motion, for the change of her religion, fearing infamy and reproach thereby; and therefore ſhe was always ſoliciting of him, with complaints, tears, kind entreaties, and all other ways that a wife could uſe to her huſband.

It was alſo a great temptation, that almoſt all the nobility in and about Naples, being of kin, and familiar acquaintance with him, oft reſorted to him, to draw him forth to his old ſports and pleaſures. And his office ſometimes calling him to the court, it was a great trouble to him, for there he heard of any thing rather than of religion; not a word of God's word, but all of pleaſures, honours, &c. or how they might rid out of the way the forſakers of popery, and profeſſors of the true faith; yet Satan ſet upon him by a more dangerous temptation, to withdraw him from the truth; for at that time Italy was much peſtered with the Arians and Anabaptiſts, who, with glorious ſhews deceived all the ſimple: theſe men ſet upon Galeacius, ſeeking by all means to entangle him in their errors and blaſphemous fancies; but God's goodneſs appeared wonderfully, enabling him, newly entered into the ſchool of Chriſtian religion, and as yet little ſtudied in the ſcriptures, to reſiſt the cunning ſnares of theſe diſſembling heretics, many of them being grounded ſcholars, and thoroughly ſtudied in the ſcriptures; yet he, by the ſincere ſimplicity of God's truth, and aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt, not only diſcerned the fondneſs of their opinions, but untied the knots, and brake the ſnares, and mightily confuted them; yea, through God's mercy, being often in their meetings, he was ſtrongly confirmed in the truth by hearing and ſeeing of them. Yet he met with a more dangerous temptation, for the Waldeſians, with whom he moſt converſed, though they were right in ſome points of religion about juſtification, &c. and diſliked ſome abuſes in popery, yet they frequented the popiſh churches, heard their maſſes, and were preſent at their vile idolatries, and this they did to avoid perſecution, and this was a dangerous example to Galeacius; but, through the good providence of God, his office calling him into Germany, to the emperor's court, at Straſburgh he met with his old friend Peter Martyr, (who was then divinity profeſſor there) by whom he learned, that the knowledge of the truth of juſtification was not ſufficient to ſalvation, if in the meantime a man defiled himſelf with idolatry, which the ſcripture calls ſpiritual whoredom: from him he received many other comfortable inſtructions, and thereby was much confirmed in the truth. And ſo returning to Naples, he declared his judgment to the Waldeſians, concerning the ſhunning of idolatry, whereupon they preſently forſook him, being unwilling to hear of that doctrine which would expoſe them to all manner of ſufferings. But God, of his infinite mercy, wrought in him ſuch heroical reſolutions, that ſeeing his friends forſook him, and he had no hope of ſeeing a reformation in Naples, he reſolved to forſake his country, and ſeek for Chriſt and his religion whereſoever he might find them; and that he would rather forſake father, wife, children, goods, honours, &c. to win Chriſt, than to enjoy them all, and want Chriſt Jeſus. Yet herein he met with many grievous combats; for ſo oft as he looked upon his aged father, that dearly loved him, and whom he again reſpected with all duty and reverence, ſo oft he was ſtricken to the heart with unſpeakable grief to think of leaving of him; and ſuch like reaſonings he had in his heart: What! muſt I needs forſake my loving father, or elſe I cannot have God my Father? And muſt I needs fail in my duty to him, if I perform my duty to God? Shall I hereby bring his hoary hairs with ſorrow to the grave? Shall I bring an obloquy upon him and my whole kindred? Shall I be the cauſe of his death, that would (if need were) redeem my life with his own death? Yet I muſt rather hazard his life, than caſt my own poor ſoul with horror into hell.

And no leſs was he grieved in reſpect of his noble wife, having no hope that ſhe would renounce popery, and go with with him She was in the prime of her youth; a lady of great birth, fair, wife, and modeſt; but her love and loyalty to him paſſed all, which filled him with theſe reaſonings: Shall I thus ſuddenly leave my dear wife, the only joy of my heart in this world, my companion, the augmenter of my joy, and leſſener of my woe? Shall I thus leave her for ever? Shall I deprive myſelf of her, and thereby of all others alſo, and of all comfort of a conjugal life, and married eſtate? Alas! poor lady, what will become of her, and her little ones, when I am gone? What will ſhe do but weep, and wail, and pine away with grief? Yet muſt I, for Chriſt's ſake, reſolve to leave her, and all, to follow Chriſt.

Whilſt he meditated on theſe things, he thought he heard and ſaw his wife ſighing, and ſobbing, and weeping and howling, and running after him, ſaying, Ah! my dear lord, and ſweet huſband, whither will you go? And will you leave me, poor woman, comfortleſs and ſuccourleſs? What can honours, riches, gold, ſilver, jewels, friends, &c. do, when I want you? What joy can I take in my children without you? but rather my grief to be doubled to look on them? How can any be perſuaded that you care for me, or them? Is this the love you have ſo often boaſted of? &c.

Theſe thoughts tormented him the more, becauſe they boiled in his heart, and he durſt impart them to none, leſt they ſhould have hindered his departure: yet the thoughts about his children extremely augmented his grief; they were goodly and towardly children, worthy ſuch noble parents; they were young, and therefore not apprehenſive what it was to want a father. He loved them tenderly: when his wife the lady did ſometimes put into his arms the youngeſt to play with, how did it cut him to the heart? and what ado had he to contain from floods of tears? how did he in himſelf thus reaſon? And ſhall I preſently leave theſe ſweet babes to the wide and wicked world, as though they had never been my children? to be a father is a comfort; but a father of no children, and yet to have children, is a miſery? And you, poor orphans, what will become of you when I am gone? your hap is hard to be fatherleſs, your father yet living. What can your great birth now help you? by my departure you ſhall loſe all, honour, living, dignity, &c. yea, hereby you ſhall be expoſed to infamy, reproach, ſlander, &c. that you ſhall curſe the time that ever you had me for your father.

Many other were the temptations that he conflicted withal, though inferior to theſe; as leaving the company of ſo many noblemen, his kindred and acquaintance; to loſe his honourable office at court; to leave for ever his native ſoil, the fruitful Italy; to deprive himſelf and poſterity of the noble title of a marqueſdom; to undertake a long and tedious journey; to caſt himſelf into exile, poverty, ſhame, and other miſeries; to leave ſo brave a ſeat, the garden and orchard whereof exceeded all others in Italy, to ſee which, there daily reſorted many ſtrangers out of all parts: yet he reſolved, through God's grace, to leave all and follow Chriſt; ſaying thus unto himſelf: 'Thou, Lord, art he that dreweſt me out of the miſty darkneſs of ignorance, enlightening my mind with thy Holy Spirit, and with the heavenly knowledge of thy truth: thou haſt made known to me the way of ſalvation, and haſt ranſomed me to thyſelf, by the blood of thy Son. Now, therefore, Holy Father, I am only thine, conſecrated to thy glory, and therefore I will follow thee, and obey thee, and walk in thy ways whitherſoever thou ſhalt be pleaſed to call me. Not my father, wife, children, honours, lands, riches, nor all my delicacies and pleaſures, ſhall hold me one hour from following thee. I deny myſelf, and I deny this whole world for thee, and thy ſake. O Lord, thou knoweſt how many enemies compaſs me; how many hinderances and temptations lie in my way, &c. O Lord, have mercy upon me, and deliver my ſoul, &c. O bleſſed and happy theſe miſeries that pull me out of the world's vanities, and ſink of ſins, that I may be made heir of everlaſting glory. Welcome, therefore, the croſs of Chriſt; I will take it up, O Lord, and will follow thee.'

According to this holy reſolution, making his mind known only to a few of his choice friends, of whoſe piety he hoped well, he wrought ſo much upon them, that they vowed to accompany him in his voluntary exile; yet, ſee the deceitfulneſs of man's heart, moſt of theſe, when they came to the borders of Italy, and began ſeriouſly to conſider what they left behind them, and what they went to, they firſt (with Lot's wife) began to look back, and afterwards went back; turning again to the vomit of their pleaſures.

But, oh! the unſearchableneſs of God's judgments! theſe ungrateful perſons, refuſing ſo great a mercy offered them, the Lord purſued with a juſt revenge; for purpoſing to ſerve God in their pleaſures, in the midſt of popery, they were taken by the inquiſition, forced publicly to recant, and abjure their religion; and ſo became the ſubject of miſery and infamy, and were equally odious to both parties: yet their apoſtaſy was a great diſcouragement to Galeacius, ſeeing himſelf forſaken of thoſe by whoſe ſociety he hoped to have enjoyed much comfort in a ſtrange country.

Notwithſtanding all this he prepared for his departure; and finding his opportunity, he concealed his purpoſe, leſt the authority of his father might have diverted him: and ſo, getting ſome thouſand merks which his mother had left him, on the 20th of March, anno 1551, and of his age 34, he departed from Naples as if he intended for the emperor's court, whither indeed he went, attending his office for a ſhort time; and then, bidding adieu to the court, and all worldly pleaſures, he went ſtraight to Geneva, where he arrived in ſafety, through God's mercy, and with a joyful heart.

In that city, though there was an Italian church, yet met he with none of his acquaintance but one, a nobleman of Stena, and now a preacher to the Italian congregation. Thus, bleſſing God for freeing him from the antichriſtian yoke, and bringing of him where he might ſafely profeſs his name, with a free conſcience. He aſſociated himſelf with Mr Calvin, and ſubmitted to his inſtruction, who finding his ſincerity, meekneſs, &c. moſt kindly entertained him into his fellowſhip: and this their mutual love was ſo firmly grounded, that it continued to their lives end. Mr Calvin ſhews how he honoured and eſteemed him, by his epiſtle to him, wherein he dedicates to him his commentary upon the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians. And amongſt many other high commendations that he gives him there he acknowledgeth that the example of Galeacius prevailed much with him, for the ſtrengthening of his faith, and increaſe of his godlineſs.

But when the news of his fixing at Geneva came to the emperor's court, and to Naples, it cannot be imagined how ſtrangely it affected all that heard it; but, above all, his own friends were wonderfully aſtoniſhed at it, and his family; where nothing was to be heard but lamentations, tears, and pitiful complaints, ſo that it ſeemed a lively pattern of woe and miſery: yet was the old marqueſs his father moſt affected of all others, foreſeeing hereby the ruin and downfal of his eſtate and family; but the evidence of ſorrow being once over, he began to caſt about by what means he might recover him again; and for that end ſent a couſin german of his, that was moſt dear to Galeacius, with letters to Geneva, full of authority, proteſtations, bitter complaints, and loving intreaties to return home again, for the comfort of his aged father, the reviving and cheering up his forlorn wife, and diſtreſſed children, and to the unſpeakable joy of all his kindred.

This gentleman coming to Geneva, found Galeacius in a mean houſe, which he had taken for his uſe, with only two ſervants attending upon him: but how ſad was the meeting of theſe two gentlemen, which was ſpent in nothing but embracings, ſighs, ſobs, and tears; yea, it ſo exceeded, that for divers hours they could not ſpeak a word to other; till at laſt the gentleman hoping, and longing to recover his friend, with pitiful words, mixed with tears, he delivered his letters, till he had recovered more freedom of ſpeech; which having once obtained, to his letters he added obteſtations, intreaties, perſuaſions, and exhortations, all mingled with many tears, that he would reſpect the ruin of his houſe, the grief of his old father, the deſperate condition of his wife and children, &c. and remedy all by his return into Italy. But Galeacius, being as unmovable as a rock, without delay, returned him anſwer, ſwer, that he knew all this which he ſaid to be true; yet withal he would have him know, that he had done nothing rashly, he had conſulted with God, by whoſe grace he was moved hereunto; and by the ſame grace that he had his eyes opened to diſcern the truth, and to ſee the ſuperſtitions in popery, &c.

He told him alſo, that he had well weighed the infamies, reproaches, and miſeries which attended this his change. But, ſaid he, ſeeing one of theſe muſt needs be choſen, either to ſtay at home with a burthened conſcience, under an heap of errors and ſuperſtitions, or elſe to leave houſe, lands, family, country; yea, and all the world's glory, thereby to obtain liberty to ſerve the Lord purely, according to his word; that therefore he reſolved of two evils to chuſe the leſs, and rather to ſhut his eyes againſt the ſplendor of worldly glory and empty vanities, than that the ſight of them ſhould hinder him from following the call of Chriſt, who ſaith, That he is unworthy to be his diſciple, who leaveth not father, mother, wife, children, &c. yea, and his own life, to follow him: therefore, ſaid he, I forſook all theſe, becauſe I could not enjoy Chriſt and them; being heartily ſorry that they would not come to him, or that he might not have liberty ſafely to live with them. But for himſelf, he ſaid, he had riches, honour, and joy enough, ſo long as in that cottage, with his two ſervants, he might live in the true church of God, enjoy his word and ſacraments free from pollution, and the ſociety of godly men, and have time to converſe with God by holy meditation, and to confer with his religious friends about God's great goodneſs ſhewed him in his converſion, &c.

His kinſman was much aſtoniſhed at this anſwer, yet had nothing to reply; conſidering that his reſolution was not grounded on carnal reaſon, or the will of man, but upon the holy word of God, and his powerful and unreſiſtable calling; therefore, with a ſorrowful heart he held his tongue, bitterly complaining within himſelf, that he had ſucceeded no better: and ſo, after a while, he took his leave of his beloved friend, with many tears and pitiful cries on both ſides. When he came near Naples, there was much running to hear good news; but when he had delivered his heavy meſſage, the ſorrow of them all was redoubled upon them; father, wife, children, friends, &c. were all overwhelmed with grief: and the rather, becauſe at the ſame time the emperor had publiſhed an edict, wherein he proclaimed Galeacius guilty of high treaſon, confiſcating his goods, and making himſelf and his poſterity incapable of his father's marqueſdom. This made the old man, notwithſtanding his great age, to go to the emperor, and ſue to him, that his ſon's falling from the Roman church might not prejudice his poſterity, but that himſelf only might bear the puniſhment of his fault. But before he entered upon this journey, he diſpatched away a meſſenger with a letter, to charge his ſon, upon his filial obedience, to meet him ſuch a time at Verona, within the Venetian territories, hoping, if he could ſpeak with him, that he ſhould recal him from the ſociety of the hereticks of Geneva.

Galeacius having received this letter, and taken advice upon it, purpoſed not to diſobey ſo lawful a command of his father, though he feared it would but further exaſperate him: yet, before he went, he reſolved by God's grace, that neither threatenings, intreaties, allurements, &c. ſhould ſtir him one inch from that courſe of religion, whereby he had begun to ſerve the Lord: and thus, armed with heavenly fortitude, and the prayers of the church, he haſted to Verona, where he found his father, who received and uſed him kindly; and after ſalutations, he ſet upon him with all the cunning and ſubtile arguments that he could poſſibly invent to draw him home again. Galeacius humbly anſwers, That his body and eſtate is his father's, but his conſcience is the Lord's: tells him, that he cannot embrace that motion, but he muſt make ſhipwreck of a good conſcience; and therefore humbly entreats him, that ſeeing his only deſire was to obey God, and ſave his ſoul, that he would not urge him more to reſpect eſtate and family, than God's glory and his own ſoul's health. The old marquiſs ſeeing the unmoveableneſs of his ſon, which he deemed wilfulneſs, yet enjoined him at leaſt to ſtay there till he had been with the emperor and preferred his petition to him: this Galeacius aſſented to, and performed. But ſo ſoon as ever he underſtood that the emperor had granted his father's requeſt, he, with a joyful heart, returned to Geneva: and, being there, he conſidered how to employ himſelf for the public good; for which end he deviſed how to ſettle the diſcipline of the Italian church there, which was much increaſed by a confluence of families, which fled from the bloody inquiſition.

About this time Calvin was delegated to go to Baſil about matters of religion, with whom (at his requeſt) Galeacius went, and there met with Celſus, deſcended of the noble family of the earls of Martinengo in Italy, lately, through God's mercy, eſcaped out of the mire of popiſh ſuperſtition. This Celſus was then purpoſed to go for England, but by the perſuaſion of Galeacius he went with him to Geneva, where they both joined together; and, by the help and direction of Calvin, they eſtabliſhed a form of diſcipline for the Italian church. and Celſus was choſen the firſt paſtor thereof, in which place he performed the office of a faithful and vigilant watchman, and had two elders joined aſſiſtants to him: the principal of the elders was Galeacius himſelf, by whoſe authority and diligence the church was preſerved in peace and unity.

Anno 1555. his uncle, Paulus Quintus, was made pope; hereupon the old marquiſs wrote to him, commanding him to meet him at Mantua in Italy, ſending him proviſion of money for his journey. He obeyed, and went thither, where his father entertained him with more than ordinary kindneſs: then he told him, that he had procured of his uncle, the pope, a diſpenſation for him, whereby he might freely live in any city within the Venetian territories, without being moleſted for his religion and conſcience. He told him, that hereby he would be a greater ſolace to his old age, than his abſence had been a grief; earneſtly intreating him that he would gratify him in this requeſt, and all in a moſt pathetical manner, beſeeching him not to reject ſo great a favour offered him by the pope, telling him that hereby he might recover his honours, eſtate, friends, and eſtimation.

Galeacius was wonderfully perplexed with this motion, conſidering the proffers and promiſes, and authority of his father, which he knew not well how to deny, nor how to embrace, the rather becauſe he wanted the advice of his faithful friend Mr Calvin. Being in this great perplexity, he durſt not rely upon his own wit, but, retiring himſelf, betook himſelf unto fervent prayer unto God his Saviour, the Author of true wiſdom, humbly craving the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit, that, in this his extremity, he might reſolve upon that which was moſt for God's glory, and his own found comfort. And the Lord anſwered his prayers, directing him in the way that he ſhould chuſe: for conſidering that the pope, Antichriſt-like, directly oppoſed himſelf to Chriſt, his religion, and true church, that therefore he might, by no means ſue for, or accept any favour at his hands, nor be at all beholden to him for any thing. Beſides, God's Spirit ſuggeſted to him, that it carried with it a ſhew of apoſtaſy, to forſake the fellowſhip of Chriſt's church, and to live amongſt idolaters: as alſo how ſcandalous it would be to profeſſors, who would be ready to think that he had taken his farewel of religion, and renewed acquaintance with his old friend the world: and further, that this was to forſake the ordinary means of the true word and ſacraments, and to live in a place where there was nothing but idolatry. He further ſaw that Satan's policy herein was to entangle him again in the cares of the world, and pleaſures of Italy, and thereby to dazzle his eyes with ſenſual delights, that by degrees the power of godlineſs might decay in him: and laſtly, God's Holy Spirit taught him wiſdom how to anſwer all his father's objections, and confute all his arguments.

Hereupon he beſeeched his father not to draw him to that which afterwards he might have cauſe to repent of, by making him a prey to the papiſts, who held it for a maxim, 'that faith was not to be kept with heretics,' therefore, ſaith he, it is better for me, and more joy to you, that I live in this poor eſtate, than that I ſhould endanger my life, and my whole poſterity. The marquiſs being ſilenced hereby, returned with an heavy heart to Naples, and Galeacius, with a merry heart, to Geneva, where where he was received by his friends, and the whole church, with exceeding rejoicing for his safe return; but, by the way, he visited that godly princess, the old dutchess of Ferrara, who entertained him honourably, and had much conference with him about his conversion, temptations, journeys, the church at Geneva, and the great Calvin; and so lovingly dismissed him, sending him in her own coach, for his ease, as far as to the town of Francolium.

During these occurrences, his wife Victoria burned in hearty affections towards him, and it is inexpressible how vehemently she longed for his company, so that she never ceased writing to him, beseeching him to return again to her, and his children: but when letters prevailed not, she earnestly desired him to meet her in some city within the territories of the Venetians: this request he yielded to, hoping to prevail with her to leave her superstition, and to come with him to Geneva. The place where they were to meet was Læsina, a city in Dalmatia, a hundred miles by water from Vicum: thither he went, and she came not according to promise, but sent two of her eldest sons to meet him there; their sight and company was most acceptable to him: but being frustrate of his expectation in meeting with his wife, he sent them back, and returned to Geneva; where, after a few days, came letters posting from his wife, craving pardon for her former failing, and beseeching him once more to come to that place, where, without fail, she solemnly vowed to attend him. This request seemed very unreasonable, that he should so spend his time, and weary out himself, in such long and dangerous journeys: yet considering, that at his first coming from her, he had not so fully discharged his duty, by endeavouring her conversion, he yielded to go; and accordingly anno 1558, he came again to Læsina, where he understood that many of his friends, together with his wife, had intended to have met him, but that a mariner of Venice had disappointed them; hereupon he resolved to go to Vicum, relying on the Lord's protection, having, as he conceived, a special call thereunto.

When he came to his father's castle, it cannot be expressed how great joy the whole family was filled with; but, above all others, his wife, surpassed with joy and delight, hoping that now she had recovered her dear Lord and husband, the only comfort and solace of her life; but within a few days all this joy was turned into tears and mourning, when he had discovered his constant resolution to persevere in his religion, and that he would rather die than be drawn from it; yet, in the midst of these mournings, which almost broke his heart, he comforted himself in the Lord, dealing with his wife in a loving way, and earnest manner, to go and live with him her husband, as the law of God and nature required, promising her, that she would have liberty of her religion, to live as she would; but she flatly answered, though with many tears, that she would never go with him to Geneva, and that she would not live with him as long as he was entangled with those heresies; yea, so violent and wilful she was, that she there denied him that duty which a wife is bound by all law to yield to her husband, nor would by any means lye with him as man and wife; saying, that she was expresly forbidden by her confessor to do it, upon the pain of excommunication: How this unwomanly answer pierced his heart, it is easy for husbands to guess; yet he bore it with invincible constancy and quietness of mind; but withal told her, that if she denied him that matrimonial duty, which by the law of God she owed him, he would sue out a divorce against her. Notwithstanding she still persisted in her obstinacy, rather chusing to break God's command than her confessor's: he therefore resolving to depart, reiterated his former protestation to her, and so bad her to take it as his last warning.

The doleful day of his departure being come, he went to his father to take his leave, whose former love was now turned into fury, so that he gave him his farewel with many an heavy and bitter curse, which the Lord turned into blessing; and so, having passed this brunt, he came into the hall, where was his wife, children, and many of his near kindred and dear friends, all fraught with grief and heaviness. Nothing was heard but sighs, sobs, and cries: nothing was seen but tears and wringing of hands. His wife, embracing and taking him about the neck, beseeched him, with loving and pitiful speeches, that he would pity himself, her, and his children, and not so willingly cast them all away. His young children, all upon their knees, with arms stretched out, hands holden up, and faces swoln with tears, crying unto him to have pity upon them, his own bowels, and not to make them fatherless before their time. His kindred, with heavy countenances, and watery eyes, looked ruefully on him; and though through grief they could not speak, yet every look and gesture was a loud cry, and strong entreaty for his stay amongst them. Unutterable was the grief of them all, and unspeakable was the torment and temptation that he felt in this agony, when he must either leave Jesus Christ, or these his friends for his sake. Yet, above all, there was one most lamentable sight, which would have broke an heart of flint: Amongst all his children he had one daughter of twelve years old, a proper and towardly gentlewoman, who catching fast hold about his knees, held him so hard, that he could by no means shake her off, and fatherly affections would not suffer him to hurt her: he laboured to be loose, but she held fast; he went forwards, but she trailed after, crying to him, not to be so cruel to her his child, who came into the world by him. This so wonderfully affected him being a man of a most loving and tender hearted nature, that, as he oft related, it made his very bowels to roll within him, and that his heart was ready presently to burst asunder. But, being armed with a divine and supernatural fortitude, he brake through all these temptations, and trode under foot whatsoever might hinder him from Christ; and so, leaving that heavy house, and dolorous company, he hastened to the sea side, and taking ship, he presently caused them to hoist sails towards Læsina; yet, with a toiled and distressed mind, betwixt sorrow, when he remembered whom he had for ever left behind, and joy to remember that he had escaped. Yet he could not so master natural affections, but that he brake out into tears, and often looked back to that which he had left behind, yet saw that he must leave all for Christ's sake. But it much pierced his heart, when, in looking back, he saw his wife, children, and kindred, standing on the shore, who, when their cries could be heard no longer, ceased not to look after the ship so long as it was in sight; neither could he refrain, but, with a woful countenance, looked at them again so long as he could discern them. And remembering all the former passages of his father's curses, his wife's tears, children's cries, &c. it fetched from him many a heart-breaking sigh, and bitter groan; yet the spiritual strength and courage of his mind was constant and invincible; so that after a while he cheered up himself, and bended the knees of his heart to the Eternal Father in heaven, giving him most hearty thanks, for that he had furnished him with such a portion of grace, as to withstand and conquer Satan in so perilous a conflict; and for delivering him from popish thraldom, and the bloody inquisition, which he was in continual danger of whilst he was in Italy.

He praised God also for giving him time, opportunity, and grace to perform that duty to his wife, which he had omitted at his first departure from her; as also, that he had made that protestation to her, upon her moodish and undutiful behaviour towards him. And so, through God's goodness, he came safely to Geneva, October 4 anno 1558.

His safe arrival brought exceeding joy to the whole church there, especially to the Italian congregation, among whom he lived with unspeakable contentment in his own conscience, in his former private and quiet life; and, after a few years, he began to find in himself some reasons which inclined him to think of entering into a married condition; and the rather, because he never heard from his wife, nor found any relenting in her, nor remorse for her former obstinacy. This his purpose he communicated to Mr Calvin, craving his advice and counsel in a matter of so great importance: his answer was, that it was not convenient, and less scandalous, if he could abstain from marriage. Galeacius told him that he could not abstain, and gave him many weighty reasons which inclined him to marriage; withal imparting to him some secret reason. Holy Calvin, a man of a sharp judgment, and of a wise discerning discerning spirit, foresaw that many would speak evil of the fact, others would be scandalized, because few truly understand the doctrine of divorcement, and fewest of all knew of the circumstances of this particular fact. Galeacius urged such arguments out of God's word, as Calvin could not sufficiently answer; and thereupon he told him at last, that if he would go to the judicious Peter Martyr, and all his opinion, and the opinion of the learned divines of Rhætia and Switzerland, and request them, after mature deliberation, to set down their judgments, and the reasons of it in writing, for his own part he would subscribe unto them, and yield him what liberty they thought fit in this matter: always provided, that he should submit and stand to their judgments in this case. This Galeacius willingly assented to, desiring nothing more than to find out what the Lord by his word, and the voice of his church, should prescribe to him.

And accordingly he wrote to the divines, and churches after mentioned, who meeting together, and seriously debating the case, and weighing all circumstances, at last unanimously resolved, that he might, with a safe conscience, leave his former wife, who had first maliciously deserted him, and so be married to another. And this their opinion they confirmed by scripture, fathers, councils, and by the civil law; which being returned to Galeacius, he still taking the consent of the church along with him, sued out a divorce, and had it legally, by the magistrate, granted unto him.

After which, advising with his godly and prudent friends, he began to think of disposing himself in marriage, wherein yet he sought not so much after riches, beauty, birth, &c. as for a fit companion of his life, with whom he might comfortably spend the remainder of his days, and serve God cheerfully till the coming of his Lord and Master. And the providence of God (which never fails his children that wait and depend upon him) provided him such a wife as his heart desired, viz. a matronly gentlewoman, a widow that came from Roan in France to Geneva, for true religion's sake: She was well reported of for piety, modesty, and many excellent qualities, and about forty years of age. Galeacius considering her fitness in many regards, married her, anno 1566, and of his age 43, and they lived together many years after, with much comfort, and excellent agreement, so that the great afflictions and unquietness of his former life was now fully recompensed with a life full of all contentment and Christian joy.

His next care was to unburthen himself of all worldly cares, prescribing to himself a moderate and frugal course of life; kept only two maid servants, lived in great sobriety, yet always free from sordid baseness, neither wanting necessaries, nor having superfluities. His attire was plain, but comely: and he, that might in his own country have been attended with many servants, did often walk the streets alone, not having one man with him: yea, he disdained not oft to go into the market and provide his own necessaries, and sometimes would buy and carry home fruits, herbs, roots, and such other things; esteeming this course of life, together with freedom of religion, better than the marquisdom of Vicum. Yet under this mean attire was shrouded that gravity, majesty, and deportment, that any wise observer might easily discern that he came of a noble race: he was a great ornament to, and was highly esteemed by all the city of Geneva, every one speaking of his praise, so that it was hard to say, whether he was more beloved or admired amongst the magistrates, ministers, and persons of all ranks. No public meeting was appointed, or solemn feast made, unto which he was not invited, every one thinking himself happy that might enjoy his company; and (though he would have refused it) yet every one gave him the tittle of a marquis all his life long. His noble qualities were such, that every one honoured him. Strangers, princes, and noblemen, that visited Geneva, would by no means omit to see, and be acquainted with Galeacius, honouring him no less than if he had been in Naples.

His chief converse was with those Italians of his own church, in whose eyes his humble mind, and friendly conversation made him more honourable. He was one of a thousand; for besides his noble birth and princely education, he truly feared God, was affable, courteous, and friendly to all men; wise, discreet, and very eloquent: as his memory was exceeding good, so his smooth stile, his easy, quiet, and seemly delivery, made his speech most graceful to all that heard him.

With poor men, if they were godly and honest, he would converse as familiarly, as if they had been his equals: he was of a free and liberal heart; no poor or distressed man did ever desire his assistance, but presently he would reach out to them his helping hand to relieve them, and the loss of his former estate never troubled him, but when he had not wherewithal to give to charitable uses. It was his joy and delight to be lending and giving to those that wanted. Prisoners and distressed persons did often taste of his bounty. He visited the sick, and his presence and Christian exhortations were very comfortable to them. Every day he joined with the church in their public service: he never omitted to hear sermons, shewing wonderful devotion and reverence to the word of God. He daily read a portion of the holy scriptures.

As an elder of the church, he carefully observed, and enquired into the manners and lives of professors, encouraging the good, admonishing offenders. Where he saw or heard of any dissentions or suits of law amongst Christian neighbours, he was exceeding careful to compose and end them.

He wholly dedicated himself and all his abilities to the advancement of God's glory, and the edification of his church. But after a long calm of peace and tranquility, God raised up new storms, yet further to try his patience, and exercise his graces; for first he fell sick of a grievous and doubtful disease, proceeding from abundance of rheum, which made him so short-winded that he could hardly draw his breath, wherewith he was exceedingly tormented night and day, so that he could scarce get any sleep. This was procured by his long and wearisome journeys, which he had formerly taken by sea, and by land, for his conscience sake.

Then there came to Geneva a nephew of his, bringing him letters from his former wife, and his eldest son, persuading him yet at length to return to his native country and former religion; giving him hope that hereby he might advance his youngest son to the place of a cardinal, &c. But the soul of this worthy gentleman was much wounded and grieved hereat, as abhoring those profane dignities in the popish church; and to shew his distaste of the motion, he burnt the letters before the messenger's face; and, withal, not deigning to answer them by writing, he, by word of mouth, returned a grave, wise, and zealous answer. Yet this important Jesuit (for so he was) ceased not to molest him with frivolous reasons, and fleshly arguments, promising him an huge sum of money if he would return home, &c.

But the noble and holy heart of this godly Christian, in an heavenly zeal, and ardent love to his Saviour Jesus Christ, could not but shew itself, which made him to cry out, 'Let their money perish with them, who esteem all the gold in the world worth one day's society with Jesus Christ, and his Holy Spirit. And cursed be that religion for ever, which shall wed men to the world, and divorce them from God. Go home, therefore, and take thy silver with thee; make much of that dross of the earth,' &c. 'But know, that my Lord and Saviour hath made me enamoured of far more precious jewels, and durable riches.' Which words so enraged this papist, that he brake out into ill words and reproachful terms, and so went his way. Being delivered from this temper, his sickness encreased more and more upon him: his pain was most grievous, but he bare it with an heroical courage; and as the pains increased, so his faith and patience encreased; and as the outward man perished, the inward man was renewed day by day; and above all, he found unspeakable comfort and sweetness in his prayers to the Lord, and would often say, that in the midst of his prayers his soul seemed to be ravished, and to taste of the blessed joys of heaven; and as the sufferings of Christ abounded in him, so the consolations by Christ abounded much more.

The physicians spared no pains to cure him, nor his friends to visit him, especially his loving and tender wife was never from about him; but all was in vain, the time of his diſſolution drawing on; therefore he wholly ſequeſtered himſelf from any more care of his body, and from all worldly cogitations: he took his farewel of his wife, and all his Chriſtian friends, ſaying, That he would lead them the way to heaven: his heart and thoughts were all in heaven, and he cried to Jeſus Chriſt, that as he had ſought him all his life, ſo he would now receive, and acknowlege him as his own: and ſo in the preſence of his friends, whilſt the miniſters were exhorting, and praying with him, he peaceably and quietly yielded up his ſpirit into the hands of his merciful God, and faithful Creator, Anno Chriſti, 1592, and of his age about 74.

As Moſes, when he was come to years, refuſed to be called the ſon of Pharaoh's daughter, and choſe rather to ſuffer adverſity with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleaſures of ſin for a ſeaſon, eſteeming the rebuke of Chriſt greater riches than the treaſures of Egypt: ſo our noble Galeacius, when he was come to years, and the knowlege of Chriſt, refuſed to be called the ſon and heir to a marquiſs, cup-bearer to an emperor, nephew to a pope, and choſe rather to ſuffer affliction, perſecution, baniſhment, loſs of lands, livings, wife, children, honours and preferments, than to enjoy the ſinful pleaſures of Italy for a ſeaſon; eſteeming the rebuke of Chriſt greater riches than the honours of a marqueſdom, without Chriſt; and therefore ſeeing he muſt either want Chriſt, or want them, he deſpoiled himſelf of all theſe to gain Chriſt.

The Life of JOHN Lord HARRINGTON, Baron of Exton who died, Anno Chriſti, 1613.

JOHN lord Harrington was the eldeſt ſon of the lord and lady Harrington, to whoſe care, and tuition king James commited the education of his eldeſt daughter the lady Elizabeth who was after married to Frederick, prince elector Palatine: they were perſons eminent for prudence, and piety, who carefully educated this their ſon, both in religion, and learning: and this honourable lord, as a thankful man for their care, and honour received from them, returned honour to them again and that with advantage: being no leſs honourable to them, than they were to him: he was of an excellent wit, firm memory, ſweet nature, and prompt to learning, ſo that in a ſhort time, he was able to read Greek authors, and to make uſe of them in their own language: he ſpoke Latin well, wrote it in a pure, and grave ſtile, was able to confer with any ſtranger readily, and laudably in the Italian, and French tongues: underſtood the authors which he read in Spaniſh: and for the arts, he was well read in logic, philoſophy, and the Mathematicks: he made a good progreſs in the Theorique part of the art military, and Navigation, ſo that he wanted nothing but practice to make him perfect in both: and for his underſtanding in heavenly knowledge, and the myſteries of ſalvation, it was admirable; ſo that there was ſcarce any queſtion that could be propounded to him about thoſe matters, unto which he was not able ſuddenly and underſtandingly to anſwer; being well grounded both in religion, and learning at home, his noble father ſent him to travel abroad in France, and Italy, that by experience he might ripen that knowledge which before he had gained, and for a guide, and tutor for him in his travels, he choſe and ſent over with him one Mr Tovy, a grave, learned, and religious man, and formerly the head maſter of the free-ſchool in Coventry: but how dangerous a thing it is for religious gentlemen to travel into thoſe popiſh countries, may appear by the example of this nobleman, and his tutor, whoſe ſound religion, and heavenly zeal for the truth being taken notice of by the Jeſuites, they took their opportunity to adminiſter a ſlow-working poyſon to them, that ſeeing they had no hopes of corrupting their minds, they might deſtroy their bodies, and bring them to their graves: of this poiſon, Mr Tovy, being aged, and to leſs able to encounter with the ſtrength of it, died preſently after his return to England: but the lord Harrington, being of a ſtrong and able body, and in the prime of his age, bore it better, and conflicted with it longer, yet the violence of it appeared in his face preſently after his return, and not long after haſtened his immature death: he was eminent for ſobriety, and chaſtity: his lips were never heard to utter any unchaſte, or unſeemly ſpeech, which was the more admirable, conſidering that he was in the heat of youth, living in the court, and had been a traveller into thoſe countries which are ſchools of uncleanneſs, where few return ſuch as they went out, but of chaſte are made unchaſte, or if unchaſte before, they are made ſeven fold worſe then they were: but this our nobleman was as fiſh, freſh in ſalt waters, and kept himſelf undefiled, as Lot in the midſt of Sodom: and indeed he took the right way to preſerve his chaſtity, by avoiding the incentives, and provocations to luſt: he ſpent not his time in courting of ladies, amorouſly contemplating the beauty of women, which are bellows of luſt, and baits of uncleanneſs: but he preferred his books before their beauty, and for his ſociety, choſe men of parts, and learning, for arts and arms: beſides, he was very temperate in his diet, ſhunned feaſting, and was frequent in faſting; and hated idleneſs, and much ſleep, which are the two nurſes of uncleanneſs: and in the night when he lay awake, to prevent temptations, he exerciſed his thoughts with heavenly meditations: his juſtice, ſo far as he had occaſion to ſhew it, was very examplary; he dealt very honourably and honeſtly with every one that he dealt with; and whereas his father had contracted great debts by his princelike houſekeeping, and other public and private occaſions, he was very ſolicitous for the diſcharge of the ſame, giving power to his executrix to ſell part, or all his land, if need were, therewith ſpeedily to diſcharge the creditors: and being aſked when the writing was drawn up, whether he aſſented to it? he anſwered, Yea, with all my heart, for my honour and my honeſty are my neareſt heirs.

But the ſplendor of his religion out ſhined all his moral, and natural accompliſhments: this was the temple that ſanctified the gold, and the altar that ſanctified the offering: this was that which enobled his ſobriety, juſtice, and other vertues: and this appeared both by his private, and public exerciſes of piety, which were rare in a young man, more rare in a young nobleman, yea, and hardly found in ſuch a meaſure in any man, of what age and condition ſoever.

He uſually roſe every morning about four or five o'clock, ſeldom ſleeping above ſix hours; when he firſt waked, his conſtant care was to ſet his heart in order, and to fit it for holineſs all the day after, offering the firſt fruits of the day and of his thoughts unto God: being up, he read a chapter out of the holy ſcriptures, then with his ſervants in his chamber he went to prayer; then he ſpent about an hour in reading ſome holy treatiſe, to enliven his affections, and encreaſe his knowlege: he read over Calvin's Inſtitutions, and Rogers his treatiſes, which were his two laſt books: before dinner and ſupper, he had a pſalm, chapter, and prayer in his family, and a pſalm ſung, and prayer after ſupper: and beſides theſe public duties, he prayed privately every morning in his cloſet, then betook himſelf to ſome ſerious ſtudy for three or four hours together, except he was interrupted by ſome ſpecial buſineſs: the reſidue of the morning he ſpent in converſe with his friends, riding the great horſe, or ſome ſuch other honeſt and noble recreation till dinner time; thus avoiding idleneſs, and preventing temptations, which enſue thereupon ordinarily: preſently after his dinner he retired into his ſtudy to meditate upon ſome ſermons that he had lately heard, or if he was diſappointed of that opportunity, he neglected not the firſt that was offered to him; yea, many times in his travels by land, or water, he thus buſied himſelf, the reſt of the afternoon he ſpent in buſineſſes, ſtudy of hiſtories, the art of war, mathematics, and navigation, wherein he attained to a great meaſure of perfection: after ſupper he prayed with his ſervants, then withdrew himſelf into his ſtudy, where he kept a diary or day book, wherein he recorded what he had done that day; how he had offended, or what good he had done; what temptations he met with, and how he had reſiſted them; and ſurveying his failings, humbled himſelf before God for them; and for ſuch failings as were fit to be known only to God and his own ſoul, he wrote them down in a private character, which none could read but himſelf, and then betook himſelf to his reſt; and to prevent evil thoughts before ſleep, one that waited upon him in his chamber, read a chapter or two ent of the holy ſcriptures to him, and this practice he continued for four years together before his death.

And as his care was thus in private to walk with God, ſo no leſs was his care in public alſo, which appeared eſpecially in his uſe of the time, and means of God's worſhip. He was a moſt religious obſerver of the Lord's Sabbaths, both in public and private duties, yet preferring, as he often profeſſed) the public before the private, ſo that though he had an houſhold chaplain, yet he ever frequented the public aſſemblies twice every day; yea, whilſt he was a courtier: and if his occaſions caſt him into a place where the word was not preached, he would ride to ſome other place, ſometimes four miles, rather than want it: immediately after ſermon, he withdrew himſelf from company for about half an hour, to meditate upon, and apply what he had heard to his own ſoul: after the evening ſermon, two of his ſervants having written, he cauſed them to repeat both the ſermons in his family before ſupper; and ſuch was his memory, that uſually he could remember, and ſpeak of more than they had written; then he wrote them down in his book, and prayed himſelf with his family, wherein he had an excellent gift: and by way of preparation to the Sabbath, every Saturday night he uſed to call himſelf to a ſtrict account how he had ſpent the whole week, and accordingly to humble himſelf for his failings, and to return praiſe to God for mercies received from him: on the Sabbath morning, riſing betimes, he uſed, as he was making himſelf ready, to repeat to his ſervant thoſe ſermons which he had heard the Lord's day before: he uſed monthly to receive the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper; and to fit himſelf to feaſt at the Lord's table, he kept a private faſt the day before, and then he looked over his book for his carriage that month, and ſpent the whole day in prayer, meditation, and ſelf-examination, obſerving how it was with him ſince his laſt receiving, what progreſs he had made in piety, how he had thrived in grace, and what more ſtrength he had gotten over his corruptions: and thus he ſpent the whole day, not coming out of his ſtudy till about ſupper time: alſo the morning before he received, he read over 1 Cor. 11. Wherein is contained the inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper, and to his ſervants that were to communicate with him, he read a little treatiſe to them, wherein the right manner of preparation was contained; and beſides theſe monthly faſts, he kept many other days of afflicting his ſoul upon ſundry occaſions: he was wondrous attentive in hearing the word of God preached, or read, and carried himſelf exceedingly reverently therein, knowing that he was in the preſence of God, that was no reſpecter of perſons, and that he heard not the words of a man, but of God: ſhewing thereby, that when he came to hear, he willingly laid down his honour at Chriſt's feet; and to avoid oſtentation, or the appearance of it in his private duties, he never admitted any one, either to his prayer, or repetition of ſermons in, and with his family, but only one friend, that was moſt intimate with him. And thus was this holy ſervant of Chriſt, blameleſs and pure, and the Son of God without rebuke, in a naughty and crooked generation, amongſt whom he ſhined as a light in the world, holding forth the words of life, that he might rejoice in the day of Chriſt, that he had not run in vain, nor laboured in vain.

He further manifeſted the ſincerity of his religion, by his love to all that were truly godly, eſpecially to faithful and painful miniſters; as alſo by his mercy, and charity to the needy ſaints and poor members of Jeſus Chriſt: after his return from his travels, by way of thankfulneſs of God he gave yearly, by the hand of a private friend, twenty pounds to the poor, and the ſecond Sabbath after his landing in England (having ſpent the day before with his tutor Mr Tovy, in faſting, prayer, and thankſgiving) he heard the word, received the ſacrament, and gave to the poor of that pariſh, five pounds; and beſides, he gave forty pounds to be beſtowed upon poor miniſters and other Chriſtians, for the relief of their neceſſities; yea, ſuch were his bowels of tender mercy, that he gave the tenth part of his yearly allowance, which was a thouſand pounds per annum, to pious and charitable uſes, beſides much that he gave occaſionally, as he travelled, walked abroad, &c. And all his other graces were beautified and adorned with admirable humility, which is rarely found in perſons ſo honourable, and honoured both by God and men.

From the firſt day of his laſt ſickneſs, he ſtrongly apprehended the approach of his death, and therefore accordingly prepared himſelf for it (though others thought of nothing leſs than his death:) beſides his private meditations, he called often for others to pray with him, prayed often himſelf: made confeſſion of his ſins, and oft confeſſed his faith, and undoubted hope of ſalvation by Chriſt, profeſſing with much cheerfulneſs that he feared not death in what ſhape ſoever it came: he uttered many heavenly ſpeeches, deſiring to be diſſolved, and to be at home with God, and his Father, profeſſing not above two hours before his death, that he ſtill felt the aſſured comforts, and joys of his ſalvation by Chriſt Jeſus, and when death itſelf approached, he breathed forth theſe longing expreſſions, O that joy! O my God, when ſhall I be with thee? and ſo in the midſt of thoſe longing deſires, he ſweetly and quietly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti, 1613. and of his age 22.

He was not ſo eminent in place, as he was in grace, his gifts and graces, and power of religion were exceeding rare; ſo that the papiſts, who brag ſo much of merits and good works, cannot bring forth a parallel example amongſt them, of any man of his age, honour and rank, nay ſcarce of any age or degree whatſoever, that ſhewed ſo much power of popery, or the form of ſeeming ſanctity, as this young nobleman did of true piety, and power of godlineſs.

The Life of PHILIP de MORNAY, Lord of Pleſſis Marly.

PHILIP de Morday was by the father's ſide of the houſe of Mornay, allied to the moſt illuſtrious families in France, being ſomewhile ſince united to the royal family of Bourbon. His mother was of the noble family of Bec Creſpin in Normandy, which, for having done worthy ſervice in the conqueſt of England, obtained the hereditary dignity of conſtable of Normandy.

This Philip was born the fifth of November, anno Chriſti, 1549. James de Mornay his father was a valiant gentleman, but (according to that age) much addicted to the ſuperſtitions of the church of Rome, in the which he was very careful to bring up his children. Frances de Bec his mother (daughter to Charles de Bec Creſpin, vice-admiral of France, was a woman of reſolution and wiſdom above her ſex) ſhe had ſome knowlege of the true religion in her huſbands life time, and endeavoured under-hand to inſtil it into her family, and in the end wrought ſo far with her huſband upon his death-bed, that after ſome ardent exhortations which ſhe uſed to him in his extremity; he ſignified to the by-ſtanders that he had no need of the Romiſh ſuperſtitious ceremonies, grounding his ſalvation upon the alone merits of Chriſt Jeſus his Saviour.

Their deſign was to have made this their ſon Philip a church-man; by reaſon that his uncle Bertin de Mornay, who poſſeſſed divers benefices, intended to reſign them all to him: but God's providence (which would not ſuffer him to be tempted with ſuch a bait) permitted not his uncle to think of it at his death. His firſt maſter was one Gabriel Preſtat, who together with humane learning, infuſed gently into him ſome principles of true doctrine, though he durſt not make any open mention of religion unto him, both becauſe he knew his tender age incapable of it, and likewiſe for fear of his father, who knew not that this Gabriel was a proteſtant. He was afterwards brought to Paris by his father, where he continued for two years, tho' in that time the courſe of his ſtudies was often interrupted by ſickneſs.

About the end of the year 1560. he was called from Paris to his father's funeral; a certain prieſt being ſent to fetch him, who perceived that his mother was no friend to the ſuperſtitions of the Roman church, and therefore he gave him this counſel upon the way; that he ſhould take heed of the Lutheran opinions, of which his mother was ſuſpected, and that he ſhould always perſiſt in that religion in the which he had been nouriſhed and taught. Mr du Pleſſis (a little aſtoniſhed by reaſon of his age) gave him this anſwer, That he was reſolved to continue firm in he had learned of the ſervice of God; and that if he ſhould doubt of any point of it, he would diligently read the goſpels, and the Acts of the Apoſtles for his better information therein. Being arrived at his mother's, he was ſolicited by her, and his elder brother, to read the proteſtant catechiſm, which he refuſed; but withal demanded a New Teſtament in Latin and French; one of the Geneva impreſſion being offered unto him, he likewiſe refuſed it, but accepted of one printed at Lyons, which he greedily read, praying God to enlighten him in the knowlege of his truth; and withal carefully obſerving, that the chief doctrines and ſervices of the church of Rome were not to be found in ſcripture, ſuch as Purgatory, Invocation of Saints, the ſacrifice of the Maſs, adoration of Images, &c. Each of theſe ſtill he found no mention of it in ſcripture, he blotted out of his mind, and began to ſuſpect the reſt: ſo he deſired to ſatisfy himſelf concerning tranſubſtantiation and juſtification, by reading ſome controverſies of that time, concerning thoſe ſubjects, which wrought ſo good effect in him, that about the end of the year 1561. he became reſolved to quit the ſervice of the church of Rome; his mother, though ſhe exceedingly rejoiced to ſee that he had embraced the truth, yet would not willingly have had him to profeſs it ſo ſoon, becauſe ſhe as yet adhered outwardly to the papiſts. But God having about the ſame time caſt her into a ſickneſs, almoſt unto death, ſhe interpreted it as an admonition to her, not to retain any longer the truth of God in unrighteouſneſs, making a vow in expreſs terms, in the preſence of her children, that if God would pleaſe of his mercy to raiſe her from that bed of ſickneſs, ſhe would make open profeſſion of the goſpel, which ſhe performed at the end of the ſame year, 1561.

About the beginning of the year 1562, he was again ſent to Paris by his mother, where he had ſcarce continued three months, before the troubles of religion brake forth, which forced him to leave the city; being returned home, he fell ſick of a pleuriſy, which with other infirmities, ſo far interrupted his ſtudies, that he forgot almoſt all which he had learned; whereupon his mother had an intention to make him page of the king's chamber. But peace being re-eſtabliſhed in the year, 1563. His importunities prevailed ſo far with her, as to return him once more to Paris, where in ſhort time he recovered what before he had loſt, ſo far as to out-go his maſter, who was wont to liſten to him, as if himſelf had been his ſcholar.

It is obſervable, that during this time of his continuance at Paris, he was never ſeen to play, or take other recreation then expounding before his maſter, Platos Timæus, or ſome ſuch like author. About this time his uncle the biſhop of Nantis ſtrove to win him back to the church of Rome, exhorting him to read diligently the ancient doctors of the church, and the better to allure him hereto, he promiſed to reſign unto him his biſhoprick, and to put him in preſent poſſeſſion of a priory: but he thanking him for his proffers, anſwered, that he would remit himſelf wholly unto God, from whom he was confident, he ſhould receive whatſoever was neceſſary for him. And afterwards did often by letters mark out unto his ſaid uncle ſuch paſſages of the fathers as confirmed the proteſtant religion, and confuted that of the papiſts. In the year, 1567. the ſecond troubles ariſing for religion, he prevailed with his mother, to permit him to put him into the army, with two of her brothers; but the eternal providence of God, which reſerved him to higher employments, brought it ſo to paſs, that his horſe falling upon him by the way, broke his leg, which forced him to return. This hurt was long in healing, and at length conſtrained him to undertake a voyage into foreign countries, the uſe of baths being requiſite to his full recovery: wherefore about the end of Auguſt, 1568. with much trouble and danger, he went Geneva, and from thence by Switzerland to Heidelberg in Germany; there he lived in the houſe of Emanuel Tremellius, and began alſo his ſtudies in the civil law, gaining immediately the affections of the moſt learned in that univerſity. September 1569, he went to Frankford, and from thence into Italy, remaining ſome time at Padova to continue his ſtudies in the law, not that he intended this for his chief end, but deſiring above all the knowlege of Chriſtian religion, he would not be ignorant of the reſt; his idle hours he paſſed in the phyſic garden, to learn the natures and names of the herbs and plants: in which he profited ſo far in a ſhort time, that Guillandinus (the rector of that garden) had him in ſingular admiration: beſides, at the ſame time he read over the greateſt part of the Bible, under Rabbi Menaken a Jew, the moſt learned of that age in the holy tongue.

At length the ſtate of Venice making a league with Spain, and the Pope, againſt the Turk, occaſioned a more ſtrict ſearch to be made by the biſhop of Padova after ſuch as profeſſed the proteſtant religion: of which profeſſion Mr du Pleſſis being known to be, retired himſelf to Venice to monſieur du Ferrier, then ambaſſador for the king of France there; and here likewiſe he was likely to have come into ſome danger for his religion; for a certain officer of the inquiſition, proffering him an oath upon ſome articles propoſed unto him, he anſwered in Italian, That his religion permitted him not to take it: the officer miſunderſtanding the word Religion (which in that language moſt commonly ſignifies ſome order of friars) aſked him if he were a religious perſon? Monſieur de Pleſſis (underſtanding the officers queſtion of a proteſtant, ſuch being in France called of the religion, anſwered, yes, whereupon the officer proceeded no further.

Divers like dangers he eſcaped by the providence of God in other parts of Italy. At Rome a provoſt came by night, and examined him concerning his country, his name, &c. He told him his name was Philip de Mornay, the provoſt not hearing du Pleſſis, by which name he was moſt ordinarily called, left him, ſuppoſing he was not the man he ſought for; from Venice (having firſt ſeen the reſt of Italy) he went to Vienna, and from thence by hungary, Bohemia, and Saxony, to Franckfort, and ſo to Cologn, in the end of the year, 1571. here he was familiar with Philip Ximenes a Spaniard, the great friend of Caſſander, with whom he had often conferred about religion, Ximenes confeſſed many errors in the viſible church, but would by no means allow of a ſeparation from it: du Pleſſis having obtained his arguments in writing, gave him an anſwer to them, which thoſe of Cologne, called Tridinum ſcriptum.

To which Ximenes promiſed, but never gave an anſwer. In the ſpring, anno Chriſti 1572. He paſſed into Flanders, and ſo into England, where he was favourably received by queen Elizabeth, who already had him in great eſteem. At that time Monſieur de Mortmocacy, and monſieur de Foix, were newly arrived in England, to ſwear the league betwixt the queen, and Charles king of France. Theſe intended to ſend du Pleſſis to the queen of Scots (then priſoner in England) to ſalute her in the name of their maſter. But when he perceived that he was to deliver ſome letters ſecretly unto her, which made a gainſt the league he refuſed that commiſſion, ſaying that he would not begin his imployment by ſo evil an action.

At the end of July, 1572. he returned into France, and went to wait upon the admiral at Paris; that fatal marriage being then ready to be ſolemnized between the king of Navarr and Margaret of France; his mother was then in the city upon her return home, and himſelf ready to accompany her; when news was brought that the admiral was hurt, whom preſently he ran to help, and to aid him to his lodging. He had always ſuſpected that marriage, but this wicked act confirmed his ſuſpicion. Wherefore deſiring his mother inſtantly to depart, he reſolved himſelf to ſtay and attend the iſſue of what he ſuſpected. Upon Bartholomew-day (the day of that horrid maſſacre) the meſſenger whom he had ſent to enquire of the admiral's health, returned affrighted, and told him, that the admiral's lodging was broke open by force; at which ſudden news, he leapt out of his bed, and putting on his cloths, felt an extraordinary motion in himſelf, which cauſed him to ſay, God will deliver me out of this danger, and I ſhall ſee it revenged; on the contrary, Ramini, his tutor, preſently anſwered, And I ſhall die in it. Both which came to paſs.

Whilſt he intended to haſten to the admiral's lodging, divers hinderances kept him within, till the murderers arrived at his houſe, ſo that he had ſcarce time to burn his papers, and ſave himſelf on the top of the houſe, till they were gone.

A day or two he lay hid in Paris, and on the third day of the maſſacre, he ſlipt out of the city (though not without much trouble and danger) under the diſguiſe of a lawyer's clerk: arriving at his mother's, he found the family diſperſed, and herſelf concealed by a mean gentleman of the neighbourhood; having ſaluted her, he reſolved to venture for England: to which end, one proffering to procure for him the duke de Guiſe his paſs, he refuſed it, ſaying, 'That he would not owe his life to ſuch, for whoſe ſervice he ſhould be loath to employ it: That God had delivered him from the maſſacre, and therefore into his hands he would commit his paſſage.' And within two or three days, finding a boat at Deip, he paſſed in it ſafe to England; where he had been recommended to the queen by the Lord Walſingham, then ambaſſador in France.

Being there, he wrote ſome remonſtrances in Latin and French; by which he exorted the queen to the defence of the afflicted church; and confuted, by ſome apologies, the calumnies impoſed upon the proteſtants. He was likewiſe employed in the treaty of marriage betwixt the duke of Alencon (brother to the French king) and queen Elizabeth. This duke, by reaſon of ſome differences betwixt his brothers and himſelf, took up arms, and made uſe of the proteſtants as a diſcontented party, to aſſiſt him; to join with whom Monſieur du Pleſſis was much ſolicited, which occaſioned him at length to return into France: but withal he expreſſed his diſlike of joining the intereſts of religion with the duke's ambitious and diſcontented ends.

This war not ſucceeding, he retired himſelf to Jametz, till the death of king Charles IX. who died anno 1574; after which he came to Sedan, where he was deſired by the dutcheſs of Bouillon to undertake a journey to the duke of Cleve, who, with the elector Palatine, had been by her late huſband conſtituted executors of his will; which (though a buſineſs of much hazard) was undertaken by him, and performed, to the great contentment of the dutcheſs.

During his ſojourning at Sedan, he married Charlotte Arbaleſte, a widow, who, having likewiſe eſcaped the maſſacre at Paris, was fled thither for religion; at whoſe requeſt he compoſed his Treatiſe of Life and Death.

In the year 1576, he went to the king of Navarr, in Guienne, who immediately received him for one of his council; to whom he did much ſervice in the wars againſt the pretend holy league; in reference to which, he was by the ſaid king employed, anno 1577, with an ample commiſſion to the queen of England, to ſolicit her for aid againſt the leaguers. Being arrived in May at London, the queen (who was very prompt in ſuch kind of ſpeeches) told him, that ſhe had expected him as meſſenger from a duke, but now ſhe ſaw him as ambaſſador from a king. At his audience he obtained from her the ſum of 80,000 crowns, to levy men in Germany for that war; which, nevertheleſs, were not raiſed, by reaſon of the peace which followed in the ſame year. During his abode in England he compoſed his treatiſe of the church. Being reſolved to paſs into the low countries, in June, anno 1578, he took leave of the queen at Norwich, who, beſides an honourable preſent beſtowed upon him, would have a particular cypher for letters to paſs betwixt them.

In his paſſage he was robbed by pirates, where he loſt (beſides other things) his papers, amongſt which there were ſome books of the hiſtory of his time, in Latin, which he had begun anno 1570.

Arriving at Antwerp, he was preſent at the treaty of alliance betwixt queen Elizabeth, duke Caſimir, and the Eſtates; in the which he cauſed likewiſe to be included the king of Navarr his maſter. He was afterwards poiſoned by one Guerin, who had been hired to poiſon the prince of Orange, but his youth and good conſtitution overcame the force of the poiſon.

During his ſtay here, about the midſt of the year 1579, he began his work of the Truth of Chriſtian religion; of which, when he had finiſhed about four chapters, he fell into a grievous ſickneſs, which the phyſicians judged to be cauſed by the relics of the poiſon which he had taken. This continuing upon him, and the plague raging in Antwerp, he was invited by thoſe of Gant, for change of air, unto their city, where they provided and furniſhed a houſe for him. There he ſpent the reſt of that year, and began the next, viz. 1580; and no ſooner had recovered his health in part, but immediately he ſet himſelf to the continuance of his work. But he was that ſpring taken off by new employments.

The king of Navarr again took up arms, and commanded Monſieur du Pleſſis, (laying all other buſineſs aſide) to make another journey to England, to demand ſuccours; which he immediately undertook. The queen of England was then about to make peace with the king of France, ſo that this embaſſage was not very agreeable to her. Yet, after his return to Antwerp, ſhe wrote a letter with her own hand to Monſieur du Pleſſis, telling him, that he ſhould be welcome whenever he pleaſed to return into England; and that never any gentleman had treated with her, in whom ſhe took ſo much pleaſure as in himſelf. At Antwerp he finiſhed his book of Chriſtian religion, which the year after himſelf turned into Latin.

Anno 1582, he returned into France, where he publiſhed a treatiſe, containing the reaſons why the council of Trent could not be admitted in France: printed by command of Henry III.

In the year following (1583) he was ſent by the king of Navarr, to the national ſynod of Vitray in Bretaigne, where he was joyfully received by the whole company, with this preface, That had they met him occaſionally in the ſtreets, they ſhould have earneſtly importuned his preſence with them. He was likewiſe preſent in the general aſſembly of the proteſtants held at Montauban, by the king's permiſſion, in the year 1584, where he was deſired by the aſſembly to draw up the form of their complaints againſt the violation of the edict for peace, which he, together with the count de Laval, preſented afterwards to the king at Blois.

The league of the houſe of Guiſe breaking forth in the year the year 1585 which was formed firſt againſt the king, under pretence of the defence of the catholic religion, and afterwards declared againſt the king of Navarr, and the proteſtants. That famous declaration, in the name of the ſaid king, was penned by Monſieur du Pleſſis, wherein the king having anſwered the calumnies caſt upon him by that faction, propoſed (to avoid the calamities of a civil war) that the quarrel might be ended betwixt himſelf and the duke of Guiſe, notwithſtanding the inequality of their conditions, by a combate, either of one to one, two to two, or ten to ten, more or leſs, at the choice of the ſaid duke. To which declaration monſieur du Pleſſis would not ſet his hand, till the king of Navarr had promiſed that he ſhould be one of the combatants, if the conditions ſhould be excepted But this not being accepted by the duke, there followed the civil wars for religion, in which Monſieur du Pleſſis did many neceſſary and important ſervices for the king of Navarr, and the proteſtants, both with his ſword and pen; having anſwered a virulent book publiſhed by the league againſt the king of Navarr, called the Engliſh Catholic. Beſides his aſſiſtance in the general aſſembly of the Proteſtants at Rochel, and his remonſtrances to the general aſſembly of eſtates, held at the ſame time by the king at Blois, intended for the diſinheriting of the king of Navarr, next heir to the crown. At which aſſembly his writings ſo far prevailed, that the greateſt part of the deputies concluded a peace to be made with the king of Navarr, and much ado there was to make them at length change their language.

After the death of the duke of Guiſe at Blois, there followed a truce betwixt the kings, in the year 1589. Upon which Monſieur du Pleſſis was, by the king of France, made governour of Saumur. One memorable paſſage during theſe wars cannot well be omitted, which was, That the king of Navarr having abuſed the daughter of a gentleman in Rochel, by whom he had a ſon, the church had often remonſtrated his fault unto him, which he ingeniouſly confeſſed, but could not be perſuaded to take off the ſcandal by a public acknowledgment of it, till Monſieur du Pleſſis giving him counſel about a battel which was ready to be fought, took the opportunity to tell him how neceſſary it was to ſeek the favour of almighty God, the only giver of victory; and thereupon urged him to conſult with his conſcience, whither he ought not to give glory to God upon ſuch an occaſion, and what remorſe it would breed in him, if God for want of it ſhould bleſt his undertakings, to the ruin of ſo good a cauſe; which he nearly nearly touched the king's heart, that he commanded him to conſult with a miniſter concerning what he had to do in that buſineſs; according to whoſe advice he made the next day a public acknowlegment of his fault in the church before all the nobility of his army. Which counſel being thought by ſome to be too rigorous, Monſieur du Pleſſis made this anſwer, 'That as a man could not be too courageous before men, ſo he could not be too humble in the preſence of God.'

After the murther of Henry III. (by a Jacobin at St. Cloud, in Auguſt 1587, Monſieur du Pleſſis was made counſellor of eſtate to the king of Navarr (now Henry IV. king of France), whom he ſerved in the recovery of his right, againſt the league of the houſe of Guiſe, though with much hazard to himſelf; ſome having been, by their own confeſſion, hired to murder him, for which they were executed at Tours.

Sixtus Quintus, then pope, being one of the king's chiefeſt enemies, an expedient was propounded of taking him off by ſome honourable embaſſage, and to that end the queſtion was put, whither the king might, with a ſafe conſcience, write to him? Monſieur du Pleſſis anſwered, That doubtleſs he might, it being ordinary in the ſame caſe for Chriſtian princes to write unto the Turk; ſo that the queſtion was not, If he ſhould write, but how? ſince the king could not call him holy father, or kiſs his feet, whom according to his profeſſion, he ought to think the enemy of Chriſt, and if he ſhould write otherwiſe it would to be no purpoſe. This expedient therefore was wholly laid aſide.

Afterwards the duke of Florence being willing to join intereſts with the king, fearing the too great potency of Spain, ſent a gentleman to him, who proffered to Monſieur du Pleſſis twenty thouſand crowns a year, if he would council the king to change his religion, to which he ſtoutly replied, 'That his maſter's conſcience was not to be ſold, no more than his own.

In the year 1590, he built a church for the proteſtants in Saumur, and obtained a grant from the king, for the inſtituting of an univerſity there, which was afterwards confirmed by a national ſynod held in the ſame place. The king beſieging Rouen, in the year 1591, and fearing the army of the prince of Parma, which was then entered France, intending to raiſe that ſiege, Monſieur du Pleſſis was again ſent into England, to demand aid from the queen, where he had conference with ſome Engliſh biſhops, concerning the differences betwixt them, and the Non-conformiſts, remonſtrating unto them, with what conſcience they could moleſt thoſe, who agreed in the ſame faith with them, only for ſome ſimple ceremonies, with whoſe infirmities they ought rather charitably to bear; which remonſtrance cauſed them for a while to be more gently dealt with, inſtead of the perſecution which was intended againſt them.

In the year 1593, he wrote a large letter to the king, who then had changed his religion, deſiring the continuance of his favour to the Proteſtants; and withal expoſtulating that ſudden change, aſſuring him nevertheleſs of their fidelity towards him, and reſolution to obey their lawful prince, of what religion ſoever, even to the hazard of their lives. Meeting him afterwards (according to command) at Chartres, the king ſomewhat troubled at the firſt interview, began to excuſe what he had done, by telling him that he had been neceſſited to ſacrifice himſelf for his proteſtant ſubjects, that he might with more eaſe procure a peace for them: to which Monſieur du Pleſſis anſwered, That there were better expedients for the working of that end, had his Majeſty been pleaſed to have made uſe of them; and that it would have been more agreeable to their minds to have ſacrificed their lives for him.

About this time he obtained of the king a revocation of ſuch edicts as had been made by the leaguers againſt the proteſtants, and a confirmation of others, by which the free exerciſe of their religion had been formerly granted unto them.

In the year 1595, he began his work of the Lord's Supper, which he finiſhed in leſs than a year: in which book his principal end was, to repreſent the belief and practice of antiquity in moſt part of the points controverted in religion; which deſign the king had heretofore approved, as a means to facilitate a reformation. This book was afterwards approved by the national ſynod at Saumur, though not printed until the year 1598. The publication of it ſtirred up many enemies againſt him, eſpecially of the clergy. The Jeſuites of Bourdeaux petitioned the parliament there, that it might be burned: the pope himſelf, by expreſs letters, complained of it to the king, that one of his privy council ſhould dare to call him Antichriſt.

The king nevertheleſs took no notice of it, only ſometimes he complained to his friends, that Monſieur du Pleſſis had by this means given him occaſion not to put him upon further employments; which likewiſe he deſired Monſieur de la Force to tell him; to whom du Pleſſis anſwered, That he had not done this act raſhly, but upon good conſideration; that the king knew well, that he was ever wont to diſtribute his ſervices firſt to God, next to his king, and then to his friends; which method he could not with a good conſcience change: that he was not ignorant how much this would hinder his preferments in the world, which he regarded not ſo much as to do the leaſt ſervice for his God: that however God was faithful, and would honour ſuch as honour him, and much more to the like effect.

But the pope ſtill underhand ſolicited the king to ruin him, whom, in all his letters he called his enemy, repreſenting that he had puniſhed one in Rome for having ſpit upon the king's effigies, how much more ought the king to puniſh him who had ſo irreverently uſed God's vicar.

And ſo far was the king led away by his frequent ſolicitations, that notwithſtanding the important ſervices of Monſieur du Pleſſis, he ſought all poſſible occaſions to caſt him off, which, though ordinarily not hard to find in one who had ſo high a charge in the adminiſtration of the common wealth, yet (by the grace of God aſſiſting him) calumny could not find on that ſide where to faſten. At laſt (having nothing elſe to accuſe him of, his book muſt be laid hold of for a pretence to ruin him, in which the biſhop of Eureux, du Perron, promiſed to ſhew five hundred falſe quotations. Du Pleſſis, on the contrary, offered to make good all the paſſages cited in his book, out of impreſſions approved by his adverſaries. Whereupon a conference was appointed at Fountainbleau. But the Sorboniſts fearing leſt the examination of particulars would prove to their diſadvantage, deſired the pope's Nuncio, and he the king, to hinder it.

The king deſired him not to trouble himſelf, ſince he would ſo manage the buſineſs, that the diſgrace ſhould remain upon the proteſtants; which he intended to bring to paſs, by ordaining, that at the conference the biſhops ſhould open the book, and name to the number of fifty paſſages, if the time would permit, to which du Pleſſis was to make anſwer ex tempore, otherwiſe he was reſolved to verify the biſhop's accuſation. This being told to du Pleſſis, he anſwered, that it was a hard condition for him to make an unpremeditated anſwer to ſuch quotations as the biſhop ſhould pick out of ten thouſand alledged in that book, to the retaining of all which, no human memory could ſuffice. Whereupon the conditions were a little (though very little) qualified, and thus propoſed; That the biſhop ſhould quote unto him ſixty paſſages over night, to which he was to anſwer at eight the next morning.

Monſieur du Pleſſis (after ardent prayers to God) accepted the condition. About one o'clock after midnight the ſixty paſſages were brought to him, quoted only thus, Scotus, p. 869. Durand, pag. 870, &c. Beſides this, the books which he borrowed of the biſhop, he having none there of his own, at two o'clock, were again ſent for by ſix: yet, in this ſpace of four hours (though weak ſighted) he had examined nineteen of the quoted paſſages. At eight of the clock he was called, though then put off till one in the afternoon, ſo that but nineteen of the quotations were examined: Upon his anſwer to the firſt, the moderators (being moſt part papiſts) were aſhamed, and pronounced in favour of Monſieur du Pleſſis; which they were about to have done likewiſe in the ſecond, had not the king interpoſed, which made them decide it againſt him. For the reſt, they were chiefly ſuch paſſages of fathers, as the biſhop pretended, that du Pleſſis had not entirely tirely quoted; in which, though du Pleſſis made it appear, that the words pretended to be fraudulently left out, were all to the ſame effect; yet the moderators judged, that it were good they had been added: this was the ſum of that conference; concerning which du Pleſſis printed afterwards a relation to vindicate himſelf: but the biſhop every where cried up the victory which he pretended to have gotten there, even in the cathedral church, in a ſermon before the king and court at whitſontide: (about a fortnight after the conference) he was himſelf the trumpet to his own praiſes: but that week a flaſh of lightning broke into the church, ſhattered the pulpit where the biſhop had preached all the holy days, burnt ſome images, and at the ſame time fell likewiſe in the king's garden: alſo on the Thurſday following, the biſhop preached again in a church near the Lowre, upon which church, within two nights after, fell another flaſh of lightning, which uncovered part of the ſteeple, and beat down ſome images; and at the ſame inſtant falling again into the king's garden, burnt ſome orange trees there. In theſe prodigies, the very adverſaries of du Pleſſis acknowleged the finger of God; neither would they ſuffer the biſhop to preach any more in their churches; beſides, that himſelf made an oath to preach no more till winter. Monſieur du Pleſſis thus fallen into diſfavour with the king, began to lead a more private life, though he had ſtill a large influence upon public affairs: in the year 1602. A certain monk had hired two young men to kill him; who came in ſermon time into the church, at Saumur, the one of them drawing ſo near, as to lift up the carpet which lay before him, but had not the boldneſs to ſtrike: being taken upon ſuſpicion he confeſſed his intentions, and who ſet him on work; whereupon the monk was apprehended, and hanged. Afterwards the king began again by little and little to favour him, moved thereunto, not only out of his own inclinations, which had been always towards him, though thus clouded for a while, for fear of the pope; but likewiſe by a remonſtrance from queen Elizabeth, who had told his ambaſſador, that ſhe knew not how to truſt his maſter, who ſo far depended on the pope, as for his ſake to ſlight his beſt and moſt faithful ſervants.

In January, anno 1605. The only ſon of monſieur du Pleſſis was ſent for to the court by the king, who intended an employment for him, where he was well received: but the deſign upon which he had been ſent for, failing, he deſired leave to go into Holland, which was granted him, where he was the ſame year unhappily ſlain before Gueldres; which bred ſo great a grief in his mother, that ſhe lived not long after, departing this life in May, anno 1606. This was one of the remarkable epoches in the whole life of monſieur du Pleſſis, in the which two ſuch great and ſo contiguous loſſes had befallen him: after his ſon's death, he had both his own grief to combat with, and to comfort that of his wife: but after her death he was wont to ſay, 'That heretofore ſhe had been an aid to him in living well, and ſhould hereafter be ſo in teaching him to die well;' from thenceforth he took this for his motto, Mihi hic ambelo ſuppreſſes.

The ſame year he was again himſelf called to the court, and graciouſly received by the king, where he continued, till the year following, at which time he deſired leave of the king to retire himſelf, which the king unwillingly granted; withal, deſiring him to come ſometimes to court, and expreſſing his grief that he could not employ him according as he deſired, the reaſon whereof himſelf well knew, meaning the ſcandal which the pope would have taken at it: being returned to Saumur, he began his work of the myſtery of iniquity, anno 1607. which, tho' a work of infinite labour, yet he finiſhed it in nine months. In which it is remarkable, that to ſpare his ſight, he dictated it to others that wrote it from his mouth.

In the ſpring, anno 1608. He began to ſet upon thoſe great volumes of Baronius, to which he intended a confutation. About this time likewiſe were thoſe letters of his into Holland concerning the novelties introduced into the church by Arminius, to whom he adviſed the French church, to ſend one of their miniſters (naming monſieur du Moulin) to confer with him concerning the points by him maintained, and to adjure him in the name of God to forbear begetting of parties in the church: this advice was approved by the church, but fearing to offend the king, they durſt neither aſk his leave nor ſend without it. Du Perron, biſhop of Eureux, now made cardinal, and archbiſhop of Sens was much preſſed by the king to anſwer mon. du Pleſſis, to which he was likewiſe urged by his friends, who told him that the action at Fontainbleau was little to his credit, and that ſhould du Pleſſis die, it would be then too late to anſwer him, becauſe men would be ready to ſay, that he durſt not do it in his life time; wherefore he promiſed, and undertook the buſineſs: and going to Rome, ſequeſtred himſelf from other buſineſs for the ſpace of a year to perform it, promiſing the pope at his arrival in France to print his anſwer, which he ſaid was riſen to a great volume: upon his return, the king aſked him when he would print it? He told his majeſty that he ſtayed but for ſome manuſcripts from Rome; which anſwer, the king ſeeing his delays, uſed as a proverb to ſome undertakers, whoſe work went not forward, who making idle excuſes to him; yes (ſays the king) I ſee you ſtay for manuſcripts from Rome too; Cauſabon, who was about the cardinal, wrote to monſieur du Pleſſis concerning this anſwer, telling him that it was finiſhed, and that himſelf had ſeen it; whom du Pleſsis deſired, as the cardinal's friend, to give him from him the ſame counſel which Chriſt did to Judas in the goſpel; 'What thou doſt, do quickly.' But this volume of anſwer never appeared: the cardinal after the king's murder, thinking himſelf to be diſingaged from his promiſe, in October, anno 1609. mon. du Pleſsis had notice given him of a book in folio, ſeen in the houſe of one that was a confident of the Jeſuites, which was written to the half, containing divers oaths ſigned with blood; in which they obliged themſelves to obey the commands of the pope: of which he immediately gave a ſecret advice to the court; but by the evil conduct of him that was appointed to ſearch for it, the book miſſed of being found. This year he turned into Latin his book of the Myſtery of iniquity, which he dictated ſo faſt, that his Amanuenſis had ado to keep pace with him with his pen. The horrid murder of the king following in the year. 1610. he upon notice of it, took ſo good order, as to keep the people about his government in quiet, who upon that ſudden change were ready to take up arms: and as ſoon as he had received the edict for the regency of the queen mother, he adminiſtred the oath of fidelity to all the clergy and people within his juriſdiction; making a ſpeech unto them, in which he deſired them to forget the diſtinguiſhing names of papiſt and proteſtant, which having cauſed ſo many misfortunes, ought to be buried in this great one: profeſſing, that whoever would ſhew himſelf a good Frenchman, and a faithful ſubject, ſhould be of him reſpected as his brother.

In May, anno 1611. was held in Saumur the general aſſembly of the proteſtant churches; where chuſing a preſident, ſix of the ſixteen provinces were for the duke de Bouillon, the other ten for monſieur du Pleſsis; who being much troubled at it, deſired them to chuſe again, but was by the company commanded to take the place; at which the duke being diſconted, there followed a diſſention in that aſſembly, manifeſtly tending to a ſchiſm in the church, which du Pleſsis (though a party) much laboured to reconcile, and at laſt that was happily brought to paſs in the national ſynod held the year following at Privas.

Another diſſention afterwards happened betwixt monſieur du Moulin, miniſter of the church at Paris, and monſieur Tilenus, profeſſor at Sedan, about the effects of the union of the two natures in Chriſt: the making up of this difference was, by a national ſynod held at Tonneinx, referred to monſieur du Pleſsis, who proved the happy author of a full reconciliation betwixt them, in the year, 1614. Yet had this difference like to have broke forth again the year following, by the indiſcretion (or malice rather) of ſome particular perſons, had not monſieur du Pleſsis in time ſtopped its progreſs: in which he was aided by a ſeaſonable meſſage of king James; who at that time ſent to invite du Moulin into England, to confer with him about a method of uniting all the reformed churches of Chriſtendom, to which he had been often ſolicited by monſieur du Pleſſis. The iſſue of which voyage was, that the king reſolved to ſend letters to all proteſtant princes, to invite them to union, and desired the French churches to frame a confession gathered out of all those of other reformed churches, in the which unnecessary points might be left out, as the means of begetting discord and dissention.

Some years following were spent by monsieur du Plessis in procuring the peace of the protestant churches, and endeavouring to keep a good correspondence between the king and them, which was continually ready to be interrupted; in which business he carried himself with so much prudence and fidelity in all occurrences between them, that he was admired, and praised by all, yea, even cardinal Perron himself (heretofore one of his greatest enemies) shewed him great respect in the assembly of estates held at Rouen, anno 1617. speaking of him in all companies with an excess of praises; and telling the king himself, that those men had done him wrong who had kept off monsieur du Plessis from having a greater power in the management of his affairs; and that his religion ought not to render him unprofitable in the exercise of those graces which God had given him; and that his majesty ought to keep him near his person so long as he should live. Which praises the said cardinal reiterated upon his death bed, in September, anno, 1618. charging his friends then about him, to send a solemn farewel from him to monsieur du Plessis, and to manifest his sorrow for not having made a straighter league of friendship with him, having so high an esteem of his conscience and integrity. His government of the town and castle of Saumur was continued unto him till the year, 1621. when the king falling into displeasure and suspicion of the protestants, by reason of their high deportment in the assembly at Rochel, displaced him at first but for three months, with a promise of restoring him so soon as affairs should be a little quieted. But these discontents growing to an open war, he could never procure a re-establishment, though it were continually solicited by him; wherefore retiring himself to his house in the forrest upon Dayure, he continued there till the day of his death, which followed in the year, 1623. there applying himself to holy meditations and exercises of patience.

He did by particular providence of God make his last will for the peace of his family, and the edification of those that should survive him; which having finished upon the third of November, in the forementioned year, he expressed himself to be now discharged of one of his greatest cares, and that nothing was now left for him to do, but to die well. The next day he was seized by a continual feaver, forcing him to keep his bed, which so continued and encreased upon him, that upon the ninth of the same month the physicians gave over all hopes of his recovery: nevertheless he lived for forty eight hours after, which he so well husbanded in the care of his salvation, that scarce one of those hours was employed in any other business. In all which time he gave both by word and action so many express and evident signs of his faith and assurance, that it may be truly said, that in this short time he confirmed by irrefragable proofs all that he had said or written of the truth of Christian religion. In all this time he felt little or no pain, so that when the minister asked him how he did, he still would answer, well, very well. His speech continued till the tenth day at midnight, which he continually imployed in prayers for himself and his enemies, and in comfortable speeches to the by-standers; sometimes in the middest of his prayers, being heard to say, 'I fly, I fly to heaven, the angels are carrying me into the bosom of my Saviour,' sometimes repeating those words of Job, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, I shall see him with mine eyes,' bifce oculis, repeating divers times these last words in Latin. Being asked if he felt not the Spirit within him sealing unto him the promises of God. he answered, 'Yes indeed, I am assured of it,' and again, 'I feel, I feel what I speak.' Two hours after, his speech and his hearing failed him, and his breath between six and seven in the morning of the eleventh day, which was the hour that he yielded up his spirit into the hands of God his Creator, finishing by a happy death, a life of above seventy four years continuance, exemplarily spent in the fear of God, and the profession of his gospel.

The last hours of Monsieur du Plessis.

Monsieur du Plessis by an instinct from God, had made, and dictated his testament, upon the twenty fourth day of Octob. 1623. In the which, for the peace of his family, and the edification of his survivors, he had set down his last will and pleasure. But by reason of some intervenient occasions, did not sign it till the third of November following, which having done, 'Now (said he) behold, I am discharged of one of my chiefest cares, and for the time to come have nothing else to look after but my death.' And indeed from the day following he kept his bed, for the most part, being seized by a continual feaver, which was since known to be of that sort, which is commonly called lyria. This sickness continuing, and increasing upon him, the physicians gave advertisement unto his friends, upon Thursday the ninth of that month, that his estate was such, as no human hope were left that he could ever recover it. After which time God continued him upon earth for the space of forty eight hours, which he so well employed in the thoughts of himself, and his salvation, that he scarcely spent any one entire hour of them upon any other business; giving both by his words and actions, such express and evident testimonies of his faith and assurance, that it may be truly said, that in that short time he confirmed by irrefragable proofs, all that ever he had said or written concerning the truth of Christian religion. The gospel of the Son of God was plainly seen to be ingraved upon his heart by the holy Spirit. He seemed in the midst of death to have obtained a firm possession of life, and to enjoy a full contentment in that, at which most men are ordinarily affrighted. And this lesson was so lively and efficatious, that even those who had the greatest share in the loss of him, reaped joy and consolation from the very subject of their grief: would to God that all men could have been present there! since it is impossible for any pen to imprint that force upon his expressions, which his own accent, and the condition wherein he was, gave unto them. His words we shall endeavour to express; though wanting that soul and life which they had in his mouth: and while we recount them as such, we shall intreat such as were then present to remember, with what voice and action they were accompanied; and those that ware absent to imagine what weight the spirit and tongue of such a personage could add unto them, sealing by a happy death, a life of seventy four years, spent (as is publicly known) exemplarily in the fear of God, and the profession of his gospel.

On Thursday, the ninth of November, madam de Villarnoul his eldest daughter, coming in the morning to his bed side, where after having enquired of his health, as she stood silent, he told her that he desired some one might come and hold some good discourse with him: upon which occasion they caused a minister, being his household chaplain, to come, that he might give him notice of the dangerous condition in which he was, and prepare him to undergo the will of God. And though the minister was much troubled to be the bearer of so sad a message, yet he used much liveliness in the delivery, without making use of the circumstances wherewith men commonly usher in such discourses; to whom monsieur du Plessis not any ways moved or astonished, but with a countenance and spirit full of assurance, answered. Yea, faith he, is it true? I am very well content it should be so; and do in the first place pardon from my heart all such as have done or procured evil unto me: further, beseeching God, that he would pardon and amend them. The minister praising God for that he was thus ready to forgive unto others their offences, which was an evident sign that God would forgive him his; prayed him, that as he had edified the church in his life time, so that now likewise he would do the same at his death, and since he still enjoyed the use of his tongue, that he would comfort and edify the by-standers by his speeches. To which he answered, that he had not his speech so free as they imagined; neither indeed could he speak without pain, nevertheless the desire which he had to give an outward testimony of the internal disposition of his heart, made him in some measure overcome this this hinderance: only he abridged into as few words as he could all that he had to say. Then he began a confession of his faith, but not being able to finish it, he lifted up himself from the chair whereon he sat, and said to the minister, I have a great account to make, having received much, and profited little; it being answered, that he had by the grace of God faithfully and happily employed his talent, having served the church with much profit, and advanced the kingdom of Christ. Alas, (said he) what was there of mine in that work? Say not that it was I, but God by me, which saying he repeated three or four times afterwards upon like occasions, reciting at one time that passage of St Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 10. I have laboured, yet not I, but the grace of God which is in me:' speaking these last words in Greek, as they are in the original sun emo giving thereby all the glory to God, without dividing it betwixt himself and his grace, as those which understand that tongue may easily perceive: afterwards, being laid upon his bed, there is nothing, (said he) more just and reasonable, then that the creature should obey his Creator: then lifting up his hands above his head, he thrice cried out, mercy, adding, that he did it to shew, that it was the alone mercy of God to which he had his recourse, and to which we ought to have ours also: that he had heretofore desired to live, in hope to see the deliverance of the church: but that finding no repentance in the world, he now found nothing that should invite him to continue in it: then composing his countenance, with a firm and grave voice, he gave his blessing, first unto his daughters, afterwards unto his sons in law, recommending peace unto them, to which (said he) I leave you, as also to their children, and whole posterity, as well present as absent, praying God to ratify this his blessing by his most holy benediction; he gave his blessing likewise to monsieur de Auberville his nephew, and his wife; after, to his family and household servants, and in particular, to the minister which then assisted him, beseeching the Lord to prosper the holy ministry of his word in his hands. He called likewise monsieur Dissandeau the physician, which had always faithfully served him in his sicknesses, particularly in this, and blessed him.

At the same time calling to mind monsieur Boucherean, minister of the church in Saumur, he prayed God to bless him, and, let it not trouble him (said he) to be patient; he hath to do with a troublesome people, I beseech God not to impute their sins unto them; there are some in the company which know what I mean. He understood by these words those horrible calumnies, with which he had been, especially in his later years, unworthily and outragiously charged at Saumur, more then any other place. After he gave his blessing to the church of Saumur, and to that of saint Jovin (which was the nearest to his house) taking notice that there were in it many good men, which bore affection to the word of God. At length he prayed to God for all the church in general, that he would deliver it, and relieve it from oppression, and restore it to a prosperous estate. After which he gave charge to the minister to write to madam de Noiers, daughter to his wife by her former husband, to tell her, that he gave his blessing to her, and all her household: remembring a while after madam de l'Isle daughter to monsieur and madam de Villarnoul, he expressed his sorrow for not seeing her, blessing her and her children: as also a while after he blessed particularly such of his grand-children, as did or had followed the studies of learning, saying, that he was assured they should be blessed with the blessings both of heaven above, and of the earth beneath. This being done, he protested that he had through his whole life made God's glory his end and aim; adding withal, that such as knew him, were not ignorant, that had he proposed any other end unto himself, it had been an easy matter for him to have come to great riches and honours. Thereupon (the minister questioning him upon that subject) he declared, that he persisted constantly in the faith wherein he had lived, which also by the grace of God he had defended by example, word, and writings; that were his life again to begin, he would walk in the same way and path, by which he had already steered his course, to wit, by persevering in the profession of the gospel, notwithstanding the many dis-favours which he had suffered for it; that this his faith was altogether founded upon the goodness and mercy of God in Christ Jesus, who by the Father had been made unto him, and unto all such as believe in him; 'Wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption;' and for your works, sir, (said the minister unto him) do you attribute no merit at all unto them? Away (answered he) away with all merit both of mine, and of any other man's whatsoever: I call for nothing but mercy, free mercy. Upon which the minister pronouncing unto him in the name of Jesus Christ, the remission of his sins, and the inheritance of eternal life, belonging unto all those that believe in the Son of God, saying, that he did it in the vertue and discharge of his duty, not that he at all doubted, but he in his heart fully felt the grace of God, and had full assurance of his mercy; I thank you (said he) for it, and take your saying for an earnest of the goodness of God towards me, and to shew, that what he had said was more then bare words. Monsieur de Villarnoul, praising God that he saw him enjoy so much comfort in his end, which he had always heard him to desire during his life, that he might be able to testify it from his heart, and not die without speaking it; I feel (said he unto him) my son, I feel what I speak. Afterwards the minister demanding if he desired that they should pray unto God to fortify him more and more, and likewise that he would restore him unto his health, that he might further serve him unto his glory. Pray unto God (said he) that he would dispose of me. It being answered, that all hope was not yet lost, that what had been told him concerning the danger of his present condition, was but for fear least some accident should take away the consolation of hearing him speak: but that God was almighty, able to raise up even those that were already in the grave; I am not (said he) an enemy unto life, but I already see one that is far better then this.

A while after, madam de Villarnoul saying unto him, that she hoped God would restore him at the instance of our prayers; my daughter (said he) let him do what he pleases, I depend upon his will. And indeed, though he always testified a great resolution and assurance to encounter with death, yet he never rejected such remedies, or nourishment as were proferred unto him, and namely, that day dined as he was accustomed: he retired himself from life, he fled it not.

After this they prayed by him, during which exercise he was extreamly attentive, his hands and eyes following, to their power, the motions of his heart: and as long as the least sense was left unto him, he constantly lent a like attention to all the prayers, which at divers times were presented unto God for him, during the space of those forty eight hours; so that about five hours before his death, when already motion and sense began to fail him, it was marked, that he endeavoured with one hand to lift the other from under the cloaths, that he might hold them joined and lifted up, during the prayer. Prayer being ended, he desired they would read unto him the lxxi. Psal. of which himself made choice; there was likewise read unto him the meditation which himself had before time made upon 2 Tim. iv. 7. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, &c. And moreover, by his command another, which he had likewise published upon those words of the Psalmist, Cast thy burden upon the Lord. Whilst these were reading, he was very attentive, giving us infinite testimonies of the pleasure which he took in it, and of the applications which he made from thence for his own consolation. All this during three good hours and above; after which we left him to his repose, as since we always observed the same, to give him sometime of rest after that we had heard him. All which spaces he employed in prayers and holy meditations by himself, as appeared by the motions, sighs, and words, which from time to time brake from him, of the assurance which he had in God, of the victory which by his grace he had obtained against the tempter, and the like. In the afternoon, upon a discourse which was made unto him, of the blessed immortality, the minister saying, That here below we have but the right and title, the possession being reserved for us in heaven, himself cited to this purpose the words of St John in his first Epistle, chapter the third: 'Beloved, now are we the children of God,

God, but what we ſhall be, doth not yet appear; now we know that when he ſhall appear, we ſhall be like unto him.' From whence an occaſion being given to diſcourſe unto him of the reſurrection, he thought good that they ſhould read unto him the fifteenth chapter of the firſt of the firſt Corinthians, and marked (ſo freſh and untroubled was his ſpirit) upon the forty ſeventh verſe, The firſt man being of the earth, is of duſt, (for ſo it ſounds in the French tranſlation) that it is in the text Choikos.

About the end of this lecture, arrived Madam de la Tabarriere, his daughter, ſent by her huſband to viſit him, and render the laſt offices of her duty to him: he expreſſed much contentment in ſeeing her, ſaying, that God had granted him that which he deſired; that ſhe made up a great part of his comfort, and had done him a great pleaſure in coming. He enquired likewiſe concerning ſome of her children, which ſhe had not brought with her; and gave her his bleſſing: afterwards exhorting all his children in general, to the union and brotherly love, that they might poſſeſs in peace the inheritance which he ſhould leave unto them, enjoining them in particular, not to go to law about it; which was promiſed unto him with great aſſeverations, by his ſons in law, and daughters, and particularly by Madam de Fontenay in the name of her huſband then abſent in Normandy; which being done, full of contentment, he ſaid, That he was arrived at the height of comfort, ſince he died with the aſſurance of leaving peace amongſt his children. And as all retired themſelves to leave him in repoſe; how ſhould I ſleep ſaid he, there being ſo many good people near me? His daughters then returning unto him, he took them by the hands, ſaying, That he would ſpeak unto them, and would have them to anſwer him; and then repeated unto them all the preceeding exhortations, tending to the fear of God, and to peace and mutual concord.

Sometime after the miniſter diſcourſing unto him, That of all his enemies he had now none left to fear, nor ſin, not death, not the devil, not the world, being already diſcomfited by the Lord Jeſus, and ſpeaking to each of theſe in particular, he ſeemed to take much delight in that diſcourſe; amongſt the reſt, as he ſpake unto him concerning ſin, he ſaid, That its power was the law, aboliſhed by Chriſt for ſuch as believe in him; for death, that it was indeed to be feared of thoſe that are out of Chriſt, phobero taton belos, ſaid he in Greek, alluding to a paſſage in Ariſtotle's Ethicks, where death is ſo called) but not to thoſe that die in the Lord, by whoſe croſs death was diſarmed: as touching the world, the miniſter telling him that he knew well by his own experience, how little its temptations can prevail againſt ſuch as the Lord fortifies, his grace and mercy having alweys conſtantly accompanied him in all his ways, even to the preſent hour, which was an aſſured ſign of the faithfulneſs of his eternal love towards him. He anſwered, lifting up his eyes on high, Thy gifts O God, and thy call are without repentance: and upon that it was ſaid That the world, to deceive the faithful, ſometimes threatens, and ſometimes flatters them. Theſe are, ſaid he the ſubtilties of Satan. The miniſter continuing the ſame diſcourſe, and ſhewing that from henceforth the calumnies of the devil can do nothing againſt the children of Chriſt, being juſtified, and ſanctified by faith in him, who is it, cried he out, that ſhall frame an accuſation againſt the elect of God? God is he that juſtifies; declaring further, that he was fully aſſured to have part in all his promiſes, ſo that neither life, nor death, things preſent, nor things to come, ſhould ever be able to ſeparate him from the love of his Saviour; which ſaying, he repeated divers times.

The evening of the ſame day, upon diſcourſe of the vanity of the world. Alas, ſaid he, what is the world? It being anſwered, The world is but a figure, he added, as it follows in St. Paul, which paſſeth away: and preſently uſed that expreſſion of Pindar in Greek. Skias onar anthropos. After leaving this diſcourſe, he infilled much upon confeſſion of his ſins, ſaying, That he was a grievous ſinner, even one of the greateſt that was upon the earth, that there was in him, as he acknowleged, the ſeeds of evil; but that in Jeſus Chriſt he ſhould obtain mercy; and thereupon required with much affection, that they would ſpeak unto him touching the death and paſſion of our Saviour; which being done, and followed by prayer, he heard all with great devotion, and at the end of the prayer, ſaid theſe words, Amen, by Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, in whom all the promiſes of God are, Yea, and Amen. Theſe were the greateſt part of thoſe things in meditation, wherewith he ſpent the whole Thurſday, and the night following.

Friday morning, as we approached to his bed ſide, praying him that he would continue to edify and comfort us, by the teſtimonies of his faith, and perſeverance: he began with a prayer, which he pronounced in Latin, 'Lord open thou my lips, and I will ſhew forth thy praiſe; Lord make me to know my ſins, to weep for them, to deteſt them, to have them in execration," which he repeated twice; upon this the miniſter took occaſion to ſpeak unto him concerning the remiſſion of his ſins, and the comfort which follows it, founded upon the hope of immortality, it being impoſſible that ſuch as are in Chriſt, though feeble, beaten down, and deſtitute, ſhould yet ever fall from life, the power of the Lord perfecting itſelf in the midſt of their infirmities, in ſuch manner, that the inward man was ſtill fortified, as the outward man grew weaker: citing unto him, and reading all along to this purpoſe the end of the fourth chapter of the ſecond to the Corinthians, from the fifteenth verſe, and the beginning of the fifth, to the two and twentieth verſe, laying a particular emphaſis upon theſe words, "We know that if our earthly houſe of this tabernacle be diſſolved, we have a building of God, a houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' And aſking him if he believed not all theſe things; if in this faith he were not aſſured to be made partaker of that eternal weight of glory, ſpoken of by the apoſtle; he anſwered, That he was entirely perſuaded of it by the demonſtration of the holy ſpirit, more powerful, more clear, and more certain than all the demonſtrations of Euclide, and ſpeaking thoſe words, by the demonſtration of the holy ſpirit, taken out of the 1 Cor ii. 4. he repeated them in Greek, apodeixei pneumatos, as they are in the original; and a little after upon the ſame ſubject ſaid, That he had ſeen the ſalvation of God; the wonderful works of God, ta megaleia tu theu ſaid he, in the words as they are read, Acts ii. 11. Wherefore he might now ſay with Simeon, Nunc dimittis ſervum tuum in pace, upon which he repeated likewiſe two or three times that of the Pſalmiſt, 'I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken,' applying it as did St. Paul, 1 Cor iv. 13. to ſhew that all his confidence and aſſurance proceeded from his faith. Afternoon he was heard praying to himſelf, and ſaying in broken ſentences; 'I fly, I fly to heaven; the angels carry me into the boſom of my Saviour.' Then the miniſter approached, and to comfort and confirm him more and more, called to his mind the manifold favours which God had ſhewed unto him, preſerving him from ſo many dangers which he had run thro' fortifying him againſt ſo many aſſaults which he had ſuſtained, having always a particular care over him, and carrying him as the eagle carries her young ones; which conception he repeated in Latin, ut Aquila pullitiem ſuam: the miniſter continuing this diſcourſe, he cried out, 'Lord thou haſt been our refuge in all generations, before the mountains were brought forth, thou art God.' Whereupon it being added, that as the goodneſs of God, and his mercy towards us was from everlaſting, and ſo is it likewiſe firm and durable to all eternity; whence he might reſt for ever aſſured of it, nor ſhould the weakneſs of his fleſh make him any ways to doubt of it; to which he anſwered, 'I know my Redeemer liveth, I ſhall ſee him with theſe eyes;' biſce oculis, repeating theſe laſt words in Latin three or four times: and as for the infirmity of the body, which turns into duſt; it having been ſaid, that this ſhould not weaken our hope, becauſe that God into whoſe hands we reſign it is powerful and faithful to preſerve that truſt, that he ſuffered us to turn as it were into nothing, to raiſe us up again more glorioufly, taking pleaſure to magnify his power in our weakneſs; of which he had often made experience during his life, and that it was ſtill to be ſeen in his death, in which by the Lord's aſſiſtance he triumphed over all his enemies, though in the depth of weakneſs, according to the fleſh. We can do all things, anſwered he, in Chriſt that ſtrengthens us.

From that time he ſtill grew weaker, ſo that towards evening he could no longer pronounce entire periods, nor teſtify the motions of his heart, but by ſhort anſwers to what what they demanded of him, conceived in two or three words. Being then asked if he felt not within his soul the force of the Holy Spirit sealing unto him the promises of God, and filling him with a lively consolation; he answered after a contented manner, which savoured of much cheerfulness, 'Yes indeed,' and another time, 'I am assured of it,' and a while after, with much ado, 'The love of God is in my heart:' always when the minister asked him how he found himself, he answered, 'Very well.' Thus in the midst of these blessed thoughts he entered into possession of the true life, leaving by little and little this other earthly life. His speech failed about midnight, his hearing two hours after, his breath betwixt six and seven in the morning, at which time he rendered his spirit unto God his Creator.

It is worth our notice, that during these forty eight hours, he felt little or no pain, having been often carefully asked concerning it, almost every hour, always constantly answering, that he suffered none. Morover, that he had his senses perfect, as may appear by the preceeding discourse, though a day before he had some raving fits, which ceased on an instant, without ever returning, so soon as they had given him warning to prepare for the life to come; at which the physicians much wondered, seeing fever and long waking (he having been many nights without sleep) in their oppinions should have caused a delirium. Lastly, it must not be forgotten, that in all this time, he entertained no other discourse than what tended to his salvation, having his judgment, spirits, and memory in so good estate that in the midst of his extremities, they could scarce alledge any passage of scripture, upon which he did not make some note, even upon the Hebrew, Greek and Latine words (whereof we have repeated some) using always the terms of scripture to express the dispositions of his heart, and accommodating to his present use, the best and richest passages which are there to be found.

Of all this, many persons of honour are witnesses, both of ours and the other religion, which were present there, both the one and the other declaring that they were extreamly edified and comforted by so fair a death: but none of them heard more than monsieur Moris, a physician of Bressure, making profession of the Roman religion, who according to his wonted candour, will (I doubt not) always render a faithful witness to the truth of that which we have here represented; God give them and us grace to make our profit of it, to his glory and our own salvation. Amen.

The Life of JOHN BRUEN, of Bruen Stapleford, who died anno Christi, 1625.

JOHN BRUEN, of Bruen-Stapleford, in the county palatine of Chester esq; was born, anno Christi, 1560. and was the son of a worthy gentleman, descended of worshipful ancestors, who brought him up civilly, and as those times were, religiously also: and the Lord preserved him in his childhood, and youth from the poison of popery, and the contagion of those common gross sins, which for want of the light, and life of the ministry of the gospel, reigned in those parts: when he was about seven years old, his father for some offence rebuked him sharply, and corrected him soundly, which he being much grieved at seeking relief, he took a prayer book which he had learned, and going into his father's chapel, read it; and prayed as well as he could, and it pleased the Lord to comfort him with unexpressible joys; the next day he went to the same place, and used the same means, but found not the like comfort: Afterwards his father sent him to his uncle's, Mr. Dutton of Dutton, where he was bred up at school, under one Mr. James Roe, for about three years space: anno 1577. his father sent him to Oxford, where he first received the love of the truth in any knowlege and understanding, being then about seventeen years old, he lived in Albans-Hall as a gentleman commoner, and being familiar with one John Breerwood, his countryman, an alderman's son of Chester: this Breerwood observing in him some popish practices, and opinions, set upon him by scripture arguments to convince and reform him, whereupon this young gentleman (through Gods mercy) was wrought upon, that as himself wrote it down in his book; 'I was, saith he, then inflamed with zeal against the profane beast of Rome, and all popery, both persons and things, with all their monuments, rites, and ceremonies, etc.

After a while his father sent for him home, that he might dispose of him in marriage, and provided for him the daughter of one Mr Hardware, [a worthy and wise gentleman] to whom he was married with the consent of parents, and in the fear of God, and lived very comfortably with her for seventeen years, seeing his sons, and daughters as olive plants round about his table: then being in the prime of his youth, he spent too much time in hawking, hunting, and such carnal delights.

But anno Christi, 1587. his father dying, he began to be much perplexed both in mind and estate; some sorrows and fears, thoughts and cares began to stir, and work in him, and the Lord hereby began to work for his more effectual calling, and conversion, and this he did both by the rebukes of his word, and checks of his spirit, convincing his judgment, and changing his heart from the love of base, to a delight in better things: whereupon he began to search his heart, and try his ways, and to call himself to an account for his former courses, and weighing them in the balance of the sanctuary, he found them to be but vanity, and vexation of spirit: and besides, he being charged by his father with the portions of twelve children, which he left behind him, he began to cut off occasions of wasteful and riotous expences; and whereas his father left him a park well furnished with deer, he disparked it, and drawing himself to as narrow a compass as he well could, he provided competently and comfortably for his own family, and faithfully paid his brethren and sisters all their portions, and disposed of them in marriage to their own content; then he was very careful to set up God's worship in his family, walking wisely in the midst of his house, setting his eyes, his favour upon the godly, and not suffering a wicked person to abide in his sight; and his principal care was to dwell with his wife as a man of knowlege, and to train up his children in the nurture and information of the Lord, and by his holy and prudent carriage his wife (though well affected to religion before) yet grew on to a higher pitch in knowlege, and grace, and became to him a faithful helper, and careful yoke fellow, to bear and draw in the yoke of Christ; they were both very careful in the education of their children, catechising of them in the principles of religion, and causing them to learn such sentences of scriptures as might make the easiest impression of grace upon their hearts; neither did he spare to use the rod of correction, as God's healing medicine to cure the corruptions of his children, yet if at any time his heart was overheated through his hatred of sin, and zeal for God's glory, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips, or dealt violently with his hands, he used to be much humbled for it, that going about to cure others, he had wounded himself; and amongst his men and maid servants, there was not one idle and unprofitable person; and for his choice of servants, he took notice of any thereabouts, that began to set their faces towards heaven, such he loved, and laboured to draw them into his service; so that in a short time he was furnished with godly and gracious servants, both men and maide; and then he looked upon them as his brethren and fellow servants in and under Christ; would sometimes use them familiarly, advise, consult, and resolve with them in matters of conscience, and other weighty occasions; sometimes he made them his comforters in afflictions and tentations, and received refreshing from them; amongst the rest, he had one old disciple, Robert Pasfield, a man utterly unlearned, being able neither to write nor read, yet thro' God's blessing upon his industry, having a good memory, became ripe in understanding, and mighty in the scriptures; yea, he was so well acquainted with the sum and substance of every book and chapter, that hardly could a man ask him for any sentence of scripture, but he would tell him in what book and chapter he might find it; he had a good gift in prayer, was very willing and able to confer of good things, whereby he became very useful both in the family, and to other good Christians abroad, as he had opportunity; for the help of his memory he invented and framed a girdle of leather, long and large, which went twice about him: this he divided into several parts, alloting every book in the Bible in their order to ſome of theſe diviſions, then for the chapters, he affixed points or thongs of leather to the ſeveral diviſions and made knots by fives or tens, thereupon to diſtinguiſh the chapters of that book; and by other points he divided the chapters into their particular contents or verſes, as occaſion required: this he uſed inſtead of pen, and ink, in hearing ſermons, and made ſo good uſe of it, that coming home, he was able by it to repeat the ſermon, quote the texts of ſcripture, &c. to his own great comfort, and to the benefit of others; which girdle Mr Bruen kept after his death, hung it up in his ſtudy, and would merrily call it the Girdle of verity; this old Robert, though but a ſervant, yet, being rich in grace, his maſter uſed him very familiarly; when conveniently he could, he would have him near him, would often go to the hop-yard or barn, where his buſineſs lay, to talk and confer with him, and when he was ſo far from caſting him off, that he daily fed him with ſome of the beſt morſels from his own table, and ſetting him not far from him, that he might the better confer with him, which he continued to his dying day; ſuch other ſervants as he choſe to be ever about him at home, he made happy, by his taking opportunities to impart ſome wholeſome words of admonition and inſtruction to them, &c. He never thought his table better furniſhed, than when he had ſome godly perſons to ſit with him, or ſtand about him, nor his meat better ſeaſoned, than when it was pondered with the ſalt of wholeſome words; and for other of his ſervants employed in huſbandry, and ſuch out works, he never ſuffered them to want ſuch encouragements as might make them chearful in his, and God's ſervice: he would ſometimes go abroad to them, raiſe matter of ſpeech, and conference from their callings, works, wages, &c. for their inſtruction and edification: and there were few of them but exerciſed themſelves unto godlineſs, praying in their courſes every night in the kitchen, when their maſter was gone to bed ſuch of his ſervants as were inclined to marriage, he provided well for them.

The religious duties which he daily and duly performed in his family, morning and evening, were theſe; he roſe very early every morning before any in his family, betwixt three and four o'clock in the ſummer, and at five in the winter, and then ſpent an hour or two in private, before he rang the bell to awaken the reſt of his family; in his ſecret prayers, he uſed to make mention of every one in his family, and eſpecially as their occaſions and affections required, and gave thanks for ſuch mercies, as either he or they had received: then he meditated upon ſome part of God's word or works, wherewith he ſeaſoned his mind in the morning; then he wrote out fair, part of ſome ſermon that he had heard lately before: then his family being up, and met together, he, with his heart, and his hands lift up to heaven, ſpake in this manner,

"Bleſſed Lord God, and our moſt merciful Father in Chriſt Jeſus, we thy poor children do humbly beſeech thee graciouſly to aſſiſt us by thy holy Spirit in this our morning exerciſe, that we may faithfully perform the ſame to thy praiſe, and our comfort, and that for Chriſt his ſake, our only Saviour and Redeemer: Amen.

This ſet form of ſhort prayer he uſed morning and evening before his exerciſe, to convince their ignorance, which deny the lawfulneſs of them; then he with his family ſung a pſalm, with which exerciſe he was much delighted, and oftentimes ſo raviſhed therewith in his ſpirit, that his heart would even ſpring, and leap in his body; yea, he was ſo affected with praiſing of God; that he took the word Hallelujah for his motto, and uſually wrote it in the firſt page of all his books; then he read a chapter himſelf out of the Bible in order; then himſelf alſo prayed with them, and that with ſuch power, feeling, fervency, ſincerity, faith, and humility, that he was oft much admired of them that heard him; he ſo wreſtled with God by prayers and tears, that he would not let him go, till he had prevailed, inſomuch that they ſeldom met again to pray, but he had ſome new and freſh cauſe of thankſgiving for the returns of his prayers.

In the evening he called them together again to the like ſervice, which he performed very religiouſly after the ſame manner, ſaving that after the chapter he propounded ſome wholeſome inſtructions to them, as the portion of ſcripture gave occaſion, whether to convince any error, or to confirm the truth; to rebuke ſin, or to inſtruct in the way of righteouſneſs, &c.

And the better to juſtify this his practice againſt oppoſers, he made collections out of the ſacred ſcriptures, out of the expoſitions, teſtimonies, and examples of godly and good men, concerning this point of the Maſter's duty, in teaching and inſtructing his family in the fear of God and faith of Chriſt. And leſt any ſhould think that hereby he entrenched too much upon the miniſter's office, and went beyond his line; they muſt know, that whatſoever he ſpake in this kind, he borrowed it of good men, or obtained it by ſerious ſtudy and meditation; got it by reading the ſcriptures, and good expoſitors, or by reviewing his notes of ſuch ſermons as he had heard upon thoſe ſcriptures, uſing all good and holy means to fit and furniſh himſelf with ſpiritual proviſions for that ſervice. Neither was his zeal confined within his own walls; for finding in the church of Tarvin, and his own chappel that antiently belonged to him, many ſuperſtitious images in the windows, which by their painted coats darkened the light of the church, and obſcured the brightneſs of the goſpel, he cauſed all thoſe painted puppets to be pulled down in a peaceable manner, and at his own coſt glazed the windows again. And for his encouragement and juſtification he had not only the word of God, but the queen's injunctions authorizing and requiring the ſame. And his heart was ſo enlarged towards God, with zeal for his glory and his peoples good, that it was the joy of his ſoul to bring in godly and able miniſters amongſt them, almoſt every Lord's day, into the public aſſembly, and that of his own coſt and labour, which he did with a chearful heart, honouring God with his ſubſtance, by giving maintainance to ſuch as were the Lord's labourers in his harveſt: and though many ſlighted it, yet was it no diſcouragement to him, neither was he weary of well-doing, whoſe practice will ſhame ſuch, as being entruſted with the lands and livings of the church for the maintainance of the miniſtry, do turn their patronage into pillage, and their devotion into ſacrilege, robbing the miniſters of their means, and the people of their ſpiritual proviſion.

Anno 1590, having provided for his pariſh a worthy preacher, the people, though they admired his gifts, yet would not ſo much as thank him for his pains, which was a great diſcouragement to the miniſter. Hereupon Mr Bruen withdrew his preacher into his own chappel, to make the people more to prize the word by the want of it. Then reſorted many to him, ſome to the chappel to feed their ſouls, and many into the hall to feed their bellies, to his no ſmall coſt, and yet great comfort, becauſe religion increaſed thereby. But after a while, at the importunity of Chriſtian friends, he reſtored him to the public congregation, maintaining him, and other preachers after him, till by the death of the incumbent, God eſtabliſhed a faithful paſtor among them.

And whereas the people of Tarvin had a bad cuſtom of keeping wakes upon the Sabbath-day, at which times there was much prophaneneſs practiſed, to the diſhonour of God, by banqueting drinking, dancing, &c. This godly gentleman ſtudying to remedy this great evil, againſt that time, every year, provided three of the beſt affected miniſters in the country, who ſpent moſt part of three days in preaching and praying in the church, ſo that the pipers, fidlers, bearwards, players and gameſters had no time left them for their vanities, but went away with great fretting; yet multitudes of well affected people filled the town and the church, much rejoicing before God, and theſe he feaſted at his houſe alſo, ſo that at one of theſe times he ſpent in his houſe a fat beef and a half in the ſpace of three days, upon godly and well affected people. And this he did for divers years together, till by degrees he had wearied out thoſe profane wakes.

Hereupon he began to be admired for his fervency in the profeſſion of the goſpel, and practice of true religion, inſomuch that divers gentlemen of the beſt rank deſired to ſojourn in his houſe, for their better information in the way of God: one of which at his firſt coming would by no means endure to be reproved for his faults, but how it was afterwards with him, Mr Bruen thus left it upon record; "After a while, having the one hundred and fortyfirſt pſalm for our evening exerciſe, divers of my family did uſually give notes, being godly and well affected, and they all concluded together that every one of them ſhould ſpeak upon the fifth verſe, 'Let the righteous reprove me,' &c. And myſelf gave the laſt note, after which he never reſiſted any more.

And whereas, in thoſe days, the Lord was pleaſed, in compaſſion to his people, to raiſe up and eſtabliſh many holy exerciſes of religion in Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, which were maintained monthly by the godly labours of the faithful miniſters of Chriſt in thoſe parts with much comfortable ſucceſs. Mr Bruen frequented theſe exerciſes, and with great care and conſcience he ſtored himſelf with their treaſures, and lighted his candle at their torches, whereby he was better enabled, and more furniſhed to ſet forwards religion in his family, and elſewhere, as occaſion was offered. In frequenting theſe exerciſes, he took much pains, riding early and late, in heat and cold, and through foul ways, ſometimes ten, twenty, yea thirty miles, to his great charges alſo. Theſe ſermons he wrote diligently, repeated them as he went home; and for about thirty ſix years together, at home, he wrote over again the ſubſtance of theſe exerciſes, whereby he left to the heirs of his family ſo many volumes of manuſcripts, ſet up orderly in his ſtudy, as is ſcarce credible, which he charged them to read over, if it were but once in their lives. He uſed the miniſters whereſoever he came marvellous kindly, commending their pains, rejoicing in their labours, and many times defraying their charges; always encouraging them with gracious and ſweet words. Yea, this kindneſs of his extended to all the profeſſors of religion, even to the weakeſt and pooreſt Chriſtian that he obſerved to frequent theſe exerciſes.

In the midſt of theſe ſweet comforts, the Lord was pleaſed to exerciſe him with a great affliction, by taking away with a ſtroke his dear wife and faithful yoke-fellow; yet did the Lord ſo ſanctify this affliction to him, that by the power of grace, and Chriſtian wiſdom, he moderated his affections, and ſubdued his paſſions, not mourning as a man without hope, but aſſuring himſelf that his loſs was her gain; after which, finding that he ſtood in need of marriage for the comfort of his life, and neceſſity of his family, he ſought by prayer a prudent wife from God; and the Lord was pleaſed to anſwer his prayers, by providing for him Mrs Ann Fox, deſcended of an antient and worſhipful family in Lancaſhire, a gentlewoman as beautiful by grace within, as amiable in face without, and one very well reported of in the church of God: her, therefore, with the joint conſent of herſelf and friends, he married; and the firſt year her mother would needs give them her table, during which time he was as careful to do good to that family, as if it had been his own houſe, and he quickened himſelf and them to prayer and praiſe, reading the ſcripture, ſinging of pſalms, holy conference, catechiſing, &c. concerning which himſelf thus writes: 'My mother-in-law tabling of us for a year, we ſet up the exerciſes of religion morning and evening; in which time, through God's grace, my mother in-law got ſaving grace, and my ſiſter-in law, now Mrs Hinde, and another half ſiſter of her's, and their brothers, Meſſ. William and Thomas Fox, a ſervant or two, and ſome neighbours; bleſſed be God for it, &c.

At the year's end, he brought home his beloved wife to Stapleford, where they lived in great peace and love; and being well ſettled, there were many of the greateſt gentlemen in the country that ſued to him, ſome for themſelves, ſome for their children, to be entertained into his family; and hereby his houſe became a nurſery for religion, a vineyard which the Lord bleſſed to bear trees of righteouſneſs, and fruits of holineſs. Towards theſe his manner was, when they came firſt into his family, to try their diſpoſitions and inclinations, and how tractable they were like to be to good duties and practices; for which end he carefully obſerved their ways, ſaw much and ſaid little, bore and forbore, as occaſion required; taking ſpecial notice of any good they ſaid or did, and paſſing over many leſſer faults, till he had fitter opportunity to reclaim them. Amongſt others, one young gentleman could not well away with the ſtrict obſervation of the Sabbath; 'Whereupon (ſaith he) we did all conſpire to do him good, ten of my family ſpeaking one after another, and myſelf laſt, for the ſanctifying the Lord's day; after which he did very cheerfully yield himſelf, bleſſed be God.'

At another time (ſaith he) coming into his chamber, I found over the mantletree a pair of new cards, and no body being by, I took out the four knaves, and ſo laid them there again: but for want of ſuch knaves his game was marred, and he never played in my houſe after. And in like manner (ſaith he) twenty years before, being in one of my ſtudies, and ſeeing a pair of tables under my feet, I took them, with the men, dice, and all the cards I found, and put them into an oven that was then in heating; and hereby he rid them out of his houſe. And to juſtify his deteſtation of theſe games, he ſet down in writing theſe collections.

1. All games depending upon hazard or chance are to be eſchewed.

2. The prince of devils firſt invented them, and the place was hell.

3. Such gameſters were held and accounted for infamous perſons, uncapable of any office, and unworthy any benefit of law.

4. Dicers, harlots, and thieves, be of one hall and corporation; and the more cunning in this art, the more wicked in their lives and manners.

5. All gain by gaming is, turpe lucrum, plain thievery, worſe than uſury.

6. All play at dice is plain lottery, which to uſe idly or triflingly, is a ſin againſt the third and ninth commandment.

7. There is no recreation of body or mind in theſe games, unleſs it be in deſire and hope of gain, by another man's loſs, which is unlawful.

8. Cards ſeem leſs evil than tables; but there is never a barrel better herring, there is ſo much craft in packing, &c.

9. There are mix'd games, conſiſting partly of lottery, partly of wit, and are oftentimes maintained with tricks of couſenage and knavery.

10. The coat-cards were in times paſt the images of their idols.

11. We ſhould abſtain from ſuch games; 1. Becauſe they never were nor are of any good report in the church. 2. There is a great appearance of evil in them. 3. The command of the magiſtrate forbids them, by the name of unlawful games. 4. They tend not to God's glory. 5. They are cauſes of much hurt to our neighbours, and occaſions of many ſins and ſorrows to the gameſters and their families, &c.

And therefore, for the preventing of theſe miſchiefs, and to exerciſe the heads and hearts of his family and of ſuch as came occaſionally to his houſe, he bought two goodly fair bibles, and ſet them upon two deſks, one in his hall, the other in his parlour.

About this time there being a defect in the public miniſtry, he procured a faithful miniſter of Chriſt to be a preacher at Tarvin, whoſe miniſtry being very powerful and profitable, he ſo much delighted in him, that he maintained him and his family very bountifully, and entertained him kindly.

About this time the fame of Mr Bruen coming to Mr Perkins, who hearing of his excellent parts, and pains in the profeſſion of religion, and exerciſes in his family, and of his government in his houſe, and the religion of his ſervants; being raviſhed with heavenly joy, and ſtricken with an holy admiration at the hearing of it, he brake out into theſe ſpeeches; 'Certainly this is no other than the houſe of God, and for the practice and power of religion, the very top-ſail of England.

His fame ſpreading ſtill more and more, many gentlemen ſought to him, to ſojourn with him; and, at the requeſts of his friends, he entertained divers families, and perſonages of great place; many of which, during their abode with him, were truly converted, others convinced, and all much reformed in their lives.

But in the midſt of theſe ſweet comforts, the Lord again ſent a tempeſt of grief and ſorrow, by taking away his gracious yoke-fellow, which not long after cauſed a diſſolving of his family, and a diſperſing of that whole company, company, to their no ſmall grief; concerning which himſelf thus writes:

'When it pleaſed God to take away my wife from me, then all mourned for her loſs; as alſo, becauſe all my tablers muſt now part, being about the number of one and twenty: But we did ſtill ſo well accord, and ſo loath were we to part aſunder, that I requeſted them to ſtay with me that quarter more, which was very thankfully accepted: In which time we had much comfort but mourned often to think of the quarter's end; and the laſt day, ſitting at dinner together, all were ſo full of heavineſs, that there was no meat eaten, ſo that I was forced to hide myſelf, and could not take leave of them,' &c.

'Then (ſaith he) I lived a ſingle life five years and an half; and being in debt, and having four daughters, and divers ſons to diſpoſe of, by advice of friends, I gave over houſe, and went to live at Cheſter for a ſeaſon: Mr Biſield, a godly and powerful preacher, being miniſter there at that time; and there I lived three years, having the company of Mr Biſield, and his wife, every Wedneſday and Friday at dinner with me, which were his lecture days, with ſome other good company beſides. In which time God ſtirred up the hearts of many of my neighbours to come to prayers with us; which meetings were at firſt traduced by ſome: yet, after a while, being well known what they were, no fault was found.

In this time it pleaſed the Lord Almighty to give a great bleſſing, all praiſe to his holy name; many converted, many confirmed, and many convinced. In theſe three years God alſo gave me a great bleſſing in my outward eſtate: I paid all my debt: I married two of my daughters, and paid their portions: I preferred a ſon or two: I maintained the poor in my own pariſh in the country, allowing them all the profit of my two mills: I maintained the poor in Cheſter, both at my gates, and otherwiſe weekly, as I was rated. All humble and hearty thanks be given unto God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, for evermore. Amen.

The three years being expired, he returned home to Stapleford, and encouraging himſelf in the ways of God, he daily performed theſe four duties: Firſt, Meditation for the increaſe of knowlege, and good affections towards God and good things: and for his help herein, he carried about with him ſome part of the Bible, or notes of ſermons when he went into the fields. Within doors he read much in the ſcriptures, and made collections of the promiſes, precepts, comforts, prohibitions, &c. and theſe he made the ſubject of his meditations: for this end alſo he read oft the works of divers learned men, and drew into heads and common places what was moſt worthy obſervation in them; and he found much benefit by theſe meditations, as the killing of noiſome luſts, the diſlodging of many worldly cares; it wrought in him a godly care over his thoughts, words, and actions; a gracious aptneſs to, and chearfulneſs in holy duties; it miniſtered to him counſel and ſtrength for ſpiritual combats; it brought him to an heaven upon earth, and made him go about earthly affairs with an heavenly mind; it kept his heart in poſſeſſion of his integrity, whereby he kept faith and a good conſcience in every thing; it wrought his ſoul to a gracious tenderneſs, lowlineſs, and meekneſs; it enabled him whereſoever he came, to leave a ſweet ſavour of his graces and virtues behind him; and it was as a ſovereign preſervative againſt all inticements and allurements to ſin.

In the next place, he was very careful to obſerve God's works, both of mercy and judgment; for which end he obſerved and recorded many of them: Hear him ſpeaking in his own words:

Some few years before my brother Hardware died, he had a man ſervant (as many thought) bewitched, and grew daily weaker and weaker, ſo that my brother ſent to me and my family to ſpend a day with him in faſting and prayer: at that time I had good Mr Watts the preacher with me. We went to the houſe, where we found the man very ſick and weak, and like an anatomy, having nothing but ſkin and bones, not like to live a day longer. He was brought and laid in a bed in the chamber where we prayed, and the ſame evening he began to amend; the next morning he walked abroad, and the third day was ſo ſtrong that he fell to his work and labour: All laud and praiſe to God for it.

Anno 1601, my ſervant going with his cart laden, fell down, and the wheels, being iron-bound, went over his leg, yet hurt him not at all. Laus Deo, Praiſed be God.

Anno 1602, my ſon John going into the field, took up a ſythe to ſee how he could mow, the ſythe entered into his ſtocking to the ſhin-bone, ſhaving the hair, and came out at the backſide of his leg, and touched no fleſh nor ſkin. Laus Deo, Praiſed be God.

Anno 1603, one that dwelt in my farm in Wimble Stafford, ſeeing two godly perſons going in the way, ſaid to one with him, 'I will dance, and ſwagger, and ſwear, to anger yonder two puritans;' and ſo he did to their great grief. But preſently the revenging hand of God was upon him, ſo that immediately he fell ſick, was carried home in a cart; and within three days died moſt fearfully. All glory to God.

But he took the greateſt pains in recording the paſſages about a boy about twelve years old at Norwich, who was ſo ſtrangely and wonderfully afflicted and tormented, that many held him to be really poſſeſſed with the devil; about this he wrote much: ſome of the paſſages were theſe;

'By his torments he was brought ſo low, weak, and feeble, that he was almoſt nothing but ſkin and bones, yet for the ſpace of four and twenty hours every day (having one half hour reſpite, which they called his awaking time, and wherein they gave him a little food); he was of that extraordinary ſtrength, that if he folded his hands together, no man could pull them aſunder; if he rolled his head, or toſſed his whole body, (as uſually he did) no man could ſtay or reſtrain him. He would, to the great aſtoniſhment of the hearers, howl like a dog, mew like a cat, roar like a bear, froth like a boar. When any prayed with him, his paſſions were ſtrongeſt, and his rage and violence greateſt, ready to fly in their faces, and to drown their voices by his yellings and outcries. If one came near him with a Bible, though under his cloak, and never ſo ſecret, he would run upon him, and uſe great violence to get it from him, and when he could get away any, he rent them in pieces; ſometimes he would lie along, as if he had been ſtark dead, his colour gone, and mouth ſo wide open, that he would on a ſudden thruſt both his hands into it; and, notwithſtanding his great weakneſs, he would leap and ſkip from his bed to the window, from the window to the table, and ſo to bed again; and that with ſuch agility as no tumbler could do the like. And yet all this while his legs were grown up cloſe to his buttocks, ſo that he could not uſe them. Sometimes we ſaw his chin drawn up to his noſe, that his mouth could ſcarce be ſeen: ſometimes his chin and forehead drawn almoſt together like a bended bow; his countenance fearful by yawning, mewing, &c.

'The biſhop hearing of the ſtrange torments of this poor child, ſent for him; his parents brought him, and once the biſhop prayed with him, but the boy was ſo outragious that he flew out of his bed, and ſo frighted the biſhop's men, that one of them fell into a ſwoon, and the biſhop was glad to lay hold on the boy, who ramped at the window to have gotten out: Hereupon this biſhop granted a licence for a private faſt in the child's father's houſe, for his help and releaſe; which accordingly was performed by two godly miniſters, and by Mr Bruen with divers others; yet God gave not deliverance at that time.

When he was in his fits, without underſtanding and knowlege of what he did or ſaid, he would often ſay;

Jeſus ſaith, (for ſo he began all his ſpeeches) the devil when he comes takes away my hearing, ſeeing, underſtanding, hands, legs, that I ſhould have no ſenſes nor limbs to glorify God withal.

Jeſus ſaith, If they would have caſt out the evil ſpirit, they ſhould have come better provided.

Jeſus ſaith, I have but three devils; it's like one of the ſpirits will go out of me, and take counſel of a great number of foul ſpirits, and come again and trouble me worſe.

God pulls back the devil with a ring in his noſe, yet the devil ſhakes my faith as if it would go out of me.

Well, theſe drunkards and whoremaſters do not think upon their ſins: well, how then? There is no drunkard that doth drink one ſpoonful, or drop of drink more than will ſuffice nature, but the devil doth pen it down in his book; book; well, it is a great book, and he doth keep it close till the day of judgment, and then he will lay it to their faces, at which time the hills will tremble and quake, and the devil will quake, yea, he doth quake for fear already.

Well, some would think it a great while to be bound with the devil a year or two, as I am; but it is better to be so, than to wallow in drunkenness, swearing and whoring: for the devil works in their souls.

Jesus saith, They say he shall not out of me: but when God comes he will strike home.

Many other of these strange speeches did he utter, which for brevity's sake are here omitted, though recorded by Mr Bruen.

Mr Bruen, besides his family duties mentioned before, used private prayer very often, yet not confining himself to any place within, or without doors for it, but taking his fittest opportunity, as time and place best accorded; about his own house he had divers places which interchangeably he used for this purpose, not frequenting one, lest he should be suspected of hypocrisy, or vain-glory; and as he made choice of the place, so of the time also, which he constantly set apart every day for private prayer; seven times a day did he practise this duty; first, in the morning before any of his family rose, next after family prayer, before his breakfast; then immediately before dinner; then a little while after dinner; then a little before supper; then not long after supper; lastly, a little before he went to bed; and as he was frequent, so was he, thro' God's grace, powerful in these his prayers: and hereunto, upon extraordinary occasions, he added fasting, which he observed with so great austerity, that he much weakened his body thereby: and as it is recorded of St. James the apostle, so was it true of this gentleman, that his knees were grown very senseless and hard with much and frequent kneeling: in these his private prayers his principal aim was to search his heart, examine his life, confess and bewail his special sins and infirmities, craving pardon for them, and power against them; as also for sins or afflictions in his family; he mourned for the sins of Sion, and for the afflictions of Joseph, and desolations of Jerusalem: he afflicted his heart for the barrenness and backsliding of professors, for their embracing the world, forsaking their first love; to which he added praise and thanksgiving for mercies; he daily laboured to be more and more renewed in the spirit of his mind, in knowlege, righteousness and holiness, according to the image of him that created him; whilst his commoration was on earth, his conversation was in heaven; he had an holy resolution, so to use the world, as neither abusing of it, nor being abused by it, but to keep himself unspotted from it; he had a full purpose to keep his heart always in God's presence, knowing and believing that he heard all his words, and beheld all his works; he used a constant and conscionable striving against all sin, especially the sins of the times and places wherein he lived: he had a godly desire in all companies either to do good to others, or to receive good from others; a full purpose to deal justly and uprightly with all men, doing no other to them, than he would have them do to him; a charitable disposition to take doubtful things in the best sense, so far as he might, without wounding his own conscience, or offending others; he was slow to speak, swift to hear; he utterly renounced the vain conformities of the world, neither following the fashions, nor serving the humours of vain or vile persons, nor staying in their company longer than needs must; his care was to cut off all occasions of variance, and strife, with all speed that might be.

He laboured for an holy contentedness of mind, by entertaining all crosses with patience, and turning them to their best use, and imbracing all comforts with thanksgiving, bringing forth the right and proper fruits of them: he would not be easily provoked by indignities, and injuries, he had rather forgive twenty wrongs, than revenge one: he was willing to purchase his peace, sometimes with his own loss, if otherwise he could not procure it: he used to shut his ears against tale-bearers, the seedsmen of strife, and firebrands of contention; ordinarily he recompenced evil with good, frowardness with kindness, and passion with moderation and good affection: a neighbour gentleman conceiving a great displeasure against him upon a very small occasion, in a great ruff sent his man to him to inhibit him from coming upon his land, either himself, or any of his family, upon their peril; to whom Mr Bruen presently answered; tell your master from me, that if he or any of his family will come upon any part of my ground at their pleasures, they shall be welcome, and if he will come to my house, he shall be much more welcome; which gracious and kind answer did so melt the heart of his adversary, that he presently brake forth into tears, reconciled himself to him, and became his true and faithful friend ever after; he was also very careful to prevent or remove all occasions of variance, and strife amongst neighbours, and friends, both near and far from home.

Naturally he was passionate, and hasty, but having his sin pardoned in the blood of Christ, and having gotten power over it, his nature was healed, his passions subdued, and his frowardness was changed into mildness: he was of an ingenuous facility, either to be perswaded to any thing that was good, or to be disswaded from any thing that was evil: an honourable judge in open court having a complaint made to him against Mr Bruen, of some wrong that he did, by a water course to his mills: out of that good opinion he held of him, said: I cannot think but that you wrong Mr Bruen, I will undertake for him, make him but sensible of any wrong that he hath done, and he shall willingly acknowlege it, and make you double amends for it.

Also there was forty shillings given to the parish of Tarvin, which being lent abroad, through neglect, was lost, whereupon the church wardens, and some neighbours requested him by himself and his friends to make it up again, to which he presently answered, that he would not press upon any mans purse for that matter, and so he gave them the money himself, which though not much, yet more than most gentlemen would have done in such a case: he saw none that were without the means of grace, but the bowels of compassion yerned in him, pitying the misery that was upon them: he saw none occasionally at their heathenish sports, and sinful pastimes, but he looked angrily upon them, and spake roughly to them, yet withall, inwardly mourning for the hardness of their hearts: if occasionally he met with mockers, contemners of God, and despisers of good things, he would not cast pearls before swine, but turn away his face, and not so much as salute them: if any poor soul erred from the right way, and yet desired a guide; how careful was he of their good? how joyful to do them good: yea, to encourage and draw on such, he would give them money, corn, Bibles, catechisms and other good books, which he had always by him for such purposes: if a professor of religion fell into decay, he would relieve him by his own, and other good means: sometimes he would take off a good suit of apparel from his own back, and bestow it upon a godly poor man that wanted it, and withal give him a good sum of money out of his purse to accommodate him in his calling: he was much given to hospitality, and to entertain strangers; his house was the common inn of God's children that came near him: none so welcome to eat of his morsels as such strangers, as were no strangers in Israel: many that passed betwixt Ireland and England, and that came upon business to Chester, horsemen and others, would take up his house for their lodging place, that they might comfort and rejoice their hearts in seeing his face, hearing his voice, and conferring and advising with him: his ordinary table was bountiful, and plentiful, not to excess, but to a very competent sufficiency, and for the furtherance of it, he had a great flight of pigeons, a warren of connies, delicate fish ponds, besides other ordinary provision about his house: yet would he not suffer any wilful waste or abuse of God's good creatures; his cellar was open and free to any, as far as they kept themselves within the bounds of moderation; he did usually fill the bellies of great multitudes, which out of his own and other parishes resorted to him for that end; and in the dear years he made provision for them almost every day in the week, and would sometimes serve them himself; both to keep them in good order, and equally to distribute according to their necessities; his purse was ever open to give, or lend freely to such as would borrow: his admonition was, 'Remember your promise, and pay again if you will borrow again;' and if any that borrowed were willing, but not able to pay, he would rather forgive the debt than exact it.

In the time of a great dearth, fearing that divers of his poor neighbours were in want, taking the opportunity when moſt of his family were gone abroad to a religious exerciſe, he ſent for his neighbours, and diſtributed fourteen buſhels of corn amongſt them: yea, the loyns of the poor did bleſs him, being warmed with the fleece of his flock, or clothed by the coſt of his purſe; every year againſt Winter, he beſtowed four or five pound in making proviſion to clothe the poor; yea he was a protector to the poor, to deliver him out of the hands of thoſe that were too ſtrong for them; he was a counſellor to defend their righteous cauſe, and to plead for them.

He held always a gracious harmony in judgment with all ſuch divines and profeſſors of religion as were moſt ſound in the truth; he religiouſly ſympathized with the church in all her afflictions.

When he heard evil tidings out of Bohemia, Hungary, Germany, the Palatinate, &c. he ſat down as Nehemiah, and wept, and mourned certain days, and faſted and prayed before the God of heaven; he was frequent in viſiting the ſick, and ſuch families as had the extraordinary hand of God upon them; if any were troubled in conſcience, moleſted by Satan, terrified by God's judgments, happy was he that could get Mr Bruen to come to him, his very preſence was ſome eaſe and refreſhing to them: and as his gifts in prayer, and pains were great, ſo was the iſſue and ſucceſs thereof (through God's bleſſing) many times very effectual, either for full releaſe, or ſome relief at leaſt; he himſelf recorded divers mercies obtained of God by his prayers, the glory whereof he doth ever in great humility aſcribe to the Lord, giving him hearty thanks for manifeſting his grace and power to ſo weak creatures, by ſo weak means; being on a time at the ſheriff's table, there was a health begun to the prince, and there were great lords preſent, but when it came to Mr Bruen, he ſaid, You may drink to his health, and I will pray for his health, but drink for mine own health, and ſo I wiſh you may do for yours, and ſo he paſſed it over, not yielding to any of the ſolemn ceremonies in that act: he was a great enemy to the profane cuſtoms and corruptions uſed in great houſes, and would not ſpare to admoniſh his friends by word or writing to reform the ſame.

He was very merciful in his dealing with his tenants, not grinding the faces of the poor by great fines, nor cruſhing their bones by heavy rents and racks, nor break their backs with cruel ſervices, nor did he uſe their beaſts without hire, nor their labour without wages; but it was the joy of his heart to ſee his tenants proſper; his whole life was a meditation of death, and a continual preparation for it; and in his declining days, when he ſaw that he was drawing on towards his journey's end, his faith was exceedingly increaſed, his hope and rejoicing in God much enlarged, his love and zeal wonderfully inflamed, his affections towards God and his people more holy and heavenly, and his motions towards heaven more quick and lively than before: the day before his laſt ſickneſs, he roſe very early in the morning, went into his ſtudy to his private prayer, then came forth and prayed with his family, then returned into his ſtudy till dinner time; and after dinner went into his ſtudy again, where it pleaſed God after two hours to viſit him, as it were, with an ague, whereupon he laid himſelf down upon a bed; his wife ſaid to him, Sir, I fear you have done yourſelf hurt with riſing ſo early; to whom he replied, If you had ſeen, wife, ſuch glorious things as I ſaw this morning, being in private prayer with God, you would not have ſaid ſo, for they were ſo wonderful and unſpeakable, that whether I was in the body or out of the body with Paul, I cannot tell, thus it hath pleaſed God, leſt I ſhould be too much exalted by this glorious ſight, to give me a buffet in the fleſh: the like raviſhing in ſpirit, and ſuch glorious ſights, he ſaw not long before (as he acquainted ſome private friends) after he had been one day in private prayer with God in his grove; whence he had a ſtrong perſuaſion, that he ſhould not live long, before he made a glorious change of this life, with a better; and for this end he cleared up his evidences for heaven, and confirmed his aſſurance of his right thereunto: this his confidence was his comfort in all his ſickneſs, which drew from him many ſuch heavenly ſpeeches.

"O how great is thy goodneſs, O Lord, which thou haſt laid up for them that fear thee, which thou haſt wrought for them that truſt in thee, before the ſons of men.

"O how precious are thy thoughts to me, O God! O how great is the ſum of them! if I ſhall count them, they are more in number than the ſand; when I awake I am ever with thee.

"Thou ſhalt guide me with thy counſel, and afterwards receive me to glory; whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth that I deſire beſides thee; my fleſh and my heart faileth, but God is the ſtrength of my heart, and my portion for ever; I know whom I have believed, and I am perſwaded that he is able to keep that which I have commited to him againſt that day; O love the Lord all ye his ſaints, for the Lord preſerveth the faithful, &c. as the heart panteth after the water brooks, ſo panteth my heart after thee O God; my ſoul thirſteth for God for the living God: O when ſhall I come and appear before God; O let him kiſs me with the kiſſes of his mouth, for thy love is better than wine, &c."

Theſe, and many hundred more of theſe divine ſpeeches did he utter in the time of his ſickneſs; and though his bodily infirmity grew upon him, yet would he by no means be kept from the houſe of God, ſo long as he could either go or ride: and when he went to church, beſides his family, he uſed to call his tenants, and neighbours that dwelt in his way, to go along with him, and then calling them about him, they uſed with one heart and voice to ſing Pſalms, eſpecially the 84. Pſal. and he with his train came to church conſtantly before prayers, and divine ſervice began that he might the more comfortably join with the congregation in the confeſſion of ſin, in prayer, praiſe, reading, ſinging, hearing, receiving of the ſacraments, all which he performed with moſt reverend attention, and gracious affection: after the morning ſermon he uſually ſtayed in the church amongſt other good people, and ſpent the time in repeating the ſermon, ſinging of Pſalms, and holy conference: after evening ſermon he returned home, attended with his company with much joy, and endeavouring as they went to encreaſe their knowlege, faith, obedience, &c.

In his family he was ſo full of life and zeal, that many that lived near him, came to hear him repeat the ſermons, and pour out his prayers unto God; and the joy and comfort that he found in theſe duties were ſuch, that he would often ſay, O that every day were a Sabbath, or a Faſt day, for then I ſhould be well: the week days were more tedious to him, his bodily infirmity encreaſing, and his ſtrength decaying; yet would he quicken his ſoul, and raiſe up his heart by faith and hope, often ſaying; the time is not long, I muſt ſhortly lay down this my tabernacle, and then I ſhall get the ſtart of you all, and ſhall celebrate an everlaſting Sabbath before the Lord, with his holy Angels, and bleſſed ſaints, in the higheſt heavens: he grew daily more and more weary of the world; he ſet his houſe in order, and then wholly ſet himſelf to think and ſpeak of ſpiritual and heavenly things: when any came to viſit him he would often ſay, 'Alas good ſouls, what are you come to ſee, a poor wretch, a worm, and no man, or a poor dying man, &c.' and when any told him of hopes of recovery, he would ſay, 'My taſk is ended, the Lord hath no more work for me to do, my warfare is accompliſhed, my race is run out, I now only hope and wait for that crown of righteouſneſs which Chriſt hath purchaſed, and God hath promiſed to me:' to his Chriſtian friends he would give theſe admonitions, to hold on, and to hold out, to be ſtedfaſt in their profeſſions, not to be weary of well-doing, to grow in grace, &c. And for their greater encouragement, he would tell them, that when he firſt began to profeſs religion, there were almoſt none in the whole ſhire that were acquainted with the power and practiſe of it, &c. 'I was, ſaid he, a wonder of the world, and a monſter of men, and many did bend their tongues like bows for lies, and did ſhoot their arrows, even bitter words againſt me, and yet for all this that came upon me, I did not forget the name of my God, &c. But, bleſſed be God, the number of believers in this county is much enlarged, every quarter and corner of it being filled with the ſweet favour of the goſpel, &c. Therefore, my dearly beloved, ſtand faſt in the faith, quit you like men, be ſtrong, be ſtedfaſt and unmoveable, &c.

Alſo, though his affliction and ſickneſs encreaſed, yet were not his conſolations diminiſhed, though he was feeble in the fleſh, yet ſtrong in the ſpirit. No pains of his body, nor pangs of approaching death, did half ſo much trouble him, as the inward refreſhings of God's holy ſpirit did make his conſolations to abound. Afterwards his weakneſs encreaſed, by reaſon of a ſtopping in his breaſt and throat, ſo that he could not take down any liquid thing, but he was ready to faint away.

About this time a worthy knight coming to viſit him, could not refrain from many tears; which he obſerving, ſaid to him, 'Good Sir, weep not for me; for there is no cauſe of weeping, but of much rejoicing in my behalf; turn your tears into prayers, and let me enjoy that fruit of your love, &c. You are in your way, I am at my journey's end; walk on, as hitherto you have done, and the Lord will be with you; he will never fail you, nor forſake you.

To his eldeſt ſon he gave many wholeſome inſtructions, and gracious exhortations, praying for him, and bleſſing his children, encouraging them to be conſtant in religion, commanding them to uphold the worſhip and ſervice of God, both in the public aſſembly and private family.

A little before his death, there came two godly miniſters to him, of his ſpecial acquaintance, whoſe preſence much cheered him, to whom he ſaid: I am here, you ſee, the Lord's priſoner, caſt upon the bed of my ſickneſs, and in great affliction, yet waiting upon the mercies of my God, for a comfortable releaſe in due ſeaſon: and being aſked by them, whether his conſolations did not abound in the midſt of all his afflictions; he anſwered, yes, I thank God they do, and do far exceed them: yea, and that which is more remarkable, the Lord of his mercy hath given me ſuch ſtrong evidence of his favour and love in Chriſt, that I am not troubled in mind or conſcience with any doubts or fears, or any other ſatanical moleſtations or tentations, but reſt and wait in patience for the accompliſhing his mercies upon me, according to his good pleaſure towards me: then he deſired them to pray with him, and raiſing up himſelf in his bed, with his heart and hands lift up to God in the heavens, he did, as it were, reach after the petitions that were made for him, often with a cheerful conſent, ſaying, amen, amen. He continued in great pain of body, but in great peace of mind, increaſing ſtill in conſolations, and bearing his ſickneſs and pains with admirable patience, not ſhewing the leaſt diſcontent in word or deed: when they took their leave of him, they mingled their ſorrows, tears, and prayers together, and ſo parted: he was never quiet, unleſs he were either meditating, or praying himſelf, or had ſome godly man, or ſome good miniſter praying with him: the morning before his death, divers of his friends took their leave of him, deſiring at their parting a bleſſing from him, which he did willingly expreſs, by lifting up his hands and heart unto heaven for them: and not long after, hearing ſome making motion of blacks, he ſaid: 'I will have no blacks, I love no proud nor pompous funeral, neither is there any cauſe of mourning, but of rejoicing rather in my particular:' immediately before his death, lifting up his hands, he ſaid: 'The Lord is my portion, my help, and my truſt: his bleſſed Son Jeſus Chriſt is my Saviour and Redeemer, amen, even ſo ſaith the Spirit unto my ſpirit: therefore come Lord Jeſus, and kiſs me with the kiſſes of thy mouth, and embrace me with the arms of thy love: into thy hands do I commend my ſpirit, O come now, and take me to thine own ſelf: O come Lord Jeſus, come quickly, O come, O come:' and ſo his ſpirit fainting, and ſpeech failing, he meekly and graciouſly yielded up his precious ſoul into the hands of God his Father, anno Chriſti 1625. and of his age ſixty five.

Not long before his laſt ſickneſs, myſelf being with him; amongſt other diſcourſe, he told me, that when he firſt procured the ſetting up of an exerciſe at Tarvin, he was exceeding ſolicitous to procure all the eminenteſt miniſters in thoſe parts of the kingdom to ſupply it, which coming many miles, they were divers times hindered by foul weather, floods, or ſome ſudden accident or other, ſo that at a very ſhort warning, he was forced many times to get ſome honeſt neighbour miniſters to ſupply their places, and uſually he, and moſt of the congregation found more edification, and comfort by the labours of thoſe honeſt plain preachers, than they did by the ſermons of ſuch as were far more eminent for parts: 'Whereupon, ſaid he, to me, I reſolved to give over my former courſe, and to content myſelf, with godly neighbouring miniſters, ſeeing God had ſhewed me, that it was not the greatneſs of mens parts, who were much admired every where, but the efficacy of the Spirit, which makes the word effectual and profitable.'

[Collected out of that learned and elaborate work, written of his life and death, by Mr William Hind: wherein, beſides the hiſtory of Mr Bruen's Life, many theological points are occaſionally diſcuſſed.]

The Life of JOHN FOX, who died, Anno Chriſti, 1587.

JOHN FOX was born at Boſton in Lincolnſhire, anno Chriſti 1517. his father died when he was young, and his mother married again; yet his father in law and mother ſeeing his towardlineſs and aptneſs to learning, brought him up at ſchool, and afterwards ſent him to Braſen-Noſe college in Oxford, where he was chamber fellow with doctor Nowell, and being of a ſharp wit, and very induſtrious withal, he profited ſo much, that in a ſhort time he gat the admiration of all, and the love of many, whereupon he was choſen fellow of Magdalen college.

He much affected poetry, and wrote ſome Latin comedies of the hiſtories of the Bible in a copious and graceful ſtile in his youth: but afterwards betook himſelf more ſeriouſly to the ſtudy of divinity, and diſcovered himſelf to favour the reformation then in hand, when king Henry the VIII. aboliſhed the pope's ſupremacy. The firſt thing that cauſed him to queſtion the popiſh religion, was the contradictions in it, divers things, in their own natures moſt repugnant, being thruſt upon men at one time, both of them to be believed: hereupon he ſet himſelf to ſtudy the ancient and modern hiſtory of the church, which he performed with ſuch diligence, that before he was thirty years old, he had read over all that either the Greek or Latin fathers had written of it: as alſo the ſchoolmens diſputations, the councils acts, and the conſiſtories decrees, and acquired no mean ſkill in the Hebrew tongue: beſides his day's ſtudy, he beſtowed all, or a great part of the night in theſe labours, and many times in the dead of the night he choſe a ſolitary grove near the college to walk in for his meditations; and in them he ſuffered many combats and wreſtlings, yea many heavy ſighs, with tears, and prayers he poured out to almighty God in them: but hereupon grew ſuſpicion of him that he began to diſlike the popiſh religion, and ſnares were laid for him; and at laſt being examined, he was by the college convicted, condemned for an heretic, and expelled the houſe. His father-in-law alſo took this occaſion to manifeſt his diſlikes againſt him, that he might the better cheat him of his eſtate which of right belonged to him from his own father. Being thus left deſtitute of all human help and comfort, God took care for him, he being ſent for into Warwickſhire by ſir Thomas Lucie to live in his houſe, and teach his children: where alſo he married a wife, and continued till the fear of the popiſh inquiſitors drove him thence. His caſe was now more hard again, having a wife to provide for, and whither to go he knew not: at laſt he reſolved to go to her father, who was a citizen of Coventrie, and in the mean time by letters to try whether his father-in-law, that married his mother, would receive him, or not: whoſe anſwer was, 'That if he would alter his opinion (being condemned for a capital offence) he ſhould be welcome, otherwiſe it would be dangerous for him to entertain him long:' but his mother under-hand wrote to him to come; and ſo it pleaſed God that he found better entertainment and ſecurity in both places than he expected; for being ſometimes with his wife's father, and ſometimes with his father in law, he deceiv'd their diligence who enquired after him, and neither of his fathers grew weary of his company.

Afterwards he went to London towards the end of king Henry the VIII's reign; but having quickly spent there what his friends had bestowed on him, and what he had acquired by his own diligence, he began to be in want again. But behold God's providence. As he one day sat in Paul's church, spent with long fasting, his countenance thin, and his eyes hallow, after the gastful manner of dying men, every one shunning a spectacle of so much horror, there came one to him whom he had never seen before, and thrust an untold sum of money into his hand bidding him be of good chear, and to accept that small gift in good part from his country man which common courtesy had enforced him to offer; and that he should go and make much of himself; for that within a few days new hopes were at hand, and a more certain condition of livelihood. Mr Fox could never learn who this was, but three days after the dutchess of Richmond sent for him to live in her house, and to be tutor to the earl of Surrey's children, now under her care; and the two young lords profited so much under him, that afterwards the elder (Thomas) seemed to deserve more than the kingdom could give him; and the younger (Henry) was able to measure his fortunes, not by the opinion of others, but by his own satiety: and the young lady Jane profited so much in Greek and Latin, that she might well stand in competition with the most learned men of that age. In that family he continued the remainder of king Henry's reign, and all king Edward's, till the beginning of queen Mary's: when a storm of persecution arising, Mr Fox was sheltered from it by the duke his scholar. But when he saw all sorts of men troubled for religion's sake, so that there was nothing but flight, slaughter, and gibbets, and the Gardiner bishop of Winchester was his enemy, he began to think of some speedy way for his departure thence; which so soon as the duke knew, he disuaded him from it, affirming that it was neither agreeable to honour, nor modesty for him to suffer his tutor, so well deserving at his hands, to be taken from him. He told him that in flying, no kind of misery would be wanting; banishment, poverty, contempt, &c. and that though these were less evils then death, yet was it not come to such extremity, neither would he suffer that it should, saying, 'That he had yet wealth, and favour, and friends, and the fortune of his house; and if the mischance prevailed further, that himself would partake of the danger, and make the destruction common: that he remembred with what instructions he had fortified his younger years, neither had he with more attention hearkened thereto, than he would with constancy put them in practice:' Yet when the duke afterward perceived that he could no longer shelter him from the malice of Winchester, he provided all things necessary for his departure, sending to Ipswich to hire a bark, and whilst all things were making ready, he sent him to a farm house of one of his servants, with his wife, the companion of his travels, then great with child, who yet would not be perswaded to stay behind him.

He had in this bark scarce weighed anchor, when suddenly a rough wind troubled the sea with so great violence, that the stoutest mariners began to tremble; then followed a dark night, with such hail and rain, that hindred the seamens work, and took away all possibility of steering any longer by the compass: yet the next day towards evening with much difficulty they arrived again in the same haven from whence they set forth. In the mean time a pursivant with a warrant from the bishop of Winchester, had searched the farm, and pursued him to Ipswitch, but finding the bark already gone, was returned towards London. This Mr Fox being informed of as soon as he came to shoar, he presently took horse as if he would have left the town, but the same night returning, he bargained with the master of the ship with the first wind to set sail again, and the pilot loosed in the night's silence, as soon as the tide turned, though the sea was rough, and the winds blustring, and two days after (through the mercy of God) landed him safely at Newport haven, and after some few days refreshing himself at Newport, and those that were with him, they went to Antwerp, and from thence to Basil, which was a common refuge to many English in those times, most of which maintained themselves by over seeing the press, and correcting faults therein. To these Mr Fox joined himself, and having in his youth been accustomed to hardship, he was able to suffer want, sit up late, and to fare hardly: and during his abode there, notwithstanding he was so full of employment, yet he began his history of the acts and monuments of the church, which afterward he compleated in his own country: first he wrote it in Latin, and sent it to Basil to be printed, where it was much esteemed; and afterwards wrote it in English, to gratify the unlearned. Not long after queen Mary died, about which time Mr Fox preaching to comfort the English exiles, did with confidence tell them, that now was the time come for their return into England; and that he brought that news by command from God; for which words the graver divines did sharply reprove him for the present; but afterwards excused him by the event, when it appeared that queen Mary died but the day before he so spake to them.

Mr Fox, understanding happy news in England, that queen Elizabeth reigned, religion was altered, and so like to continue in the end of that year he returned into England with his wife, and two children which were born there; and instead of seeking preferment by his great friends, and own deserts, he lived retiredly in his study, prosecuting his work begun at Basil of writing the acts and monuments. The papists foreseeing how much this work would tend to their disparagement, and disadvantage, charged the author with falshood, and feigned some crimes against him, to lessen his credit and authority: which he, by heaping together testimonies for the confirmation of what he had writ, endeavoured to take away. This elaborate work, with infinite pains, he finished in eleven years, never using the help of any other man, but wrote and searched all the records himself.

But, by these excessive pains, leaving no time free from study nor affording to himself, seasonably, what nature required, he was brought to that pass, that his natural vigour being spent, neither his friends nor kindred could by sight remember or know him. Yea, it caused in him withered leanness of body, yet would he by no means be perswaded to lessen his accustomed labours.

From this time he was much spoken of for a good historian; but shortly after his other excellent endowments began to appear. He was very charitable, and had an excellent ability in comforting afflicted consciences, so that they resorted to him noblemen, strangers, citizens, and others also, seeking salves to their wounded consciences. He preached often abroad, and went to visit such as could not come to him; and what spare time he had he bestowed in prayer and study; and for his vehement prayers mingled with groans he made use of the night's silence, for the greater secrecy.

There was in him a deliberate and resolved contempt of all earthly things, especially of pleasures; and for this end he declined the friendship of illustrious and noble persons. The money which rich men some times offered him, he accepted, but returned it back to the poor. Many things did he foretel, by occasion of comforting the afflicted, or terrifying those that were stubborn. The lady Ann Henage, lying sick of a violent fever, and the physicians deeming it mortal, Mr Fox was sent for to be present at her ending; and after, by prayer and instruction, he had prepared her for death, he told her, that she had done well in fitting herself for death, but that yet she should not die of that sickness.

A knight, her son in law, being by, told him in private, that he had not done well to disquiet her mind with hopes of life, when the physicians had given her up for dead; to whom he answered, 'That he said no more than was commanded him, for it seemed good to God that she should recover:' which also came to pass.

Also, Mrs Honiwood, who had lain sick of a consumption almost twenty years, through melancholy, to whom many excellent physicians, and grave divines, had refused to cure her body, and comfort her mind, but all in vain. At last Mr Fox being sent for, when he came into her chamber, found a most sad house all about her, sitting like statues of mourning in human likeness. But after he had prayed with her, and therein endeavoured both to comfort comfort her, and theſe about her, that ſhe ſhould not only recover of her diſeaſe, but alſo live to an exceeding great age: at which words, earneſtly beholding him, ſhe ſaid, 'You might as well have ſaid, that if I ſhould throw this glaſs againſt the wall, I might believe it would not break to pieces.' And having a glaſs in her hand, ſhe threw it forth, the glaſs falling firſt on a cheſt, and then on the ground, yet neither brake nor crack'd; and the event fell out accordingly: for the gentlewoman being then fifty years of age, lived in much felicity till ſhe was above ninety years old, and could reckon above 360 of her children, and childrens children.

Alſo, one day going to ſee the earl of Arundel, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, at his houſe in the Strand, when he was going away from him, the earl walked with him to the end of his garden, where he was to take boat; but the river being very boiſterous, the earl counſelled him not to truſt himſelf in ſo great a tempeſt; to whom Mr Fox anſwered, 'So (my Lord) let theſe waters deal with me, as I have in truth and ſincerity delivered unto you all that I have ſpoken:' and there withal entering into the boat, before they could put off from the bridge, the wind ceaſed, and the river ran with a ſmooth ſtream.

He had many great friends to whom he was very dear, and of whoſe bounty he taſted liberally, whereby he was enabled to be ſo bountiful to the poor. He had much familiarity with many learned and godly men.

At length, having in ſuch actions and ſuch behaviours ſpent his time, being now full of years, he foreſaw his own end, and would not ſuffer his ſons to be preſent at his death, though he entirely loved them; but ſending them from home, 'ere their return, he quietly reſigned up his ſpirit to God, anno 1587, and of his age 70

He never denied to give to any one that aſked for Jeſus ſake; and one aſking him, whether he knew a certain poor man whom he uſed to relieve? 'Yea (ſaid he) I remember him well; and I tell you, I forget lords and ladies to remember ſuch.

As he was going along London ſtreets a woman of his acquaintance met him, and as they diſcourſed together, ſhe pulled out a bible, telling him ſhe was going to hear a ſermon; whereupon he ſaid to her, 'If you will be adviſed by me go home again.' But (ſaid ſhe) when ſhall I then go to church? to whom he anſwered, 'When you tell no body of it.

One of his ſons had a great mind to travel beyond ſea, which his father could by no means diſwade him from. After ſome years travel he returned back in outlandiſh habit; and coming to his father, the old man aſked him who he was? to whom he anſwered, 'Sir, I am your ſon Samuel.' Whereupon he replied, 'Oh! my ſon; who hath taught thee to make thyſelf ſo ridiculous, by coming home in ſo ſtrange and uncouth an habit?

The Life of Mrs KATHARINE BRETTERG, who died Anno Chriſti 1601.

KATHARINE BRETTERG was born in Cheſhire, the daughter of Mr John Bruen, of Bruen Stapleford: her education, before her marriage, was ſuch as became the profeſſion of the goſpel, in godlineſs and purity of life and religion: She was ſtudious of the holy ſcriptures from a child, and by reading thereof gained ſuch knowlege, that ſhe was able to make good uſe of them as occaſion was offered. She uſed the things of this world moderately and ſoberly, not affecting the vain pleaſures and faſhions that others too much delight in. She uſed not to gad abroad with wandering Dinah; but rather, with Hannah, ſhe delighted to tread upon the duſt of the ſanctuary, and to walk in the way of Zion, &c.

The Sabbath day was always dear and welcome to her; and, though many times ſhe went far for it, yet ſhe would not be without the miniſtry of the word: and her heart was ſo tender and full of compaſſion, that oftentimes ſhe was perceived to hear ſermons, read, pray, and meditate, with tears.

She made conſcience of all, even of the leaſt ſin, and ſuch as many accounted no ſins. She never uſed to ſwear an oath, great or ſmall; neither at any time brake forth into unſeemly ſpeeches, lying in jeſt, immodeſt words, &c. She uſed not the name, or titles of God, at any time, without great reverence: her private diſcourſes were always well ſeaſoned, and proceeded from ſuch a ſanctified heart, that they miniſtered grace to the hearers. Her daily exerciſe was to converſe with God in reading, praying, ſinging, and meditating: all her delight was in the ſaints, and in thoſe that were moſt excellent. The Lord's precepts were precious to her, for from her childhood ſhe feared God, and walked before him with an upright heart.

She was not like many women, that are unable to render a reaſon of the faith and hope that is in them, but grew in grace, and in the knowlege of our Lord Jeſus.

When ſhe was about twenty years old, by her parents conſent, ſhe was married to Mr William Bretterg, of Bretterg-hold in Lancaſhire, near Liverpool, who was a young gentleman that embraced religion ſincerely, and ſuffered much for it at the hands of papiſts. This gracious couple lived two years together in ſuch mutual joy and comfort as well beſeemed the children of God, in which time ſhe had one daughter by him.

Their habitation was in the midſt of ignorant and bruiſh papiſts, who were always doing ſome wrong or injury to them; yet her knowlege, patience, mildneſs, and conſtancy for the truth, much edified and built up her huſband in his moſt holy faith, and incouraged him with more patience to bear all the wrongs and indignities that were daily offered to him. He had his horſes and cattle divers times killed in the night, in his grounds, by ſuch malicious papiſts as hated him for his religion's ſake, which exceedingly conduced to his loſs and hinderance, being moſt of the ſtock that he had: yet did ſhe not only bear this great affliction with admirable patience, but even rejoiced and praiſed God, ſubmitting to his holy and wiſe providence. She would often ſay, It is good that ſuch things ſhould be, but wo be to them that do them. It is good in God thereby to chaſten his children, and prevent ſome ſin that he ſaw us like to fall into. It's good, in reſpect of God's church, that the weak may be confirmed in the truth; and that popery may be diſgraced, when the world ſhall ſee ſuch wickedneſs flow from it. It's good in God, that ſo the wicked may be without excuſe in the day of judgment, when their conſcience tells them, that though God ſuffers them to do ſuch villainy, for ſome juſt cauſe known to himſelf, yet they commit it only of malice and revenge. And in the midſt of ſuch vexatious practices, ſhe would often ſay, The mercies of God are infinite, who doth not only by his word, but by his juſtice alſo, make us fit for the kingdom. Little do our enemies know what good by theſe things they do unto us, and what ruin they bring to their own kingdom, whilſt they thus ſet forth the wickedneſs thereof.

She uſed often to pray, that God would forgive them who had thus wronged them, and ſend them repentance for it. She uſed to call upon her huſband to do the like, and to bleſs them that curſed him: and, leſt her huſband ſhould fail in this duty, ſhe daily prayed to God to ſanctify her huſband's thoughts, and direct his heart aright, only to ſeek God's glory, without ſeeking revenge, or ſatisfying his own affections. So careful ſhe was to prevent ſin, both in herſelf and others; her meekneſs, humility, and unſpotted carriage was ſuch, that ſhe forced ſome that were adverſaries to her religion yet to ſpeak well of her. She had a good report of all that knew her, for her holy and ſincere life.

She was very pitiful and bountiful to the poor, neglected no opportunity of doing good where ſhe could She conſtantly kept her times of praying, reading, and meditating. She would by no means be abſent from family duties. She uſed private duties, not only in her cloſet, but abroad in her garden, orchard, &c. She taſked herſelf to the reading of eight chapters a day at leaſt, out of the ſacred ſcriptures; and ſuch time as ſhe ſaw idly or evilly ſpent, ſhe uſed to call, the time of temptation. She ſpent much time alſo in reading good books, judicious expoſitors, and the book of martyrs; and was many times ſo affected in reading of the torments which Chriſtians were put to, &c. that ſhe would weep very bitterly for the ſame. She was ſo zealous for God's glory, and loved the truth ſo entirely, that she would often argue against popery, but never open her mouth to plead for Baal. Sin was so hateful to her, that she would grieve for it both in herself and others

Once as she was riding to church with her husband, he was angry with his man, whereupon she said to him, Alas! husband, I fear your heart is not right towards God, that can be thus angry for a trifle. And weeping, she said further, You must pray against your passions, and always be sure your anger be for God; else how dare you appear this day before his minister, and offer up your prayers in the public congregation before God?

And another time, a tenant of her husband's being behind with his rent, she desired him to bear with him a quarter of a year longer; and then when he brought it, with tears she said to her husband, I fear you do not well to take it of him, though it be your right, for I doubt he is not well able to pay it, and then you oppress the poor. She was so blameless in her whole course, that the common enemies of religion, the papists, had nothing to say against her; and amongst all the godly that knew her, she was highly prized for her modest, holy, and humble carriage.

Thus she continued with her husband about two years, and then it pleased God that she fell sick of a fever, which was so violent, that it made her sometimes to talk idly; and by Satan's subtility, that watches his opportunity, she began to fall into an heavy conflict of spirit: first she began to find some little infirmity and weakness of faith, more than ordinary; but, through God's mercy, she soon overcame it. But shortly after Satan assaulted her in a more violent manner, but after a day or two God delivered her, sending her peace and comfort of conscience, which encreased more and more in her to her death.

In the beginning of her conflict the severity of God's justice, and the greatness of her sins came into her mind, which much afflicted her, whereof she often complained: then she accused herself of pride, that she had delighted in herself and her beauty too much. Then she thought that she had no faith, but was an hypocrite, and one that had not embraced religion so sincerely, nor glorified God so carefully, especially with her tongue, nor loved him so fervently as she should have done.

Sometimes she would cast her Bible from her, and say, it was indeed the book of life, but she had read the same unprofitably, and therefore feared it was become to her the book of death.

Sometimes she complained that her sins made her a prey to Satan, a spectacle to the world, a disgrace to religion, and a shame to her husband, kindred, and all true Christians; and then she would weep bitterly.

Sometimes she was troubled for the original corruption of her nature, the sins of her parents; yea, and of our first parents, as if it had made her unworthy of God, &c.

Sometimes she accused herself of impatience; bewailed her want of feeling God's spirit; doubted of her election, &c. She wished that she had never been born or that she had been made any other creature, rather than a woman. Oft times she cried out, 'Wo, wo, wo, a weak, a woful, a wretched, a forsaken woman,' &c. with tears continually trickling from her eyes.

She complained of grievous thirst, such as all the water in the sea could not quench, and yet refused, or drank very little. Sweat burst out upon her exceedingly; at other times her body burned extremely.

Sometimes she was very dull in prayer, and once, as she should have said, 'Lead us not into temptation,' she stopped, saying, 'I may not pray, I may not pray, being thus interrupted by Satan.' Yet her friends left her not, till she could both pray, and make confession of her faith, with special application to herself.

These fits, though grievous to herself, and discomfortable to her friends, yet they were neither long, nor continual; but in the midst of them she would give good evidences of her faith, striving and fighting against her temptations; and by prayer, begging strength of God against them.

Oft she would, with a cheerful countenance, intreat her friends not to faint, nor to give her over, but constantly to pray, and to help her against the tempter. One of them once demanding, whether she believed the promises? and whether she could pray? she answered, 'O that I could, I would willingly, but he will not let me: Lord, I believe, help my unbelief.' And when he told her that her desires and endeavours were accepted for performance in Christ; she was much comforted at it.

Once, after a great conflict with Satan, she said, 'Satan, reason not with me, I am but a weak woman; if thou hast any thing to say, say it to my Christ; he is my Advocate, my Strength, and my Redeemer, and he shall plead for me.

Sometimes being afflicted with the sight of her sins, and want of comfort, with many a pitiful sob, and much weeping, she would say, 'Pray to the Lord Jesus Christ to help and comfort me, a poor, woful, distressed woman.' A godly Christian friend took much pains with her, minding her of God's mercies, Christ's merits, the many gracious promises contained in the word, &c. which, through God's blessing greatly refreshed her, and gave her occasion many times to call upon God, for increase of grace, and deliverance from those grievous temptations; wherein the Lord shortly after answered her desires, so that she began to find herself in a very good measure delivered from her former fears and afflictions.

But the day before her death she was wholly relieved, and filled with abundance of inward consolations; and from the beginning that her comforts appeared, she would very cheerfully join with the company in prayer and singing of psalms.

One day her brother, holy Mr John Bruen, coming to visit her, he said, 'Sister, be not dismaid at your trouble, remember what the apostle saith, "that judgment must begin at the house of God:" to whom she answered, 'True it is; and if it begin at us, and the righteous shall scarcely be saved, where will the sinners and ungodly appear?'

During this time she often prayed, and would rehearse many comfortable texts of scripture, especially the eighth to the Romans, closing up all with prayer, and most comfortable application thereof to herself, with much joy. When food was brought her, she would pray God, not only to sanctify those creatures for her bodily sustenance, but also to fill her soul with the waters of life, often repeating, 'To him that thirsteth will I give of the water of life freely.'

Once she took her Bible in her hand, and joyfully kissing of it, she said, 'O Lord, it is good for me to be afflicted, that I may learn thy statutes. The law of thy mouth is better to me than thousands of gold and silver. At another time, calling her husband to her, she said, 'O husband, beware of popery, keep yourself holy before the Lord; yield not to the abominations of the wicked, lest they rejoice, and so you dishonour God, and destroy your own soul. Let my little child be brought up in the true fear of God, &c. so shall I meet her in heaven, when I must now leave behind me on earth.'

She often repeated, 'We have not received the spirit of bondage to fear again, but the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father,' which last words she often doubled over. She often also repeated,

I will give thanks unto the Lord,
And praises to him sing,
Because he hath heard my request,
And granted my wishing.

The day before her death, the Lord discovered himself more plentifully to her; from which time, to her death, she was freed from Satan's temptations. She hid all worldly thoughts of the world, husband, child, or any thing else. She lay with a cheerful countenance, as one ravished in her spirit: her tongue overflowed with the praises of God.

Her husband reading some portions of scripture to her, when he came to that, John xvii. 4. 'I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do, and now glorify me,' she desired him to pause, and then said, Blessed be thy name, O blessed Saviour: perfect the work, I humbly beseech thee, that thou hast begun in me. When he read ver. 9. 'I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine,' she said, O Lord Jesus, dost thou pray for me! O blessed and sweet Savi-ever, how wonderful! how wonderful! how wonderful are thy mercies! Read on; the bleſſedeſt reading that ever I heard, the comfort whereof doth ſweeten my ſoul. When he read ver. 22. 'The glory that thou gaveſt me, I have given them, that they may be one, as we are one,' with marvellous joy ſhe ſaid, I confeſs before the Lord his loving kindneſs, and his wonderful works before the ſons of men, for he hath ſatisfied my ſoul, and filled my hungry ſoul with goodneſs. When he read ver. 24. 'Father, I will that they which thou haſt given me be with me, even where I am, that they may behold my glory,' &c. Stay, ſaid ſhe, let me meditate on the goodneſs of the Lord, for this is the ſweeteſt ſaying that ever came to my ſoul: for now I perceive and feel, that the countenance of Chriſt my Redeemer is turned towards me, and the bright ſhining beams of his mercy are ſpread over me. O happy am I that ever I was born to ſee this bleſſed day. Praiſe, praiſe, O praiſe the Lord for his mercies, &c. O my ſweet Saviour, ſhall I be one with thee, as thou art one with the Father? Wilt thou glorify me with that glory which thou hadſt with the Father before the world was? And doſt thou ſo love me, duſt and aſhes, to make me partaker of glory with Chriſt? What am I, poor wretch, that thou art ſo mindful of me? O! how wonderful! how wonderful! how wonderful is thy love! O! thy love is unſpeakable! O! I feel thy mercies! And O that my tongue and heart were able to ſound forth thy praiſes as I ought, and willingly would! O! help me to praiſe the God of all conſolations!

And thus ſhe continued for five hours ſpace, praiſing the Lord with a cheerful and heavenly countenance, teſtifying ſuch inward joy, from a comfortable feeling of God's mercies in her ſoul, uſing ſuch ſweet ſentences and ſugared phraſes of divine eloquence, as was moſt admirable; ſome part whereof was thus; 'O my Lord God, bleſſed be thy name for evermore; thou haſt ſhewed me the path of life. Thou diddeſt, O Lord, for a little ſeaſon, hide thy face from me; but with everlaſting mercy thou haſt had compaſſion on me, &c. Thou art come with fulneſs of joy, and abundance of conſolations, &c. Help me, O help me to praiſe the Lord.

Then ſhe ſang, with as ſweet a voice as ever ſhe did in her life, the third pſalm, concluding thus;

The Lord, the God of Iſrael,
Be bleſt for evermore:
Let all the people ſay, Amen:
Praiſe ye the Lord therefore.

Then ſhe ſaid, 'O praiſe the Lord, for he hath filled me with joy and gladneſs of heart. My line is fallen unto me in a pleaſant place: I have a goodly heritage, for the Lord is the portion of mine inheritance. O how pleaſant is the ſweet perfume of the place where I lie? It is ſweeter than Aaron's compoſed perfume of principal ſpices. How comfortable is the ſweetneſs I feel? It is like that odour that proceeds from the golden cenſer, that delights my ſoul: the taſte is precious, do you not feel it? Sweeter it is than myrrh, the honey, or the honey comb.' Then ſhe ſang pſalm xix. ver. 7. &c. then ſhe prayed to, and praiſed God again: then ſhe ſang pſalm cxxxvi.

A Chriſtian friend ſeeing her exceeding joys, prayed for the continuance of them to the end; whereupon ſhe ſaid, O the joys! the joys! the joys that I feel in my ſoul! O! they be wonderful! they be wonderful! they be wonderful!

After a while ſhe fell into a ſhort ſlumber, and then awaking, ſhe ſaid, 'O come kiſs me with the kiſſes of thy mouth, for thy love is better than wine. O how ſweet the kiſſes of my Saviour be? Mine eyes are opened (bleſſed be God) I do feel and ſee the everlaſting mercies of my Chriſt, &c. O how merciful and marvellous, gracious art thou unto me? I feel thy mercy, I am aſſured of thy love, and ſo certain am I thereof, as thou art the God of truth. Even ſo ſure do I know myſelf to be thine, O Lord my God, and this my ſoul knoweth right well; and this my ſoul knoweth right well. Then ſhe ſang the fourth pſalm; and afterwards ſaid, 'I am ſure that my Redeemer liveth, and that I ſhall ſee him at the laſt day,' &c.

Then a godly miniſter coming to her, ſhe ſaid to him, 'My ſoul hath been compaſſed about with terrors of death, &c. A roaring wilderneſs of wo was within me; but bleſſed, bleſſed, bleſſed be the Lord my God, who hath not left me comfortleſs; but, like a good ſhepherd, hath brought me to a place of reſt, even to the ſweet running waters of life, &c. O bleſſed, bleſſed be the Lord, that hath thus comforted me, and hath brought me to a place ſweeter than the garden of Eden. O the joy! the joy! the delightſome joy that I feel! O! how wonderful! how wonderful! how wonderful is this joy! O praiſe the Lord for his mercy, and for this joy that my ſoul feeleth full well.

And thus ſhe continued, divers praying with her at ſundry times; and immediately before one began his prayer, ſhe ſaid to herſelf, 'Hear, O Lord, and have mercy upon me: Lord, be thou my helper; thou haſt looſed my ſack, and girded me with gladneſs; therefore will I praiſe thee, O Lord my God; I will give thanks to thee for evermore.

On the Sabbath evening, her ſtrength and ſpeech beginning to fail her, ſhe ſaid, 'My warfare is accompliſhed, and mine iniquities are pardoned. Lord, whom have I in heaven but thee? and I have none on earth but thee. My fleſh faileth, and my heart alſo, but God is the ſtrength of my heart, and my portion for ever. He that preſerveth Jacob, and defendeth his Iſrael, he is my God, and will guide me unto death,' &c. And with that ſhe preſently fell aſleep in the Lord, paſſing away in peace, without any motion of body at all, May ult. anno 1601, and of her age 22.

The Life of William Perkins, who died anno Chriſti 1602.

William Perkins was born at Marſton in Warwickſhire, anno 1558, and brought up at ſchool; from which he went to Chriſt's college in Cambridge, where he profited ſo much in his ſtudies, that having got the grounds of all the liberal arts, he was choſen fellow of that college in the 24th year of Queen Elizabeth.

He was very wild in his youth; but the Lord in mercy was pleaſed to reclaim him, that he might be an eminent inſtrument of good in his church.

When he firſt entered into the miniſtry, being moved with pity towards their ſouls, he prevailed with the jaylor to bring the priſoners (fettered as they were) to the ſhire-houſe, hard by the priſon, where he preached every Lord's day to them; and it pleaſed God ſo to proſper and ſucceed his labours amongſt them, that he was the happy inſtrument of converting many of them unto God; freeing them thereby from the captivity of ſin, which was their worſt bondage.

This his practice being once known, many reſorted to that place, out of the neighbour pariſhes, to hear him; ſo that from thence he was choſen to St Andrew's pariſh in Cambridge, where he preached all his life after. His ſermons were not ſo plain, but the pioully learned did admire them; nor ſo learned, but the plain did underſtand them

He brought the ſchools into the pulpit, and unſhelling their controverſies out of their hard ſchool terms, made thereof plain and wholeſome meat for his people. He was an excellent chirurgeon at the jointing of a broken ſoul, and at ſtating of a doubtful conſcience, ſo that the afflicted in ſpirit came far and near to him, and received much ſatisfaction and comfort by him.

In his ſermons he uſed to pronounce the word damn with ſuch an emphaſis, as left a doleful echo in his auditors ears a good while after. And when he was catechiſt in Chriſt's college, in expounding the commandments, he applied them ſo home to the conſcience, as was able to make his hearers hearts fall down, and their hairs almoſt to ſtand upright. But in his old age he was more mild, often profeſſing, that to preach mercy was the proper office of the miniſters of the goſpel.

In his life he was ſo pious and ſo ſpotleſs, that malice was afraid to bite at his credit, into which ſhe knew that her teeth could not enter. He had a rare felicity in reading of books, and as it were but turning them over, would give

give an exact account of all that was considerable therein. he perused books so speedily that one would think he read nothing, and yet so accurately, that one would think he read all. He was of a chearful nature and pleasant disposition; somewhat reserved to strangers, but when once acquainted, very familiar

Besides his frequent preaching, he wrote many excellent books, both treatises and commentaries, which for their worth were many of them translated into Latin, and sent beyond sea, where to this day they are highly prized, and much set by, yea some of them are translated into French, High Dutch and Low Dutch; and his reformed catholic was translated into Spanish also, yet no Spaniard ever since durst ever take up the gauntlet of defiance cast down by this champion; he died in the forty fourth year of his age of a violent fit of the stone, anno Christi 1602, being born the first, and dying the last year of queen Elizabeth.

He was of a ruddy complexion, fat, and corpulent; lame of his right hand, yet this Ehud with a left handed pen did stab the Romish cause; as one saith,

Dextere quantumvis fuerat tibi manca, docendi
Pollebas mira dexteritate tamen.

Though nature thee of thy right hand bereft,
Right well thou writest with thy hand that's left.

He was buried with great solemnity at the sole charges of Christ's college, the university and town striving which should express more sorrow at his funeral; Dr Montague preached his funeral sermon upon that text, 'Moses my servant is dead.'

Mr Perkins his manner was to go with the prisoners to the place of execution when they were condemned, and what success his labours were crowned with, may appear by this example.

A young lusty fellow going up the ladder discovered an extraordinary lumpishness and dejection of spirit, and when he turned himself at the upper round to speak to the people, he looked with a rueful and heavy countenance, as if he had been half dead already; whereupon Mr Perkins laboured to chear up his spirits, and finding him still in an agony and distress of mind, he said unto him, 'What man? what is the matter with thee? art thou afraid of death? Ah no (said the prisoner, shaking his head) but of a worser thing; fayest thou so? (said Mr Perkins) come down again man, and thou shalt see what God's grace will do to strengthen thee; whereupon the prisoner coming down, Mr Perkins took him by the hand, and made him kneel down with himself at the ladder foot hand in hand, when that blessed man of God made such an effectual prayer in confession of sins, and aggravating thereof in all circumstances with the horrible and eternal punishment due to the same by God's justice, as made the poor prisoner burst out into abundance of tears; and Mr Perkins finding that he had brought him low enough, even to hell-gates, he proceeded to the second part of his prayer, and therein to shew him the Lord Jesus, the Saviour of all penitent and believing sinners, stretching forth his blessed hand of mercy and power to save him in that distressed estate, and to deliver him from all the powers of darkness; which he did so sweetly press with such heavenly art and powerful words of grace upon the soul of the poor prisoner, as chearred him up again to look beyond death with the eyes of faith, to see how the black lines of all his sins were crossed, and cancelled with the red lines of his crucified Saviour's precious blood; so graciously applying it to his wounded conscience, as made him break out into new showers of tears for joy of the inward consolation which he found, and gave such expression of it to the beholders, as made them lift up their hands and praise God to see such a blessed change in him; who (the prayer being ended) rose from his knees chearfully, and went up the ladder again so comforted, and took his death with such patience and alacrity, as if he actually saw himself delivered from the hell which he feared before, and heaven opened for the receiving of his soul, to the great rejoicing of the beholders.

His works are printed in three volumes.

Mr Perkin's, when he lay in his last and killing torments of the stone, hearing his friend pray for a mitigation of his pains said, 'Pray not for an ease of my torments, but for an increase of my patience.'

The Life of THEODORE BEZA, who died, anno Christi 1605.

THEODORE BEZA was born at Veselia, anno Christi 1519. His father was Peter Beza, praefect of that town, his mother was Mary Burdolet, both of them noble born. As soon as he was weaned; he was sent for by his uncle Nicholas Beza to Paris, who was a counsellor in the parliament, and by him was tenderly and carefully educated, and at five years old he placed him with Wolmarus, a famous schoolmaster at Orleance, with whom he lived seven years, and in that time learned Latine, Greek, and all the liberal arts, so that there was no worthy author either in Greek or Latin, which he had turned over: yea Wolmarus had also read law to him. But that which was principal, he instructed him in the true religion, drawn out of the fountain of Gods word.

Afterwards, when Wolmarus was returned into his native country of Germany, by the advice of his friends, Beza was placed in Orleance to the study the civil law, but disliking their barbarous language, he left those, and betook himself to more polite studies. He also affected poetry very much, and made all his poems before he was twenty years old; and imitating Catullus and Ovid therein, he writ more wantonly than afterwards he approved of; and indeed endeavoured to have suppressed his poems, but the Papists hating him for his religion, often printed them, seeking thereby his disgrace all that possibly they could.

Anno Christi 1539 he went to Paris, where he was entertain'd by his kindred and friends with all the expressions of love and respect that might be, but above all he was most welcome to another of his uncles (for the former was now dead) who was Abbot of Frigidmont, and who designed him for his successor, the profits of which place were worth above five thousand crowns per annum. besides two benefices belonging to the same, worth seven hundred crowns more. Beza by this uncles means, abounding with ease, money, and all things, but good counsel, began to find himself compassed about with infinite snares of Satan: for though he hated those vices which discovered open impiety, and were disgraceful; yet he squandered away precious hours in pastimes, and began to be puffed up with that applause which he got by his forementioned poems, and by his hopes of the great preferments which his uncle reserved for him.

Yet it pleased God that those seeds of piety that were sown in him in his childhood, began to appear afresh, in that discerning his danger, and the snares of Satan, he made a vow to renounce the errors of popery, and lest he should be overcome by fleshly lusts, he privately married a wife, having only two of his fast friends present at his marriage; yet at the same time he faithfully promised that within a certain space of time, breaking through all impediments, he would have her to the true church of God, and there publicly confirm the marriage, and that in the mean time he would take none of the popish orders: both which he religiously performed afterwards.

And yet the would heaping more honours and profit upon him by the death of his elder brother, and the abbot his uncle giving him all his goods, he was long in resolving what to do, and slower in performing his vow than he should have been: but whilst he thus delayed, the Lord struck him with a sore disease that he almost despaired of life; and it continuing long upon him, he was at last humbled by it, and abhorred himself for his delays, and with many tears begged pardon of God for the same, saying, Lord bring my soul out of prison that I may praise thy name; and the Lord heard and restored him.

And as soon as ever he had recovered his health, according to his former engagements, he took his wife, and leaving friends, honours, riches, and country, he went to Geneva anno Christi 1548, where according to his former vow, he publicly solemnized his marriage. About the same ſame time alſo there came to Geneva one John Criſpin, an antient and intimate friend of Beza's, and ſo both of them conſulted together what courſe of life to betake themſelves to, purpoſing to ſet upon the art of printing, which their excellent learning and induſtry did much fit them for. But God had appointed Beza to another imployment; for before they could bring their purpoſe to maturity, Beza would needs take a journey to Tubing, where his old maſter Wolmarus lived, being now a counſellor to the prince of Wirtemberg; and as ſoon as he was returned to Geneva, dreaming of no ſuch matter, he was called to be the Greek profeſſor in the univerſity of Lauſanna, and by the ſenate of Bern, admitting that election, was brought into that ſociety.

Beza therefore looking upon it as a call from God, embraced it, and went to Lauſanna. In which place he found many excellent men, as Peter Viret the paſtor, John Ribbit the divinity profeſſor, John Raimund Merlin the Hebrew profeſſor, &c. by all whom he was kindly entertained, and ſo dearly beloved, that each ſeemed to live in the other.

At his firſt coming to that univerſity, that he might the better arm himſelf againſt thoſe manifold perturbations which all men, eſpecially the godly are moleſted withall, he often, and ſeriouſly meditated upon the hiſtory of Abraham. And as often as he had any leiſure, he went to Geneva to converſe with Calvin, by whom he was much quickned to improve his parts for God's glory and the churches good. And upon this he undertook that truly golden work, begun by Marot, but finiſhed by him, of turning the Pſalms into French metre, which he finiſhed anno Chriſti 1561, and which were often printed in ſundry parts of France.

About this time many godly men and women flocked out of France to Lauſanna, which occaſion Beza taking as ſent from God, expounded to them the epiſtle to the Romans, and afterwards the two epiſtles to Peter, which were the foundation of that excellent work which afterwards he compleated, of turning the New Teſtament into Latine, with annotations upon the ſame.

About that time the plague waxing hot in Lauſanna, Beza fell ſick of it, but Chriſt (who intended him as an inſtrument of his glory in his churches good) reſtored him to health again. Shortly after which he wrote a book de hæreticis a magiſtratu puniendis, occaſioned by the aſperſions raiſed by Lælius Socinus againſt Calvin, and the magiſtrates of Geneva for burning Servetus for his hereſy and blaſphemy.

He alſo wrote an explication of chriſtianity out of the doctrine of eternal predeſtination. He alſo anſwered Joachim Weſtphalus about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper; and afterwards publiſhed two learned dialogues upon the ſame argument. He anſwered Sebaſtian Caſtalio, who fought to overthrow eternal election.

Anno Chriſti 1557, When the Sorboniſts in Paris had raiſed that perſecution againſt the church of Chriſt, wherein four hundred of them being met together in the night to hear the word, and receive the Lord's ſupper, ſeven of them were afterwards burnt in the fire and the reſt caſt into chains and priſons. The beſt means thought on to procure their releaſe was, by obtaining the proteſtant German princes to become interceſſors for them to Henry II. of France And thereupon Beza with ſome others went to the German princes to engage them herein, which alſo he obtained from them, though it proved to little purpoſe, in regard of the implacable malice of the French courtiers againſt the ſervants of Chriſt. In that journey he grew acquainted with Melancton, and they took much delight in the ſociety of each other.

Having ſpent ten years at Lauſanna, as the Greek profeſſor, with the good leave of the ſenate of Bern, he went to Geneva anno Chriſti 1559, and lived with Calvin, from whoſe ſide he ſeldom parted, and was his great aſſiſtant both in matters of doctrine and diſcipline; and that in the mean time he might not be wanting to the ſchools, he publickly interpreted Demoſthenes's orations, a part of Ariſtotle to the young ſtudents.

And not long after upon the death of Claudius Pontanus, he was choſen paſtor into his room. He was alſo choſen the firſt rector of the ſchool in Geneva, at which time he made an excellent and eloquent oration in commendation of learning, in the preſence of many grave and learned men, both to encourage youths to the love of it, and the ſenators of Geneva to make a further progreſs in the advancement of it. For whereas the city of Geneva did at this time conflict with innumerable difficulties both at home and abroad, which did almoſt ſwallow it up, yet by the perſuaſion of that great Calvin, it took ſo much courage, that in that very juncture of time, the ſenate founded, and endowed that public ſchool which was a great ornament to the city, and out of which iſſued abundance of godly and learned men, to the great benefit of the churches of God.

Shorly after, at the requeſt of certain noblemen of France, Beza was invited to viſit Anthony king of Navar, who at this time was at Nerac in Aquitane, to confer with him about ſome weighty matters, but eſpecially, if it were poſſible, through God's mercy, to confirm his mind in the true religion; for it was hoped that if that king, who was the principal man of the royal blood, and like to govern the affairs of ſtate in the minority of king Francis II. could be confirmed in the truth, it would much conduce to the peace of the churches, and to the preſervation of the lives of many who were cruelly burned by the papiſts in ſundry parts of the kingdom. Neither did this deſign want effect; for anno Chriſti 1561, the king of France dying at Orleans, the king of Navar joining with the prince of Conde, the admiral Coligni, d' Andelot, and other noblemen, cauſed the popiſh party to give over the butcheries and executions which they had formerly done upon of Chriſt's faithful ſervants.

Charles IX. coming to the crown, there were various actings about religion, whilſt the pontificans would advance their own, and root out the reformed; and on the contrary they of the reformed religion contended with all their might to promote their own; and therefore leſt theſe ſeveral parties ſhould cauſe commotions, there were edicts publiſhed in the king's name, requiring all upon ſevere penalties to abſtain from arms, and to keep the peace, till certain ſelect perſons of each party at a certain time, and place nominated, ſhould meet together to conſider of the fitteſt way and means to preſerve the public peace; many not only of the common people, but of the nobility inclining to the reformed religion.

Hereupon the king of Navar ſent letters and meſſengers to the ſenate of Geneva, requeſting that Beza might be ſent to that great meeting where ſuch weighty matters ſhould be tranſacted. The prince of Conde alſo requeſted the ſame. Beza upon this, ſet forward, and came to Paris, Auguſt the twentieth. And the queen mother wrote alſo to the ſame purpoſe to the ſenate of Zurick to ſend Peter Martyr to her, which accordingly they did, and Martyr came to Paris.

The chief of the pontificans alſo repaired to this meeting, though they had declared that ſuch as had been long ago condemned for hereſy, ought not to be conferred withal. There came alſo many miniſters of the reformed churches in France, as Nih. Gallaſius, Auguſt. Marlorat, Jo. Raimund Merlin, Francis Sampaulius, Francis Morellus, Jo. Malotius, Jo. Spinæus, Claudius Boſſierus, Nich. Folius, Mat. Virellus, John Tornæus, and N. Barbaſtus; for they had the public faith given them for their ſafe coming, ſtay, and return at their pleaſures.

Auguſt 23d, they met together at St. Germans, where the proteſtants debating who ſhould ſpeak for them, they unanimouſly choſe Beza, as a man every way fitted for that employment; and in the evening he was had into the king of Navar's chamber, where were preſent the queen mother, the prince of Conde, the cardinals of Bourbon and Lorrain, with many of the nobility.

Beza briefly declared the cauſe of his coming (though it was not unknown unto them) and the queen cheerfully anſwered, that ſhe much deſired that the public peace might be principally promoted; and the cardinal of Lorrain exhorted him to ſtudy the ways of peace and concord; for, ſaith he, in your abſence you have been the author of many ſtirs, and tumults, therefore it beſeems you by your preſence to endeavour to compoſe them, which is that which we all deſire.

To this Beza replied, that he was too mean and obſcure a perſon to raiſe commotions in ſo large and potent a kingdom; that he was always an enemy to tumults, and that his ſtudies and endeavours ſhould always be bent to promote the glory of God, and the happineſs of his king and country.

Then did the queen aſk him if he had ever publiſhed any thing in French? Nothing, ſaid he, beſides the Pſalms, and a ſhort writing oppoſed to the confeſſion of the duke of Somerſet. Upon this occaſion Lorrain ſaid, that he had read in a book publiſhed in Beza's name. That Chriſt was in the ſame manner to be ſought in his ſupper, as he was before he was born of the bleſſed Virgin: and that Chriſt was in his ſupper as he is in the dung. To this Beza anſwered, That this latter ſpeech was blaſphemy, and that he thought that no Chriſtian had ever ſpoken or written any ſuch thing. As for the former ſpeech, ſaith he, if it be taken in a good ſenſe, it is true; for the church hath always been congregated by one Mediator, Chriſt, God-man, therefore the communion of the faithful with Chriſt, is not to be confined to the time of his incarnation for the force and efficacy thereof was always preſent to the eye of faith: for Abraham ſaw his day, and rejoiced: the fathers did eat of the ſame ſpiritual meat, and drank of the ſame ſpiritual rock, viz. Chriſt; and that he was the Lamb ſlain from the foundation of the world. To which the cardinal aſſented.

Then was there another queſtion ſtarted about the ſenſe of thoſe words, 'This is my body.' Whereupon Beza anſwered learnedly and briefly, laying down the reformed opinion, and againſt tranſubſtantiation. Whereunto the cardinal anſwered, that for his part he would not contend about tranſubſtantiation, being of Beza's mind; and withal told the queen that Beza had given him great ſatisfaction in that point, and that he hoped their conference would come to a good iſſue if things were handled peaceably, and with right reaſon.

When the company was departed, the cardinal ſpake very lovingly to Beza, ſaying 'Now that I have heard you ſpeak, I rejoice, and invite you to the conference by the immortal God, hoping that weighing the reaſons on both ſides, ſome way may be found out for the ſettling of a firm peace.' Beza returned him hearty thanks, entreating him to perſevere in the ſtudy and endeavour of procuring public concord; profeſſing for his own part, that according to the abilities God had given him, he would promote it.

September 4th, they met together in the large hall of the monaſtery at Poſſy, where were preſent, the king, the queen mother, the duke of Orleans the king's brother, Margaret the king's ſiſter, the king and queen of Navar, the prince of Conde, and the reſt of the nobility, and ſtates of France. On the popiſh party were the cardinals, archbiſhops, and biſhops to the number of fifty, accompanied with many doctors of Sorbon, and canoniſts. For the reformed churches were the miniſters before named.

After the king had in a few words opened the cauſes why he had called them together, and Michael Hoſpitalius, the great chancellor of France, had opened them more largely, Beza in the name of all the proteſtants made an excellent oration, which he pronounced with ſuch a grace, as drew the attention, and cauſed admiration in all that were preſent. In it he compriſed the ſum of the pure religion, which was profeſſed in the reformed churches of France; only this is to be noted by the way, that when Beza in his ſpeech ſaid, That Chriſt was as far from the ſacrament as the higheſt heavens are from the earth; the popiſh doctors made a great murmur, which at laſt being over, he went on to the end of his ſpeech. Then Turnovius, dean of the college, being in a great paſſion againſt the miniſters, whom he called new profeſſors, made ſome objections, and exhorted the king that he would not ſuffer himſelf by any perſuaſions to be withdrawn from his old religion, and that he would ſuſpend his aſſent till he had heard anſwers which the prelates would give to that which had been ſpoken; for then he ſhould be able to diſcern a difference between the truth and lies. Then did Beza humbly preſent a Confeſſion of Faith in the name and with the conſent of all the reformed churches, which had been drawn up in the year 1555.

But when the miniſters perceived that the minds of the pontificans were exaſperated, they reſolved that Beza ſhould write his private letters to the queen, wherein he ſhould explain things more fully than he was ſuffered to do the day before, which accordingly he did.

September 16th, the conference began again in the preſence of the ſaid great perſonages. And the cardinal of Lorrain made a tedious ſpeech, wherein he defended the popiſh religion, perſuading that nothing ſhould be altered in the ſame. And when he had done, Beza humbly intreated the king, that he might have liberty to anſwer ex tempore: for the proteſtants feared that after this day they ſhould be ſuffered to meet no more: for there was a conſtant report that the pontificans after that day would have no more to do with the proteſtants, but would preſently excommunicate them; Beſides, there was ſome fear that the crafty prelates would evade any further diſputation by ſetting the French and Dutch churches together by the ears about the matter of the ſacrament: but he could obtain nothing that day, the conference being adjourned to another, and procraſtinated by many delicacies.

Yet at laſt, upon an humble ſupplication to the king from the proteſtants, they obtained that the conference ſhould go on. And accordingly, September 24th, it was again begun in the ſame audience, and Lorrain profeſſed that this meeting was appointed, that ſo the proteſtants, if they had a mind to it, might freely anſwer to what had formerly been ſpoken by him. Then did Beza diſcourſe excellently and clearly about the church and the ſupper of the Lord, which two heads were principally inſiſted upon by Lorrain. Then Eſpenæus, a Sorboniſt, being appointed by the cardinal, took up Beza, beginning about the vocation of miniſters both ordinary and extraordinary, and ſo proceeding to traditions, and the Lord's ſupper. Beza was about to anſwer him, but another Sorboniſt (Sanctæſius) riſing up, and repeating ſowerly what Eſpenæus had ſaid, interrupted him. He inſiſted principally upon traditions, which he affirmed to be certainer than the holy ſcriptures, quoting ſomething out of Tertullian; but Beza ſhewed that this froward ſpeech of the Sorboniſt made little towards ſettling the peace of the church, and therefore entreated the queen that ſuch unreaſonable clamours might hereafter be reſtrained. After which he anſwered Eſpenæus about the calling of miniſters, and traditions; whereupon Sanctæſius beginning again his clamours, would have thruſt in divers other queſtions; but Lorrain fearing that the queen would be offended at it, put an end to that queſtion and propounded a new one about the ſupper of the Lord, which unleſs it were determined, he proteſted for himſelf, and his aſſociates, that he would not change another word with the miniſters; and thereupon he aſked them if they were all ready to ſubſcribe the Auguſtane Confeſſion? Beza replied And are you all ready to join with us therein? But the cardinal inſtead of an anſwer, produced a writing of the opinions of ſome German divines, which he ſaid was lately ſent to him, importunately urging the miniſters that they alſo would ſet down their opinions.

This was craftily done of him, that if the miniſters ſhould refuſe to do it, he might ſet them and the Germans at variance; and if they ſhould do it, he might inſult over them as a conqueror. Beza therefore to ſhun this rock ſaid, that he and his colleagues were come thither to defend the confeſſion of faith publiſhed by their churches, and that they had nothing elſe in command; and that the diſputation was to be continued about the points contained therein, as the likelieſt way to come to an happy iſſue: and that the beſt method was to begin with ſuch things as were moſt eaſy; and that ſince the ſacraments depended upon the doctrine, that it was fitteſt to begin with the doctrine.

But when the cardinal would by no means alter his former reſolution, the miniſters ſuſpecting that if they wholly reſiſted him, he would thence take occaſion to diſſolve the conference, and to tranſfer the fault upon them, they deſired that the writing might be produced, and that they might have time to conſider of it, which being granted, the meeting was diſſolved for that day.

September 26th, the conference began again, and Beza again diſcourſed of the calling of the paſtors of the church, and then of the Lord's ſupper; but Lorrain being nettled about ſome expreſſions which Beza uſed about the vicious calling calling of their eccleſiaſtics, cried out, 'That the majeſty of the king was violated.' Then Beza replied, That he had ſaid nothing that might be juſtly blamed, for that kings had therefore drawn the choice of eccleſiaſtics into their own power, becauſe it had been ſo long abuſed. Lorrain, paſſing by that ſubject, aſked why they refuſed to ſubſcribe the Auguſtane Confeſſion? To which it was anſwered, that if the pontificans would alſo admit it, there were hopes that ere long they might agree: 'But, ſaith Beza, if you refuſe to aſſent to this confeſſion, it is unequal that we ſhould be preſſed every way to approve of it.' Then the ſpeech of the Lord's ſupper being again renewed, Eſpenſæus quoted a ſpeech of Calvin, 'That we receive the ſubſtance of Chriſt's body: to which was anſwered, That by ſubſtance we are not to underſtand the fleſhly eating of Chriſt, but it ſignifies the ſpiritual, and true feeding upon him, as oppoſed to the imaginary and phantaſtical; upon which occaſion Peter Martyr, becauſe he could not ſpeak French, produced many things in Italian. Though Lorrain often interrupted him, ſaying that he would not diſpute with men of a ſtrange language. Yet had Peter Martyr for this ſpeech the teſtimony of Eſpenſæus, That of all the divines of that age, none had handled that queſtion about the Lord's ſupper ſo fully and clearly as he.

Whilſt the miniſters were preparing to anſwer Eſpenſæus, a certain Spaniard that was general of the Jeſuits, ſtanding up, for an hour together declaimed in Italian, calling the miniſters diſſemblers, apes, foxes, &c. ſaying that they were not to be heard there, but to be commanded to the council of Trent; and ſo proceeding to the queſtion about the Lord's ſupper; he ſaid that Chriſt was preſent as a prince, who having gotten a victory, will have the memory of it to be continued by ſome anniverſary plays, which himſelf would be over; and ſo by an unuſual impudence he laboured to ſtir up the queen againſt the miniſters, till he provoked ſome to laughter, others to indignation.

But Beza told him to keep his reproaches to himſelf. Told him that the queen had no need of the counſel of a friar, who would wiſely govern affairs according to the cuſtom of the kingdom; and that he ſpoke of the Lord's ſupper as if it were a ſtage-play, wherein Chriſt ſhould act the firſt part; and ſo leaving him, he turned to Eſpenſæus ſaying, as it is ſaid, This is my body, ſo it is ſaid, This is the cup of the New Teſtament, which cannot be underſtood without a figure: For ſacraments ſhould not be ſacraments, if they ſhould not reſemble thoſe things whereof they are ſacraments, and ſigns, as St Auguſtine teacheth.

But, ſaid Eſpenſæus, if our ſacraments ſhould be ſigns, they would not much differ from the Jewiſh ſacraments, and they would be ſigns of ſigns, which is abſurd. But Beza ſhewed that there was no abſurdity when the apoſtle compared circumciſion with baptiſm, &c.

Then ſaid a Sorboniſt; In this propoſition, This is my body, what doth This ſignify? Beza anſwered, It ſignifies both the bread and Chriſt's body. The Sorboniſt replied, That it was againſt the rules of Grammar, that hoc, this, ſhould be applied to the bread; but that it was individuum vagum. Beza took away this anſwer, and told him that his individuum vagum was unknown to all learned antiquity. Then one of the Sorbon doctors holding up his finger to Beza, in a threatening manner ſaid, 'Oh, if we could once catch thee within the walls of Sorbon, thou ſhouldſt not get out again.' Thus the day being ſpent, the conference was diſſolved. And ſeeing nothing could be effected this way, ſome thought of another, which was, that John Monluc, biſhop of Valentia, and Eſpenſæus, who were counted middle and moderate men, ſhould tranſact theſe buſineſſes privately with Beza, and Galaſius; which being aſſented to, they met September 17th, at St Germain's in a private houſe, being commanded by the queen, that if it were poſſible they ſhould agree upon ſome form about the Lord's ſupper; which might give content to both parts, which after much debate they did, and the form was this.

Confitemur Jeſum Chriſtum in cœna nobis offerre, dare, & vere exhibere ſubſtantiam ſui corporis, & ſanguinis operante ſpiritu ſancto: noſque recipere, & edere ſpiritualiter, & per fidem. verum illud corpus quod pro nobis mortuum eſt, ut ſimus oſſa de oſſibus ejus, & caro de carne ejus: ut eo vivificemur, & ea quæ ad ſalutem noſtram neceſſaria ſunt, percipiamus. Et quoniam fides innixa verbo Dei, res perceptas facit præſentes: per illam, verum & naturale corpus, & ſanguinem Jeſu Chriſti per virtutem ſpiritus ſancti comedi, & bibi fatemur, eoque reſpectu præſentiam corporis, & ſanguinis Chriſti. In S Cœna agnoſcimus.

Both parties had agreed that not a word of this writing ſhould be divulged till it was communicated to the great perſonages at Poſſie: but contrary thereto, divers copies were immediately diſperſed through the court, and were received with much applauſe, as if now both parties were agreed in the chiefeſt point of the controverſy. And the queen ſending for Beza, thanked him, and told him that what they had agreed on was very grateful to her. She alſo with joy ſhewed it to the cardinal of Lorrain, who when he had read it, ſaid, that he never believed otherwiſe; and that he hoped all the reſt of the great ones at Poſſie would readily embrace the ſame.

But it fell out far otherwiſe; for when on the fourth of October it was exhibited to them, they rejected, and damned it, reproaching Eſpenſæus for conſenting to it, and Lorrain for not oppoſing it. And thereupon preſently drew up another form, which if Beza and his aſſociates ſhould defer to ſubſcrib, they declared that it was a great wickedneſs to treat with them any further, and that as incorrigible, they were to be excommunicated, and puniſhed by the king.

This was the iſſue of that great conference at Poſſie, ſo famous all over Europe, which yet anſwered not mens expectations; and ſo every one returned to his own place: only the queen ſtayed Beza, ſaying, ſince you are a Frenchman, France deſires your help to ſtop future troubles as much as may be. But Beza though he foreſaw the ſeeds of thoſe factions which ſhortly after brake out, and his ſingular love to Geneva continually put him upon a deſire of return, where alſo he was earneſtly deſired, and much longed for, yet was he neceſſitated to ſtay there whether he would or no.

From that day forward there was a wonderful increaſe of the goſpellers in France, and ſermons began to be preached publicly every where, yea in ſome places they took away the churches from the papiſts, till by the king's command, and their miniſters entreaty, they reſtored them again.

Beza in the mean time preached often, ſometimes in the queen of Navar's houſe, ſometimes in the prince of Conde's, and other ſometimes in the ſuburbs of Paris. And in January following there was an edict procured, that the proteſtants might freely meet together for the ſervice of God in the ſuburbs of all cities. This provoked the Guiſian faction, who by all means ſought the hinderance of it; but the firſt thing they attempted, was to draw the king of Navar to their party; which Beza ſuſpecting, and finding him wavering, endeavoured by all means to confirm and keep him in the true religion; to whom the king anſwered, Quod pelago ſe non ita commiſſurus eſſet, quin quando liberet, pedem referre poſſit, That he would not launch ſo far into the ſea, but that when he pleaſed he might return ſafe to the ſhore again. And accordingly he fell off from the proteſtants, and Beza went to him no more.

Another diſputation was appointed by the queen mother about images, the reſult of which was, that the popiſh doctors condemned the making of the images of the trinity, or of the Father, or Holy Ghoſt; and agreed that all images ſhould be removed out of the churches but that of the croſs; and that no images ſhould be worſhipped. But preſently after the civil war began to break forth, which was occaſioned by this means.

Whereas many proteſtants were met together at Vaſſi to hear the word preached, the duke of Guiſe with a party of ſoldiers, ſet upon them, ſlew forty five of them, and wounded many more. Hereof Beza made complaint, but without any redreſs; whereupon both parties betook themſelves to arms, and the prince of Conde by his importunity prevailed with Beza to ſtay with him in thoſe dangerous times. Beza's earneſt longings to be with his people at Geneva, diſſuaded him; but the importunate deſires of ſo godly a prince prevailed, ſo that he ſtayed with him all thoſe firſt civil wars; at which time Orleance was the chiefeſt place of the proteſtants refuge; and for the better regulating of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline in thoſe troubleſome times, a ſynod was called in that city, at which Beza was preſent. Shortly after the peſtilence waxed hot in Orleance whereof many died, and amongſt the reſt Conrade Badius, a paſtor in Orleance, who from his very childhood had been moſt dear to Beza; yet did not Beza intermit his public preaching, nor private viſiting of the ſick.

A few months after fell out that memorable battle in Druiden fields where Beza was preſent, and by his prayers and exhortations did much encourage the ſoldiers, yet they loſt the day, and the prince of Conde was taken priſoner, whom Beza by his letters much comforted, and exhorted the reſt not to give way to deſpondency, but to perſevere in the defence of the cauſe, and to commit the ſucceſs of it unto God.

Not long after peace enſuing, Beza got leave to go back to Geneva from which he had been abſent 22 months, in which time he had gone through many troubles, and dangers both of body and mind.

At his return to Geneva he fell upon his former employment in the ſchools and church: Calvin undergoing the burden one week, and he the other, and they continued in thoſe mutual labours, till Calvin's death, and then he had Nicolas Collodonius for his colleague, and after him Lambertus Danæus, and after him Anthony Faius.

Preſently after his return in the firſt ſermon that he preached to the people he filled the minds of the hearers with incredible ſorrow and grief, by relating to them the miſerable condition of the churches of France, whereof himſelf had been an eye-witneſs, and which therefore he painted out to the life, which he did for this end, to ſtir up all to commiſerate, and heartily to pray for their brethren that ſuffered ſuch great afflictions.

Shortly after he wrote an anſwer to Sebaſtian Caſtallio, who had inveighed againſt his tranſlation of the New Teſtament into Latin. He alſo publiſhed an anſwer to the railings of Francis Balduinus, who followed the ſteps of Ecbolius, both of them teaching 'that men might change their religion as the ſtate changed.' Then did he confute the errors of Brentius, and James Andreas, who held the omnipreſence of the body of Chriſt: after this he publiſhed an excellent catechiſm.

Anno Chriſti 1567, the civil wars breaking out again in France, he was much affected with it, and by writing, admoniſhing, and exhorting both at home and abroad, endeavoured to aſſiſt with his counſel whom he could not by his preſence. Alſo anno Chriſti 1568, that war waxing hot, many out of ſundry parts of France fled to Geneva as to a ſafe harbour, amongſt whom was Nicolas Beza, præfect of Vezelia, brother to Beza by the father's ſide, who living a while in Beza's houſe, ſhortly after died of the plague. And not long after Beza's wife fell ſick of it, yet it pleaſed God to reſtore her to health again. The ſame year, in the midſt of many troubles, he wrote his books of Polygamie, and Divorces, againſt Bernard Ochin, who a little before had publiſhed his dialogues upon theſe ſubjects, ſtuffed with errors. He wrote alſo againſt Flacius Illiricus.

Anno Chriſti 1571, peace being ſetled, he was ſent for by the queen of Navar, the admiral, and the general vote of the churches of France to Rochell to a ſynod, where he was made the moderator, and at which, the confeſſion of faith of the French churches was confirmed, and ſubſcribed by the queen of Navar, her ſon (afterwards king Henry the IV.) and the prince of Conde. And the year after he was ſent for to Nemures to another ſynod, where the book of the French church diſcipline was eſtabliſhed.

Anno Chriſti 1572, after that bloody maſſacre at Paris, many of the godly that eſcaped fled to Geneva, amongſt whom were the paſtors of fifty churches that were wholly diſperſed. Theſe being ſtript of all, and in great want, Beza, by his letters into Germany and England, procured ſuch relief for them, that for three years ſpace in which they lived there, they were plentifully and comfortably provided for. In that maſſacre God was pleaſed wonderfully to preſerve Hen. of Burbon, ſon to the great Lodwick prince of Conde, who thereupon retired into Germany to ſhelter, and ſtaying a while at Stratborough, he ſent for Beza, and employed him to prince Caſſimire, the adminiſtrator of the Palatinate. And afterwards as this prince returned into France, he went by Geneva, where he conferred with Beza about many weighty matters.

Beza went on indefatigably in his public employment, reviſed his tranſlation and annotations upon the New Teſtament, and enlarged them; wrote againſt Pappus about the hypoſtatical union; againſt the railings of Holderus; againſt the calumnies of Andreas: made his harmony of the law out of the Books of Moſes. He wrote alſo of the notes, and authority of the catholic church, &c.

Shortly after the plague breaking forth in Geneva, Beza was much afflicted for the ſad condition of the commonwealth, yet he cheared up himſelf much with the hearty and ſincere love, and ſociety which he had with all the paſtors thereof, whoſe unity and unanimity was a great means under God to preſerve the happineſs of Geneva. About the ſame time five anabaptiſts (mechanics) began privately to ſow the ſeed of their errors in Geneva, whereupon Beza, John Pinaldus, Charles Perrot, and Anthony Faius, were choſen to confer with them and after confutation of their errors, they recanted, and reformed; only one of them left the city, and was heard of no more.

Anno Chriſti 1586 there was a diſputation appointed at Mombelgard between the German and Helvetian divines about the difference betwixt them in ſome points, unto which Beza was ſent for, and the whole diſpute was betwixt Dr Andreas and him; but in concluſion nothing was effected by it; yet they parted lovingly without bitterneſs. This was after publiſhed by Beza.

The year after his wife died, with whom he had lived with much comfort forty years, which was a great grief to him; yet afterwards by the advice of his friends he married another, one Katherine Plania, a godly matron, who was a great comfort to him all his life after. About the ſame time he was called to a ſynod held at Bern, wherein divers controverſies were debated, and the errors of Alberius, who ſaid, that we are juſtified at God's tribunal by inherent righteouſneſs; alſo of Huberus, about predeſtination, and eternal election, were condemned. Shortly after he wrote about the ſacraments againſt Hoſman; publiſhed in French his ſermons about the paſſion of Chriſt; alſo on the Canticles, which he turned into lyric verſe; anſwered Genebrard's calumnies, and reviſed his tranſlation of the New Teſtament.

Anno Chriſti 1589. France being full of broils, Geneva alſo was moleſted by the ſame; whereupon public prayers were appointed twice a week extraordinary, which burden Beza willingly took upon himſelf; whereupon the other paſtors freed him from his daily ſermons which he uſed to preach before; only he preached once on Sabbath mornings betwixt eight and nine o'clock.

Not long after he began to be troubled with a dizziness in his head, inſomuch as being to preach on Whitſunday anno Chriſti 1597 before the ſacrament, as ſoon as he had made confeſſion of ſins after their uſual manner, he was fain to give over, and come out of the pulpit, whoſe place Faius preſently ſupplied.

The like happened to him the week following alſo, whereupon he gave over public preaching, only now, and then praying publicly, yet would he not be idle, but went on teaching daily in the ſchools; yet at laſt becauſe of his dulneſs of hearing, he abſtained from the public diſputations, and conſiſtorial meetings.

And to ſatisfy ſome noblemen, Germans, Bohemians, and Polonians, who would needs hear him read ſome lectures; he began a brief analyſis upon the Epiſtle to the Romans, but after he had done it twice, he was fain to leave off. Yet did he not wholly deſiſt from preaching till the year 1600, when he preached his laſt ſermon in January, being eighty one years old, upon the third petition of the Lord's prayer, 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.' He had often in his mouth that ſaying of Veſpaſian, Imperatorem decet ſtantem mori.

Not long after being preſent at a conſiſtory, he invited all his brethren to ſupper, but they at firſt refuſed, becauſe there was to be a public faſt that week, and the magiſtrate had forbidden all feaſting; but he told them, that he would would get leave of the magiſtrates, and that he intended not a feaſt, but a frugal ſupper, rather to feaſt their minds with their mutual love and ſociety, than their bodies with dainties: then they all aſſented, and were entertained by him with all the expreſſions of brotherly love that could be.

Many noblemen and others that came from other countries to ſtudy at Geneva, would always deſire to ſojourn with him, that they might enjoy his ſociety.

That year there was a rumor ſpread abroad all over Europe by the Jeſuits, that Beza was dead, and that he turned papiſt before his death; which lie the paſtors of Geneva, and himſelf alſo by public writings confuted: and diſcourſing with his friends of it, he ſaid, 'That the Jeſuits, and he had both one deſire, but not for the ſame end; the Jeſuits (ſaid he) wiſh my end but for an evil end: I wiſh for it alſo, but that by death I may paſs to eternal life, purchaſed for me by the merits of Chriſt.'

Anno 1599 the king of France and the king of Navar lying in ſiege before the caſtle of ſaint Katharine's in Savoy near to Geneva. Beza went to viſit them, and was entertain'd with abundance of courteſy by them, and being aſked by the king of France if he had any requeſt to make to him, he anſwered, That he had nothing, but to command his ſacred majeſty to the bleſſing of the great God, and to pray that his majeſty might govern his people in peace. Only he requeſted, that ſeeing the church at Lions had not yet enjoyed the benefit of his majeſty's edict, that he would be pleaſed to think of them, which the king promiſed, and upon their petition, granted their deſire.

About the time of his return, he began to be much troubled with want of ſleep, but lying awake in the nights, he deceived the time with holy meditations. And ſpeaking to his friends of it, he uſed that ſpeech Pſal. xvi. ver. 7, 8. 'My reins alſo inſtruct me in the night ſeaſon. I have ſet the Lord always before me, in whoſe favour is life. And that of Pſal. lxiii. My ſoul is filled as with marrow and fatneſs, when I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches.' Many came out of the king's camp to Geneva to ſee the city which was now ſo famous, but eſpecially to ſee Beza; all whom he courteouſly entertained with holy and ſavoury diſcourſes, and ſo diſmiſſed them well pleaſed.

Anno Chriſti 1602 Maurice the lantgrave of Heſſe came to Geneva to ſee him, but diſguiſed, for which Beza was very ſorry after that he had not known him. Finding himſelf to draw near to his end, he reviſed his will, and ſo caſing his mind of all worldly thoughts, he wholly betook himſelf to expect the time of his departure, which he much longed for.

He often uſed that ſaying of the apoſtle, 'We are his workmanſhip, created in Chriſt Jeſus to good works.' And that of St Auguſtine, Diu vixi, diu peccavi. ſit nomen Domini benedictum: I have lived long, I have ſinned long, bleſſed be the name of the Lord. And that alſo, Domine, quod cœpiſti, perfice, ne in portu naufragium accidat, Lord perfect that which thou haſt begun, that I ſuffer not ſhipwreck in the haven; and that of Bernard, Domine, ſequemur te, per te, ad te: te, quia veritas: per te, quia via: ad te, quia vita: Lord, we follow thee, by thee, to thee: thee, becauſe thou art the truth: by thee, becauſe thou art the way: to thee, becauſe thou art the life.

Anno 1605 there came ſome noble, and learned men from Boruſſia to ſee him, with whoſe ſociety he was much pleaſed. But diſeaſes encreaſing upon him, the paſtors of Geneva agreed amongſt themſelves, that every day two of them ſhould viſit him by turns, and ſometimes all of them came together, and prayed moſt fervently with him.

Octob. 13, being the Sabbath-day, he roſe in the morning, and prayed with his family, and then deſiring to go to bed again, he ſat him down on the ſide of his bed, and aſked if all things were quiet in the city: they anſwered him yea; but perceiving that he was near to his end, they ſan for a miniſter, who immediately coming, whilſt he was praying with him, without the leaſt pain or groaning, he quietly yielded up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti 1605, and of his age 86, and of his miniſtry 46.

James Lectius made this epigram of him.

Vezelii genuere, piæ tenuere Gebennæ:
Aſtra tenent: vixi non mihi, ſed populis.
Aliud.
Si quæ fides famæ, proles mihi defuit omnis:
At varia, & vera prole beatus ego.
Me Populi, & Myſtæ, & Reges dixere parentem:
Multa virum genui millia, Chriſte, tibi.
Quin Populi, & Myſtæ. Reges naſcentur & ex me
Chriſte tibi, & toto dum legar orbe frequens.

He was a thick ſet man, and of a ſtrong conſtitution, inſomuch that he uſed to ſay, that he never knew what it was to have his head ake: he was of an excellent wit, an accurate judgment, a firm memory, very eloquent, affable, and courteous; ſo that he was called the Phœnix of his time.

In his teſtament he gave thanks.

1. That God at ſixteen years old had called him to the knowlege of the truth, though for a while he walked not anſwerable to it, till the Lord in mercy brought him home, and carried him to Geneva, where under that great Calvin he learned Chriſt more fully.
2. That being infected with the plague at Lauſanna, and aſperſed with grievous calumnies, the Lord had delivered him from them both.
3. That coming back to Geneva, he was there choſen paſtor, when as he deſerved not to have been one of the ſheep.
4. That not long after he was made colleague to that excellent man John Calvin in reading divinity.
5. That being called into France in the firſt civil war, and toſſed there up and down for twenty two months, God had preſerved him from ſix hundred dangers, &c.

A papiſt objecting to him his youthly poems; 'This man (ſaith he) vexeth himſelf becauſe Chriſt hath vouchſafed to me his grace.'

Though there was ſo great worth in this man, and his labours were extraordinary; yet he had but 1500 florins per annum for his ſtipend, which amount but to ſeven or eight and fifty pounds ſterling by the year, beſides 20 coups of corn, and his houſe.

His works were theſe. N. Teſtamenti nova verſio. cum Annotationibus. Confeſſio Chriſtianæ fidei. De Hæreticis & civili Magiſtratu puniendis. Summa totius Chriſtianiſmi. De Cœna Domini. De Hypoſtatica duarum in Chriſto naturarum unione. De unitate eſſentiæ Divinæ & tribus ſubſiſtentibus perſonis. Tractatio de Polygamia, & Divortio. Epiſtolæ Theologicæ. With many others ſet down particularly by Verheiden; and mentioned in this narrative of his life.

At the conference in the monaſtery of Poſſie (before mentioned) when a Spaniſh Jeſuit called the proteſtant divines, Aſinos, Vulpes, Simias, &c. Beza anſwered, Nos non magis credimus quam tranſubſtantiationem: We believe it no more than we do your doctrine of tranſubſtantiation.

The Life of Dr COLLET Dean of Paul's, who died Anno Chriſti 1519.

JOHN Collet was born of worſhipful parents in London; his father (Henry Collet) having been twice lord mayor of London, by whom he was carefully trained up in learning. In his younger days he travelled into France and Italy, whereby he much improved his learning. At his return into England he went to Oxford, commenced doctor of divinity, and began to read publicly upon Paul's Epiſtles inſtead of Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, which before were only in requeſt in that univerſity.

When he came to London he preached often, and had a very great auditory both of courtiers and citizens. His diet was very frugal; his life upright and unblameable: in diſcipline he was very ſevere, in ſo much as being made dean of Paul's, his canons complained that they were held in too much by him. He always preferred the honeſt and honourable eſtate of matrimony before the unchaſte ſingle life of prieſts. At dinner time he uſed to have ſome portion of ſcripture read to him, either out of Paul's Epiſtles or Solomon's Proverbs. He uſed no ſupper at all.

He was no friend to the irreligious orders of monks, and fryars. He was an enemy to the divinity of the ſchool doctors, as of Scotus, and Thomas Aquinas, inſomuch as when Eraſmus highly commended Aquinas for his learning and acuteneſs, Dr Collet anſwered; what tell you me of the learning of that man, who unleſs he had been of an arrogant and preſumptuous ſpirit, durſt never have taken upon him to diſcuſs and define all things ſo boldly and ſo raſhly as he did? And except he had rather been worldly minded than heavenly, he would never ſo have polluted Chriſt's wholeſome doctrine with man's profane doctrine as he hath done.

The biſhop of London at this time was Fitz James, who of a long time bore a great grudge to Dr Collet, and therefore joining with two other biſhops they entred an action of complaint againſt him before Dr Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury. The articles exhibited againſt him were three. Firſt, for preaching againſt the worſhipping of images. Secondly, About hoſpitality, for that the preaching upon thoſe words in the goſpel Feed, feed feed; having expounded the two firſt for feeding by doctrine and example, the third expounded for feeding by hoſpitality: yet not ſo much for feeding the body as the people by good counſel and conference. The third was for ſpeaking againſt ſuch as preached boſom ſermons, declaring nothing to the people but what they bring in their papers with them: this the biſhop of London uſed to do, and therefore took it as ſpoken againſt himſelf, which much irritated him againſt Dr Collet. But the archbiſhop more wiſely weighing the matter, and being well acquainted with the worth of Collet, ſo took his part againſt his accuſers, that at that time he freed him out of trouble.

Another deſign of Fitz James was to make him an heretic for tranſlating the Pater noſter into Engliſh, but the archbiſhop help him out of that alſo.

Yet the biſhop's malice was reſtleſs; for when he could not prevail againſt doctor Collet before the archbiſhop, he laid a train to accuſe him to the king, and the occaſion thereof was this: about this time king Henry the VIII. was preparing war againſt France, and the biſhop with his complices took advantages againſt Dr Collet, for that in one of his ſermons he had ſeemed to prefer peace before any kind of war, though never ſo juſt. For this they inveighed againſt him in their ſermons, and traduced him alſo before the king; yet on good Friday after, Dr Collet preached before the king, at which time he treated upon the victory of Chriſt, exhorting all Chriſtians to fight under Chriſt's ſtandard againſt the devil; adding moreover what an hard thing it was ſo to do. He ſhewed alſo that all they who upon private hatred or ambition took weapons againſt their adverſaries, one Chriſtian to deſtroy another, they did not fight under Chriſt's banner but under Satan's. He exhorted therefore all Chriſtians in their wars, rather to make Chriſt their prince and captain in fighting againſt their enemies, than to imitate Julius Cæſar, Alexander, &c.

The king hearing this, and fearing leſt the hearts of his ſoldiers ſhould by theſe words be withdrawn from the wars, took him aſide into his garden after ſermon, and had much private conference with him. Biſhop Fitz James and his aſſociates ſeeing this, were now confident that they ſhould ſee Collet preſently ſent priſoner to the tower, and therefore they waited for his return out of the garden; but contrary to their expectation the king uſed him very courteouſly, bade him put on his cap, much commended him for his learning and integrity of life, and agreed with him in all points that he had taught; only he deſired him, leſt the rude ſoldiers ſhould miſinterpret that which he had ſaid, that in his next ſermon he would explain himſelf more fully to them, which afterwards he did accordingly: and ſo after long communication, and great promiſes of favour, the king gently diſmiſſed him with theſe words, 'Let every man have his doctor as himſelf beſt liketh, this ſhall be my doctor.' His adverſaries ſeeing and hearing this, durſt never after that time moleſt him any further.

He did many excellent works of piety and charity, and amongſt the reſt he erected that famous foundation of Paul's ſchool, London, where one hundred and fifty-three poor men's ſons ſhould be taught freely; and for this end he built a very convenient dwelling houſe for the ſchool-maſter. He aſſigned alſo a large annual ſtipend both for the head maſter and uſher, whom he wiſhed rather to be choſen out of the number of married men, than of ſingle prieſts, with their ſuſpected chaſtity. He left ſundry rents and houſes for the payment of thoſe ſtipends, which he committed to the overſight of the worſhipful company of mercers in London.

He cauſed to be engraven upon the ſchool in Latin, Schola catechiſationis puerorum in Chriſti opt. max. fide et bonis literis, anno Chriſti M. D X.

The firſt moderator of this ſchool was Mr William Lilly, a man no leſs eminent for his learning, than Dr Collet was for this foundation: he made the Latin Grammar, which ever ſince, by authority, has been uſed in all ſchools.

Dr Collet was very expert in the ſcriptures, eſpecially in Paul's epiſtles, which he hath illuſtrated by his commentaries. He held juſtification freely by the merits of Chriſt, and not by our own works. He was an enemy to the idle and unchaſte life of the popiſh clergy. He abhorred thoſe that perſecuted the profeſſors of the truth. He died anno Chriſti 1519, and was buried in Paul's church, upon whoſe tomb Mr Lilly engraved this motto;

Diſce mori mundo, vivere diſce Deo.

The Life of Dr SANDS, Archbiſhop of York, who died anno Chriſti 1588.

EDWIN SANDS was born of an antient and worthy family, about the year 1528; and being trained up in learning, he ſo profited therein, both in the country and univerſity, that he was choſen maſter of Katharine hall in Cambridge; and having commenced Dr. he was made vice chancellor of that univerſity; at which time that bleſſed king Edward VI. dying, and the lady Jane Gray being proclaimed queen as we have heard before, the duke of Northumberland was ſent with an army to apprehend the lady Mary. And when he came to Cambridge, he ſent for Dr Sands, the then vice chancellor, and ſome other doctors, to ſup with him; and at ſupper required Dr Sands to preach on the morrow. The warning was ſhort for ſuch an occaſion and auditory, yet he refuſed it not, but went home, and ſo to bed. The next morning he roſe at three o'clock, and, having prayed a good while, roſe up, and took his bible in his hand, and cloſing his eyes, earneſtly pray'd to God that it might fall open at a fit text for the preſent occaſion, and accordingly it opened, and the firſt text that he caſt his eye upon was Joſhua I. 16. 17. 18. 'And they anſwered Joſhua ſaying, All that thou commandeſt us we will do, and whitherſoever thou ſendeſt us we will go: according as we hearkened to Moſes in all things, ſo will we hearken unto thee; only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moſes. Whoſoever he be that doth rebel againſt thy commandment, and will not hearken to thy words in all that thou commandeſt him, he ſhall be put to death; only be ſtrong and of a good courage.'

This text he proſecuted with ſuch prudence and affection, as drew many tears from the eyes of his auditors. After ſermon, the duke and other nobles deſired him to print his ſermon, and he only required a day and an half's time for the writing of it, at the end whereof he delivered it to Mr Leaver, who was preſently to carry it to London to the preſs: but juſt at that inſtant came one of the beadles to him weeping, and bad him ſhift for himſelf; for, ſaid he the duke is retired, and Queen Mary is proclaimed. Dr Sands was nothing troubled herewith, but delivered his ſermon to Mr Leaver, and ſo went to dinner to Mr Moore's, one of the beadles his great friend: at dinner, being of an undaunted courage, and cheerful diſpoſition, he was very merry. Mrs Moore drinking to him, ſaid, 'Mr Vice chancellor, I drink to you; this being the laſt time that ever I ſhall ſee you;' which accordingly proved true.

That night the duke ſent for him, to join with him in proclaiming proclaiming Queen Mary; and then told him that the queen was merciful, and that he hoped for a general pardon; to which Dr Sands answered, My life is not dear unto me, neither have I done or said any thing that troubleth my conscience; for what I spake of the state, I have instructions signed by sixteen counsellors to warrant me therein; neither can speeches be treason: nor yet have I spoken any thing but what the word of God and the laws of the land will bear me out in; therefore the will of the Lord be done. But be you assured, my lord, that you shall never escape death; for if the queen should spare you, they that now shall rule will kill you.

That night the duke was apprehended, and some were as busy about Dr Sands; but Sir John Gates, that lay in the doctor's house, drave them away. The next day Dr Sands walked into the fields, when the university, in an irregular manner meeting together, ordered Dr Mouse and Dr Hatchet to go to Dr Sands, his house, to fetch away the university statutes, the keys, and such other things as were in his custody, which accordingly they did; and Dr Mouse, who the day before was an earnest protestant, was turned now a zealous papist, and a great enemy to Dr Sands, from whom he had received great courtesies.

That afternoon a congregation was appointed by them, and the bell rang to it; when Dr Sands, coming out of the fields, sent for the beadles, asking what the matter meant, requiring them to wait upon him to the schools, according to their duty, which they did, and Dr Sands took the chair.

Mr Mitch, and a rabble of unlearned papists, seeing this, withdrew, and conspired among themselves to pull him out of the chair. In the mean time Dr Sands began his oration, expostulating with the university about their dealings, and charging them with great ingratitude towards him, affirming that he had said nothing in his sermon but what he was ready to justify; and that if he were faulty, they were as deeply guilty in concealing, and consenting to that which he had spoken. In the midst of his speech in came Mitch, with his associates, some laid hands on him to pull him out of the chair, telling him it was not his place; others called him traitor, &c. Dr Sands seeing that they used violence, being of a great courage, felt for his dagger, to have dispatched some of them as God's enemies; but Dr Bell and Dr Blyth prayed him for God's sake to hold his hands, and patiently to bear that great wrong; to which he assented: and so the tumult ending, he went on, and finished his oration; and having some money of the university's in his hand, he delivered it up, together with all other things belonging to the university, and then resigned his office, praying to God to substitute a better in his room, and to give them better and more thankful hearts; and so he repaired to his own college.

On the morrow came to him Mr Germingham and Mr Thomas Mildmay; Mr Germingham told him it was the queen's pleasure that by two of the guard he should be conveyed to the tower, together with the duke: Mr Mildmay told him, that he wondered that so learned a man as he, should speak so unadvisedly against so good a prince. Dr Sands answered, I shall not be ashamed of bonds; but if I could do as Mr Mildmay can, I need not to fear them; for you came down in arms against the queen, and now you are in arms for her; I cannot thus blow hot and cold with one mouth.

Presently Dr Sands, his stable, was robbed of four excellent geldings, and an inventory was taken of all his goods, and he was set upon a lame jade that halted to the ground; whereupon a friend of his desired that he might lend him a nag to ride upon. As he went out at the end of the town some papists assembled to jeer, and some of his friends to mourn for him.

He was carried through London in scorn, and as he entered in at Bishopsgate a base woman threw a stone at him, and hit him so full on the breast that he was near falling from his horse; to whom he mildly said, 'Woman, I pray God forgive thee.' As he went through Tower-street, a woman in her door said to him, 'Fye on thee, thou knave, thou traitor, thou heretic:' at this he smiled, whereupon she said, Look, the desperate heretic laughs at it.

Another woman, on the other side of the street, said, Fie, neighbour, thou art not worthy to be called a woman, railing thus upon this gentleman, whom thou knowest not, nor yet the cause why he is thus used; and, turning to the doctor, she said, 'Good gentleman, God be thy comfort, and give thee strength to stand in God's cause, even to the death.' And thus he was carried prisoner to the tower, where the yeoman of the guard took from him his borrowed nag, and whatsoever else he had: and whereas his man brought some linen after him, that was also taken from him.

The first three weeks he was in a very bad prison, at the end whereof he was removed to another, where was put to him Mr John Bradford.

On the day of the queen's coronation his prison door was left open, and there came to him one Mr Mitchell, a special friend of his, and said, Dr Sands, there is such a stir in the tower, that neither gates, doors, nor prisoners are looked after this day; therefore take my cloak, hat, and rapier, and get you gone, save yourself, and let me do as I may. The Dr refused this offer, saying, I know no just cause of my imprisonment, and if I should do this I should make myself guilty, I will expect God's good will; yet am I much bound to you for your love. Mr Mitchell not prevailing departed.

Dr Sands and Mr Bradford continued in prison twenty-nine weeks, one Bowler, a perverse papist, being their keeper; yet by their affable and loving carriage and converse, he began to mislike popery, and to favour the gospel; yea, he was so far at last wrought upon, that on a Sabbath, when others went to mass, he carried up to them a service book, a manchet, and some wine; at which time Dr Sands administered the sacrament to Mr Bradford and him, and so Bowler became their son begotten in their bonds.

When Wyat was up in arms, that room might be made for him and his in the tower, Dr Cranmer, Dr Ridley, and Mr Bradford, were put into one prison; and Dr Sands, with nine other godly ministers, were removed to the Marshalsey.

As they went, the people every where prayed to God to comfort them, and to strengthen them in his truth: whereupon the keeper of the Marshalsey said to Dr Sands, I perceive the vain people would set you forward to the fire, but I hope you will not prefer your own knowlege before the judgment of so many learned and worthy prelates; if so, you shall find me as strait a keeper as one that utterly mislikes your religion. Dr Sands answered, 'I know myself young, and my learning small, its enough to know Christ crucified; and he hath learned nothing that sees not the great blasphemy that it is in popery. I have read in scripture of some godly and courteous keepers, God may make you one; if not, I trust he will give me strength and patience to bear your hard dealing with me.' The keeper replied, Do you then mind to stand to your religion? 'Yea, (said the Dr) by God's grace I do.' Truly, said the keeper, I love you the better for it; I did but try you before; and what favour I can shew you, you shall be sure of it; and I shall think myself happy if I may die at the stake with you: and ever after he shewed the Dr much favour, suffering him to walk into the fields alone, where sometimes he met with Mr Bradford, who being removed to the king's bench, found the like favour with his keeper. He also lodged him in the best chamber, and would not suffer irons to be put on him, as other prisoners had; and suffered his wife, a beautiful gentlewoman both in body and soul, to resort to him. He lodged also Mr Sanders with him.

To these two holy men there was much resort, and much money was proffered to them, but they would receive none. Three or four times they celebrated the sacrament, and had many communicants; at which times Dr Sands gave such exhortations as drew many tears from his auditors, and wrought in them an utter abhorrency of the mass and all popery.

When Sir Thomas Wyat, with his army, came into Southwark, he sent to Dr Sands in prison, desiring his company and advice, telling him that the prison doors should be set open for him and the other prisoners. Dr Sands bad the messengers tell him, that if his rising were of God he ſhould ſtand, otherwiſe he would fall: and that for his own part he was committed by order; and that he would never depart thence except he were diſcharged by the like order. The like anſwer made Mr Sanders, and the other godly miniſters that were priſoners there.

Dr Sands having thus lain there nine weeks, at laſt, by the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcraft, then knight marſhal, he was ſet at liberty. The manner of it was thus; Sir Thomas Holcraft made great ſuit to the biſhop of Wincheſter, in the behalf of Dr Sands, yet could get no grant from him except he would turn to their religion; which if he would do, he ſhould have great preferment. Yet at laſt, by importunity, he extorted from him, that if the queen would grant him his liberty he would not oppoſe it. Then did Sir Thomas, by two ladies of honour, prevail with the queen, that he ſhould have his liberty, if Wincheſter liked of it. Sir Thomas having this grant, watched the biſhop's next going to the queen, and then again moved the buſineſs. He at laſt prevailed with them, and got a warrant ſigned by them for his deliverance: yet Wincheſter afterwards commanded him not to releaſe him, till two gentlemen ſhould give a thouſand pound bond for him not to depart the kingdom without licence. Sir Thomas ſeeing this, procured two gentlemen to be willing thus to be bound with him; and then ſending for Dr Sands, he imparted all the buſineſs to him; to whom Dr Sands ſaid, 'I give God thanks who hath moved your hearts to be ſo careful of me; I think myſelf much bound to you for your love, which God will requite, and I will never prove ungrateful: but as I came a free man into priſon, ſo I will not go out a bondman; for as I cannot benefit my friends, ſo neither will I hurt them: and if I be ſet at liberty I will not ſtay ſix days in the realm, if I can get out. Therefore, if I may not go free, ſend me back to priſon, where you ſhall be ſure of me. Sir Thomas Holcraft was much troubled at this anſwer; yet, ſeeing the Dr immoveable in his reſolution, he ſaid to him, Since I cannot change you, I will change my own mind, and am reſolved to ſet you at liberty, come of it whatever will come; therefore get you gone quickly over ſea and never write any thing back hither, for ſo you may undo me. And ſo, friendly kiſſing him, he bade him farewel; and commanded his keeper to take no fees of him.

Dr Sands returned to the Marſhalſey, tarried all night, and on the morrow gave his priſon-fellows a dinner, bad his bed fellow, and ſworn ſtake fellow, if it had ſo pleaſed God [Mr Sanders] farewel, they kiſſing each other with many tears.

Then went he to the king's bench to Mr Bradford and Mr Ferrar, comforting them, and they praiſing God for his happy deliverance; and ſo he went into London to a private friend; and the next night changed his lodging, hearing that ſearch was made after him. For Dr Watſon and Chriſtopherſon went to the biſhop of Winchester, and told him that he had ſet at liberty the greateſt heretic in England and one who had moſt corrupted the univerſity: whereupon the biſhop ſent for all the conſtables in London, commanding them to make diligent ſearch for him, and promiſing five pound to him that could apprehend him.

Dr Sands ſuſpecting the matter, ſhifted from place to place; and appointed his man to provide him two geldings, purpoſing to go into Eſſex to his father-in law Mr Sands, with whom his wife was: but that night having a pair of hoſe too long for him, which were made without meaſure, whilſt he was priſoner in the tower, he then lodging in Cornhill, requeſted the good wife of the houſe to ſend them to the next taylor to be cut ſhorter: and it ſo fell out, by God's providence, that the next taylor was a proteſtant, and the man that made them: he knowing the hoſe, went at midnight to the doctor's lodging, and being admitted into his chamber, wiſhed him not to be troubled at their unſeaſonable coming in: to which he anſwered, 'Nothing can be amiſs; what God will, that ſhall come to paſs' Then the taylor told him of the biſhop's ſending for the conſtables, whereof he was one, and of their hopes to find him; 'for, ſaith he, it is known that you have provided geldings, and that to-morrow you are to go through Algate, where you will certainly be taken; therefore let your man walk, booted and ſpurred, to morrow near where your horſes ſtand; and, in the meantime, they ſhall be conveyed privately to Bednal-green, and, at a fit ſeaſon, I will come and convey you thither alſo: as you go along the ſtreets look wildly; and if you meet your brother in the mouth, know him not &c.

Accordingly Dr Sands, attired like a gentleman, and looking wildly, went with the taylor the next day, who conveyed him through back lanes to Moore gate, and from thence to Bednal-green; where, having his horſes ready, he kiſſed the honeſt taylor, and would have given him the greateſt part of that little which he had, which yet he would not receive; and ſo with tears they parted: yet afterwards Dr Sands requited him thankfully. That night he rode to his father in law; and within two hours after his coming, his father was informed that that night two of the guard would ſeek to apprehend him there; whereupon he was preſently conveyed to an honeſt farmer's houſe, near the ſea ſide, where he was locked up two days and two nights in a chamber all alone, and then removed to one Mower, a maſter of a ſhip's houſe, at Milton ſhore, attending a wind for his departure: and while he was there, Mower brought forty or fifty mariners to him, to whom he gave ſuch an exhortation, that they being taken with it, reſolved all of them to die rather than he ſhould be apprehended.

May 6. the wind ſerved, and he took his leave of his hoſt and hoſteſs, who had been married eight years, and had no child; and when he took his leave of the woman, he thanked her kindly for his entertainment, and gave her his handkerchief, with an oval royal of gold in it, ſaying, 'Ere a year be paſt, be of good comfort, God will give you a ſon:' and accordingly it came to paſs; for when there lacked but one day of a twelvemonth ſhe was brought to bed of a fair ſon.

Dr Sands and Dr Coxe were both in the ſame ſhip, and 'ere it was out of kan, two of the guard were upon the the ſhore to have apprehended Dr Sands; but God gave them a good paſſage; ſo that they arrived ſafely at Anwerp, and were invited to dinner to Mr Lock's houſe; and as they were at dinner, Mr George Gilpin, ſecretary to the Engliſh houſe, came to them, and whiſpering to Dr Sands, ſaid, King Philip hath ſent to make ſearch for you, and to apprehend you: Hereupon he immediately roſe from dinner, and though it rained very faſt, yet he went out at the gate that leads towards Cleveland, where, meeting with a waggon, he haſted away, and came ſafely to Auſburg in Cleveland, where he tarried fourteen days, and then travelled to Straſburgh; and when he had continued there one year his wife came to him. There he fell ſick of a great flux, which held him nine months, and brought him to death's door. He had a child alſo that fell ſick of the plague, and died. His godly and virtuous wife alſo fell ſick of a conſumption, and died in his arms.

Whilſt he remained there he was chiefly maintained by one Mr Iſaac, an Engliſh gentleman of Kent, and one that ſuffered exile for the cauſe of Chriſt: he ſo entirely loved him, that he was always more ready to give, than Dr Sands was ready to receive; ſo that he gave him above a hundred merks, which Dr Sands afterwards thankfully repaid again.

After the death of his wife he travelled to Zurich in Switzerland, and there ſojourned in the houſe of Peter Martyr for five weeks ſpace, at the end whereof, as they ſat at dinner, news was brought them of queen Mary's death, and Dr Sands, by his friends, was ſent for back to Straſburgh. This news occaſioned joy to all but Dr Sands, who was ſtricken to the heart to think that he was called back to new ſorrows.

Mr Bullinger, and the other miniſters, feaſted him before his departure from Zurick; and ſo he returned back to Straſburgh, where he preached; and in the company of Mr Grindal, he came for England, arriving at London upon the coronation day of queen Elizabeth.

By her, for his ſingular piety and learning, he was advanced to the biſhopric of Worceſter, anno 1559. and afterwards he was removed to the biſhopric of London, anno 1570; and laſtly, he ſucceeded Dr Grindal in the archbiſhopric of York, anno 1576. In all which places he governed the church with ſingular prudence and modeſty; and having finiſhed his courſe on earth, he went to receive his crown in heaven, Auguſt 8. anno 1588, being above about the age of ſixty, and lies buried in the collegiate church of Southwell in Nottinghamſhire.

He was a man of whom it is hard to ſay, whether he were more famous for his admirable virtues or great learning, as his ſermons yet extant in print do manifeſt. He left many children, of which three were knights, excellently qualified both in mind and body, eſpecially Sir Edwin Sands, who deſerved ſo well of his country.

The life of Mr RICHARD GREENHAM, who died about the Year 1591.

I Can yet learn nothing concerning the country, parentage, or firſt education of Mr Richard Greenham. The firſt place where I find him was in Pembroke hall in Cambridge, where he followed his ſtudies ſo hard, and was ſo eminent for his proficiency in learning, that he was choſen fellow in that ſociety; and after a while he was called to a paſtoral charge at Dry Drayton, not far from Cambridge, and, like a faithful miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, he ſpared no pains amongſt his people, whereby he might advance the good of their ſouls.

His conſtant courſe was to preach twice on the Lord's day, and before the evening ſermon to catechiſe the young people of the pariſh. His manner alſo was to preach on Mondays, Tueſdays, and Wedneſdays, and on Thurſdays to catechize the youth, and again on Fridays to preach to his people; and that on theſe week days the people might have the better opportunity to attend upon his miniſtry, his courſe was to be in the pulpit in the morning ſo ſoon as he could well ſee.

He was ſo earneſt, and took ſuch extraordinary pains in his preaching, that his ſhirt would uſually be as wet with ſweating, as if it had been drenched in water, ſo that he was forced, ſo ſoon as he came out of the pulpit to ſhift himſelf, and this wonderful and exceſſive pains he took all his time. Twice a day he prayed in his family; and after ſermon he uſed to call his ſervants together, and examined them of what they heard, and what they remembered. And beſides all theſe his public labours, he ſtudied very hard, riſing every day, both winter and ſummer, at four o'clock in the morning.

He was very eminent for his charity to the poor, whereof we have this notable example: In a time of ſcarcity, when barley was at ten groats the buſhel, (which in thoſe days was an extraordinary price) he by his prudence brought it to paſs, that the poor had it ſold to them for four groats the buſhel, of every huſband man in the town; and thus he effected it:

There were about twenty plough-holders in the town, all which he, by his holy perſuaſions drew to an agreement amongſt themſelves, to hire a common granary, and therein to lay up corn for the poor, ſome more, ſome leſs, every man according to his ability; ſo that ſome laid up one coom, ſome a quarter, ſome three cooms, and Mr Greenham himſelf hid in five cooms, all which was delivered out to the poor at a groat a-peck. There was one day in the week appointed for all the poor to come and be ſerved, at which time every one received according to their charge: where there were but two in a family, they received one peck a week, and ſo more according to that proportion; only no one family had above three pecks a week.

He kept but two beaſts himſelf, that the poor might have his ſtraw; and when other men ſold their ſtraw for two ſhillings the day's threſh, he ſold his for ten pence: ſo that in that dear time all the poor in the pariſh had been well nigh famiſhed, had it not been for his prudence and liberality; which he alſo continued till the price of corn abated, which was ſuddenly and extraordinarily; for that corn which was ſold for a noble the buſhel, was within one month after ſold for fourteenpence the buſhel.

But during the fore-mentioned dearth, by public order, the buſhels were cut and made leſs; this Mr Greenham preached much againſt, and publicly reproved whereſoever he came, and withall gave his man a charge, that if the clerk of the market ſent for his buſhel to cut it, he ſhould not carry it in, which was done accordingly, for which he came into ſome trouble, but the Lord delivered him out of the ſame. Alſo at this time though his buſhel was bigger then other mens, yet he would often charge his man not to ſtrike off all the corn. He uſed not to trouble himſelf with reckonings and accounts, but would ſometimes aſk his man when he came from the market, how he ſold corn? and if it was dear, he would ſay, I pray God bring down the the price of it; and if it was cheap, he would heartily bleſs God for it. Yea, his charity was not only extended to the poor of his own pariſh, but to others alſo; for if at any time he had ſeen a poor body at a diſtance from him as he rode abroad, he would ſend his man with money to him; and when at any time he rode by the caſtle at Cambridge, the priſoners would never aſk him for any thing, nor any one that was with him, for if he had any money in his purſe, they were ſure to have part of it. By reaſon of his great liberality, though his living was worth a hundred pound per annum, yet he uſually wanted money to get in his harveſt, ſo that his wife (formerly Dr Bound's widow) was forced to borrow money to ſupply that want; yet was he ſo well content with his preſent condition, that though he had proffers of livings worth three of that which he had, yet would he by no means be perſwaded to accept of them.

He was a great friend to, and promoter of peace and concord amongſt his neighbours and acquaintance, inſomuch that if any had come to him who were at variance, he would either have made them friends himſelf, or if he could not prevail, he would have made uſe of other friends to reconcile them together, thereby to prevent their going to law.

When Martin Mar Prelate came firſt out, Mr Greenham being to preach at St Maries in cambridge, ſpake freely againſt that book, manifeſting his diſlike of the ſame: for (ſaid he) the tendency of this book is to make ſin ridiculous, whereas it ought to be made odious.

On a time the biſhop of Ely ſent for him, to appear about his nonconformity: at which time the biſhop told him that there was a great ſchiſm in the church, aſking him where the blame was to be laid, whether upon the conformiſts, or non-conformiſts? To which he readily anſwered, that it might lie on either ſide; or, on neither ſide: for (ſaid he) if they loved one another as they ought, and would do all good offices each for other, thereby maintaining love and concord, it lay on neither ſide: otherwiſe, which party ſoever makes the rent, the ſchiſm lies upon their ſcore. The biſhop was ſo pleaſed with this anſwer, that he diſmiſſed him in peace.

He was much troubled with a bad concoction, whereby he had frequent ſick nights, which kept him much waking, but then his manner was (as much as poſſibly he could) to ſpend the time in meditation and prayer.

We have before heard of his great charity to mens bodies: his charity to ſouls was not leſs examplary. For having great experience, and an excellent faculty to relieve and comfort diſtreſſed conſciences, he was ſought to, far and near, by ſuch as groaned under ſpiritual afflictions and temptations: all whom he entertained friendly and familiarly, without reſpecting the perſon of the rich more than of the poor.

Yea the fame of this ſpiritual phyſician ſo ſpread abroad, that he was ſent for to very many, and the Lord was pleaſed ſo far to bleſs his labours, that by his knowlege and experience many were reſtored to joy and comfort, out of unſpeakable and inſupportable terrors and torments of conſcience. If the Lord had not ſo ſoon tranſlated him out of this ſinful and miſerable world, there was none more fit, nor willing to have preſcribed rules, and a method to be obſerved in this ſo little a known art. Of his good will herein, let his own words teſtify the forward deſirer of his heart: for upon a ſpecial occaſion he thus ſpeaketh of himſelf; I have had (ſaith he) for a long time a ſettled reſolution, (which I hope is from God) to ſtudy the caſes of conſcience, that thereby I may be the better able to ſuccour the tempted and perplexed in ſpirit.

He was filled with bowels of compaſſion towards the afflicted, ſympathizing, as if he had been afflicted with them.

Many godly and learned friends of his, perceiving his abilities and inclinations thereto, did labour much to excite and encourage him in thoſe ſtudies, upon theſe and the like grounds. Firſt, That he might hereby the better train up ſome young men in the like ſtudies, communicating his knowlege and experiences to them therein. ſecondly, that he might leave to poſterity a commentary of ſuch particular maladies as God had made him inſtrumental in the cure of, together with the means by him uſed for effecting of the ſame. And becauſe precepts are wanting, rules of direction might be framed, partly by his own obſervation, partly by conferrence with other learned and experienced perſons, whereby in that, and the age following, that art might be brought into ſome form and method, to the public good and benefit of many, not only for the fruitful curing, but alſo for the healthful preventing of manifold miſchief.

To ſuch as complained to him that they were troubled with blaſphemous thoughts, his counſel was, that they ſhould not fear them, but abhor them. And when ſome poor chriſtians were miſerably afflicted with fears, that they had commited that unpardonable ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, he uſed to tell them, that if they would not have committed it, it was certain that they had not fallen into it.

The graces of God's ſpirit did all abundantly ſhine forth in this man of God: all tempered, as with unfeigned love to Chriſt, ſo with bowels of love and compaſſion towards men; and he again was greatly beloved of all men.

In the whole courſe of his miniſtry, he was very careful ever to avoid (as much as was poſſible) all occaſions of offence, deſiring in all things to approve himſelf as a miniſter of Chriſt, and work man that needed not to be aſhamed.

He much rejoiced in, and praiſed God for the happy government of queen Elizabeth, and for the bleſſed calm and peace which the church and people of God enjoyed under the ſame, ſpeaking often of it both publickly and privately, as he had occaſion, endeavouring to ſtir up the hearts of all men (as much as in him lay) to praiſe God with him for it, and to pray alſo for the continuance thereof. Yea this matter ſo affected him, that the day before his departure out of this world, his thoughts were much troubled, for that moſt men were ſo unthankful for thoſe wonderful and happy deliverances, which the Lord of his mercy vouchſafed to that glorious queen, from the conſpiracies and dangerous practices of her popiſh adverſaries.

He was a ſpecial inſtrument and means under God to encourage, and train up many godly and learned young men in the holy ſervice of Chriſt, in the work of the miniſtry; and to reſtrain, and reduce not a few from errors and ſchiſm; ſtriving by all means to retain them in obedience to the laws of the land, and to provoke them highly to prize, and preciouſly to eſteem the peace of the church, and people of God.

Having continued at Dry-Drayton about the ſpace of twenty or one and twenty years, he left it, and went from thence to London about the year 1588 or 89. Yet was very careful before his remove, to get an honeſt and able man to ſucceed him in that place.

The cauſes of his removal were partly the untractableneſs and unteachableneſs of that people amongſt whom he had taken ſuch exceeding great pains. For beſides his public preaching and catechiſing, his manner was to walk out into the fields, and to confer with his neighbours as they were at plough; and partly he did it upon ſuppoſal that he might do far more good in a more public place by comforting afflicted conſciences, wherein the Lord had given him ſuch an admirable dexterity.

He wholly ſpent himſelf in the ſervice of God and his church, and therefore often made uſe of that ſaying of the prophet David: 'The zeal of thy houſe hath eaten me up.'

He was a little man of ſtature, and uſually indifferent well in health; but when at any time he was ſick, he would ſuffer no body to ſit up and watch with him, that ſo he might more freely converſe with God.

He continued not in London above the ſpace of two years, but being quite worn out, he comfortably and quietly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti 1591, and about the ſixtieth year of his age.

He hath a volume of ſermons, and treatiſes of divinity in print.

The Life of THOMAS CARTWRIGHT, who died, Anno Chriſti, 1603.

THOMAS CARTWRIGHT was born in Hertfordſhire, about the 1535. And being by his parents kept at ſchool till he was fit for the univerſity, he went to Cambridge and was admitted into St John's colledge, anno 1550. He there followed his ſtudies exceeding hard, and being a man of excellent natural parts, he profited in learning more than ordinary; he never uſed to ſleep above five hours in a night, which cuſtom he continued to his dying day.

Three years after at the death of Edward VI. he left the univerſity, and betook himſelf to the ſervice of a counſellor, yet followed his ſtudies very hard, as taking more pleaſures therein, than in the ſtudy of the law; thus he continued till the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, at which time his maſter meeting with Dr Pilkinton, maſter of St John's college in Cambridge, he told him of his mans learning and ſtudious diſpoſition; the doctor deſired to ſpeak with him and thereby perceiving his great abilities and hopefulneſs, with his maſter's conſent he took him again to St John's college, where his proficiency and progreſs both in the arts and tongues, was ſo eminent, that anno 1560, he was choſen fellow in that college, and about three years after he was removed to a fellowſhip in Trinity college, where for his worth, he was ere long made one of the eight ſenior fellows.

Anno 1564. Queen Elizabeth coming to Cambridge, great preparation was made for her entertainment, and four of the eminenteſt men in the univerſity being choſen to keep a philoſophy act before her, he was one of them, who performed it with extraordinary abilities, to the great content and ſatisfaction both of the queen and his other ſtuditors. Anno 1567. he commenced batchelor of divinity, and three years after he was choſen to be the lady Margaret's divinity reader. He read upon the firſt and ſecond chapter of the Acts of the Apoſtles, and performed it with ſuch acuteneſs of wit, and ſolidity of judgment, as cauſed admiration in his hearers; and even at that time he was ſo famous for his miniſtry, that when his turn came to preach at St Mary's, the ſexton was fain to take down the windows, by reaſon of the multitudes that came to hear him.

In his lectures he was occaſioned to diſcover his judgment about church-diſcipline, which the doctors and heads in the univerſity took very haingouſly, as being dangerous and deſtructive to the preſent hierarchy, whereupon he was convented before the vice chancellor, Dr May, and other doctors, and being examined upon ſundry articles, or propoſitions of doctrine delivered by him publicly in his lectures, and elſewhere, which they affirmed to be contrary to the religion received, and allowed by public authority in this realm, and thereupon they demanded whether he would ſtand to, or revoke the ſaid opinions and doctrines delivered by him.

Mr Cartwright upon deliberation, deſired that he might have leave to ſet down in writing what his judgment in thoſe things was, and what he would ſtand to; which being granted, he drew up in ſix propoſitions what his judgment was; and ſetting his hand to it, delivered it to the vice chancellor, who thereupon admoniſhed him to revoke the ſame, and upon his refuſal, puniſhed him by the ſubtraction of his ſtipend, and ſo he continued in his lecture that year.

But the year after, Dr Whitgift being choſen vice chancellor, he again convented him before him, requiring his abſolute anſwer whether he did mind to teach his auditors otherwiſe, revoking that he had before taught; or whether he would abide in the maintainance of the ſame? Unto this Mr Cartwright anſwered, that for the propoſitions delivered by him under his hand to Dr May, and now ſhewed to him, they were his own hand-writing, ſuch as he had openly taught, and ſtill continued fully determined to maintain and defend as truths. Hereupon after Mr Cartwright had a while withdrawn, and the vice chancellor had conferred with the other doctors, Mr Cartwright was again called for, and this definitive ſentence was pronounced nounced againſt him by the vice chancellor, Dr Whitgift, that perceiving that no admonition would help, but that he ſtill perſiſted in the ſame mind, he did therefore pronounce him, the ſaid Mr Cartwright, to be removed from his ſaid lecture, and by his final decree of ſentence, did then and there remove him, and declare the ſaid lecture to be void; and that he minded, according to the foundation thereof, to proceed to the election of a new reader. And further he did then and there by virtue of his office, inhibit the ſaid Mr Cartwright from preaching within the univerſity and the juriſdiction of the ſame.

Now that the reader may be better ſatisfied what the articles were which Mr Cartwright drew up, and ſigned with his hand, and for which this ſentence was paſſed upon him, I ſhall here ſet them down in his own words, as I have them tranſcribed out of the original, ſtanding upon record in the regiſtry of the univerſity of Cambridge.

1 Archiepiſcoporum, & archidiaconorum nomina ſimul cum muneribus, et officiis ſunt abolenda.

2 Legitimorum in Eccleſia Miniſtrorum nomina, qualia ſunt Epiſcoporum, et Diaconorum ſeparata a ſuis muneribus in verbo Dei deſcriptis, ſimpliciter ſunt improbanda, et ad inſtitutionem Apoſtolicam revocanda: ut Epiſcopus in verbo et precibus, Diaconus in pauperibus curandis verſetur.

3 Epiſcoporum Cancellariis, aut Archidiaconorum Officialibus, &c. regimen Eccleſiæ non eſt committendum, ſed ad idoneum miniſtrum, et Preſbyterum ejuſdem Eccleſiæ deferendum.

4 Non oportet miniſtrum eſſe vagum, et liberum, ſed quiſque debet certo cuidam gregi addici.

5 Nemo debet miniſterium tanquam candidatus petere.

6 Epiſcoporum tantum autoritate, & poteſtate, miniſtri non ſunt creandi: multo minus in Muſæo, aut loco quopiam clanculario: ſed ab eccleſia electio fieri debet.

Hiſce reformandis, quiſque pro ſua vocatione ſtudere debet (vocationem autem intelligo) ut magiſtratus authoritate, miniſter verbo, omnes precibus promoveant.

Per me Thomam Cartwright.

Mr Cartwright being thus driven from the univerſity, not long after, finding the way for the exerciſe of his miniſtry in England obſtructed, he went beyond the ſeas to viſit other reformed churches, where he grew acquainted with the famouſeſt men for piety and learning in Chriſtendom, with whom he kept correſpondence all his life after. He was alſo highly prized by them, inſomuch as Beza writing about that time into England to a friend of his, hath this expreſſion; Eſt quidam anglus nobiſcum, nomine Thomas Cartwright, &c. Here is now with us your country-man, Thomas Cartwright, than whom I think the ſun doth not ſee a more learned man, &c.

He was alſo choſen preacher to the Engliſh merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleborough, where he did very much good by his miniſtry, the Lord bleſſing his labours exceedingly in thoſe parts; and when he underſtood that the merchants, by whom he was maintained, through their great loſſes decayed in their eſtates, he returned his ſallary to them again.

Not long after he came over into England, being earneſtly ſolicited thereunto by letters from Mr Dearing, Mr Fulk, Mr Wiburn, Mr Leaver, and Mr Fox; about which time the Non-Conformiſts having drawn up an admonition to the parliament for reformation of the church, doctor Whitgift, who was then preferred to the arch-biſhopric of Canterbury, anſwered the ſame in print; whereupon the miniſters which wrote the admonition, conſulting but not agreeing upon the choice of one to reply to Dr Whitgift, Mr Cartwright was at laſt choſen by lot to undertake it, and performed it ſo well, that his very adverſaries were heard to advance and commend him for it.

Yet was he with divers other of the Non-Conformiſts brought into the high commiſſion court, where, for refuſal of the oath, ex officio, they were clapt up in priſon, and afterwards proceeded againſt in the Star-chamber; but it pleaſed God ſo to order it, by his providence, that thoſe very witneſſes which were brought to accuſe them, did ſo clear them, that they were diſmiſſed, and ſent home much more honoured and beloved than they were before.

Whilſt Mr Cartwright was priſoner in the Fleet, he had thirty pounds ſent him from a noble friend, of which he took but ten ſhillings, returning the reſt, with many thanks, to the donor; and when the earl of Leiceſter offered him the provoſtſhip of Eaton college, ſaying, That it was a hundred pounds a-year more than enough, beſides the conveniency of the place. Mr Cartwright anſwered, That the hundred pounds more than enough was enough for him.

About the year 1580, his fame was ſo ſpread through the reformed churches, that king James, then king of Scotland, ſent for him, proffering to make him profeſſor in the univerſity of St Andrews; whereof, twenty years after, upon king James's coming into England, Mr Cartwright makes mention in his epiſtle before his commentary upon Eccleſiaſtes, which he dedicated to king James, returning him humble thanks for that royal favour. The arch biſhop of Dublin alſo ſent for him into Ireland, proffering him preferment in that kingdom.

He was ſent to from divers eminent divines beyond ſeas, wherein they craved his advice for the direction of young men in the method of their ſtudies; as alſo in the behalf of the churches in general, for his counſel in regulating their proceedings in the weighteſt affairs.

Alſo, about the ſame time, the Earl of Leiceſter preferred him to be maſter of his hoſpital at Warwick, which place was worth to him about one hundred pounds per annum. His employment was to pray with the poor men twice a day, to catechiſe twice a-week, and to preach once on the Lord's day at the pariſh church. This place he willingly and thankfully accepted of, becauſe he was therein exempted from the juriſdiction of the prelates.

His carriage and deportment was ſuch, that there was not a nobleman or gentleman of quality in all the country that looked heaven ward, or was of any account for religion and learning, but they ſought to enjoy his company, and found much pleaſure and content therein; for his converſation was ſuch, that ſcarce a word came from his mouth that was not of ſome good uſe and concernment.

He was of a very laborious and indefatigable ſpirit; it was his meat and drink to be doing the will of his heavenly Father; ſo that beſides all his pains in writing, and in the hoſpital, he preached every Sabbath-day in the morning, about ſeven o'clock, in the lower pariſh of Warwick, and, when he could be ſuffered, in the upper pariſh in the afternoon: beſides which he preached a lecture on Saturdays, in the afternoon, in the upper church, in which he went over a great part of the Proverbs and Eccleſiaſtes, with ſingular judgment and profit; and this he did of his own free will, without demanding or receiving one penny for his pains.

And whereas he was ſometimes ſuſpended by the biſhops from preaching in the churches, his manner was at thoſe times to preach in the hoſpital, whither many reſorted to hear him, though they were ſure to be brought into the biſhops courts for the ſame.

Preſently after his coming to Warwick, the Engliſh ſeminary at Rhemes publiſhed their verſion of the New Teſtament, and annotations upon it in Engliſh, which, coming over into England, it was looked upon by all as a book of dangerous concernment, and therefore fit to be anſwered by the ableſt pen that could be found; hereupon (as I have heard) queen Elizabeth ſent to Beza to requeſt him to undertake the anſwer; but he modeſtly excuſed it, and returned anſwer, that ſhe had one in her kingdom far abler than himſelf to undertake ſuch a taſk; and, upon further enquiry, declared that it was Mr Thomas Cartwright.

Then Sir Francis Walſingham, a man of eminent place and power, who herein, as in other affairs, was accounted the mouth and hand of the queen and ſtate, wrote to Mr Cartwright, earneſtly requeſting him to undertake the work, aſſuring him alſo of ſuch aid as ſhould further him in the finiſhing thereof; for which end he ſent him one hundred pounds towards the charges of buying books, and procuring writers which were to be employed by him therein; this was anno 1583.

The ſame year alſo he was earneſtly ſolicited by the moſt learned men of the univerſity of Cambridge, by a ſolemn epiſtle, with joint conſent written to him, to undertake the anſwer, wherein, amongſt other paſſages, they have theſe expreſſions; 'With you we are earneſt (moſt Rev.

Cartwright)

Cartwright) that you would ſet yourſelf againſt the unhallowed endeavours of theſe miſchievous men, either by refuſing the whole book, or at leaſt ſome part thereof. It is not for every man work-man-like to frame God's tabernacle, but for Bazaleel and Aholiab; neither is every one raſhly to be thruſt forth into the Lord's battles; but ſuch captains are to be choſen from amongſt David's worthies; of which, as we acknowlege you to be one, by the former battles undergone for the walls of our city, [church diſcipline], we doubt not, if you will enter this war (which truly you ought to do, according to the zeal and piety you bear to your country and religion), but that you, fighting for conſcience and country, yea even to the very inmoſt holy place of the temple, will be able to tread under foot the forces of the Jebuſites, which ſet themſelves to aſſault the tower of David. Moreover, (which may marvellouſly ſharpen the edge of your courage) you are not now to fight with a brother, or fellow of the ſame religion, which maketh the conflict more faint) but with the moſt inveterate enemies of Jeſus Chriſt, &c. Then they thus conclude; 'You ſee to what an honourable fight we invite you; Chriſt's buſineſs ſhall be undertaken againſt Satan's champions. We ſtir you up to fight the battles of our Lord, where the victory is certain, which the triumph and applauſe of the angels will enſue. Our prayers ſhall never be wanting unto you. Chriſt, without doubt, whoſe cauſe is defended, will be preſent with you. The Lord Jeſus much encreaſe your courage and ſtrength, and keep you very long in ſafety, for his church's good. Farewel.'

This was ſubſcribed by Roger Goad, William Whittaker, Thomas Crook, John Ireton, William Fulk, John Field, Nicholas Crane, Giles Sicutler, Richard Gardener, William Clerk, &c.

But beſides theſe, the reverend miniſters of London and Suffolk, did, by their ſeveral letters, earneſtly exhort him to this work: and Mr Cartwright was at laſt, by theſe importunities, drawn to undertake it, and neither diligence nor conſtancy was wanting in him to have carried it on to perfection; but he met with ſuch great diſcouragements and hinderances from potent adverſaries, that he was forced often to lay his pen aſide: yea, archbiſhop Whitgift ſent him a poſitive command, that he ſhould deal no further in it; yet afterwards, by an earl and privy counſellor of great note, and ſome other noble perſonages he was at laſt drawn to take pen in hand again; but receiving new diſcouragements, and having ſuch continual employment in the miniſtry, he lived not to perfect that work.

Whilſt he was at Warwick, being ſilenced by the biſhops, he was requeſted by Lord Zouch, governor of Guerſney, to go with him into that iſland, with whom he continued ſometime, and, in the mean ſpace, he ſubſtituted one Mr Lord, a godly and holy miniſter, then living at Woolſtone, in his room at the hoſpital in Warwick, allowing him the greateſt part of the profits of the place during his abode there, and the reſt he cauſed to be diſtributed amongſt the poor.

He was far from ſeeking after great places or great things in the world; and for riches he ſought them not: yea, he rejected many opportunities whereby he might have enriched himſelf. His uſual manner was, when he had good ſums of gold ſent him, to take only one piece, leſt he ſhould ſeem to ſlight his friend's kindneſs, and to ſend back the reſt, with a thankful acknowledgment of their love, and his acceptance of it, profeſſing, that for that condition wherein God had ſet him, he was as well furniſhed as they, for their high and great places.

His manner was not to keep any more money in his purſe, but what might ſerve for charitable uſes; he was very bountiful to poor ſcholars: he diſtributed money every Sabbath day amongſt the poor of the town of Warwick, beſides what he gave to the priſoners, and upon other occaſions both at home and abroad.

For his houſhhold affairs he never troubled himſelf with them, but wholly left them to be ordered and managed by the prudence of his wife.

He was very careful to regulate and order the buſineſſes of the hoſpital for the beſt advantage of the poor brethren: he continued his diligence and aſſiduity in his ſtudies even in his old age; and his uſual manner was to riſe at two, three, and four o'clock in the morning at the lateſt, both ſummer and winter, notwithſtanding that his bodily infirmities were ſuch, that he was forced to ſtudy continually kneeling upon his knees.

He was of a very meek and quiet ſpirit, as appears in thoſe conflicts which he had with Dr Whitgift and Dr Sutcliffe, wherein he uſed ſore words and hard arguments: he could not endure, ſo much as in private, to hear his adverſaries reproached; and if any in his preſence uſed diſgraceful ſpeeches of them, he would ſharply reprove them for it, ſaying, That it is a Chriſtian's duty to pray for, and not to reproach his adverſaries: and when Martin Mar Prelate's book came forth, he ſhewed much diſlike of the ſkyrical and tart language uſed therein.

He was alſo very humble, not enduring to hear any thing ſpoken in his own commendation, or any titles given him, which in the leaſt meaſure favoured of ambition: he affected not popularity, but avoided it as much as poſſibly he could.

Indeed all his ambition was to advance the kingdom and cauſe of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and to promote God's glory.

It was the great joy and rejoicing of his heart to hear of the welfare and proſperity of the churches at home and abroad; for this he earneſtly and daily prayed; and when he heard any ill tidings, with Nehemiah, he ſat down and mourned, and faſted, and prayed, before the God of heaven; ſo that all that converſed with him might eaſily diſcern, that nothing did affect him, in any degree, like the good and ill tidings of the church's ſtate.

He was frequent in prayer every day, and in his younger years hath riſen many times in the night to ſeek out private places to pray in.

And as his labours was very great in the work of the miniſtry, ſo it pleaſed the Lord to make them very ſucceſsful for the converſion and confirmation of many, and for terror and reſtraint unto others.

There was a woolen draper, in Warwick, who made a profeſſion of religion, but many times brake out into ſcandalous practices; Mr Cartwright, on a time, walking with him in his garden, dealt plainly and faithfully with him, rebuking him for his miſcarriages, and ſhewing him the diſhonour that he brought to God, and the goſpel thereby; this ſo wrought upon him, that he preſently ſunk down, and being carried home, died in a few hours after.

In his old age he was much troubled with the ſtone and gout, which much impaired his ſtrength; yet would he not intermit his labours, but continued preaching, when, many times, he could ſcarce creep into the pulpit. The Sabbath before his death, which was the laſt ſermon that he made, December 25 he preached upon Eccleſ. xii 17. 'Then ſhall the duſt return to the earth, and the ſpirit ſhall return to God who gave it'

The morning before his death, which was the Tueſday following, he was two hours on his knees in private prayer; in which (as he told his wife) he found wonderful and unutterable joy and comfort, God giving him a glimple of heaven before he came to it; and within a few hours after, he quietly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, December the 27 anno Chriſti 1603, and of his age 68. Mr Dod preached his funeral ſermon.

During his abode in the univerſity, he was of great power and credit in the regent houſe, ſo that the doctors feared leſt the preciſians (as they were then called) ſhould chuſe him vice chancellor, whereupon they procured the alteration of the ſtatute, whereby the choice was formerly in the regent houſe, and confined the election of the vice-chancellor to one of thoſe two whom the heads ſhould prick.

After long diſcontinuance, Mr Cartwright coming to Cambridge, was importuned to preach on a week day at St Maries, where there was a great confluence of all ſorts to hear him; grave men ran, like boys in the ſtreets to get places in the church. After ſermon he dined at Mr Chadderton's, and many went to the houſe to ſee and hear him ſpeak.

The

The Life and Death of Mr WILLIAM BRADSHAW, who died, anno Christi 1618.

IT hath from time to time been the lot of divers persons of singular worth and eminent parts, that they have lived in obscurity, and in a low condition, and past their time without that due respect and regard which their excellent endowments might justly have claimed; partly through the shortness of outward supplies; (for, they get not up easily, though never so well deserving, that are seated in that kind); partly, by reason of an outward bashfulness, and overawing modesty, accompanied with an undervaluing repute of themselves, and their own abilities; and partly through the iniquity of the times wherein they have lived, and the disaffection of those who have swayed most in the state and government under which they have resided.

Such was the condition of that worthy and faithful servant of the Lord Mr William Bradshaw, though a man richly endowed, as well with such spiritual graces, as in truth are of highest esteem, being peculiar to God's favourites, that have interest in his Christ, as with such gifts and parts also as might and did render him useful and instrumental for the public good of God's people; yet never enjoying any plentiful condition; howsoever, never prone to complain of want; nor forward at any time, or in any place, to put himself forth, as having a very low and mean conceit of his own parts, and admiring in others what his own eye could not descry, or would not take notice of (howsoever to others conspicuous enough) in himself; and being never suffered to continue long quiet in any settled place of more public employment, through the envy and malice of some that had a jealous eye on him, and the disturbances of him in the work of his ministry, set on foot by others ill affected towards him, but accrewing from the same, pursued by some of those who were of greater power and authority in ecclesiastical affairs, and could not brook any that did not in all particulars comply with them and their courses, as they conceived him not to do.

He was born at Bosworth, a market town in Leicestershire, famous for the battle fought near to it, wherein that bloody usurper, Richard III. lost his crown, (attained by the unnatural murder of his two nephews in their nonage), together with his life.

His father was Nicholas Bradshaw, though descended from an antient family of the Bradshaws in Lancashire, with the crest of whose coat therefore (being a buck browzing) this our brother used to seal; yet living but in a mean condition, and being not so well able therefore to train this his son up in learning as he desired, an uncle that he had at Worcester undertook the education of him; whether being master of the free school there, as some have supposed, or of some other profession, as some others conjecture: for that he had been heard to report that Mr William May, (who was some time by the Turkey merchants employed at Alleppo, and afterwards lived and ended his days in or about London, a man of more than ordinary skill in the learned languages, and in exposition of scripture very accurate and exact) was teacher in a public school at Worcester, while he lived there; relating withal, what a neat man he then was, howsoever in his afterdays he grew cynically sordid, and by his uncouth deportment, and jealous disposition, made himself nothing so useful to others, as otherwise he might have been. But, howsoever, it was for his uncle's profession, under him, (who, by some relation of his, may not improbably be deemed to have been a scrivener or public notary); he was brought up and kept at school, until it pleased God to bereave him of this support by his death. After whose decease, returning home to his father at Bosworth, he was enforced, though very much against his mind and desire, to intermit the prosecution of his studies in literature for some space of time.

His father now designing him to some other course of life, out of despair of maintaining him in a way so chargeable, as his means, being not large, would not reach unto; especially having other children, three sons and two daughters to provide for, besides him. But while the disposal of him hang thus in suspense, it pleased the Lord (who is wont to have a more special providence over those, whom, in his secret purpose, he hath fore-designed unto the work of his ministry, to have them fitted for the same) to stir up the spirit of one Mr Ainsworth, a man of much worth, then school-master at Ashby de la Zouch in Leicestershire, to divert his parents purpose of disposing him to any other employment. For by his favour (having taken notice of his capacity, industry, eager desire of farther progress in good literature, fitness of disposition to be wrought upon to that purpose, and by some buds sprouting out from such seeds thereof as had already been sown in him, conceiving good hopes of such future fruits, as did accordingly ensue) he was taken into the free school there; where he so profited, and made so successful a progress, that after a year's continuance, being then about eighteen year's of age, he was deemed sufficiently fitted and furnished for the university; and in the year 1589 was, together with that worthy man of great renown, Joseph Hall, afterwards bishop of Exeter, then of Norwich, and Hugh Cholmeley, (who had been both trained up in the same school with him, and did continue also afterward a kind affection to him, and friendly correspondence with him) he was admitted in Emmanuel college in Cambridge; where with them also he followed his studies under the tuition of that rev. divine Mr Gilbie, then fellow of that college; being there maintained, partly by the allowance of some gentlemen, his fellow pupils under the same tutor; and partly by some supplies afforded him from two noble knights of the honourable house of the Hastings, Sir Edward and Sir Francis, (on the latter of whom his father also had some dependence) upon the recommendation, and at the motion of that worthy servant of God, now with God, Mr Arthur Hildersham, who was himself also allied to that family.

In the college, with these supports, he continued husbanding his time to the best advantage, with an abundant blessing of God upon his sedulous endeavours, to a clear evidence of large improvement, manifesting itself in such schollary exercises, as his time and place there required, (in the performance whereof special notice was taken of him, as an acute and eager disputant) until he had taken both degrees, first that of batchelor, and after that of Master of Arts.

But then, being not capable of a fellowship in that college, for that the statutes of the house admitted not above one of the same shire, and of that one for Leicestershire Mr Joseph Hall, before mentioned, being of the same time and standing with him, was already possessed; and having refused a vicarage, endowed with some competent yearly revenue, by that noble knight Sir Edward Hastings, one of his patrons tendered him, not daring yet to adventure on a work of that nature; Mr Laurence Chaderton, then master of the college, and the first from the very foundation of it, bearing a singular affection to Mr Bradshaw, as well for his parts of learning, as for his pious deportment, but being unable, for that cause above mentioned, to bring him in there, cast about with himself how to procure a place, and get some employment for him elsewhere.

Some years before, that right honourable and thrice noble lady Frances Sidney, countess of Sussex, had, by her last will and testament, given order for the erecting and endowing of a college in Cambridge, to be furnished with a certain number of fellows and scholars under one master or head.

The college was now in building, by the provision of the right honourable the earl of Kent, and Sir John Harrington, instructed by her for the performance of that work; and Mr James Montague, son to Sir Edward Montague, then living as fellow-commoner, but student in divinity, among the fellows of Christ's college, was designed for master. With him dealt Mr Chadderton in Mr Bradshaw's behalf, to have him set down for a fellow's place there; which through his mediation was, from those noble trustees, with difficulty obtained. But because some space of time would run out, 'ere the building of the college would be consummated and made fit for receipt; it was thought good, in the interim, to dispose of Mr Bradshaw Bradſhaw for ſome employment elſewhere, until he might be ſettled there. It fell out (God ſo diſpoſing it) that Sir Thomas Leighton governor of Guernſey, wanting one to be employed about the inſtruction and education of his children, and having requeſted that worthy ſervant of Chriſt Mr Cartwright, abiding then at Cornet-caſtle with him, to write unto Mr Chaderton, to furniſh them with one fit for ſuch a charge; this letter of Mr Cartwright's arrived with Mr Chaderton in that juncture of time, wherein he and Mr Montague had this buſineſs in agitation about Mr Bradſhaw: and the matter being by them broken to him, who referred himſelf wholly to what they ſhould advite; it was jointly agreed, that Mr Bradſhaw ſhould be ſent, or lent rather, unto them, to undertake that charge, and continue in the diſcharge of it, until the college building were compleated, wherein upon return thence he was then to reſide.

Thither therefore without delay, being furniſhed with letters of recommendation from thoſe here to them there, he addreſſed himſelf; and, through God's goodneſs, arriving ſafe there, he was with all kind and courteous entertainment by them received. By this occaſion he became throughly known to, and inwardly acquainted with Mr Cartwright, who highly eſteemed of him, and renewed, or purſued rather his acquaintance with him, after both Mr Bradſhaw's and his own return alſo into England, (as may appear by intercourſe of letters yet to be ſeen, written by him to Mr Bradſhaw, while he ſtayed behind him in Guernſey, and from Warwick alſo after his departure from thence) and to his dying day continued expreſſions of entire affection to him, and due reſpect of him, as alſo both before and after his deceaſe, his children, both ſons and daughters, and thoſe that they were matched unto, and his widow alſo, did.

And indeed ſuch was his demeanure, whereſoever he came, that he left behind him a grateful memory of him, in the hearts and minds of all well affected, that had occaſion to take notice of it; not unlike therein to muſk or civet, that leave a ſweet ſcent behind them, even for a long time after they be gone, in the boxes wherein they were formerly kept; the which continued after his departure thence, not among the French miniſters alone in that iſland, but among ſuch alſo of the old garriſon ſoldiers, on whom Mr Cartwright's miniſtry had ſome efficacious and gracious work who; as Sir Peter Oſburn, who, had afterward the goverment of that place, hath been heard to relate, would be oft talking of one Mr Bradſhaw, that had lived ſometime there, and ſpeak with much affection of him.

But for his conſtant carriage during his abode there, his piety, induſtry, integrity, fidelity in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him, and charge committed to him, together with his courſe of life and converſation otherwiſe unreproveable; as alſo the love and affection to him, earneſt deſire, if it might have been, of his continuance with them and loathneſs to leave him, with theſe, who were, after ſometime ſpent among them there, then, to part with him; all theſe things will by no means better appear, then by the letters of Mr Thomas Cartwright, and the relations concerning him therein contained, being written and directed to divers in theſe parts, either near upon, or at Mr Bradſhaw's departure from thence.

Among others, in one to 'Sir Francis Haſtings of September the fifth 1598 wherein he aſſures him of his diligence in following his ſtudies, and of his ſharp and ready capacity, likely through God's bleſſing to bring forth ſuch fruit of learning, as he might have good cauſe to rejoice over any coſt that he had been at with him, or ſhould farther beſtow that way on him; as alſo, of his love to the beſt things, and his converſation in the family without reproach, for ought he could learn, having had an eye conſtantly on him.' In another to Mr Chaderton of December the fifth, (the time, it ſeems of his departure thence) wherein 'he thankfully acknowiegeth the great benefit they had received by Mr Bradſhaw, procured by him to take ſo long and painful a journey to them, and his wiſe and loving care in ſo good proviſion for them; returning thanks alſo to him, from Sir Thomas Leyghton the governor, and his honourable lady for him; and withal requeſting him, that they may once again taſte of his accuſtomed love and care in that kind.'

And in another yet more fully of the ſame date to Mr Montague in theſe words; 'The law commandeth, that of things borrowed great care ſhould be had for the well uſage and due reſtoring of them. Both which we have endeavoured in Mr Bradſhaw: but the full performance muſt reſt rather in yours and his acceptation, than in pay. For as touching the former of them, his deſert of care to profit thoſe committed to his charge, and his behaviour otherwiſe in the houſe, hath been more than every one is able to eſteem, and therefore in all reſpects not ſo fit to reward. For the other, (unleſs unwilling parting with him on all hands be againſt duty) you ſhall (we hope in the Lord) have him duly reſtored; out of all doubt with all thankfulneſs to your worſhip, by whoſe kindneſs, both we have enjoyed him ſome good time, ſince you of right might have taken him away, and he hath received a reply of recompence for that we are not able to make good unto him. And ſo with hearty thanks and commendations from the governor and his honourable lady, and my humble thanks for your love; and this fruit I have received thereof by Mr Bradſhaw, I commend you to the gracious keeping and bleſſing of God in Jeſus Chriſt.' Unto this letter Mr Montague now maſter of the college, upon Mr Bradſhaw's acceſs thither, returneth anſwer, both thanking him, for the remitting of him to them; (ſo that on no ſide thanks for him were wanting, ſo well was he eſteemed of on either part) and withall adverting him of a very great danger, and no leſs deliverance, that near unto his journey's end had befided him.

Whereunto Mr Cartwright in a letter of March 7. the ſame year thus replieth; 'Sir, It cometh from the abundance of your love, to thank me for that which duty itſelf required at my hands towards Mr Bradſhaw, and therefore the thanks are returned unto you, who eſteem ſo highly of duty, as to let it go in the account of a benefit or good turn. My hope is the ſame with yours that the Lord, who by deliverance of him from ſo great a death, bindeth him to a ſtraighter obedience, hath ſet ſuch an impreſſion of it in his mind, as will be inſtead of a watch to waken him every morning to all cheerful ſervice, which his place will require. And indeed the letter he wrote of that matter, carrieth that ſound, and even undertakes ſo much in his behalf.' And in one to Mr Bradſhaw himſelf, after receipt of that from him, touched upon in the cloſe foregoing; 'That the Lord our moſt merciful Father delivered you from ſo great a death, it pledges unto you deliverances hereafter, eſpecially if they be inferior to this. So much the rather, as the ſwimmer ſunk like a piece of lead, and he that could no more ſwim than the iron head of the ſcholars hatchet, was graciouſly born up: and therefore by how much the proverbs is true Potamos out ari plus ten axinen, by ſo much we, have cauſe to praiſe God, that by the angel of the waters ſaved you: and withal you may help to encourage others againſt the exceſſive fear of drowning in paſſing the ſeas: ſeeing it was more ſafe to you to paſs the winter ſeas, even when they rage moſt, than the ſmall brook of Hawſton-mills. I remembred you to Sir Thomas and my lady; who told me, that if any entertainment would have holden you, they would not have ſuffered you to have gone from them; and rejoiced much at your gracious eſcape. Subſcribed, your aſſured loving brother and friend, Thomas Cartwright'

The eſcape in thoſe letters mentioned was this: Mr Bradſhaw being to leave Guernſey, ſhipped himſelf for England. Nor was his paſſage by ſea wholly free from hazard, for with ſo violent a ſtorm were they ſurprized at ſea, that the paſſengers moſt of them expected nothing but wreck, and a gentlewoman among them, with another, whom ſhe much affected attending upon her, did in a cord, by the waſte, faſten themſelves either to other, that they might periſh together, and draw their laſt breath, or breathe it out rather, in the mutual embraces either of other. But that ſtorm being allayed, and the danger of it over, and the ſhip with her paſſengers now arrived in ſafety, Mr Bradſhaw having attained London, did there hire a hackney, ſuch as are commonly uſed on that road, to convey him to Cambridge, there to enter upon the fellow-

ſhip prepared for him, and aſſigned unto him; by help of which beaſt, he got ſo far on his way in ſafety, that he was now within three miles of his journey's end. 'But danger oft lieth in wait for us, where we leaſt of all either expect or ſuſpect it; and then many times overtakes, and ſurprizeth us unawares, when we deem ourſelves wholly paſt danger, and are near approaching our intended much deſired, and now fully expected port, and have always need therefore both of an eye of providence conſtantly on us, and of an hand of protection continually over us.'

For being there to paſs a ſmall brook croſſing the road near to a village called Hawſton, and the water mills ſeated on it, thence Hawſton-mills; he that had eſcaped ſo eminent that apparent danger at ſea, lighten'd on, and fell into that unexpectedly, and proved much more hazardous on land, where no appearance was of ought in that kind: for being unacquainted with the courſe of the ſtream, otherwiſe paſſed ordinarily, and that daily without danger, and having not fetched a compaſs far enough, as he ought to have done, the beaſt that bare him plunged ſuddenly into the mill pond, or pit; and being not able to recover itſelf, therein periſhed, and there left him floating in a ſtrong vertiginous current, unſkilful in ſwimming, (nor had any ſuch ſkill in likelihood been available in ſuch a caſe to have ſaved him) and altogether unable to ſhift for himſelf; where he muſt of neceſſity have gone the ſame way with the beaſt, had not either ſome one occaſionally looking out of the mill, or ſome paſſenger on the way, eſpying one floating in that manner, and at the very pitch of periſhing, called haſtily on the miller, or theſe next at hand to let ſlip down the flood-gates; by means whereof the ſtiff current of the water courſe was ſtayed, and this ſervant of God, though not without much difficulty, reſcued out of the water, and delivered unexpectedly out of that his, in a manner, even deſperate diſtreſs.

And it may indeed juſtly be deemed a wonder of wonders, (in regard whereof that venerable miniſter of Chriſt before mentioned, ſeems to have apprehended the miniſtry of an angel uſed in it) that he was not ſuddenly in an inſtant, either ſwallowed up in that whirling gulf, or hurried away with the violent courſe of the current, and that he ſhould bear up and keep above water, ſo long in a place of that nature for he had been heard to relate, that while he continued thus floating and ſtruggling with that wheeling ſurface, it troubled him not a little, that he could not addreſs himſelf as he deſired to prepare for his departure, though having nothing but death in his eye, while his ear was taken up with the voice of ſome talking in the mill, from whom he ſuppoſed yet ſome help might come, though neither was he able to call unto them, nor they to hear him.

Thus even God's children themſelves find a defect oft in themſelves, that they cannot with ſuch an exact compoſure of ſpirit, in times of diſtreſs addreſs themſelves unto God, until he have pulled away all outward proſperity, as well hopes, as helps from them.' But being by a ſpecial providence of God thus recovered: and as another Moſes drawn out of the water, and brought into the miller's houſe, he was there ſhifted, and put into ſuch dry apparrel, as the miller himſelf uſed to wear; in which garb when ſome of his acquaintance found him, who upon tidings of this occurent, came poſting over to him from Cambridge, they could not forbear ſmiling to ſee him ſitting in that habit, though not a little affected with the caſuality occaſioning it, and no leſs heartily gladened for the gracious iſſue that God hath pleaſed to afford it, and expreſſing much thankfulneſs for his mercy and goodneſs therein manifeſted. The Lord it may ſeem would hereby fit this his ſervant reſerved to other hot and hazardous ſervices, unto a farther and firmer dependance in and under them upon him.

But thus his horſe loſt, (which to the carrier its owner, as by his default miſcarrying, requiring it, was made good) being after his eſcape and recovery ſomewhat revived and refreſhed, and fitted again with a wonted ſuit, he was with ſome of thoſe his acquaintance accompanied to Cambridge, and repaired to the college; where having preſented himſelf to the maſter, he was entertained in the chamber of one of the fellows, that aſſigned him, being not yet fit to receive him, (as indeed they came all to very raw chambers at firſt) and the uſe of that offered him, until his own could be fitted and furniſhed for him: which being his firſt entertainment there, albeit but a ſorry courteſy to ſpeak of, yet did ſo affect him, as upon occaſion, to ſome of his familiar friends he afterward profeſſed, (of ſo ingenuous and grateful a diſpoſition he was, and ſo prone with thankfulneſs to acknowlege, and to ſet an high rate on the leaſt kindneſs ſhewed him, or meaneſt office done for him) that it laid the ground-work, or firſt ſtone thereof at leaſt with him, for ſuch an union of inward and entire affection, and well faſtned knot of unreſerved familiarity and ſtricteſt friendſhip, as did afterward enſue between them two, and ſo continued, not only while they abode in the college together, by a mutual communication of their ſtudies, counſel, courſes, and purpoſes either to other; but even after alſo, when through diſtance of abode they were ſevered the one from the other, by a conſtant courſe of viciſſitudinary writing, therein adviſing either with other, and diſcuſing mutually ſuch queſtions and doubts, wherewith either of them were occaſionally encountred; by means whereof they received much help and light either from other; and albeit in ſome particulars either not ſo clear, or not ſo cleared to their joint apprehenſions, their judgment might, and did ſometime differ, (having on occaſion profeſſed to a friend, deſiring to know their joint judgment in a caſe then queſtioned, and ſeming to marvel that they two ſhould be of divers minds in ought, he made anſwer, 'that it was no wonder at all, it might rather be wondred, conſidering man's condition in intellectuals, ſo impaired and clouded, that any two ſeriouſly ſet upon the ſearch of truth, ſhould not in many particular caſes diſſent; yea that if in every particularity they ſhould wholly concur, it might ſeem to favour rather of a cunningly contrived compact or conſpiracy, than a real and rational conſent)' yet where by force of argument they ſeemed convict, or any miſtake manifeſted, they were ready to yield, and did indeed in not a few things, come home either to other, unto their mutual much advantage; nor did their remaining differences ever produce any breach, or abatement of affection between them, but that the knot once knit, from the firſt to the laſt, continued firm and inviolate, never looſed nor ſlackned, ſo long as God was pleaſed to lengthen out the line of his life.

In the college he ſo demeaned himſelf, that though the fellows were not all of one mind, or one way, and there were among them (as uſually in ſocieties of that nature) men of divers diſpoſitions, and ſub diviſions conſequently of companies, conſiſting of ſuch as more familiarly conſorted, and more inwardly converſed with ſome few, whom, ſelected from the reſt, they moſt affected; yet ſo loving and lowly, yielding to all, and complying with all, was his carriage, that notwithſtanding he were by ſome deemed over ſtrict, and would freely as occaſion was, ſpeak his mind, and deliver his judgment, yet he retained ever the profeſſed, at leaſt, good liking, and external kind uſage from them all: where it will not be amiſs to relate a ſpeech of one of them, (a man by occaſion of ſome diſcontents ſtrongly and ſtrangely poſſeſſed with a ſpirit of jealouſy and ſuſpiciouſneſs of every one, even his inwardeſt and entireſt friends, which in the end proved his overthrow) who having entertained a conceit, that ſomething ſpoken by Mr Bradſhaw in a diſpute ſhould have a glance cloſely at ſomewhat that concerned him, and having diſcovered that his ſuſpicion to a common boſom friend of them both, (by whom alſo upon diſcloſe of that groundleſs conceit, he was evidently convinced of his error therein) he uſed theſe words of him, 'Although I am ſure, he had a gird at me, yet the man is of ſo kind and loving a diſpoſition, that I could not be angry with him, though he had broken my head.' But I cannot let paſs one remarkable inſtance that may evidently manifeſt in him a due temper (which is not over-frequently found) of freedom of ſpirit, and diſcreet demeanure, wiſely mixed, and well conſiſtent the one with the other.

During his abode in Guernſey, a queſtion was on foot, among divines, of ſpecial note, on either ſide yet in debate, concerning the lawfulneſs of ſome pecuniary contracts, wherein Mr Cartwright having by writing declared his mind, in way of anſwer to ſome arguments objected againſt it: Mr Bradſhaw being required by him freely to diſcover his judgment therein, and ſeriouſly to conſider of that his anſwer, albeit of himſelf he would not have adventured to undertake ſuch a taſk; yet being ſo put upon it, he did it freely and largely, with as much ſtrength of wit and argument, (it may not without ground be deemed) as any have done, that have hither to dealt on that ſubject; and yet ſo diſcreetly and reſpectively managing the buſineſs, that though being then of a contrary judgment, he uſed his beſt forces, and ſtrongeſt endeavours to ſhake and ſhatter Mr Cartwright's grounds, yet did it not breed any breach, between them, nor did it (that could be diſcerned) leſſen Mr Cartwright's affection to him, or eſteem of him, which from time to time, as occaſion was, and as in part hath already been ſhewed, he was ever ready to expreſs. Howbeit it muſt withal for a truth be acknowleged, that Mr Bradſhaw, howſoever in the college performing a divinity problem, as they term it, did ſtill ſtiffly maintain that his former tenet; yet upon farther conſideration in his latter days, he is known to have altered his judgment therein.

While he ſtayed in the college, that he might with more freedom employ that talent that the Lord had committed unto him, he entred into the miniſtry; the rather adviſed (as ſome others alſo were) ſo to do, while admiſſion was yet more eaſy, and the way of entrance leſs obſtructed, in regard of ſome things, which out of diverſity of judgment, and tenderneſs of conſcience he ſtuck at; then was by prudent men, obſerving how ſtate buſineſs began to be carried, deemed like to laſt long. And at the motion of one Mr Pigot, a religious gentleman reſiding at Abingtoa about eight miles from Cambridge, he rode weekly over thither, there to preach every Lord's day for ſome good ſpace of time; joining alſo in a weekly lecture, as he had opportunity, with ſome other neighbour miniſters, at a greater town called Baſingborn not far thence diſtant. Afterward he was drawn over to Steeple Morden in the ſame ſhire, by one Mr Martin, an ingenuous gentleman, who enjoying the appropriation, entertained him as a lecturer, in regard of the infirmity of the party that was poſſeſſed of the Vicarage.

But while he was thus taken up with employments abroad, there aroſe a ſtorm againſt him at home, and that upon this occaſion. About that time two Leiceſterſhire miniſters of his acquaintance, Mr Darrel and Mr Moor, being queſtioned about the diſpoſſeſſion of William Somers and Thomas Darling, (beſides ſome others) ſuppoſed to be by evil ſpirits poſſeſſed; the one of them, to wit, Darling ſtood ſtiffly in avowing the truth of the thing and refuſed to acknowlege any deceit or colluſion therein; yea though many ſlights were uſed to enduce him there unto, and the letters forged and tendered to him in Mr Darrel's name, as beginning to grow ſomewhat ſuſpicious of the buſineſs, yet nothing could prevail with him; but the other, to wit, Somers, being in like manner dealt with, and enticed by large promiſes of ſuch proviſion to be made for him, that he ſhould be ſure not to want, nor ſhould need to go down into his country again, was perſuaded to accuſe Mr Darrel to have ſet him on work, and taught him how to act ſundry ſtrange feats and geſtures, whereby he might be deemed to be a demoniak.

Whereupon ſome of the biſhops, London eſpecially, in whoſe houſe the boys had been kept apart, eagerly purſuing the buſineſs, the two miniſters were cited into the high commiſſion court, and there being charged with impoſture, were ſuſpended and impriſoned until further cognizance, and Mr Hafnet (London's chaplain) mean while ſet on work to pen and publiſh a virulent pamphlet againſt Mr Darrel, traducing him therein as a grand impoſture and jugler and the whole action about the poſſeſſion and diſpoſſeſſion of William Somers, as a meer puppet-play. Hence Mr Darrel thus traduced, was enforced to write and publiſh ſomething for the defence of himſelf, and clearing of his guiltineſs herein; and ſo did firſt in a briefer Narrative concerning the manner of their procedings with him, entitled his Trial; and afterward in a larger anſwer to Hafnet, in way of farther apology for himſelf. Of theſe books ſome copies being ſent down to Cambridge, were directed to Mr Bradſhaw, and a parcel of them by him delivered to one Underwood a taylor, who diſperſed of them as well in the college as in the town. Intimation hereof being given to biſhop Bancraft at London, that ſuch books were in divers hands at Cambridge, he writes to the vice chancellor to make diligent enquiry after the diſperſers of them. He lights on Underwood, whom, upon examination, confeſſing that he had received a certain number of them from Mr Bradſhaw, he binds him in a bond to appear upon warning before the High Commiſſion, and chargeth them withal not to give notice of ought to Mr Bradſhaw.

The next morning by ſeven of the clock letters came from the vice chancellor to the maſter of the college, requiring him at eight of the clock to repair unto him, and to bring Mr Bradſhaw with him. About the ſame time that theſe letters came to the maſter, an unknown friend repairing to Mr Bradſhaw's chamber, telleth him, that Underwood was in trouble, and he ſhould do well to look to himſelf. Mr Bradſhaw upon theſe tidings thus brought him, went preſently to Mr Wright the ſenior fellow of the houſe, to aſk advice of him what to do in this caſe: he wiſhed him to withdraw himſelf, and withal, directed him to Granſden, a town about nine miles diſtant from Cambridge, as fit place of retire, where one Mr Caſe, a gentleman well affected, and Mr Wright's brother-in-law, he well knew, would be right willing to receive him. But Mr Bradſhaw reſolved firſt to have an eſſay made by ſome other, whereby it might be diſcovered, what the maſter's mind herein was. Hereupon Mr Ward was ſent for, who being requeſted to break the matter to the maſter, was right willing and ready to undertake that office. The maſter mean while upon receipt of the vice chancellor's letter, had ſent his man preſently to enquire for Mr Bradſhaw at Mr Gataker's chamber, which in his abſence then diſcontinuing, he had the charge of, and kept moſt in, being more convenient than his own; he not finding him there, was returned back juſt as Mr Ward came in to the maſter: who upon his repair to him, having but named Mr Bradſhaw, the maſter, before he could deliver any part of his errand, demandeth of him where Mr Bradſhaw was, and ſaith he muſt ſpeak with him. Mr Ward told him, it was not ſafe for Mr Bradſhaw to come to him, becauſe he was in danger of the vice-chancellor, the maſter replied, that thefore he muſt come; for that he had letters from the vice-chancellor to bring him preſently to him. Which letters while he ſtept into his cloſet to fetch, that he might ſhew them to him, Mr Ward, a faſt and true hearted friend, more careful of Mr Bradſhaw's ſafety, than fearful of the maſter's diſpleaſure, and his own danger, ſtayed not the maſter's return, but ſlipt away with all ſpeed to acquaint Mr Bradſhaw how things ſtood. The maſter at his return miſſing Mr Ward, was exceedingly enraged againſt him, and threatned to puniſh him, by ſeting a deep fine for example upon him. But the hour being now elapſed, which the vice-chancellor had ſet, the maſter wrote back to him, that Mr Bradſhaw could not as yet be found. Mr Bradſhaw hereof advertiſed, albeit that all his friends there, were earneſt with him to withdraw, yet for the preſent refuſed, and requeſted Mr Wright to repair to the maſter, that by him he might underſtand from him, what his reſolute will was, which he purpoſed not to withſtand.

Mr Wright, according to his requeſt, repairing to the maſter, found him in much heat: no nay he would have, but Mr Bradſhaw muſt needs go, it would elſe endanger him, and endanger the college, &c. Mr Bradſhaw informed hereof by Mr Wright, not at all fearing to ſuffer in a good and juſt cauſe, as he deemed it to be, and no whit loath to have any other endamaged, or endangered for him, (notwithſtanding that his friends were all utterly againſt it) without farther diſpute or delay, went preſently to the maſter, and preſented himſelf to him; who entertaining him with hot and high terms, the good man anſwered him in a calm and meek manner, that he had no cauſe to be ſo much offended with him, or ſo incenſed againſt him; he knew not of any ſuch commiſſion that he had, when he ſent at firſt to him; but ſent only to him for counſel in that caſe: deeming it better for him to do by ſome other rather than by himſelf; and being loth to come into trouble in thoſe turbulent times: (for the earl of Eſſex his buſineſs was then on foot) and that ſo ſoon as he underſtood his pleaſure, he readily condeſcended thereunto. The maſter thereupon charged him by the authority of his place, to bring him all Mr Darrel's books, that he had in his hands, and to go preſently with him unto the vice-chancellor; which without farther reply he yielded unto. But while he was gone to fetch the books, the vice chancellor ſent his ſervant to the maſter, deſiring him to come to himſelf; and the maſter, his man to Mr Bradſhaw, charging him to ſtay within until he returned.

At his return Mr Bradſhaw of his own accord repaired to him; who then charged him, at twelve of the clock to repair to his chamber, that he might take his anſwer, and a bond for his forth coming. But Dr Barwell, maſter of Chriſt's college, in the mean ſpace coming to him, (whether about that buſineſs or upon ſome other occaſion is uncertain) by his advice (it ſeems) the maſter altered his mind; and in likelihood the rather, after much mutual conſultation, and better conſideration paſt between them, becauſe both the maſters had themſelves bought of the books: for he ſends for Mr Wright, and now tells him, that it would be the beſt courſe for Mr Bradſhaw to go out of the way: which accordingly he did. The biſhop of London not long after wrote again to the vice chancellor to impriſon Underwood, and to make farther inquiry after Mr Bradſhaw, concerning whom, the maſter being by the vice chancellor demanded; made anſwer, that he was not in the college: whereunto he replied, that it was beſt ſo for him, not willing (as may be deemed) to be uſed as an inſtrument to moleſting him, if it might be avoided. The carriage of this buſineſs, together with the ſeveral overtures and circumſtances of it, is out of a narrative of his own, the more particularly related, to ſhew both the diſcreet and modeſt, and yet ingenuous and courageous diſpoſition of this ſervant of God; and the remarkable paſſages of God's providence in a concurrence of occurents ſo unexpectedly managed, that he ſhould thereby be kept out of the churches of thoſe that were ſo exceedingly thirſty to ſeize on him, and ſo fiercely bent againſt him.

Mr Bradſhaw being informed thereof by ſome friends, and conſidering how the biſhops perſiſted in enquiry after him, conceieved that Cambridge (for the preſent) could be no ſafe or quiet place for him: and having therefore withdrawn himſelf, though retaining his place ſtill there, he ſpent his time, for the ſpace of ſome months, partly with Mr Pigot at Abington, and partly at Morden with Mr Martin; in which places he had formerly exerciſed his miniſtry; and, as occaſion required, ſo ſtill did.

Thus there hovering, in a letter to a ſpecial friend, whoſe good opinion of him he much valued, he thus writes;

'I fear it will be ſomewhat offenſive unto you, and that you will condemn me for being too raſh and indiſcreet in this matter: but I truſt you will conſider that the thing I have done was to pleaſure moſt good and Chriſtian friends; that the cauſe it is the cauſe of God, and the glory of God hath been much encreaſed by it, by reaſon of the truth of God ſhining therein, unto which I could not perform a leſs duty; there being nothing in the books (as I am perſuaded) againſt the ſtate: howſoever, there are many hot words that might have been ſpared, though none that have not been deſerved. I wiſh they had paſt my poor cenſure before the coming forth of them, they ſhould not then have given ſo much advantage to the enemies of the truth. I will (God willing) fly the danger as much as I can, eſpecially in theſe troubleſome and tragical times, which ſeem of purpoſe to be choſen, that they might do the more injury, and the ſpeech may be the leſs.'

And in another to the ſame party, 'My danger for Mr Darrel troubleth me not a whit, I thank God; neither do I repent of any thing that I have therein done, ſo long as you think never the worſe of me, other matters trouble my mind more; yet ſuch is the goodneſs of God, that though they diſtract my mind from other ſtudies, needful for me to wade into; yet, when I come to exerciſe my poor miniſtry, and to ſtudy for my ſermons, my mind is free enough. Thus is the Lord wont, in a more ſpecial manner, to ſupport the ſpirits of his ſervants, for ſuch particular employments as he hath more eſpecially aſſigned them unto.

The matter that more troubled him, was concerning his entrance into any ſettled place for the exerciſe of his miniſtry, which he ſuppoſed would be, and upon ſome trial indeed found, every way ſo obſtructed, that, albeit places of imployment enough were offered, and his imploy-ment in them much deſired, yet he could not conceive how it might be cleared in regard of the tenderneſs of his conſcience, and ſcruple of ſome things that he ſtuck at, which were like to be tendred unto him, and preſſed upon him, before admiſſion thereunto; and that the rather in probality in regard of the prejudice now had of him for the buſineſs concerning thoſe books: for he had been offered the rectory of Abington by Mr Pigot the patron, who would have compounded with the preſent incumbent for the bringing him in: and Mr Wendy likewiſe, a religious gentlemen in thoſe parts, had, together with ſome others, been endeavouring to bring him in at Baſinghorn; but neither of them took effect.

He was invited alſo to Newcaſtle in Staffordſhire, where alſo he repaired, but found not matters to his liking there; and after unto Yarmouth, to be lecturer with them, with aſſurance of a liberal maintainance from them, for they very much affected him. But that their deſign was croſſed by the biſhop of the dioceſe, having a jealous eye as well on them as on him, and being deſirous to prefer and place a chaplain of his own there.

To the college he returned again, after ſome time ſpent abroad, the ſtorm ſeeming now to be overblown, and howſoever there he met with no renewed moleſtation about the fore mentioned buſineſs, yet had he no heart at all there to continue; partly in regard of the departure thence of a ſpecial friend, whom he entirely affected, of whoſe return thither, being now elſewhere ſettled, he was wholly out of hope; and partly becauſe he perceived that the maſter did not then ſo affect him, as formerly he had done.

Amidſt theſe diſtractions, a preacher's place falling vacant at Chatham in Kent, where a great part of the navy-royal, and officers of the ſame attending, did uſually reſide; the buſineſs of ſupplying them with an able and faithful teacher was by general conſent referred to God, Mr Chaderton, being at that time in Kent not far from thence, thither drawn over from Cambridge, about the conſummating of a marriage between that reverend man of Mr Joſias Nichols, who had paſſed many ſharp bickerings and brunts in thoſe times, and the relict of that famous worthy Dr Whitaker deceaſed. He commended Dr Bradſhaw to them, concerning whom, the pionſly affected party, after diligent inquiry, received ſuch ample teſtimony, that (whereas divers others made firſt for the place, and by their labouring with ſome friends had wrought a ſiding among them, to prevent ſuch obſtructions as thence might ariſe) they ſent an expreſs to Cambridge on purpoſe, with inſtructions, in the firſt place to Mr Chaderton, to entreat him that he would not in any wiſe give conſent to have any other deſigned to the place, but him only whom he had already propounded; for that they reſted in his choice, and longed much to ſee and hear him. And in the next place to Mr Bradſhaw, to requeſt him, that he would make no doubt or delay of coming to them; wherein he would not be ſlack, if he knew how earneſtly they longed to ſee and enjoy him: and withal to ſignify to him, what had been delivered to Mr Chaderton from them; that they deſired only the ſincere milk of God's word, and a paſtor bearing a ſincere affection and tender heart to his people: that they had wrought great means to obtain him, that if he refuſed to come to them, he did not know what he did; and if he came, and found them not worthy of him, yet his labours and charge ſhould be fully made good. Thus being importuned, (as by his own letter to a friend of July the eighth, 1601, appeared) though by ſome ſtill preſſed for Abington, with hopes ſuggeſted of clearing the way there for him, he came to London; and after advice had with ſome friends in the city, from thence went down to Chatham.

And though it go for a common by-word, oft verified, that perſonal preſence abateth much of foreign reports; and great expectations preconceived, are wont ſeldom to receive full ſatisfaction. And if it be true that Mr Bradſhaw was not a man of much outſide, nor forward to put out himſelf, of a very baſhful and demiſs, but not fawning deportment; inſomuch that his bodily and perſonal preſence might (as the apoſtle's ſome time) ſeem weak, and not to promiſe much, with ſuch eſpecially as look no further than the face: yet when he came and was heard, and his meek and diſcreet carriage by the generality obſerved, and by the wiser sort well weighed, he was by joint consent agreed upon; and a solemn letter of invitation appointed to be drawn up by Mr John Cook, sometime fellow of Trinity-college, then injoining an office under Sir Faulk Grivel, treasurer to the navy, and afterward secretary of state to king James, subscribed by the officers there belonging to the navy, and the most of any note and repute in the place; intimating their election of him by joint consent to the place, professing a willingness to submit themselves to his ministry, and promising to afford him all due support and assistance in the same.

Upon the receipt hereof he fully now resolved, without farther delay, to entertain the call, and accept of the place; and having signified so much unto them, was very lovingly received by them, and quietly, for some good space of time, (to wit, from July 1601, unto April 1602) laboured in the word and doctrine among them, (together with Mr John Philips, who, enjoying the vicarage, did, as pastor of the place, therein join with him) with good success and much comfort; and to the great contentment and gladsomeness of some people well affected in those parts. Being thus settled there, with good hope of continuance, motion was made to him, by some of his friends there, (supposing that might be some means of further engagement of him for to stay with them, of a match with a widow, and housewifely woman; and one that had lived always in good repute with them; which, not foreseeing in likelihood what would after ensue, he did, not unwillingly, so far hearken unto them, as to entertain some good liking of the woman; howsoever, in regard of the ensuing change of things, the business was no farther proceeded in; but, by mutual agreement between them, laid aside and delayed, until God should see good to make way, by some means, for their more convenient coming together, and comfortable cohabitation of either with other.

For those halcyon seasons lasted not long; the common adversary of God and man, who, out of his inveterate envy and enmity, can in no wise brook the propagation of the gospel, and dilatation of Christ's curtains, began, at first more covertly, and underhand, to contrive some course whereby to cast a rub in his way, and to procure a restraint of his farther proceeding in a course so successful and advantageous for the glory of God, and the good of his people.

For, about the time above mentioned, some neighbour ministers, envying the recourse of people to his teaching, began secretly to plot against him, though they would not be seen in it, by suggesting to the bishop of the diocese, that he was a man not conformed to the rites of the church, nor well affected to the present government. This how far it prevailed with the bishop that then sat there doth not appear; but the business being smelt out, and by some means discovered, to prevent trouble from him, and settle Mr Bradshaw, as they supposed, more surely in the place, it was, by divers of his people and friends there, deemed most expedient, (though therein peradventure much mistaken) to have some means used to obtain a confirmation of him therein from the archbishop of Canterbury, unto whom Rochester was a suffragan; and no man being deemed fitter to deal in this business with the archbishop, than that noble and religious knight Sir Francis Hastings, he was, by a letter from Mr Bradshaw, requested to make some trial of his interest in, and power with archbishop Whitgift, to that purpose, in his behalf. He, upon the receipt of Mr Bradshaw's letter, returned him this most kind, Christian, and affectionate answer:

'My love to yourself you know, and shall ever know it in any thing wherein I can make it known: my duty, your duty, and all our duties to God's church, you know better than myself. And my duty to further a good people to a good minister, a longing people to hear, to a labouring speaking minister to teach them, is a bond of duty that I may never forget, and a work of duty that I must ever be ready to perform. Assure yourself therefore my will shall not be slack; and if my posse can prevail, I shall be glad. I will say no more, but pray to my God to encrease his graces in you, to teach profitably; to increase grace in your people, to hear diligently; and to multiply his graces both in speaker and hearer, that they may speak and hear fruitfully,' &c. Subscribed, 'Your true Christian friend, Francis Hastings.'

Nor was he more ready to promise, than forward to perform; for within three days after, viz. April 25, he wrote to the archbishop this modest, pious, and zealous letter;

'May it please your grace to pardon me, that I do not personally attend you, but presume to write. I make bold to become suitor to your grace, for your favour to a young man, being one that I hold myself interested in, and to whom I owe my best help, to further him to some place of employment and maintainance, which causeth me now become an humble suitor for him to you; not without a special regard to that people, who so Christianly thirst after knowlege and instruction. The man for whom I sue is one Mr Bradshaw a master of arts of Sidney college in Cambridge. The matter I sue for, your grace's favour and allowance that he may preach: the place where his labours are desired is at Chatham.

'And I most humbly beseech your grace, that however you may find or hear, that he is fearful to do some things that may be urged on him; yet seeing he is well qualified with gifts, and of an honest carriage fitting for his calling, let not his fearfulness prejudice him with your lordship, but vouchsafe him liberty to bestow his talent; and I will undertake to your grace for him, that he shall not offer any disturbance to the peace of our church, either in word or action; but shall painfully bestow himself in that place, to preach Christ crucified; and to arm his people with some measure of knowlege, to stand Christianly and courageously for the truth of Christ, and to resist all errors broached against that holy doctrine.

'And the rather I make bold to render this suit to your grace for him, because I find plenty of practising by seminaries and Jesuits, to corrupt and pervert the people's hearts both in knowlege and obedience; and that through penury of preaching in some places it may prove dangerous.

'I never heard the young man preach myself, but I hear his gifts greatly commended; and I know him to be learned and painful also, and careful in that he taketh in hand. And though I know the tenderness of his conscience many ways, yet I dare engage my credit again (as before) to your grace for him, that he shall walk dutifully, wisely, and discreetly, in the whole course of his preaching, without all offer of disturbance to the peace of the church. And so longing to hear that my suit may find its desired success with your grace, I commend my humble duty to you, and commit your grace, and all your godly proceedings, to the protection and direction of the Lord Almighty.'

Subscribed, 'Your Grace's most bounden, and ready to be commanded. Francis Hastings.'

What answer the noble knight had from the archbishop, or what effect this letter had with him, we cannot certainly say; but by what followed it may well be deemed, that of the archbishop it was not very well relished; who in cases of this kind was seldom wont to do ought without the advice of bishop Bancroft, in whose stomach the memory of Mr Darrel's business stuck still, and of Mr Bradshaw's act about his books. For not without some intention in likelihood from above, those Mr Bradshaw's back-friends, who had before dealt in the dark, did shortly after begin to disclose themselves, and to manifest their malice, which had formerly lain hid, as embers raked up in the ashes.

The first of them that openly appeared in the business was one Mr Bearblock, minister at Strowd, a town or village adjoining to Rochester, a man of very mean parts for learning, and of a very scandalous life: but one of those whom the prophet Jeremiah speaketh of, that had a singular faculty of flicking and smoothing his tongue, to sooth men up in their sins. This man (among others) vexed at the concourse of people that repaired, from the places adjacent, to Mr Bradshaw's teaching, (although Mr Bradshaw, desirous to comply so far forth as without offence he might, with him) used to frequent his week-day's lecture, stuck not both in private meetings to rail at Mr Bradshaw for delivering heretical doctrine, and publickly also in a sermon on the Lord's day so to charge him therewith, that the auditory, though he named him not, might well know whom he meant.

Now,

Now, albeit the man himself was of no esteem, and his censure consequently little to be regarded, yet Mr Bradshaw deemed, that a public charge, of that nature, should not be let pass with silence. Howbeit, not willing, nor esteeming it meet to pester the pulpit with apologies, he chose rather to deal with his opponent and traducer by a letter, which it will not be amiss here to insert.

'Mr Bearblock, I was informed, by some of your Christian auditors at Strowd, that, in your forenoon's exercise, you took occasion, in the repetition of your former sermon, to add thereto something, in bitter terms, against some heretical doctrine lately broached in some neighbour church; which divers of your most charitable, and most of your judicious hearers, conceived to be directed against me. At the first, I had no cause easily to entertain the report, because I was no way guilty to myself, so much as of the least shew of any occasion given unto you to break out in that manner against me; and did presume you had better learned the laws of charity, than in such an open manner to traduce a fellow minister of the gospel, before you were better possessed of the cause. Besides, I thought that reproachful reports have been bruited against yourself, should have taught you, if you be innocent, that a minister of the gospel may be much abused and misreported of, both for life and doctrine; and, therefore, that you would not teach, by your own practice, me or any other thus, in open manner, to make the reports of men a sufficient text to preach against your life, as you have made them to preach against my doctrine. But since that time I am given to understand, that you have given it out at one Mr Moreland's table, that I was the man; that you then, before God and his holy angels, endicted and arraigned me, and that of no less a crime than gross heresy; and that some of your congregation were purposed to proceed in law against me for it.

'You know there was a law, (and it were well if it were now in force, to bridle distempered tongues) that if one were accused of a crime, which could not be proved, the accuser should suffer the punishment due to that crime: and then, Mr Bearblock, if heresy deserve a punishment, if you should but accuse me of that, which methinks you have already condemned me of, your back should bear the punishment of two heresies: for,

'1. It is most untrue that I have taught any such doctrine: And secondly, If you could not prove that doctrine, as I know you cannot, this you here so tax to be heresy, your doctrine that calleth it heresy, deserves no less, lege talionis, than heresy, which I speak not so much in regard of your weakness, as in grace, of the strength of the cause; wherein, though with the dim eye of mine own judgment, I could see nothing, yet I have cause to be confident, in regard of their judgment whose shadows it would become you and me to give room unto, yea, and to run away from.

'And I am verily persuaded, that though some of your spirit may be found to judge it an error to hold, That a bare reading minister is not a lawful minister before God; yet that none that deserves the name of a man of judgment, will push with such horns against it as you do, that it is an heresy, and that a gross and abominable one. I would I might be worthy to know, upon your better consideration of the point, whether that heart of your's, that set your tongue on fire against this poor heresy, would serve to set fire to the pretended heretic. But blessed be God, that supreme authority keepeth the fire-brands from the hands of such furies; else there were some cause to fear, lest the saints of God (I give them no other title than your own conscience gives them, nay than your own mouth hath given them) should find your hands as hot as they now feel your tongue; for methinks in your divinity, to make but a question of any thing in religion established by law, is no less than treason and heresy. There must be some mystery in it, that every poor man must not presume to look into; that one that is so full of charity towards adulterers, drunkards, blasphemers, and other sinners that swarm in the church, should be so fiery against these new heretics of your own making. What? Are they of all other past hope of repentance? or, do not the mercies of God, wherewith your mouth is so oft sugared, of all other belong to them? Myself, on the week day, am one of your auditors, and, I hope, none of the worst minded, and then you seem (as oft as ever I heard you) as if your soul did overflow with charity towards us all. You cannot be ignorant of the words that so often were in your lips; That none that hear you but they are God's faithful children; that though they be foul, grievous sinners, yet they are repentant, and God's mercy belongs unto them; that no man is without sin, but the best and holiest are unclean. This hath been your tenor for this half year; the sermon is yet to come, that ever with the least zeal you spake against lewdness of life: and yet now how full of zeal are you against errors in doctrine, of this sort especially? whereas, considering the slanders that run of you, (for I call them so, as I desire, for the gospel's sake, they may prove) you could take no better course, than to be most zealous in doctrine against those sins, that fame hath gone about to brand you withal; and to condemn such with your own mouth to hell, rather than to set open heaven's gates so wide unto them as you use to do; as though yourself were out of hope of heaven, except the lewdest of your congregation go to heaven. I may be bold, being the injured party, and knowing you better than you me, to take this leave to tell you thus much of yourself, who have so freely given leave to yourself to speak to others worse things of me; that if the Lord's judgments should pursue me so fast, that mine inward corruptions should break out into notorious crimes, and yet should dare, for all that, to exercise an holy ministry; that then, of all methods of teaching that ever I heard, I would surely follow your's,

'To keep you from advantage, I acknowlege the doctrine that you have taught in my hearing to be very sound and true: but this is it that I affirm, and you may keep it to yourself if it please you, that in dealing against sin, in all the sermons I have ever heard you, you have said no more in substance, than what you shall have always running in the wickedest mouths; That all men are sinners; that the godliest do fall seven times a day; that men must not despair of God's mercy; that they are sorry for it when they have done; that it is their corruption of nature, &c. which are all very excellent and comfortable doctrine to a broken heart, but very poison to an impenitent: so that if a minister should preach them to the stews, he should have as many applauses and Amens there to them, as any where else. If therefore a foul life be as abominable in the sight of God and man as false doctrine; if this zeal of your's against false doctrine were of God, you would blow as strong a blast against the other as you do against it, and a stronger too; considering, that the other having borrowed the wings of fame, is flying continually in your own face: this, if you could have let me alone, would never have bitten you.

'But to draw to an end, if my bare denial, and the voices of them that with best understanding heard me, and are best able to repeat the heads of that sermon, can persuade you, that there was no such doctrine then delivered; I hope you will satisfy that congregation, whose ears you have abused with that report, and especially the gentleman to whom you related the particulars. If you cannot be moved to this, yet be contented, sith you say the law must proceed upon me, to stay the proceeding of your tongue against me, till you have tried me guilty or not. If you cannot yield to this, but have a purpose to pursue the matter, let religion over-rule you thus far, to deal with me in the points by private writing; but if you have resolved to go on in this indirect course, openly thus to injure me, do it I pray you in your weekly exercise, that I may not trust to the report of others, but may be a witness to myself of mine own abuses, and then I shall know the better how to satisfy you.

'It is the humour of most of your stamp, under pretence of a zeal to her majesty's proceedings in matters of religion, to take your liberty of speech against some, that are persuaded some things might, and should be reformed, if the state had leisure to look into them: and you know it full well, that such as you are shall find ears enough to receive your accusations against such; else, upon equal ground, you would not be so confident, thus hand-over-head, to condemn as good subjects (without any disgrace)

as yourself, of no less than heresy and treason. As for myself, I thank God, I have had that care, both of mine outward conversation and doctrine, that none of any civility, I trust, shall find a face to reproach me for the one, nor any, of any judgment, will accuse me of the other. And as for those reports, that are given out against me, out of your's and others mouths, your shame shall send them home again, and I will wear them about my neck as chains and garlands.

In particular, for yourself, (though I desire the love, acquaintance, and favour of any well gifted minister) it will be no great disgrace to me to sit at home without your countenance, except yourself were in greater countenance with them that truly fear the Lord.

'Thus leaving you at this time to a better spirit than that which set you so greedily on work against me, I commit you to the grace, mercy, and pardon of God; and myself to his wise direction, hereafter to take heed how I give mouths so readily open to reproach to my ministry, any just and direct occasion.

'Chatham, the last of April 1602. Your fellow labourer and minister in the Lord's work, desirous of peace, and, if it were possible, of love also. William Bradshaw.'

This letter, though somewhat large, it seemed not amiss at full to relate; because it representeth to the life, both the character of many such teachers as were forwardest to oppose God's faithful messengers in those times, and the manner of their teachings, which the most of our Antinonian party, that give out themselves as the only gospel preachers, come so near unto now a days, and the most unequal and unchristian courses also that were by such then commonly practised, to work them into disgrace with the people, and to procure trouble to them from the state. But the malice of the man stayed not here, which, of itself, for ought he was able to do, was not much to be regarded; for being nettled by this letter, upon consultation had with some of his accomplices, a knight of note in that country, a man of some parts of learning and wit, but of loose life, utterly averse from, and adverse to the profession and practice of piety, was by them procured to come down from Rochester, where he then was, to Chatham, on a Lord's day, to hear Mr Bradshaw, and that for no other end, but to pick somewhat (if it might be) out of his teaching, for which, upon his information against him, (a practice most unworthy a man of his rank) his mouth might be stopped, or he inhibited at least from farther employment in that place.

And according indeed to their wicked design and ungodly desire the plot proceeded; for, whereas Mr Bradshaw being then entered upon the handling of the story of Christ's temptations, (related by two evangelists, on which his sermons, much desired by many that heard part of them, and though not fully perfected by him, yet by some small supplies being made up, may peradventure hereafter see light) had observed, that this was the main scope of Satan in his first encounter, to bear our Saviour in hand, that howsoever he had been put in some hope by a voice, as from heaven, that he was 'the beloved Son of God; yet God, by his present neglect of him, and leaving him in such difficulties, destitute of all necessaries, did thereby manifest that he did not respect or regard him at all. Hereupon he took occasion to admonish all true Christians, to arm themselves diligently against this temptation, and to strengthen their faith in the assurance of God's favour towards them, care of them, and undoubted truth of his promises made to them; using this as an argument to excite them unto the greater care in this kind; for that (said he) 'If this temptation do once fasten upon us, that we shall come, by Satan's slights, to be persuaded that there is no such matter, that God hath no such respect or regard unto us, it cannot but cool our love unto God.' Which words of his, very wholesome and good, the knight perverting and misreporting, informed, underhand, against him, that he should deliver, 'That a man was not bound to love God unless he were sure that God loved him.' Hereupon Mr Bradshaw was shortly after, by a short note under Dr Buckeridge's hand, bearing date May 26. 1602, and directed unto him at Chatham, made acquainted, that it was the pleasure of his lord's grace of Canterbury, and his lordship of London (the main prosecutor of the business against him), that he should the next day, by nine of the clock, appear personally before them at Shorn, a town situate between Rochester and Gravesend: whither accordingly he repaired; and thereupon appearing, after some questions moved, and answers thereunto returned, the bishop of London began to charge him with teaching of false and ungodly doctrine, such as had been suggested by the knight before mentioned; whereunto when he answered negatively, relating withal truly and sincerely what he had delivered, and offering to produce not a few of good credit who could and would testify what then he taught, that would not be admitted: London affirming, that what had been informed, was averred by such as were able to conceive, being learned, and to understand aright what it was that he delivered, and recieved it not by report from others, but had been ear witnesses of it themselves. However, at last, to strike all dead sure, subscription was tendered to him, whereat they knew he would stick; which because he professed that he could not condescend unto, they inhibited him to preach any more at Chatham; and having bound him to appear when he should be further called upon, for the present so dismissed him.

The next Lord's day was one suborned, in the habit of a traveller, to repair early in the morning to Mr Bradshaw's lodging at Chatham, who asking to speak with him, pretended that he came on purpose out of his way to hear him, and demanded of him whether he preached that day or no? whereunto he answering, that he did not, being by authority inhibited, he made show of such sorrow, as being frustrated of his expectation; but he was descried to be no other than a spy, sent to sound Mr Bradshaw what he intended to do, so greedy were they to have further ensnared him, if by any means they might. The same day Mr Bearblock was observed at Strood, as triumphing after a victory atchieved by some great adversary, to have appointed to be sung before his forenoon sermon the former part of the 27th psalm.

Those of Chatham, much affected with the inhibition of their faithful teacher, and grieved in their souls for the restraint of that precious food which they had formerly received from him, were not backward to use what means they might for the taking off the inhibition and removal of the restraint. To this purpose a supplication was framed in the name of the parishioners of Chatham unto the bishop of Rochester, their immediate diocesan, in these words;

'Right rev. father, and our very good Lord, if we were not by manifold trial, and long experience, assured of the love that you bear, and the care that you have over that flock which the Lord hath committed unto your charge, we could not with so good hope and comfort as now we do, become petitioners unto your Lordship in the behalf of our too much wronged preacher Mr Bradshaw, unto whom, in sincerity of a good conscience, we do voluntarily yield this testimony, that he is a man so far in every respect from desert of those misreports wherewith his causeless adversaries have endeavoured to incense your good lordship against him, as his accusers have been, from the remembrance of that duty which they ought to bear to your lordship, whom they have abused with sinister and unjust informations; his doctrine always holy, wholesome, true, and learned, utterly void of faction and contention; his life so thoroughly garnished with unblemished virtues and graces, as malice itself cannot reprove or suspect him; directing all his labours only to the beating down of sin and wickedness, the comfort of the faithful, and the instruction of the ignorant, without intermeddling at any time with the needless and conceited controversies of this factious age.

'May it therefore please your good lordship, with favour, according to your wonted goodness, so to tender this your little poor flock of Chatham, as to restore unto us our virtuous and faithful teacher, lest otherwise we be as sheep without a shepherd; which being obtained, we, your humble supplicants, will account it so great a blessing of God from the hands of your rev. father hood, as that we shall hold ourselves bound faithfully to pray unto the Almighty for your lordship's endless prosperity.'

This

This their petition, after their own frame conceived, is the rather here inſerted to ſhew their reverend eſtimation of Mr Bradſhaw, and their earneſt deſire to have retained him ſtill with them. But the buſineſs was in higher hands, London was the man that muſt do it, if ought were done, with whom Chaderton (going up to London upon occaſion of ſome college affairs) promiſed to deal in Mr Bradſhaw's behalf; and in likelihood did; but, as appeared, without ſucceſs.

Thus was this bleſſed ſervant of God toſſed to and fro and could not be ſuffered to abide long in a place; though a man of peaceable carriage, a moſt meek and humble ſpirit, and a kind and loving diſpoſition. But God's pious providence over his, and gracious proviſion for them never faileth. He is oft working for them when they leaſt ſee it, and where or whence they leaſt look for it. He was then preparing a retiring and reſting place for him, when he ſeemed to be now utterly out of hope of any. For being now driven from Chatham, he came up to London whence, after ſome ſhort ſtay with a friend, having at preſent no employment, he thought good to look down into Leiceſterſhire, to viſit his friends there; and he intended the journey only as a viſit: howſoever, the Lord, in his ſudden diſpoſal, unknown unto him had a further aim in it than he was then aware of, as by the event appeared which he afterwards took notice of, and did thankfully acknowledge.

For upon his coming down into thoſe parts, by the good hand of God, uſing that his worthy ſervant of bleſſed memory Mr Arthur Hilderſham (as formerly ſometime, ſo now again) as an inſtrument therein, he was brought into ſome notice with, and commended unto one Mr Alexander Redich, a religious gentleman, then reſiding at New-hall, an houſe of note, ſituate near to Burton upon Trent, in the confines of Darbyſhire, Leiceſterſhire, and Staffordſhire. He not only received him into his houſe, but obtained alſo for him, from the then biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, being a moderate man, a licence to preach in any part of his dioceſe: which favour and liberty Mr Bradſhaw, without any interruption, enjoyed in thoſe parts during that biſhop's life; yea, and after too, without any trouble, a light and ſhort ſtorm only excepted, and that ſoon again laid, the year before his deceaſe whereof ſomewhat hereafter, unto the time of his releaſement.

For his entertainment there, though the means allowed him were very ſmall in regard that the gentleman's eſtate was much encumbered, and he, by reaſon thereof diſabled to do what he otherwiſe deſired; the Lady Ferrers, his wife's mother yet ſurviving who had an eſtate for life in that part of the land which was to come to his wife, whereon he then reſided; not in regard of religion (for a ſtrong and zealous papiſt ſhe was) ſo well affected towards them, being forward another way: and ſome other part of it, by concealment of ſome evidences, being wrongfully detained from him, as in proceſs of time, upon diſcovery thereof, did evidently appear: yet the ſmall pittance that was allowed him, together with their kind carriage towards him, and the loving affection to him that he found generally in the family, did give him very good content. For in a letter to an inward friend he profeſſeth, that he found both the gentleman and his wife very tender hearted, and ſincerely religious, ſo kind unto him as his heart could not deſire more, and that in gifts they were otherwiſe beneficial unto him; and the truth is, (ſaith he, for you have his own words) it is impoſſible to find more love in a place than I do find more and more both of great and ſmall in the houſe; ſo that the Lord, I ſee, hath not clean forſaken me. And in another to the ſame party; Never let your mind be troubled about the ſmallneſs of my maintenance, it is more than he from whom it cometh can well ſpare, yet as much as my labours upon them deſerve; and more than many of my betters have. To add hereunto ſome farther matter of encouragement and contentment, he withal ſignifieth, that the Lord had bleſt him there with a moſt kind neighbour, abiding in a houſe not far from thence with the Lord Paget, a young man of Oxford, and a Londoner by birth, one Mr Haſſal, a man of very rare parts for all kind of learning, of moſt prompt and ready ſpeech, and of a very courteous and affable diſpoſition. With him he entertained familiarly, and maintained a good correſpondence, while they abode ſo near together: for he was not nice to embrace acquaintance with any moderate man, of endowments eſpecially; and very forward to take notice of the good parts of others, and to ſet them out, as occaſion was offered, to the utmoſt; ſo far was he from that malevolent humour ſo rife with too many in thoſe times, of extenuating or blurring the endowments and abilities of others; ſuch eſpecially as do not in every particular conceit, though but groundleſſly oft fancied, comply with themſelves: as alſo, together, with his ingenious compoſure of ſpirit, his pious diſpoſition may herein be obſerved, in taking notice of, and acknowledging a paſſage of divine providence, in every accommodation, that might any way, or in any meaſure, improve the comfort of his preſent condition

But that the great moderation of mind in one of ſuch worth, as was this ſervant of Chriſt, may the better appear, we ſhall compare the means of maintainance afforded him and his employments, whereof he profeſſed before not to deſerve ſo much as ſo ſmall a pittance amounted unto, the one with the other. That the allowance was very ſmall, may very juſtly be deemed. when his friends were ſo much troubled and grieved, to think that one of his endowments ſhould be driven to accept ſo low and ſlender conditions; and the truth is, as by his own relation appears the allowance at firſt agreed upon was but ten pounds by the year, his diet, fire, candle, and all kind of attendance, as himſelf draws it out at length, to make the moſt of it.

That which is here ſpecified not in any wiſe to aſperſe the gentleman, whoſe preſent condition would not then well afford better terms; and yet ſhewed his good will by free addition to what he ſtood engaged for, even in his firſt year of abode with him, and afterward alſo, as charge grew upon Mr Bradſhaw; though means were not much amended with him, yet ſtrained himſelf unto a farther enlargement, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed; but to manifeſt the exceeding and almoſt unparalleled modeſty of the man, eſteeming his labours beneath ſo poor an allowance For his employments that himſelf ſo much undervalued, what were they? Beſides his private exercites, at ſet times, performed in the family, he preached at firſt conſtantly twice every Lord's day, in a chapel, of ſome capacity, belonging to the gentleman's houſe, and ſituate within the park where the houſe ſtood; afterward, when the reſort from other parts, more remote, grew ſo great, that the place could not well contain them. that the more might enjoy the fruit of his miniſtry, and with the more eaſe to them, though the leſs to him and the houſhold, he was eaſily induced (the governors of the family, out of their religious diſpoſition, well approving thereof, and condeſcending thereunto), to beſtow his labours, as he had before done in the chapel, in a more public place, at a pariſh church, where a reading vicar only was, at a village called Stapenhill or Stapenhall, about a mile diſtant from the place of his abode.

And this he did conſtantly for above twelve years at leaſt, at ſuch times as the gentleman abode with his family at Newhall, which was the principal place of his ſettled abode; receiving for ſuch his pains among them no conſideration at all from the people of the place. the moſt of them deeming him more beholden to them. for coming and ſtaying to hear him, than themſelves to him for coming to preach to them; ſave that on the Lord's day, for his better eaſe and refreſhment, between his forenoon and afternoon's employment, he was uſually entertained at the houſe of one Mr Alexander Buckley, who had ſometime belonged, as a bailiff or ſteward, to Mr Redich's family, and whoſe wife, Mrs Ann Buckley, a very ſweet natured, humble, and godly woman, was both a Mary and Martha to him, no leſs diligent to attend his teaching with the one, than ſedulous to make fitting proviſion for him with the other; and that ſome of the better affected ſort among thoſe that heard him would now and then gratify him with ſome kind of country courteſies, when he kept houſe by himſelf him at Chatham, and ſo far forth, as hath been formerly ſhewn, embraced then by him; which in regard alſo of ſome other emergent occaſions had hung hitherto in ſuſpence. This to proceed in and conſummate he much deſired, not ſo much in regard of himſelf, as in regard of the other party, who had been held in expectation thereof ſo long already, and might deem it ſome wrong, if it ſhould be ſtill ſo delayed. But how this might conſiſt with his continuance in Mr Redich's family he was not able well to conceive; and how very loath he was to part with a family, where he had found ſo much love. Howſoever he reſolved to break the matter unto them, before he would proceed any farther therein, that if no fit means of compliance there could be contrived, he might with their good leave look out for ſome other place of employment, and they have ſome convenient ſpace of time for fitting and furniſhing of themſelves with ſome other to ſucceed with them in his room. Upon relation hereof, according to ſuch his reſolution, (having taken a fit time for it) made unto them, informing them truly and freely in all circumſtances, how the caſe ſtood with him, and how he ſtood affected towards them, 'it was ſtrange to ſee (it is in his own words related) how great affection they ſhewed to bear unto him, expreſſed even with tears; that on no condition he muſt depart from them; ſuch courſe ſhould be taken, as that, when he ſhould in that kind change his condition, he might ſtill conveniently and comfortably abide with them.' Whereunto he ſubjoineth: 'And this indeed is the firſt hour of my ſolid comfort, that the Lord hath vouchſafed me a ſtanding place, where I may ſettle myſelf. And indeed God was pleaſed to work ſome particulars ſomewhat ſtrangely and unexpectedly, beyond what he was then able to foreſee or forecaſt, toward the farther accompliſhment of his deſire in this kind; as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed.

Mean while Mr Redich by occaſion of buſineſs drawn up to London, and having taken ſome lodgings for himſelf and his retinue near unto Chriſt-church, with purpoſe to make ſtay ſome good ſpace of time in the city, Mr Bradſhaw abiding there with him, was requeſted to preach ſometime at Chriſt church; which accordingly he did, and that with ſuch approbation and good liking of the well affected in the pariſh, that the afternoon's lecture there becoming vacant, albeit Dr Milward, a man of ſome note in thoſe times, ſtood for it, yet by the greater number of votes, in a veſtry purpoſely for that end aſſembled, Mr Bradſhaw was choſen to be their lecturer; though not having ſought it himſelf, but having been without his privity propounded by ſome ſuch of them as had been much taken with his former ſermons. But the will of God (it ſeems) was, that he ſhould ſtill adhere to that family, which he was fallen into, and where he had found ſo much affection; that which to his dying day alſo he did. For though by ſome of thoſe, who earneſtly deſired him, great means were made to the biſhop, yet would he in no wiſe condeſcend to give way thereunto.

During his ſtay in thoſe parts, looking down to Chatham, he there conſummated that buſineſs, which hitherto had been delayed. And in regard that Mr Redich with his wife and retinue were by reaſon of his urgent affairs in divers kinds likely to continue for a longer ſpace of time in the city than at firſt was expected; Mr Bradſhaw having brought up his wife with him from Chatham, did for a while board her with a ſiſter of hers, before married, and ſeated in the city, and afterward took part of a tenement for himſelf and her, who being a woman that affected employment, for their better ſupport, taught there a few ſcholars. Much about this time, by occaſion of that formal conference acted and tranſacted at Hampton-court, wherein ſome of our chief prelates endeavoured to poſſeſs the king's majeſty with a prejudice againſt thoſe that made ſuit for a reformation of things amiſs in church-affairs (his diſaffection to whom, he had himſelf alſo in ſome writing of his, partly diſcovered already) and to perſuade him, that for eccleſiaſtical affairs all things were ſo well ſettled, that no reformation needed, but ſome ſtrict injunction only of a preciſe conformity unto, and conſtant obſervation of things already eſtabliſhed; which began thereupon in many places with much vigour to be preſſed; it came to paſs that many books came abroad, being privately printed, wherein divers godly miniſters, who were of a contrary judgment, declared their grievances, laid down their exceptions, ſet forth their grounds of diſſent, and returned anſwer to the arguments produced and urged againſt them to induce them to conformity.

For books of this nature, ſearch was made in the city; for one, more eſpecially among the reſt, that had (it ſeems) given our great clergy maſters moſt offence, and Mr Bradſhaw being known to abide then in the city, a man in much ſuſpicion with them, two purſuivants, accompanied with Mr Norton the king's printer, were ſent with commiſſion to ſearch his houſe both for it and him. Whither accordingly repairing, but not finding him at home, they enforced his wife to open his cloſet or ſtudy, the cheſts, trunks, boxes, and preſſes, to make ſearch for ſuch books, but found nothing. For the truth is, (and there was a great providence in it) after that Mr Bradſhaw was that morning gone out, not above half an hour before that this buſineſs fell out, his wife looking into his ſtudy, and ſeeing ſome of thoſe books there, to prevent future danger, (which yet ſhe then little deemed or dreamed to be ſo near at hand as it proved to be afterward) had taken them out from thence, and caſt them into a hole between two chimnies, where being covered over with old beſoms, they remained undiſcovered. But however they could meet with nothing of that which they looked for, yet on his wife they ſeized, who would rather have had him; her they took and led unto Doctors Commons, where having preſented her before Dr Stanhop, Dr White, and a third party, whom ſhe knew not, a number ſufficient to make up a compleat High Commiſſion Court; they examined her, yet without oath; firſt, 'Where her huſband was?' whereunto ſhe anſwered, ſhe knew not; then, 'What means of maintainance ſhe had, and from whom?' To which ſhe made anſwer, that ſhe gat her living by her work, and teaching of a few young children; after that 'What children ſhe had?' ſhe told them, none yet; but one ſhe hoped in her belly, being then great with child; which was her firſt born ſon, now a miniſter of the goſpel, afterwards born in that houſe they then dwelt in, in Threed needle ſtreet, and baptized in the church near thereto adjoining, where the miniſter of the place, ſomewhat thick of hearing, by a miſtake, inſtead of Jonathan, named him John, which name therefore he bare afterward, and doth to this day. But after divers ſuch queſtions to little purpoſe propounded and anſwered, in concluſion they told her, that they knew well enough that the book they then ſearched for, was none of her huſband's making, tho' he might have a hand in venting it; and withal, that if they had been diſpoſed, they could have had him, for all his keeping in a Lancaſhire gentleman's houſe. So they termed Mr Redich, becauſe his own lands of inheritance lay in thoſe parts. Thus having parlied with her, they diſmiſſed her, not ſuffering thoſe greedy harpies the purſuivants, who were eager upon her for their fees, to exact ought from her only binding her at a day's warning to appear again before them.

Thus through God's goodneſs and watchful eye over his ſervant, too regardleſs in ſome ſort of his own ſafety, having eſcaped the ſnare that was ſet for him, he returned after ſome ſpace of time, Mr Redich's main buſineſs being now diſpatched, together with him and his, unto their former place of abode at New Hall, taking his wife and little one together alſo along with him.

Being there arrived, the gentleman both enlarged his maintainance, and aſſigned him and his wife certain chambers in his houſe conveniently furniſhed; as alſo having in the park for a certain number of kine, and of ſwine, and ſome poultry, together with a convenient room for a dairy, wherein ſhe might exerciſe her houſewifery; which ſhe very well could do, and accordingly did.

Now while they thus lived together in Mr Redich's houſe, Mr Bradſhaw went on cheerfully in his wonted courſe, both of private exerciſes for the inſtruction of the family, and of public employment on the Lord's day for the benefit of others alſo abroad. But the old lady Ferrer, Mrs Redich's mother, a woman of a great ſpirit, and a reſolute papiſt, though not an abſolute profeſſed recuſant, could by no means brook Mr Bradſhaw, and the leſs now becauſe married, and for that he had brought his wife alſo to ſee with him in houſe with them: yea ſhe had conceived ſuch an extream hatred againſt him, profeſſing to hate him above any man in the world; that ſhe had made a vow, that ſhe would never ſet her feet in the houſe where he was, and it was therefore feared, not without ſome juſt ground of ſuſpicion, that the family might from her, fare the worſe for him. But the hearts of all men, and women alſo, are in God's hand, and he can wind and turn them which way he will: and when a man's ways do pleaſe the Lord, he can, if he ſee it good, yea, doth oft, when he ſeeth it will be for the good of his, make of his utter foes, his friends. And even ſo fell it out here. For the lady not withſtanding this her extream diſaffection, ſo deeply rooted, and ſo vehemently expreſſed, yet in proceſs of time being enduced by ſome that were in credit and repute with her, to viſit her ſon in law and daughter, and make a ſtay for ſome time (which they much deſired) in houſe with them; and being withal informed and aſſured by them of Mr Bradſhaw's mild and moderate demeanure, and his meek, kind, and lowly carriage, ſhe was over wrought by them, contrary to that her former unnatural and irreligious engagment, to repair thither, and take up her lodging with them: where it pleaſed God, withal not long after her acceſs thither, (being now an eye witneſs herſelf of what ſhe had formerly heard by report of him from others) ſo to alter, that her former diſaffection to Mr Bradſhaw, and to caſt it into a clean contrary mould that all that beheld and obſerved her carriage on all occaſions towards him wondered exceedingly at it, to ſee ſo ſtrange an alteration, and ſuch not unexpected only, but unuſual carriages in her. For, albeit ſhe were otherwiſe a gentlewoman as of very proper and perſonable preſence and in that regard much admired by the Scottiſh queen that ſuffered here, whom ſhe alſo much affected ſo of herſelf no leſs forward to take and keep ſtate; yet ſhe uſed Mr Bradſhaw with very much courteſy and compliment at table drinking to him, and carving for him; reſorting twice a day conſtantly to prayer with him and the family, and ſpeaking reverently of him; yea whereas formerly ſhe could not be induced to hear any of our miniſters preach; howſoever for faſhion ſake, and to eſcape penalty of law ſhe might ſometime repair to hear the Liturgy read; yet was ſhe content to hear Mr Bradſhaw, and commended his ſermons. Which the better to work upon her, he wiſely framed to ſuch ſubjects as he deem'd would beſt ſerve, to take off ſuch falſe imputations, as are wont by the adverſe party to be caſt upon our profeſſion and preaching as if we were utter enemies to mortification and good works. For firſt out of Matth v. 16. he took occaſion to ſpeak of the neceſſity and nature of good works; the ground from whence they ſpring, and the end that muſt be aimed at in them; and after that out of Pſal. 51. of repentance and mortification, with both which diſcourſes ſhe ſeemed to be very much affected. What farther work theſe things had upon her after her departure thence, we are not able to ſay; but certain it is, that while ſhe abode there ſhe ſeemed to be much better diſpoſed not towards Mr Bradſhaw only; but (contrary to what was formerly feared, and ſtrongly ſuſpected) toward her ſon in law and daughter alſo For before ſhe went thence, ſhe ſealed them a leaſe for three years, of the land they held from her, with abatement of an hundred pounds by the year of the rent formerly paid, and a remiſſion of thirty pounds a year beſides, otherwiſe accruing to her, (God might bleſs the houſe, for his Joſeph's ſake) and her continued good opinion of and affection to Mr Bradſhaw ſhe farther manifeſted, by her free conſent, to have an houſe built for him and his wife to live in, on a parcel of land that ſhe had intereſt in; which was accordingly with as much ſpeed as might be not long after effected. Than which (ſaith he, ſo modeſt and moderate were his affections for the things of this life) I deſire no more worldly things, than that I may be ſettled in that little houſe, and reſt there in quiet, which theſe times give ſmall hope of.

This he conceived the leſs hope of, becauſe the biſhop under whom he had hitherto lived quietly, about this time, was deemed not like long to continue, and indeed ſhortly after deceaſing, it was given out that biſhop Neal, tranſlated from Rocheſter, was to ſucceed (that which he much dreading, in divers of his letters had oft ſaid, Lord keep us from Rocheſter) and ſo he did indeed, though not immediately; yet not long after. For Dr Abbots Dean of Wincheſter, who came in between them, ſat not long there, but before many months expired ſlept from Litchfield to London. But biſhop Neal was the man, whom all the pious, as well private men as miniſters, in theſe parts miſdoubted would do the moſt miſchief. And it was reported, that the biſhop was minded to reſide from the ſpace of time at Darkelow, a place not far from Newhall; whoſe neighbourhood was like to prove no more beneficial to Mr Bradſhaw, than the braſs pots company in the fable to the earthen pitcher. But, as dangers oft befal us, where we leaſt miſdoubt or ſuſpect ought much leſs expect any; ſo (the Lord on that wiſe diſpoſing things for the ſafety of his ſervants, and the enuring of them to a conſtant dependence on his providence) it falleth out ſometime on the other ſide, that we prove leaſt aſſailed or annoyed from thence, whence we have been moſt affrighted with the greateſt expectation of much damage, or ſore diſtreſs. So it fell out with Mr Bradſhaw here. For, howſoever in one of his letters he manifeſteth his fears to that purpoſe, that in regard of the conſiderations before mentioned, he much doubted that Zone would be too hot for him, yet in another afterward he ſignifieth that he had not as yet heard ought from him, or of any complaints that had been made to him againſt him. Nor indeed doth it appear that he was at any time after moleſted, or diſturbed in the exerciſe of his miniſtry by either of them, by what means ſoever the Lord was pleaſed to either repreſs or divert, as well the malice of the one, as the might of the other, that neither of them ſhould fall on to any purpoſe upon him, until the year before he died.

About this time Mr Redich beſtowed his eldeſt daughter, Mrs Grace Redich in marriage with Sir Robert Darcie, ſon and heir to Sir Edward Darcie, a Kentiſh knight, a very religious gentleman in great favour and repute with that illuſtrious prince Henry of rare parts, and great hopes, of whom this land was not worthy, and one that highly eſteemed Mr Bradſhaw, as he juſtly deſerved. He, making his abode at New-hall until his father's deceaſe, (where his lady a very gracious gentlewoman according to her name, not inferior to her huſband, either in piety, or in ſincerity of affection to Mr Bradſhaw, was the ſecond time delivered of twins, and became mother of four children, within the compaſs of a year) Mr Bradſhaw by his company there received much comfort and encouragement in the work of his miniſtry, and furtherance alſo in his ſtudies. For Sir Robert being a ſcholar and ſtudious, had a library furniſhed with many of the beſt writers, as well in divinity, as in other kinds of literature, whereof Mr Bradſhaw had the free uſe; and he brought alſo upon his motion, divers others on purpoſe, that might be uſeful for him. And this his affectionate and courteous carriage to Mr Bradſhaw, toward whom he ever demeaned himſelf with much reverence and due reſpect, was continued by him until his diſeaſe, which did not many weeks precede Mr Bradſhaw's.

In the year 1613 it pleaſed God to take from him that worthy gentleman Mr Redich, his patron, who in a very holy and Chriſtian manner at New hall departed this life. His frequent removals from New-hall to Longford another houſe that had befallen him in thoſe parts not long before his deceaſe, was occaſion of much diſtraction to Mr Bradſhaw, now ſettled with his family at Santon Ward near to New-hall, but his deceaſe much more: concerning which he thus writes, among other things in a letter to a friend, Mr Redich's deceaſe hath made an heavy alteration in this family; and for mine own eſtate: Mrs Redich giving over houſe, as ſhe intendeth to do, and to live ſomewhere hereabout, as privately as ſhe may, for the better diſcharging of her huſband's debts, it will be leſs comfortable, and more chargeable to me than it hath been. But I am willing for her good to undergo any thing. Mr Redich on his death-bed was willing to have aſſured me of ſomething during my life. But the force of his diſeaſe did ſo grow upon him that he could do nothing. If God lend Mrs Redich life, till the debts be diſcharged, or a ſure courſe taken for them, I hope ſhe will, if it lye in her power; for ſhe hath promiſed ſo to do; and I aſſure me, ſhe will do her uttermoſt to effect it. But whatſoever fall out, I truſt I ſhall be content, having been hitherto at the Lord's Lord's finding; who hath shewed himself at all times a loving father to me his unworthy child; and our time here, though it be full of wants, is but short.' Thus it pleased the Lord to inure this his servant to a dependance from day to day for provisions upon his providence; and as a grave man of God sometime said, 'Whereas many others have, and eat their bread stale; to receive his bread, and eat it daily new from his hand;' that which he also you see, was very well content to do. Mean while the good gentlewoman's incumbred and unsettled estate she was left in, being to take course for the payment of her husband's debts, and to compound for the wardship of her younger daughter, who was afterward matched to one of the lord chief justice Cook's sons, could not but exceedingly distract Mr Bradshaw, as well as herself; and drew him up to London together with her, oftner than he had any mind of himself, or desire thereunto. But from that family the main means of his maintenance accrued; and to it therefore he constantly addicted himself, as in duty he deemed himself obliged to do.

At Stanton Ward, not far from Newhall, as was before intimated, his family still abode in the little house there built for him: where, while Mrs Redich abode in those parts, or when he had any liberty to get down from these parts, while she was longer than usually detained in or about the city; he went on constantly in his wonted course, teaching freely at Stapenhill every Lord's day, as formerly he had done. Only in the year 1617. coming down from London, (upon what occasion, or through whose instigation, is uncertain) he was welcomed home by the bishop's chancellor, with an inhibition to preach there, till he heard further from him. But by the mediation of a couple of good angels, the one from himself, (so willing and forward was he to redeem his liberty, for the benefit of others, without advantage to himself) and the other from a friend, the chancellor was soon pacified, and the restraint removed; whereby it appeared that the prohibition proceeded principally from his own avarice, rather than from misinformation from any thereabout, or injunction from above.

Amidst this his restless and distracted condition; and constant pursuit of his religious employments, the Lord was preparing a place of settled rest for him, and royal reward in the highest heavens, for his faithful service here upon earth, drawing on apace now to its utmost period. For in the year 1618. being come up from Stanton, to attend Mrs Redich, while he lodged with her at Chelsey, not far from the city, visiting a friend at Rederith whose house he usually frequented when he was in these parts, he complained of some malady that by his present distemper he misdoubted might be grown upon him, and though by his friend he was earnestly urged to take some speedy course, by the physician's advice, for preventing the further growth of it; yet being too regardless of himself, while he neglected so to do, he was suddenly surprized with a violent and (as the physician affirms) malignant fever, which so fiercely set upon him, that in its very first apparent encounter it cast him down upon his couch. And notwithstanding all the means used, that either were desired, or could be procured; no care being omitted, or cost spared, by that worthy gentlewoman, who most tenderly and intirely affected him, for advice of physicians who constantly repaired to him, assistance of apothecary, according to direction with all requisite necessaries supplying him, and diligent attendance, as well of those in the family, as of some others also for that end procured from abroad, without intermission successively about him; even the gentlewoman herself (though advised to forbear, in regard of some malignity deemed to be in the disease) frequently resorting to him, sitting by him, and with her own hands offering, for his better ease, to be helpful unto him, which yet he was very loath to admit; in all which from the first to the last she expressed a very great measure of cordial affection unto him, and no less an earnest desire, both of his present relief, and future recovery also, if God should see it good; yet the time being now come wherein the Lord had determined to put an end to his faithful servant's laborious employments, continued distractions, and restless condition and to translate him hence to a place of endless rest, and peace never to be interrupted again; the force of the disease within the space of a few days fretted asunder those bands that kept soul and body together, and leaving the one behind to be laid up in the bowels of that element whence it had its first original, let the other at full liberty to return unto him, from whom alone it immediately received its existence at first.

During the short time of his sickness, wherein yet, through God's goodness, he continued free from any notable sense of pain, and was accompanied with much freedom of mind and memory, he had his heart and tongue in meditation set wholly upon God, 'acknowleging his special favour and goodness unto him, who had so far forth vouchsafed to cast a gracious eye upon him so vile and loathsome a creature, while he yet continued in his native condition, as to give him an interest by faith in his Christ; yea so far farther to grace so unworthy a wretch, as to call him to be a minister of his word, and publisher of his will, and to make his weak endeavours and worthless labours, at any time in any measure efficacious to any of his people, (as he hoped in some sort with some at last they had been) either for the conversion and bringing of them home unto him, or for the establishing and building of them up in the saving knowlege and belief of his truth, and in the graces and comforts of his Spirit. Withal seriously professing this to be his comfort, the testimony of his conscience in the sight of God bearing witness in his behalf, that in sincerity of heart, though with much weakness and amidst many failings, through the whole course of his ministry, his main end and scope in all his labours and endeavours had been both in public and private, to seek the glory of God, the delivery of his truth, the peace of his church, the spiritual good of his people; in all things to approve himself to him, and continue faithful with him, who hath been pleased to take him into his service; and desiring now nothing more, than that he might be so enabled through the support of his good Spirit, that by his Christian and comfortable carriage under his fatherly hand, in this close of his day's work, he might confirm and seal up to others the truth of those things that he had formerly professed and taught, withal earnestly exhorting all that came about him; to learn now to die before they came to it, to be sure to lay a good foundation in time of life and health, for matter of firm support and sound comfort in time of sickness, and at the hour of death; and to make as much provision and strong preparations against that time as they could, assuring themselves, that they should find all their utmost endeavours and careful addresses to be little enough, when they came once to that work.'

Amidst these and the like religious meditations and pious employments, perceiving his desired end now to approach, and having requested prayer to be conceived in his behalf by a special friend, who had accompanied him most part of his sickness, not long after that office performed by him, he quietly and peaceably resigned his soul into the hands of his blessed Saviour, no less ready (doubtless) to receive it from him, than himself was desirous and forward to recommend it unto him.

His funeral rites were performed at Chelsey, where he drew his last breath; most of the ministers of better note about the city, either constantly residing, or occasionally detained there, besides a very great multitude of private persons well affected, repairing thereunto. Who were all there, after the usual manner in such cases and on such occasions, entertained at the charge and by the bounty of that gentlewoman of singular piety, in whose house he deceased. From which place his corpse being conveyed on the shoulders of six of his reverend brethren of the ministry, who of their own accord offered themselves unto that office, to the place of public assembly, where it was to be interred: Mr Thomas Gattaker his ancient and inward friend, though full of grief for the loss of one, who so entirely affected him, and whom as well for the high esteem he had of him and his worth, as for that entire affection which he constantly bare to him, was most deservedly exceedingly dear to him, and in regard thereof not so fresh fit for performance of that office, yet enforced himself to preach at his funeral, and to give, though very briefly, such testimony of him, as was generally approved of by his reverend brethren there present. And he was indeed a man of eminent parts, for sharpness of wit, clearness of apprehension, apprehenſion, ſoundneſs of judgment, exactneſs of method, and powerfulneſs of delivery, and ſingular dexterity in beating out perplexed and intricate debates, deſcrying and diſcovering where the knots lay, ſtating of controverſies aright, and diſſolving of difficult caſes of conſcience; to which purpoſe not only many even from remote parts reſorted unto him, either of their own accord, or directed and recommended unto him by other his brethren of the miniſtry, as one moſt likely of any to give them ſatisfaction in their doubts; but divers of them alſo, of good note, (as by their letters to him may appear) deemed it no diſparagement to ſeek reſolution from him in queſtions of that nature themſelves. Neither was he one that kept his talent wrapt up in a napkin; though he were cooped up moſtly in an obſcure corner, through the harſh courſes of thoſe, that would not ſuffer his light to ſhine forth in any eminent place; yet was he exceeding laborious in thoſe parts wherein he lived, both in private employments at conſtant ſet times in the family, and in public alſo, where he might be permitted, though without benefit to himſelf: that which may appear by abundance of papers and note-books yet extant, though by many caſualties a multitude of them have miſcarried. Beſides his conſtant courſe of preaching at Stapenhill, for the moſt of his time from his firſt admiſſion into that family, ſave only by interruption, through occaſion of removals, which neither uſually laſted over-long, nor, though it diſtracted him in his ſtudies, did any whit lightly leſſen his labours; he was frequently drawn forth to join with other his reverend brethren in their meetings and exerciſes, at Aſhbie de la Zouch in Leiceſter-ſhire, at Repton in Darby ſhire, and at Burton upon Trent; at ſome of which meetings the manner being, that ſome one of them preached his hour on the ſcripture propounded the meeting before, and the reſt or a certain number of them ſpent afterward, each one in his half hour or thereabout on ſome other portion of ſcripture, one being appointed to moderate, by minding each that ſpake, if occaſion were, of the time, and to cloſe up all with ſome ſuccinct rehearſal of what had been delivered, together with an additament, if it ſeemed good, of ſomewhat of his own. It hath been reported by ſome of thoſe miniſters, who frequented theſe exerciſes, that when they could get this our brother, into that number, or into the chair, which latter he could hardly be drawn into, he was obſerved to have a reach ſtill beyond the reſt; and in regard of his depth of judgment, and dexterity in due ballancing of points controverted, and differences in opinion concerning the ſame, he was commonly ſtiled among them the weighing divine, as hath been atteſted by that worthy ſervant of Chriſt now at reſt with him, Mr Oliver Bowles, from the mouths of ſome of them, who in his hearing related it.

For his ordinary manner of teaching, it was in ſome kind ſomewhat different from the uſual method of moſt teachers in thoſe times. For he ſeldom made any excurſion into the handling of common places, or drew his ſubject matter out at length by any prolixly continued diſcourſe; but the main frame both of his public ſermons and private exerciſes, for the moſt part, if not wholly, conſiſted, after ſome brief and genuine reſolution of the context, and explication of the terms, where need required, of notes and obſervations, with much variety and great dexterity drawn immediately from the text, and naturally, without conſtraint, iſſuing and flowing either from the main body, or from the ſeveral limbs of it, with ſome uſeful application annexed thereunto: which though neither of them long inſiſted upon, yet were wont with great vivacity to be propounded and preſſed by him, as well might, and oft did, pierce deep into the hearts of his hearers, and not only rectify and clear their judgments, but have a powerful work alſo upon their affections. Nor was it his manner to quote many ſcriptures, finding it troubleſome to his memory, and ſuppoſing it would be ſo to his auditors alſo: (that which was the practice and opinion alſo of Dr Chaderton, as they well know, that heard him on Matth. xxi. 13.) beſides deeming it the leſs needful, in regard that his obſervations being grounded immediately on the ſcripture he handled; and by neceſſary conſequence thence deduced, ſeemed to receive proof ſufficient from it. A conſtant form of prayer he uſed, as in the family, ſo in his public miniſtry; only varying or adding upon ſome ſpecial occaſions, as occurrences interveening required; the reaſon he gave thereof, was this, becauſe heſitation, (which he ſaid he was much ſubject unto) was in prayer more offenſive, than in other diſcourſe; unto profane ones eſpecially, whereof in mixt multitudes, and meetings ſome lightly, too many uſually, were; that which he affirmed alſo to have been Mr Cartwright's practice, with whom ſometime he converſed.

In ſuch manner of teaching he went over divers portions of ſcripture: among others, the fifty firſt and the hundred and nineteen Pſalms: the ſtory of Hanna, 1 Sam. i. and of Naaman the Syrian, 2 Kings 5. part of Chriſt's ſermon on the mount, Matth. xiii. and of the rich man and Lazarus, Luke xvi. the relation of Chriſt's temptations, recorded by two of the evangeliſts; the whole hiſtory of Chriſt's apprehenſion. Arraignment and execution; together with Judas his end; the four firſt chapters of the Epiſtle to the Romans, the three laſt chapters of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, beſide many other more particular parcels of ſcripture.

Of this ſort was by himſelf publiſhed in his life-time, a preparation to the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper; at firſt written out at the requeſt of that right religious lady Darcy for her private uſe, and by importunity afterwards, more public for the farther benefit of others. Therewith many have been much taken, (by means whereof it hath oft been reprinted) and among others one Thomas Foſter, a mercer by trade, living at Shefford in Bedfordſhire, a very honeſt, humble-minded, and ſincere hearted Chriſtian, hath been heard to profeſs, that that book, and that part of it more ſpecially wherein are laid down certain marks and ſigns of faith and repentance, was ſo far (as he was able to deem) the only outward inſtrumental means of his converſion, through the gracious co-operation of God's Spirit working powerfully and efficaciouſly upon his heart in the reading thereof. And ſince his death have been publiſhed, a nuptial ſermon, entitled, a marriage feaſt, on John ii. 1.—12. A Meditation of man's mortality, on Pſal. xc. His ſermons on the ſecond Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians. A Treatiſe of Chriſtian Reproof, on Mat. xviii. 15. 17. And another of the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, on Matth. xii. 22.—32. which in his life-time he had been, by that worthy knight Sir Robert Darcy, who died not long before him, much preſſed to publiſh; but could not prevail with him, being very backward in that kind, much undervaluing his own works, and very rarely, if ever, ſatisfying himſelf in ought that he undertook. For the uſe of the family wherein he lived, he drew up a twofold Catechiſm as they term it; the one ſomewhat large, the other more brief, for young beginners extracted out of the former; which latter, to ſave labour of tranſcribing, he permitted to be printed.

What ſpare time he had from his conſtant employments, either private or public, when not taken off by occaſional occurrences, he ſpent moſt of it principally three ways.

Firſt, In labouring to clear ſome points about the doctrine of faith and juſtification; concerning the latter whereof, after many debates (firſt occaſioned by ſome lectures of Dr Grey, ſometime fellow of Trinity college in London) that paſſed to and fro by reciprocal letters between him and a ſpecial friend of his, he began to ſet upon an exact treatiſe of that argument: which being upon the firſt draught of it communicated to that friend of his, upon ſome advertiſements from him, he in divers particulars farther cleared, and being afterwards imparted to divers of prime note in either univerſity, he was by them not much encouraged only, but earneſtly incited to divulge it; that, which though by much difficulty drawn unto, yet at length he did. And howſoever that accurate piece was but courſely entertained by one of his brethren in the miniſtry, then living in the city, traducing it publicly in a lecture at Paul's, quarreling with him who had licenſed it for the preſs, and framing a bitter invective againſt it; which upon peruſal was found ſo virulent, that he could not get it permitted to the preſs; yet was the work ſo well approved by many learned and judicious in both our univerſities, that divers of them have profeſſed to have received more light thence in that point, than they had ever before from the writings of any that had dealt in that argument. Hence it was that having occaſion to be ſometime on the act-day at Oxford, one of those that had seen it, and deeming not undeservedly of the work-man by the work, seeing him pass along in a plain russet cloak, is reported by some that were then in company with him, to have said to them, 'Do you see the man that goeth yonder, in that plain habit, and in that self neglecting garb and posture? He hath more sound learning in his head, than twenty of us have.' And that famous professor Dr Prideaux, after his decease, in some company hearing his son yet surviving then present there named, demanded of him whether that Mr Bradshaw, that wrote the Treatise of Justification were his father? And being informed that he was, he professed himself heartily 'glad to see the son of that man, for the old acquaintance he had, not with his father himself, but that work of his;' For those were the doctor's own words. Hereunto may be added the verdict of the great and grave counsellor of state, so much esteemed for his judgment in law cases, the lord Cook, who visited the gentlewoman (by the marriage of her daughter to his son, now nearly linked to him) at her house where Mr Bradshaw then lay sick, and finding the book lying accidentally in a window, after the perusal of some good part of it, professed, that he had seldom read a thing more pithily and pregnantly written.'

Nor was this work of his in such esteem at home only, but with other learned men abroad. Among whom Mr Lewis Chappel, a man of special note for variety of learning, and professor of divinity at Salmure in France, having received the book sent him from London by Mr Aaron Chappel his kinsman, then minister of the French church there returneth him many thanks for it; requesting him withal, to enquire after the author's place of abode, and convey from him unto him the letter enclosed; in the superscription whereof he stileth him, Doctissimum, ornatissimum clarissimumque virum; and in the superscription, out of respect to him, and estimation, yea admiration of him, in regard of that piece alone, thus writes of himself, Tui non studiosus modo, sed cultor & admirator. In the body of the letter, after signification, how upon some occasion being to part with the book, he had taken pains, before he would let it go out of his hands, to translate it out of English into French, he passeth this censure of it, 'a little book, small for bulk, but for learning, wit, and acuteness a grand one.---To speak ingeniously, I never hitherto read ought in any human writing of doctrinal divinity, that so exceedingly liked me; so learnedly, acutely, soundly, pithily, plainly, and yet with admirable brevity is this argument so fully comprised, and throughly handled therein, I want words wherewith to commend and extol it according to its due desert; I have oft read it over, and yet never have enough of it; but the oftener I return to it, and read it over again, the more eagerly is mine appetite stirred up unto it, so much light and brightness of learning, wit and art shineth forth in it.' And whereas treading then precisely in Piscator's steps, he propounded his doubts withal, concerning some particulars, wherein Mr Bradshaw seemed to swerve from Piscator; Mr Bradshaw to give him farther satisfaction therein, and yet save much writing at large to and fro, reviewed his own work, and endeavoured to clear those things somewhat better; wherein also he was farthered by some exceptions from Mr Wootten imparted unto himself, unto which he had returned an answer; and having turned it so revised into Latin, he sent a copy of it in writing unto Mr Chappel, who upon receipt thereof, wrote back at first briefly, but not long after more fully, in these words; 'Right worthy Sir, I wrote before to you, that I had received your truly golden book, enlarged by you and turned into Latin, and that presently I read it over, but in haste; so eager an aperite had I unto it, by reading the other edition of it in English before. Since that I have read it over again, not once, but often, and taking leisure thereunto. Which the oftener I read it over, the more it pleaseth me, and is approved of by me, so accurately and exactly is it composed by you. I hope this birth and issue of your mind will find approbation with peaceable and moderate dispositions, on whether side soever, albeit you condescend not unto them in all things that they require. You so space in the middle between either opinion, that neither of them ought to be displeased with you, if they truly love peace and concord.''

Thus that learned man word for word translated out of his letters in Latin, which in the same language have been represented also, and published elsewhere. Whereby may appear, what entertainment, approbation, and estimation this Treatise (which yet the author speaks so meanly of himself in private letters to his friends) found with the learned in foreign parts, and he himself also, where otherwise wholly unknown, for it And whosoever shall with a regardful eye read over the generally well approved, and deservedly much esteemed writings of those worthy servants of God, now with the Lord, Mr William Perkins and Mr Samuel Torshel, concerning this subject, collated with this of Mr Bradshaw, which came forth some good space before either of them had writ ought; he shall easily discern, on whose foundation they built, in whose steps they trod, with whose heifer they ploughed, at what torch they lighted their tapers, and from whence they received much of their light in that argument. For it may with good ground of truth be averred, that amids the extream opposition of divines in this point dissenting, this our brother did herein hew out such a middle tract between them, as appears not to have been formerly discovered by any, wherein these two men of special note coming after him for the main matter of their principles, have kept close to his footsteps, in the path by him cut out and cleared to their hands.

Of this letter in Latin, a copy being sent over by him to Dr Ames not long before his decease, was by him not long after it printed. Unto this his purpose was to have added a Treatise of justifying Faith, the proper nature, peculiar act, and office of it in that work, and great pity it was that such an head as this one piece shews him to have had, was not set apart for such like employment. How many points of much difficulty might haply been clear, if one of his parts received encouragement, and means of support, to apply himself and his main studies unto so useful an employment? Surely what he saith of another, might be well said of him, 'That if such as he was, had the handling of controversies, questions would not be so intricate oft as they are; and being aright stated, some that now fight most eagerly one against another, would be found to agree, being brought at length aright to understand each other.'

A second business whereunto he applied himself, about which he took much pains, was in the discussion of the matters then in controversy, for which he so much suffered, about subscription, the ceremonies then pressed, the civil power, and the prelatical, in affairs of that nature. Of this kind, discourses penned by him were underhand printed, and published as they could be secretly got out and dispersed, these following: a protestation of supremacy: the English puritanism: a treatise of true and false worship: twelve arguments against the ceremonies, and conformity thereunto: of the nature of things indifferent. Of which argument also he wrote in Latin answer to Mr Gabriel Powel, which yet was not published. And it is well known to some yet surviving, that the greatest part of that which was done in that grand controversy with Dr Downham concerning episcopacy, for the main matter of it came forth of his forge; (howsoever of his labour and pains therein taken, another bare the name, and received the reward of the work) the tart and bitter language only, wherewith it was rather pickled than seasoned, proceeding from another pen somewhat too much steeped in vinegar and gall, that which he complaineth of as much misliking, in a letter to a friend: for he was a man of a very mild and meek spirit, and of a moderate disposition: and how far forth in his judgment and practice he could have acknowleged, submitted unto, and complied with some kind of superintendency, or episcopacy, as it is commonly stiled, may appear by his demands propounded to Mr Francis Johnson in his answer to his reasons for separation, of which more anon.

Divers other subjects he had set upon, and made entrance into, but afterward laid aside; whether for want of time and opportunity, or for what other cause, uncertain, among others; of the former sort was a refutation in Latin, of Dutch Thomson's Distribe, de amissione & intercissione justificationis et gratie, which upon notice given given him of Dr Abbot's undertaking of that task, he forceased; of this latter sort, in English, An answer to Mr Hooker's ecclesiastical polity, a work so much cried up and admired by the most; and it were greatly to be wished, that he had had life and leisure (had the Lord seen it good) to have gone through with it; but the Lord had otherwise disposed.

In the third and last place, Amidst these his labours about, and suffering for those controverted matters, he bent his forces as much also another way; to wit, against sectaries and separatists. To this purpose he had divers bickerings with them, and with some of the chief leaders among them, both by conferences with them and by writings against them, and the courses taken by them, whereby many were stayed from going those ways, and some also reclaimed and brought back again.

Among others, at the request of a gentleman of Lincoln's Inn, (for the stay of some that were staggering and warping that way, that one Mr Clifton had gone before them, seduced by Mr Smith, sometime fellow of Christ's college, who had thrice been baptized) having imparted to him a relation in writing, of what had past between Smith and Clifton, who by their mutual collation pretended, as upon good and just grounds, being convict in conscience to have past over to him; he wrote a large discourse, wherein he discovered a great deal of weakness, as well in the arguments of the one, as in the answers of the other; thereby making it manifestly to appear, by what slight and ill wrought twine, rather than twist, that might have easily been snapt asunder, Mr Clifton had been drawn away, and induced to leave his former station, and abandon his wonted profession; nor was his labour therein without its desired success with those for whom it was undertaken.

As also thereby he took occasion to write a defence of the baptism of infants, against the same parties; against Mr Francis Johnson's reasons of separation, he wrote a book entitled, The unreasonableness for separation, and that upon this occasion, one that was deemed to be a man of an ingenious disposition, was earnestly solicited, by some with whom he conversed, to withdraw from our congregations; and seeming to be much perplexed with Mr Johnson's arguments, was yet persuaded, by some of his discreet friends, to do nothing inconsiderately, in a business of that concernment and consequence, but to consider seriously first of it, and have conference with some grave and godly ministers, such as he deemed as well judicious as conscientious, whereby it might be descried, whether the grounds that he was in this course intending to go upon, were such as would endure trial or no: this advice of theirs was hearkened unto, and choice made by himself of Mr Bradshaw and another, whom he conceived to be both understanding and moderate men. The place for conference was agreed upon to be in a common friend's house, and the meeting intended to be very private, not above two or three of that party, besides himself, the two ministers, and those of the house; but such of them, whose presence alone he desired, having acquainted divers others of their accomplices therewith, a multitude of them intruded themselves. Now, in regard of such an unexpected company, it was deemed meet to proceed the more warily: and the party in the conference principally concerned, being put to his choice, whether he would argue or answer; was willing rather to argue, and to make use of Mr Johnson's arguments, than to frame others of his own; that which very well pleased those of the separating side, as deeming Mr Johnson's arguments unanswerable. To prevent mis-reports, it was mutually agreed, that two persons, one of either side, should write down each argument, as it was propounded, and each answer as it was returned thereunto; and should read audibly what had passed in the prosecution of any argument at the close of it, before entry upon a new, which was accordingly done; and so many of Mr Johnson's reasons discussed as the straits of time would permit; in pursuit whereof was so evidently shewed how grossly Mr Johnson had abused divers passages of scripture, quoted for proof of those propositions, whereunto he had affixed them, that the whole company of them were exceedingly puzz'ed with it; and some of them, to save their champion's credit, would fain have fastened some fault upon the printers, but could not well find how to do it.

The evening coming on, the debate ceased for that day; and copies on either side taken, being read, collated and interchangeably delivered, the conference was adjourned till afternoon the next day, what time the other arguments were to be scanned. But the party, whom the business concerned, being persuaded by the rest of them, (as it seemed) to desist, did the next morning make known his unwillingness for some pretended causes to go on, and so it brake off. Howbeit Mr Bradshaw having waded so far in examination of Mr Johnson's reasons, was much importuned to proceed on therein, and to go through with the rest, considering how needful a work it was, and how useful it might prove. Which being at length drawn unto, and that the rather because Mr Johnson had fetcht some arguments from grounds laid by him in that treatise against conformity, which it stood Mr Bradshaw upon therefore to consider of, and give satisfaction unto; that which was drawn up by him, after perusal and approbation of some, on whose judgment he much relied, was by their advice sent over to Mr Ames, who with an epistle of his own prefixed, caused it to be printed in those parts, where he then abode. Neither was there any reply ever returned unto it, in defence of Mr Johnson either by himself, while he lived, or by any other in his behalf, so long as Mr Bradshaw survived; only many years after Mr Bradshaw's decease, an attempt was made against it by one Mr Can of Amsterdam, which was not long after returned back upon its author by a friend of the deceased.

And indeed to separation he was ever very averse, and to withdrawing from the public places of assembly, or from any part of God's worship there used. To which purpose shall be related out of his papers in his own words the ensuing passages; delivered by him in a sermon at Longford on Matth. v. 1. 'It is the great mercy of God towards us, that we have no cause to seek the word in deserts and wildernesses, in woods and caves and desolate mountains; but such worthy edifices as these to assemble in, dedicated only to this use. And where God's people have by public authority such places as these appointed and allowed ordinarily to assemble and meet in, we are fully at least to suspect those assemblies, and the worship done therein, which forsake those places, and fly into woods and deserts. It is true, that among the Jews at this time there was the temple, and besides sundry synagogues, answering to these churches of ours; and which is more, the doors of the pulpits were generally open to Christ himself; and yet our Saviour often taught in other places, but this was upon extraordinary occasions, such as seldom or never fall out with us; and so carried by our Saviour, that there was no schism or separation made by him, or any of his special disciples or followers, from the assemblies then established.' And after concerning the places of assembling themselves: 'It is indeed an honour, that those which are in authority and ability, should do to the worship of God, to see that comely and seemly places be dedicated and separated from other common uses thereunto; and it is a disgrace and contempt to God's worship, when men that may remedy it, care not how base and contemptible the place of God's worship is. When men have not that care of the place where the holy assembly of God meets, as they have of their barns and stable.' As also concerning some circumstances of gesture used in them; 'From Christ sitting to teach, we learn, in such external behaviour, to follow our Saviour's example: that is, in matters not doubtful and controversial, at least to conform ourselves to such outward fashions as are generally used in those times, and that church wherein we live. For example in the like case; It is the general custom in our church, that the ministers preach standing in a seat higher than the people, and bare headed; and this gesture is no peculiar gesture, but borrowed from the common practice of orators, and such persons as make speeches in solemn assemblies. It is meet therefore, in such cases, that we should not be singular and odd, but conform to the received fashion of the church. So that if we should sit and preach as Christ did, we should not conform to Christ; because we should cross that which was the ground why Christ sat.' Lastly, concerning repair to all parts of God's service, from these words, words, 'And his disciples came to him,' &c. 'This also is a matter of order, that, as much as may be, divine worship should begin when the congregation is assembled and come together: therefore, the members of an assembly should make more conscience than usually they do, of coming together sooner. I urge this the rather, because it is a general fault in our assemblies, not committed only by them that care not which end of religion goeth forward, but generally of most, that so they come to some part of God's worship, it is well enough; especially if they can come time enough to the beginning of the sermon. Hence many times the minister with the clerk are fain to perform a great part of the worship of God alone, or with one or two at the most; and the rest of the church come dropping in, one after another, at their own leisure; as though the public prayers of the church, and reading the scriptures, were a worship that concerned the minister and clerk only, and not the whole church.'

This is the rather related, and here inserted, because not published, to manifest the moderation of the man, notwithstanding so much harder measures as he sustained from the hands of those, who so grievously abused the power they had in those times.

Thus we have a rude and crude delineation of this blessed and faithful servant of God's course and race, whose life was indeed as a continual peregrination here upon earth; extracted, partly from letters written to him by others, communicated for the better making up of this model, by Mr Samuel Hildersham, pastor of the church at West Felton in Shropshire, son to that famous man of pious memory Mr Arthur Hildersham, and Mr John Bradshaw, at present minister of the word at Echingam in Sussex, son to this worthy champion of Christ Jesus, both genuine heirs of their parents best parts; and partly from relations of his own, and others of good credit, his letters especially to a bosom friend, whom he was wont, from time to time, thereby to acquaint with the most occurrents of note that befel him, or did any way concern him, while they lived at a distance. It might have been more exactly and entirely performed, had not some letters of his been lost, and a bundle of others to him miscarried, torn by rats in his absence from the place where they lay, the loss whereof in a letter he much laments, and wishes that as many of his books, to save them, had undergone the like ill-usage.

His death was much lamented by all that knew his parts, and how useful he might farther have been to God's church, had the Lord been pleased to lengthen out the line of his life; so more especially by the well affected of that family whereunto he had adhered; but in a degree far above the rest by the head thereof, Mrs Katharine Redich, the relict of Mr Alexander Redich, deprived now of a second stay, and principal support, for spiritual helps especially, since her husband's decease; a very tender hearted gentlewoman, much addicted to hospitality, and of very remarkable devotion and piety; reported by those who were inwardly acquainted with her more retired courses, to have been wont constantly to spend privately, twice a day, an hour at least, in meditation and prayer, mixed oft with many tears. She, good soul, was so affected with his departure, and so feelingly apprehensive of her own loss thence ensuing, that albeit she survived him about, if not above twelve years, yet was it observed by those that conversed with her, that to her dying day she could very seldom, with dry eyes, either speak of him, or hear him spoken of by others; which made divers forbear speaking of him, that well might, in her presence, for the renewing of her grief. Nor was her hearty affection to him, and due esteem of him, manifested in such kind of expressions alone, (wherein, even counterfeits, though not so constantly, yet at sometimes exceed) but it was made to appear, in beneficence to her ability, and in careful provision to her power for those he left behind him; for what by her husband was intended, though she met with many obstructions in the pursuit of it, the estate was so entangled, she at length got made good, and settled according to his desire. And for his eldest son, (for he left three, whereof two yet survive, and a daughter), being set apart for a scholar, she maintained him at the grammar school until he was fitted for the university, and at the university in part also, so long as she lived.

With those in general among whom he lived, and that knew him not but at a distance, he left behind him the estimation of one very studious, humble, plain, honest, free, liberal, and compassionate. Very studious they deemed him, because they seldom saw him walking about without a book in his hand; and reading usually, if alone, in it, as he walked, though he walked commonly somewhat fast, being therein farthered through the quickness of his eye, and the steadiness of his hand. And for his humility, it so readily offered itself to the eye in his whole deportment, that they could not but take notice of it, reading it as written in text letters therein, that saw ought at all in him.

A plain man he was, as Jacob, without welt or gard; and a plain dealing man, as Nathaniel, without craft or guile; free from all courtship, either for counterfeit or compliment.

Among the meaner sort he was the more beloved, because, though his means were but mean and scant, yet they perceived him to be of a free and liberal disposition; and were willing therefore to work with him ordinarily before any other, because he used to give them somewhat above their hire or agreement, which few others did. His charitable mind and tender heartedness many ways manifested itself: it hath been known that he hath borrowed money, when he had none about him, or by him, to relieve some that hath been in want, and to have been as careful to repay it, as forward to part with it.

While he was at Chatham, some gallies that had some time been built for service, and lay a long time after them idle, being found unuseful for our seas; yet being then on foot, and some put into them, he walked down one day, with some company, to see the manner of them; which when he had viewed, it seemed to him so direful a sight, to see men, Christian men, put to such kind of servitude, that he could not endure to behold it without tears; and having given them a little money, so left them, returning back in a very sad and pensive mood. Yea, he was one of those whom Solomon speaks of, whose commiseration reacheth even to the very brute beasts, which he could not endure to see unmercifully used; and would often say, he was persuaded that men took too much liberty to themselves in killing and misusing some, even contemptible creatures, without cause. Riding homewards one time with his son behind him, whom he had taken out with him, the ways being bad and deep, and the beast that bare them travelling heavily and wearisomely, he took occasion thereby to enter into a discourse to the lad behind him, what hardship the poor unreasonable creature was put to, to be serviceable to us; what misery such sustained for man's sin: and so affectionately he spake of it, that to his son, whom he spake to, he seemed to weep with it.

He may be thought to have had some presage of his end approaching, before his last access to the city; for it is reported by his son now in the ministry, and treading in his father's steps, that being very earnest in soliciting of him, that he might then go up to London with him, which, since he sucked, it seems he had never seen, he willed him not to be so desirous to see London; for whensoever he saw London, he should see it to his cost. And so his great grief indeed he did, coming up with his mother a heavy widow, not long after his father's departure hence, and funeral rites here performed.

We shall close all with that free and ingenious character which that illustrious late bishop of Norwich, his old, true, and loving friend, (he is pleased so to stile himself in some letters to him) truly giveth of him; 'He was (saith he) of a strong brain, and a free spirit; not suffering himself for small differences of judgment to be alienated from his friends, to whom, notwithstanding his seeming austerity, he was very pleasing in his conversation, being full of witty and harmless urbanity. He was very strong, and eager in arguing; hearty in his friendship, regardless of the world; a despiser of compliment; a lover of reality; full of digested learning and excellent notions; a painful labourer in God's work; and now, no doubt, gloriously rewarded.

The Life of Mr RICHARD ROTHWEL, who died anno Chriſti 1627.

RICHARD ROTHWEL was born in Lancaſhire, at, or near Bolton in the moors, about the year of our Lord 1563. After he took the miniſtry upon him, and God gave him another heart, he diſpoſed his temporal eſtate amongſt his friends, and 'he lived of the goſpel,' 1 Cor. ix. 11. 14.

His education was in the ſchools, and afterward in Cambridge; in the one he attained to an exact knowlege of the tongues, (eſpecially Greek and Hebrew, wherein he was a critic), and in the other of the arts; ſo that he became a skilful linguiſt, ſubtle diſputant, copious orator, and of a deep inſight into any kind of knowlege, human or divine.

In this firſt courſe of his ſtudies appeared preſently to his obſervers, the buds and bloſſoms of that fame which after he attained unto; for he had a prompt wit, a quick apprehenſion, a clear underſtanding, a ſound judgment, a ready ſpeech, and a ſtrong memory. All theſe ſeldom meet in one man but did in him very eminently, and were improved by diligent ſtudy, which (out of a deſire of learning and knowlege) he continued to his laſt without wearineſs.

His conſtitution of body, and moral endowments of mind, were great props and ſupporters to his intellectual habits, Gratior eſt virtus veniens e corpore pulchro. This is not the ordinary lot of ſcholars; he was tall, well ſet, of great ſtrength of body and activity, of a ſtern countenance, of invincible courage, of approved valour, and of a very goodly and majeſtic preſence. Grief, nor any miſery, could never break him, but joy would preſently melt him into tears.

He was of a generous ſpirit and deportment, yet withal very humble and courteous: his language was ſententious and proverbial. I have heard many others ſay, what I muſt needs myſelf, Nunquam illi accedo quin doctior evadam, I never came to him but I went the learneder from him. He had a great dexterity in communicating his mind to another, and ſpeaking to his underſtanding: God gave him a great inlet into the hearts of men.

After many years ſpent in the univerſity, he betook himſelf to the miniſtry, and was ordained preſbyter by Dr Whitgift, then archbiſhop of Canterbury, who forbad him meddling with interpretation of Moſes' types, the book of Canticles, Daniel, and the Revelations; which then he thought himſelf, as the biſhop did, were not ſo uſeful for him to ſtudy as ſome other ſcriptures.

But, alas! all theſe natural diſpoſitions, intellectual habits, perſonal deportments, were but as ſo many weapons in the hands of a madman: judge how able he was by them to reſiſt the truth; for he remained ſome years without any change of heart, or ſenſible work of grace upon his ſoul; but preached learnedly, as they called it, and lived vainly, abhorring debauchery, and debauched companions, through the height of his ſpirit, but gave himſelf to hunting, bowling, and ſhooting, more than became a miniſter of the goſpel; and ſometimes he would ſwear faith and troth, and, in his paſſion, greater blaſphemies.

I have heard him tell that there were two knights in Lancaſhire fallen out, and a great feud betwixt them: That the one had a very good park with ſtore of deer; that the other had excellent good fiſh ponds, and ſtore of fiſh: he robbed the park of the one, and preſented what he got to the other; and the fiſh-ponds of the other, and preſented the fiſh to his adverſary; thus he pleaſed himſelf in the days of his vanity, with ſuch kind of follies. In doing this one night the keeper met with him, his dog having killed a buck; at the fall of the buck, the keeper came in with his faulchion and ſtaff, and met Mr Rothwel, who had a ſtaff alſo: they fell from words to blows; he got the keeper down, bound him by the thumbs, and drew him up to his full height, that he could but touch the ground with his toes, and ſo left him tied to a tree till next morning, where others found him and looſed him. At length 'God pleaſed, who ſeparated him from his mother's womb, as he did Paul, and called him by his grace, to reveal his Son in him.' Which becauſe it was famous, and he himſelf afterwards proved the means of the converſion of ſo many, I ſhall ſet it down, as I remember, I have heard him ſpeak it.

He was playing at bowls amongſt ſome papiſts and vain gentlemen, upon a Saturday, ſomewhere about Rachdale, in Lancaſhire; there comes into the green to him one Mr Midgley, a grave and godly miniſter of Rachdale, whoſe praiſe is great in the goſpel, though far inferior to Mr Rothwel in parts and learning; he took him aſide and fell into a large commendation of him, at length told him what pity it was, that ſuch a man as he ſhould be a companion for papiſts, and that upon a Saturday, when he ſhould be preparing for the Sabbath-day. Mr Rothwel ſlighted his words, and checked him for his meddling.

The good old man left him, went home and prayed privately for him; Mr Rothwel when he was retired from that company, could not reſt. Mr Midgley's words ſtruck ſo deep in his thoughts; the next day he went to Rachdale church to hear Mr Midgley, where it pleaſed God to bleſs that ordinance ſo, Mr Rothwel was by that ſermon brought home to Chriſt. He came after ſermon to Mr Midgley, thanked him for his reproof, and beſought his direction and prayers, for he was in a miſerable condition of nature; and under the ſpirit of bondage he lay for a time, till afterwards, and by Mr Midgley's hands alſo he received the ſpirit of adoption, wherewith he was ſo ſealed, that he never loſt his aſſurance to his dying. Though he was a man ſubject to many temptations, the devil aſſaulting him very much, yet God was mightily with him, that out of his own experience he was able to comfort many.

He eſteemed and counted Mr Midgley ever afterward for his ſpiritual father. This makes me think upon Auguſtine's ſpeech to God, when he came to hear Ambroſe preach; Non ut ad doctorem veni (but upon another account) ad eum per te ducebar neſcius, ut ad te per eum ſciens ducerer. So did the Lord, by Mr Midgley's plain kind of teaching, put forth the evidence of his ſpirit upon this mighty and learned Rabbi.

Whether it was before or after this his converſion that he went a ſoldier, and chaplain to a regiment under the earl of Eſſex, into Ireland, I know not; but there he was, and did very great things. And certainly wiſdom and courage were ſo eminent in him, that there were few of his calling his equals, I think none at all his ſuperiors.

He now becomes another man, forſakes all his wonted courſes and companions, preacheth in another manner than formerly, opens the depths of Satan, and deceitfulneſs of the heart, ſo as he was called the Rough Hewer. He had the power of God that went with his miniſtry, when he preached the law, to make men tremble; yea, ſometimes to cry out in the church: and when he preached the goſpel, he was another Barnabas, and had great ſkill in comforting afflicted conſciences.

He ſtudied now the point of non-conformity, which was as the joints in Ahab's armour, through which the prelates hit, and deprived ſo many godly and able miniſters in thoſe times. In theſe controverſies he was ſo well verſed, that he ſatisfied many, and ſilenced any that diſputed with him. He was ſo fixed in his judgment, that he would never either marry, (expecting daily perſecution; and the word he uſed in all his books, was perſecutio pignus futuræ felicitatis,) nor take any benefice, (though divers great livings were proffered him) becauſe he would ſtill ſay, 'My head is too big to get into a church door.' But he betook himſelf firſt to a chapel in Lancaſhire as a lecturer, and afterward (to decline the ſtorm of the prelates) to be a domeſtic chaplain to the Earl of Devonſhire, and at that time I firſt knew him, and came (I bleſs God) acquainted with him.

There now ran nothing more in his mind but why the biſhop ſhould forbid him preaching upon thoſe ſcriptures before mentioned; and he began to conceive that there was ſure ſomething there, could he find it, which would mightily batter down their hierarchy; he prayed therefore much to God, (wherein he was mighty) and ſtudied them; and God opened thoſe myſterious paſſages of his book to him him more than to other men; that he seldom preached abroad out of any other scriptures; and did write an exact commentary upon Moses' Types, which he unveiled, with very much profit and delight to the reader; but that book is lost, to the great loss of God's church thereby.

Learned and godly Mr Cotton enquired of me, whether that or any thing else might not be found amongst his papers after his death; I told him there was little found but what was in characters. He prayed me to send him what I could gather to Boston, where men were that were expert in characters. I did so, but I believe they could make nothing of them. That, and some other of his learned and judicious labours he hath lent out, I suppose, and I fear they will not be recovered. Learned men, that have seen them, judge them a rare treasure. He had some contests with the prelates, especially with bishop Neal then of Litchfield, afterwards of Durham.

At length he came to spend most part of his time in the bishopric of Durham, by means of an honourable and elect lady, the lady Bowes, afterwards the lady Darcy in the north; of whom it was truly preached at her funeral, (alas! that it was her funeral) 'Whersoever this gospel shall be preached, in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her.' She gave about 1000l. per annum, to maintain preachers where there were none, nor any means for them, and all her preachers were silenced men, by reason of nonconformity; Such as Mr Baynes, Mr Dike, &c. She would lay out all her interest to get them their liberty, and then she would dispose of them where there needed in the north, or in the peak in Darbyshire, or other places, and allow them pensions: O! that God would raise out of this phœnix some more such mothers in Israel. Sir William Bowes, her husband dying, his funerals were kept at Bernard's castle, where he had some honour. Mr Dike (father of the writers of that name) was then her household chaplain, and went into the north to that funeral. At his return he represented the state of the people destitute of a minister to my lady, who would have sent him thither; but he told her he durst not venture on so furly a people, but commended Mr Rothwel to her. She sent to him, then at the earl of Devonshire's house, and proferred him this employment; his answer was, he would go thither, and if the people called him, he would then accept of her motion.

At his first day's labour they all desired him; he returned to the lady, and told her he would go; she replied, though for their sakes she was glad, yet she was afraid to send him; understanding that they were of a fierce disposition, and having never heard the gospel, might deal unkindly with him; he answered, 'Madam, If I thought I should never meet the devil there, I would never come there; and he and I have been at odds in other places, and I hope we shall not agree there.

He desired to have me with him, and with much ado prevailed; and so, I bless God, he not only fitted me for the university, but was a means to bring me to the first saving knowlege of Christ: I remember, and shall do ever, the first sermon and point which God blessed to my soul for that purpose. I was about eight years his bed fellow, and eye witness of the great success he had in his ministry there, and over all the country, where h was worthily called, The apostle of the north. The lady allowed him 40 l. per annum; and such as God wrought upon by his ministry contributed to him, but he would not have a penny from any other.

There was once, in his absence, collected 30 l. by Sir Talbot Bowes, that lived there, from the people; but when he returned, and knew it, he caused it to be restored to the parties that gave it, and told them, he sought them, not theirs.

At his first entrance he had great opposition, and sometimes was way-laid to take away his life; but he overcame all that with his patience and courage, and at length his greatest enemies were afraid of him; and few sermons, but it was believed he gained some souls.

His manner was to spend the forenoon at his studies, and the afternoon in going through his parish, and conferring with his people; in which, as he excelled, so he gained much upon them; and within four years had so many judicious and experimental Christians, that they came from London, York, Richmond, Newcastle, and many other places, to see the order of his congregation. And many lewd gentlemen came oft, ten or twelve miles to hear him, to carp and get somewhat to accuse him; many of which God took hold on, and they returned, some convinced, and some converted.

Not long after (saith mine author) I went to the university, and after eight years continuance there, came over into England upon some opportunities, and stayed about half a year, ere I returned. When I came to Mansfield in Nottinghamshire, I found him there this minister, and sick unto the death; at my coming he revived, and, in the strength of that joy so far recovered, that within a week he went about the town with me to divers places; but relapsed, and engaged me to preach for him once the next Sabbath following, and in the afternoon at Mansfield Wood house, within half a mile of Mansfield.

On Friday we looked for no life from him, he was almost past his understanding; there came a vicar of Mansfield, one Mr Brittaine, to see him, and desired him now, that he was not like to live, to tell him what he thought of the ceremonies; he knew he was learned, and therefore would be glad to be informed by him. Mr Rothwel either understood not, or minded not what he said, but answered sometimes, Yea, sometimes, No, as he apprehended. Mr Brittaine went away, telling him he was satisfied, and reported, that Mr Rothwel recanted his judgment of non-conformity.

The next day [Saturday] he had some lightning, and sat up in his chair, and discoursed freely, cheerfully, and heavenly, all that and the next day: some sent to enquire on the Sabbath how he did, he answered, 'I am well, and shall be well shortly;' and whispering with me, said, 'Do you know my meaning? I shall be with Christ ere long, but do not tell them so.' He caused me to repeat my sermon preached in the forenoon for him, after which, with tears in his eyes, he laid his hands on my head, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and, with a short prayer, blessed me. Then he bad me go to preach at Mansfield Woodhouse, and tarry there all night, (for he had promised it to one Mr Dand there,) but to be sure to come when he sent for me. This he did next morning about six o'clock; when I came I found him in pangs of death, he had not known nor spoken to any for an hour before: the chamber was full, and one was praying for him; after prayer I spake to him, he turned about his head, took me by the hand, and bad me pray, pray: I desired a reverend minister to go to prayer again; Mr Rothwel said, 'Pray you, pray you;' I did so: after that he smiled, 'Now, (says he) I am well: happy is he that hath not bowed his knee to Baal.' He bade us sing Psalm cxx. he sung a while, but in the singing of the psalm he died, in the year 1625, and in the 64th year of his age.

Thus have I given you as true an account as I could of this famous champion of Christ, who, notwithstanding his non-conformity, may be called with Austin, Hæreticorum malleus, The hammer of heretics; and with Ambrose, Orbis terrarum Anglicarum oculus, The eye as bright as any other in the English orb.

Two things, amongst many others, I think worth the inserting into his life, which have been omitted in the foregoing story.

The one is a strange sickness and recovery he had once at Bernard's castle. His sickness was a Vertigo Capitis, he would have forty fits at least in an hour, and every one of them accompanied with mischievous temptations, which, when the fit was over, he dictated, and I writ down: these held him about three weeks, in which time he had the advice of learned physicians from London, York, Newcastle, Durham, and other places; they all jumped in their judgments, imputing it to much study, fasting, and inward trouble of spirit; their prescriptions wrought kindly, but removed not his disease. He desired divers Christians to pray for him on a day prefixed, and promised to join with them as well as he could, with some others that should be with him, assuring them, that he was confident that disease should not be removed but by prayer and fasting.

The

The morning of that day he had a fit continued four hours together upon him; and the devil set upon him all that while with moſt dreadful temptations, telling him he would make him the ſcorn of religion, and every man ſhould reproach it for his ſake, that had before by his means looked towards it: that he ſhould never preach more, but ſhould blaſpheme the name of God he had preached; with many like ſuggeſtions: God gave him courage, comfort, and victory over them all. The devil told him, if he did faſt and pray that day, he would torment and hinder him, &c.

We met at the time appointed, and Mr Rothwel would needs have me to perform the duty, which, through God's goodneſs, I did, and the devil was not permitted to hinder or interrupt him or us; and God heard our prayers, ſo that he had never a fit after that; and the Sabbath ſe'night following he preached; but after many wreſtlings with Satan, who told him he would make him mad, and before all the people in the pulpit, make him a ſcorn if he did adventure to preach; nevertheleſs his faith in Chriſt overcame his fear of Satan, and he preached, with great aſſiſtance and comfort, upon that text, pſal. cxvi. 9. 'I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.' Nevertheleſs, that ſickneſs did ſo weaken his brain that ever after he was inclining to ſome infirmities, which love muſt cover.

The other is a relation which I had from himſelf, and from divers others to whom the ſtory was known, that are yet alive. As well as I can recollect, it is thus;

There was one John Fox living about Nottingham, who had no more learning than enabled him to write and read: This man was poſſeſſed with a devil, who would violently throw him down, and take away the uſe of every member of his body, which was turned as black as pitch in thoſe fits, and then ſpake with an audible voice in him, which ſeemed ſometimes to be heard out of his belly, ſometimes out of his throat, and ſometimes out of his mouth, his lips not moving. He lay thus, if I miſtake not, ſome years. Many prayers were put up to God for him, and great reſort, eſpecially of godly miniſters, to him. Amongſt the reſt, Mr Bernard of Batcomb, then of Worklop, and Mr Langley of Truſwell, betwixt whom and John Fox I have ſeen divers paſſages and writing, he relating by pen his temptations, and they giving anſwers when he was ſtricken dumb.

As Mr Rothwel was riding to ſee him, the devil told all that were in the houſe, 'Yonder comes Rothwel: but I will make a fool of him before he goes' The people looked forth, and ſaw him coming about a quarter of a mile from the houſe. As ſoon as he entered the room the devil ſaid, Now Rothwel is come: and as ſome ſay ſpake thus; 'Rothwel, thou ſayeſt there is no poſſeſſion, what thinkeſt thou now? here is a man opens not his lips, and yet he ſpeaketh!' And after a while he further ſaid;

Devil. Say nothing to me of this man for I tell thee he is damned; and he added thereto many fearful blaſphemies.

Rothwel. Thou art a liar, and the father of lies; nor art thou ſo well acquainted with the mind of God concerning this man, which makes thee thus to torment him; therefore I believe thee not, I believe he ſhall be ſaved by Jeſus Chriſt.

Devil. He is a murderer; and thou knoweſt no murderer muſt come into heaven.

Rothwel. Thou lieſt again, for David murdered, and is in heaven; and the Jews with wicked hands crucified the Lord of glory, yet Chriſt prayed for them, and Peter exhorts them to repentance, that their ſins may be blotted out.

Devil. But this man hath not, cannot, ſhall not repent.

Rothwel. If he had not, thou wouldſt not have told him ſo; but if he have not, I believe God will give him repentance, and thou ſhalt not be able to hinder it.

Devil. Thou art a murderer thyſelf, and yet talkeſt thou thus?

Rothwel. Thou lieſt again. I have fought the Lord's battles againſt his known enemies, the idolatrous and bloody papiſts in Ireland, rebels to the queen my ſovereign, by whoſe authority I bore arms againſt them; otherwiſe I have killed no man.

Devil. (Swore and blaſphemed) Thou didſt murder one this day, as thou cameſt hither; and there is one behind thee will juſtify it.

Rothwel looked over his ſhoulder; and with that the devil ſet up a hideous laughter, that nothing could be heard for a great while, and then ſaid;

Devil. Look you now; did not I tell you I would make Rothwel a fool? and yet it is true, thou didſt murder one this day; for as thou cameſt over the bridge (which he named) there would I have killed thee, and there thy horſe trode upon a fly, and killed it.

Mr Rothwel's horſe you muſt know ſtumbled there; it ſeems the devil had power to cauſe it, but without hurt either to Mr Rothwel or his horſe.

Rothwel. Thou haſt oft beguiled me; I hope God will in time give me wiſdom to diſcern, and power to withſtand all thy deluſions; and he it is that hath delivered me out of thy hands, and will I doubt not alſo deliver this poor man.

The devil blaſphemed fearfully, quoted many ſcriptures out of the Old and New Teſtament, both in Hebrew and in Greek, cavilled and played the critic, and backed his allegations with ſayings out of the fathers and poets in their own language, which he readily quoted; ſo that the company trembled to hear ſuch things from one that underſtood no learning, and that moved neither tongue nor lip.

Mr Rothwel was mightily enabled by God to detect the devil's ſophiſtry.

Devil. What ſtand I talking with thee? all men know that thou art bold Rothwel, and feareſt no body, nor careſt for words, therefore I will talk to thee no more. (That name he carried to his grave; they would ſay, 'That is he the devil called bold Rothwel.'

Rothwel (turning to the people) ſaid, Good people, you ſee the goodneſs of our God, and his great power; though the devil made a fool of me now, through my weakneſs, God hath made the devil dumb now, do you ſee how he lieth? therefore let us go to prayer; that God who hath made him dumb, will (I doubt not) drive him out of this poor man.

The devil raged, blaſphemed, and ſaid, 'And wilt thou go to prayer? If thou do, I will make ſuch a noiſe, that thy prayer ſhall be diſtracted; and thou knoweſt God will not hear a diſtracted prayer: but thou haſt got a device, becauſe thou wilt not be diſtracted with thy eyes in prayer, thou winkeſt, (ſo he always did); but if thou pray I will pull out thy eyes.

Rothwel. I look to find thee as great an enemy in this duty now, as I have done heretofore; but I fear not thy threat, I know thou art limitted: God heareth the prayers of the upright, hath promiſed to give his ſpirit to ſupply infirmities; therefore, in confidence of his promiſe, and powerful aſſiſtance of his Spirit, and in the name and interceſſion of his ſon Jeſus Chriſt, we will go to prayer. They did ſo; Mr Rothwel kneeled by the bed on which the poor man lay, the devil, for a quarter of an hour together, or more, made a horrid noiſe; nevertheleſs Mr Rothwel's voice was louder than the devil's. After a while the devil roared at Mr Rothwel's face; this was the firſt motion of any part of the man's body) Mr Rothwel opened his eyes, met, and brought down the hand, which he held with great eaſe, two men being ſcarce able to hold the other hand; prayer was ſtill continued; at length the devil lay ſilent in the man, and after that departed from him. The man fetched divers deep ſighs, inſomuch as they thought he had been expiring, but his colour returned to him, and the uſe of all his members, ſenſes, and underſtanding; and at the next petition he ſaid, (to the glory of God, and amazement, but comfort of all the company, Amen; and ſo continued to repeat his Amen to every petition. Prayer was now turned into thankſgiving, and ſo concluded.

After prayer John Fox ſaid, 'Good Mr Rothwel leave me not; I ſhall not live long, for the devil tells me he will choak me with the firſt bit of meat that I eat.' Mr Rothwel anſwered, 'Wilt thou believe the devil that ſeeks thy deſtruction, before thou wilt truſt in God through Jeſus Chriſt, that ſeeks thy ſalvation? Hath not God, by his almighty power, diſpoſſeſſed him? had he had his will, will, thou hadſt been in hell before now; but he is a liar, and as he is not able to hinder thy ſoul's life, ſo neither ſhall he be able to deſtroy the life of thy body. Wherefore get me ſomething ready (ſaith he) for him, and I will ſee him eat before I go, and will crave a bleſſing upon it. When it was brought, Eat, ſaith Mr Rothwel, and fear not the devil; ſhewing him that he might do it in faith of that ordinance by which God appoints meat for means to preſerve life, and urged that place of Jairus' daughter reſtored to life; 'he commanded to give her meat,' Luke viii 55. With much ado, and in great trembling, at laſt, he took and eat it 'Look, (ſays Mr Rothwel) you all ſee the devil is a liar; the firſt bit hath not choaked him, nor ſhall the reſt.'

Mr Rothwel left him, after which he was ſtricken dumb for three years together. I had a book written with his own hand, of the temptations the devil haunted him with afterwards, and the anſwers divers godly and reverend miniſters gave to thoſe temptations; but the cavaliers got them, and all my books and writings.

Thus the poor man remained tempted, but no longer poſſeſſed: at length, by prayer alſo, (which was inſtantly put up to God for him, every Sabbath and lecture day, in many places), the Lord opened his mouth, and reſtored his ſpeech to him. One uſing this petition, 'Lord, open thou his mouth, that his lips may ſhew forth thy praiſe;' he anſwered, in the congregation Amen: and ſo continued to ſpeak, and ſpake graciouſly to his dying day.

The Life of Dr JOHN PRESTON, who died Anno Chriſti 1628.

JOHN PRESTON, the ſon of Thomas and Alice Preſton, was born at Heyford in Northamptonſhire, a town divided by a little river into the upper and lower Heyfords, and is in maps oft written in the plural number: it is a rectory, and hath a fair church in the lower Heyfords, but yet ſtands in divers pariſhes.

That farm wherein Mr Thomas Preſton lived is in Bugbrook pariſh, where they buried and baptized, where we find that John, the ſon of Thomas Preſton, was baptized October 27. 1587; but was deſcended from that family of the Preſtons that lived at Preſton in Lancaſhire, from whence his great grandfather removed upon occaſion of a fatal quarrel with one Mr Bradſhaw, a neighbouring gentleman, whom in his own defence he ſlew, and ſatisfied the law, (and was acquitted for it), but not the kindred, who waited an opportunity to be revenged for it, as the manner of thoſe northern counties then was.

It fell out not long after, that Mr Bradſhaw's next brother meets Mr Preſton near to the place where he had ſlain his brother, and told him he ſhould do as much for him, or he would revenge his brother's blood. Mr Preſton told him, he had ſlain his brother againſt his will, and in his own defence; that he bare no evil will unto them: deſired him he would forbear. But when nothing would prevail, they fought, and Bradſhaw fell again.

But Mr Preſton was troubled and grieved at it, for he ſaw a fire was kindled that would not eaſily be quenched, and therefore reſolved that he would leave that fatal and unlucky country, though he was a gentleman of a very fair eſtate: and walking one day penſive in Weſtminſter hall, one Mr Morgan of Heyford, with whom he was acquainted, came unto him, and aſked why he was ſo ſad? to whom, for anſwer, he relates the foregoing ſtory. Mr Morgan knowing him to be a very gallant man, was very ſenſible of his eſtate, and told him if he would go with him to Heyford, he ſhould have a good farm to live in for the preſent, and what accommodation he could afford him. Mr Preſton thanked him, and after ſome conſideration of the matter, reſolved to take his offer; and ſo Mr Preſton of Preſton in Lancaſhire became a kind of farmer in Northamptonſhire, where he afterwards lived and died, and his ſon ſucceeded him; and ſo it came to Thomas Preſton, as we have ſaid.

His mother's name before ſhe married was Marſh, but ſhe had an uncle, by the mother's ſide, whoſe name was Crefwel, a man of means and good eſteem in Northampton where he lived, and where he had been ſeveral times mayor. This uncle being rich, and having no child, was very careful of her, and took this ſon, whilſt he was young, unto himſelf, and ſent him to the free ſchool in Northampton, where he was a ſcholar under the government of Mr Sanderſon, then maſter of the ſchool, and afterwards under Mr Waſtel who ſucceeded him: and when he had been there ſome time, his uncle was perſuaded to remove him into Bedfordſhire, unto one Mr Gueſt, who had ſome time taught a private ſchool in Northampton, and was accounted a better teacher of the Greek tongue; from whence, after he had perfected his ſtudies in the Greek, he was ſent to Cambridge, and admitted of King's college, under the tuition of Mr Buſſe, one of the fellows, in the year 1684. where he did, as young ſcholars uſe to do, that is, applied himſelf to that which was the genius of the college and that was muſic; and finding that the theory was ſhort and ſoon attained, he made account the practice would alſo be ſo; and accordingly adventured on the nobleſt but hardeſt inſtrument, the lute; but here he found that art was long, and was not willing to attend it: he uſed to ſay within himſelf, whilſt he was fingering of his inſtrument, Quantum hoc tempore legi potuit? and whilſt his fingers were thus diſtempered and foundered upon the lute, it fell out that his tutor Mr Buſſe was choſen maſter of the ſchool at Eaton, and ſo removed from the college about two years after he was admitted. Coming not from Eaton's ſchool, but from another, he could not be of the foundation, and was therefore uncapable of thoſe preferments in the college that were of moſt worth, and the ſooner perſuaded alſo for to remove, which he did unto Queen's college, where he was received and admitted under the tuition of Mr Oliver Bowles, one of the fellows of that houſe, a very godly learned man, and a noted and careful tutor, under whoſe government he ſettled to his book, and left his muſic, and by whoſe conduct and directions he grew in knowlege, and was improved unto very thriving undertakings in his ſtudies.

It is not nothing to be well deſcended, Fortes creantur fortibus et bonis; ſheep and neat bred in Lancaſhire, or on the peak hills, and after driven into Northamptonſhire, and planted there, produce a very gallant race. Theſe Preſtons though removed from their native ſoil, and much impaired in their revenue, retained yet the garb and metal of their anceſtors, they carried themſelves and were accounted gentlemen; ſomething there was in this young Preſton's ſpirit that was not vulgar; I have ſeen in a book of his, under his own hand, when he was young, ſuch ſparklings of aſpiring ingenuity, as argued in him ſomething that was not common.

He was as yet but junior Sophiſter, but looked high, and grew acquainted with thoſe that were gentile, and fancied ſtate affairs and courtſhip, that had deſires or diſpoſitions to be ſecretaries or agents in princes courts; thought it below him to be a miniſter, and the ſtudy of divinity, a kind of honeſt ſillineſs, and accordingly got in with a merchant, by whoſe means he did procure that he ſhould live in Paris, and learn the language and garb of France; and another gentleman in recompence, ſhould be received and entertained in London, to learn our garb and language.

Mr Crefwel of Northampton was by this time dead, and had bequeathed certain lands in that town to him after his wife's deceaſe; theſe lands he ſells to put himſelf into a poſture fit for that deſign; but here he now began to find that he had reckoned without his hoſt, and that he ſhould have ſaid, 'if the Lord will I ſhall live and do this or that,' James iv. 15. for the merchant dies before the exchange could be accompliſhed, and ſo theſe blooming hopes, that had thus long held up his imagination, died with the merchant.

He was of an able, firm, well tempered conſtitution, brown, comely viſage, vigorous and vivid eye, but ſomewhat inclining to that kind of melancholly that ariſeth from aduſt and parched choler, which now began a little to be diſcovered in him. For being mated in his firſt deſign, he grew diſcouraged, went not ſo much abroad among the gallants, but ſtruck ſail to fortune and retired; yet his appetite was rather dammed than dried up; for after a very little pauſe and boyling over of his fullenneſs, he begins begins to ſteer again the ſame courſe, although by more certain and domeſtic mediums and if he muſt be ſhut up and confined to the muſes, reſolves to be no ordinary ſervant to them; his genius led him unto natural philoſophy, which by that time was become his proper taſk; which he undertakes, not as boys uſe to do, to ſerve their preſent uſe, but with devotion, reſolves to leave no ſecret unattempted; adoreth Ariſtotle as his Tutelary ſaint, and had a happineſs to enter often where others ſtuck, and what broke others teeth, was nuts to him, no dark untrodden path in all his phyſics or metaphyſics, but he was perfect in it; and ſo drowned and devoted was he, that he ſeldom or never could be ſeen abroad, to the wonder and amazement of his former brave companions, ſo that no time paſſed, ſine linea; not that between the ringing and toling of the bell to meals; and for his ſleep he made it ſhort; and whereas notwithſtanding all endeavours, there was one in the college that would always be up before him, he would let the bed cloths hang down ſo that in the night they might fall off, and ſo the cold awaken him; inſomuch that his tutor was conſtrained to read unto him moderation, and to tell him, as there might be intemperance in meats and drinks, ſo alſo there might be in ſtudies; but the evil of it as yet he felt not, the ſweet and good he did, came off with honour and applauſe in all his acts, and was admired in the regent houſe when he ſat for his degree, both by the poſers and all the maſters that examined him, and from that much obſerved throughout the univerſity.

About this time his tutor (Mr Bowle's,) was called to the rectory of Sutton in Bedfordſhire, and ſo left the college, and another of the fellows, then Mr (afterward) Dr Porter became his tutor, a very learned man and great philoſopher, who never went about for to diſſuade him from his ſtudies, but gave him all aſſiſtance and encouragement. The year following it came unto his tutor to be head lecturer in the college, and Sir Preſton being to probleme in the chappel, made ſuch an accurate and ſtrong poſition, and anſwered ſo underſtandingly, that his tutor borrowed his poſition of him, when he had done, to look on and peruſe; and finding it elaborate, reſolved to make more uſe of it, than ever his pupil did intend.

The maſter of the college at that time was Dr Tyndal, who was alſo dean of Ely and reſided for the moſt part there; thither his tutor goes, and carries his poſition with him, which he ſhewed to the maſter, and acquainted him with what he had obſerved, that he was a youth of parts and worth, and deſerved ſome encouragement; the maſter was an honeſt gallant man and loved a ſcholar, and was glad of any opportunity to ſhew it, and ſo bids his tutor ſend Sir Preſton over unto Ely to him, where he aſſured him, he ſhould not want what was in him to do him good; and bade him hold on, and he would take care for him. and there being an election in the college, ſoon after he was choſen fellow by the unanimous conſent of maſter and fellows, and his tutor, Mr Porter, brought him word of it, as he was at ſtudy, not thinking any thing, and told him that he muſt come down into the chappel preſently to be admitted, and accordingly was admitted fellow of Queen's college in Cambridge anno Dom. 1609. That is, five years after his firſt admiſſion into the univerſity: he was not ſo much moved at it, as young ſtudents uſe to be, becauſe he looked ſtill at higher things, and had not quit in his retired thoughts his firſt deſign of being ſome body at court, to which he thought this honour might be a bar: this courteſy was not compos to him, yet it was not manners to be diſcontented, but attend what ſhould enſue.

He was by this time grown a maſter in philoſophy, had waded far in Ariſtotle, and had met with few that were able to encounter him, and therefore now reſolves to go another while to ſchool to Hippocrates and Galen, and verify what is ſo often ſaid, ubi definit philoſophus, incipit medicus: he had a very penetrating wit, and exact and ſolid judgment, to conjecture at effects in cauſes, and prognoſticate events; and being ſkilful in philoſophy before, ſoon made the theory his own, but becauſe Perfectio ſcientiarum eſt in ſummitate, the life and vigour of a ſcience is in the practice, he reſolves to make enquiry after that. Books make not men practitioners in any art, Nemo ex libris evaſit artifex, he retires unto a friend of his in Kent, who was very famous for his practice, where he earneſtly attended and waited on the trade and way of knowing ſimples, and compounding medicines, wherein he attained to that ſufficiently, that had divinity failed he might have been another butler; yet what he had was not in vain; for when any of his pupils were amiſs, though he ſent them always unto phyſicians, yet himſelf peruſed, and many times corrected their preſcriptions.

It was not eaſy to allay his eager, and unſatisfied appetite and apprehenſion with any one art, Eccl. v. 10. He that loveth ſilver ſhall not be ſatisfied with ſilver. Creſcit amor nummi quantum ipſa pecunia creſcit. The more you put into the ſoul, the wider preſently it reacheth He thought he could not be a good phyſician, that could not read the powers of the herbs and plants in ſtars and planets, and therefore acquaints himſelf with Ptolemy, and other authors in aſtrology, and other curious arts and cacculations, as they are called, Acts xix. 19. that he might be able to ſtudy, not only books, but men, and to read mens fortunes in the heavenly bodies; but he could not, nor did not read his own.

There was a ſoothſayer that told Agathocles he ſhould be ſlain the next month: who aſked, how long he thought he ſhould live after him? He anſwered, many years. He told him he would prove one of the two falſe, and leave the other to the iſſue, and ſo commanded for to hang him preſently. Mr Preſton was very buſy among the houſes of the planets, but ſaw not there his own domeſtic doom, nor what his Maker had determined concerning him; for as he was in theſe coeleſtial contemplations, it fell out, that Mr Cotton, then fellow of Emanuel college, preached in ſaint Mary's, where Mr Preſton hearing him, was ſet about an other exerciſe, conſtrained from his contemplations in aſtrology, to look into himſelf, and conſider what might poſſibly befal him. It was his manner, as it is of other ſtudents, when they come home from ſaint Mary's ſermons, to run unto their ſtudies preſently, or what is worſe; but this young ſtudent was forced to retire and ruminate: this ſermon had bereaved him of two beloved notions, one was his low opinion of the miniſtry and preaching; for he ſaw an over-ruling gravity and majeſty in that ſermon, that he thought had been impoſſible to pulpits. I have heard it often in the college, that he took away ſixteen anſwers in a probleme in the chappel; but here was one he knew not how to take away, Sed hæret lateri lethalis arundo, no cunning in philoſophy, or ſkill in phyſic would ſuffice to heal this wound. Another was his great opinion of, and ambition after ſtate employments; for theſe were higher things that now were offered to him, concernments of eternal influence, which nothing could divert that he had ſtudied hitherto; there have been divers eminent and great phyſicians that began in medling with their own infirmities. Self love rides always on the fore-horſe. His own accounts and aking conſcience, ſet Luther firſt upon the ſtudy of divinity.

Mr Preſton after this affront and baffle in the pulpit, wanted eaſe, and when he could not find it in his other books and ſtudies, begins a little to look into the Bible, and to conſider of the ſtudy of divinity In the proſecution of his ſtudy in philoſophy, he found many of the ſchoolmen quoted, and ſo was willing for to look a little into them, and finding thoſe he light on, pithy and ſententious, went on: it gave him eaſe, that he was now a ſtudent in divinity, and had left Albumaſar and Guido, and ſuch high flown ſpeculations; yet it pleaſed him for to ſee and find his Mr Ariſtotle, ſo often quoted, and in ſuch requeſt among them, and thought it that were to be a preacher, he might adventure well enough upon it, and ſo was drawn on very far in the ſtudy of the ſchool-divines. I have heard him ſay, there was nothing that ever Scotus or Occham wrote, but he has weighed and examined; he delighted much to read them in the firſt and oldeſt editions that could be got. I have ſtill a Scotus in a very old print, and a paper not inferior to parchment, that hath his hand, and notes upon it throughout; yet he continued longer in Aquinas, whoſe ſums he would ſometimes read as the barber cut his hair, and when it fell upon the place he read, he would not lay down his book but blow it off; and in this tune he continued, until a rumour came into the univerſity that the king would ſhortly come to viſit them. King James was happier in his education, than his mother mother would have had him. It pleaſed God to breed a Buchanan on purpoſe; for to guide his younger years, and by that time he was ripe, Scotland was grown acquainted with Geneva and the king no ſtranger unto Calvin's way. The news awakened all the univerſity, and there were few but promiſed to themſelves ſome good from this fair gale, that ſeeing 'Promotion came neither from the eaſt, nor from the weſt, nor from the ſouth,' Pſal. lxxv. 6. it muſt and would come from the north; and the proverb be inverted, and be, Omne bonum ab Aquilone.

Dr Harſnet, maſter of Pembrook hall was then vice-chancellor, a prudent well adviſed governor, who knowing well the critical and able apprehenſion of the king, was very careful and ſollicitous to pitch upon the ableſt in every faculty, for actors in that ſolemn entertainment, and himſelf made choice of Mr Preſton to anſwer the philoſophy act, and ſent unto him to provide himſelf. He was ambitious enough by nature, and had this news come a little ſooner, nothing had been more ſuitable to his deſign an inclination. But now the gentleman was planet-ſtruck, grown dull and phlegmatic; Mr Cotton's ſermon had ſo invaded him, that kings and courts were no ſuch great things with him, eſpecially when he underſtood that another was reſolved on for anſwer.

Dr Wren was then a very pregnant ſcholar in Pembroke hall, and alſo chaplain unto biſhop Andrews and thought fit to be employed in this commencement ſervice, but was not willing to have any other place but anſwerer: the vice-chancellor urged his promiſe and engagement unto Mr Preſton, and his opinion of his great ability, but nothing would ſerve. The vice-chancellor's college, and the biſhop's chaplain muſt have precedency, which he moſt ſeriouſly excuſed to Mr Preſton, and endeavoured to reconcile him to the firſt opponents place, which he declined, as being too obnoxious unto the anſwerer, who is indeed the lord and ruler of the act; but there was no removing now, and ſo he goes about it with much unwillingneſs, being rather driven than drawn unto it.

His great and firſt care was to bring his argument unto a head, without affronts or interruptions from the anſwerer, and ſo made all his major propoſitions plauſible and firm, that his adverſary might neither be willing nor able to enter there, and the minor ſtill was backed by other ſyllogiſms, and ſo the argument went on unto the iſſue: which fell out well for Mr Preſton; for in diſputations of conſequence, the anſwerers are many times ſo fearful of the event, that they ſlur and trouble the opponents all they can, and deny things evident, which had been the caſe in all the former acts; there was wrangling about ſyllogiſms, that ſullied and clouded the debates extremely, and put the king's acumen into ſtraits; but when Mr Preſton ſtill cleared his way, and nothing was denied, but what was ready to be proved, the king was greatly ſatisfied, and gave good heed, which he might well do, becauſe the queſtion was tempered and fitted unto his content; namely, 'Whether dogs could make ſyllogiſmes.'

The opponent urged that they could; an enthimeme (ſaid he) is a lawful and real ſyllogiſme, but dogs can make them; he inſtanced in an hound who had the major propoſition in his mind, namely, 'The hare is gone either this or that way;' ſmells out the minor with his noſe; namely, She is not gone that way, and follows the concluſion, Ergo this way with open mouth. The inſtance ſuited with the auditory, and was applauded, and put the anſwerer to his diſtinctions, that dogs might have ſagacity, but not ſapience, in things eſpecially of prey, and that did concern their belly, might be naſutuli, but not logici; had much in their mouths, little in their minds, unleſs it had relation to their mouths; that their lips were larger than their underſtandings: which the opponent, ſtill endeavouring to wipe off with another ſyllogiſme, and put the dogs upon a freſh ſcent, the moderator (Dr Reade) began to be afraid, and to think how troubleſome a pack of hounds, well followed and applauded, at laſt might prove, and ſo came in into the anſwerer's aid, and told the opponent that his dogs, he did believe, were very weary, and deſired him to take them off, and ſtart ſome other argument; and when the opponent would not yield, but hallooed ſtill and put them on, he interpoſed his authority and ſilenced him. The king in his conceit was all the while upon New-Market heath, and liked the ſport, and therefore ſtands up, and tells the moderator plainly he was not ſatisfied in all that had been anſwered, but did believe an hound had more in him than was imagined. I had myſelf (ſaid he) a dog, that ſtragling far from all his fellows, had light upon a very freſh ſcent, but conſidering he was all alone, and had none to ſecond and aſſiſt him in it, obſerves the place and goes away unto his fellows, and by ſuch yelling arguments as they beſt underſtand, prevailed with a party of them to go along with him, and bringing them unto the place, purſued it unto an open view. Now the king deſired for to know how this could be contrived and carried on without the uſe and exerciſe of underſtanding, or what the moderator could have done in that caſe better, and deſired him that either he would think better of his dogs or not ſo highly of himſelf.

The opponent alſo deſired leave to purſue the king's game, which he had ſtarted, unto an iſſue, but the anſwerer proteſted that his majeſty's dogs were always to be excepted, who hunted not by common law, but by prerogative. And the moderator fearing the king might let looſe another of his hounds, and make more work, applies himſelf with all ſubmiſſe devotion to the king, acknowleged his dogs were able to out do him, beſought his majeſty for to believe they had the better; that he would conſider how his illuſtrious influence had already ripened and concocted, all their arguments and underſtandings; that whereas in the morning the reverend and grave divines could not make ſyllogiſmes, the lawyers could not, nor the phyſicians; now every dog could, eſpecially his majeſty's.

All men acknowleged that it was a good bit to cloſe with. It was grown late, and ſo the congregation was removed unto the regent houſe, and the king went off well pleaſed with the buſineſs. The other acts were eaſily forgotten, but the diſcourſe and logic of the dogs was freſh in mouth and memory, and the philoſophy act applauded univerſally. The king commended all the actors, but above all, the opponent. It was eaſy to diſcern that the king's hound had opened a way for Mr Preſton at the court, if he were willing; yea many of the great ones put him in mind, and promiſed all aſſiſtance and encouragement. Sir Fulk Grevill, afterward lord Brook, was taken greatly with him, and after many demonſtrations of his real love, ſettled at laſt a ſtipend on him of fifty pounds per annum, and was his friend unto his laſt hour; but his ambition after courtſhip was well allayed, ſo as he did not ravenouſly purſue it. But being now reſolved to be a miniſter, fell to the ſtudy of modern writers, eſpecially Mr Calvin, whoſe very ſtile and language much affected him. The courtiers wondered that he did not bite, Prov. xix. 12. 'In the light of the king's countenance is life, and his favour like a cloud of the latter rain.' That a young man ſhould not be ambitious, that a good eye ſhould not ſee; they began to be a little jealous of him.

He was reſerved naturally, and could keep counſel; few knew how Mr Cotton's ſermon had affected and wrought upon him But this not failing when the wind blew, begat ſuſpicion Some judged he was modeſt, and wanted opportunity to bring him on; ſome that he was melancholy, and ſo neglected what was proper for him to intend; ſome buſy and intent upon his pupils, who now began to come from all parts But the politicians aſſured, it was ſome inclination unto puritaniſm, a name now odious at court; for it could not be, (ſaid they) that he ſhould let ſo fair an opportunity miſcarry, if he had not ſomething elſe in view. Kings think themſelves extremely undervalued, if a word be not enough; cardinal Pool being choſen pope, at midnight by the conclave, and ſent unto, to come and be admitted, deſired it might be let alone until the morning, becauſe it was not a work of darkneſs. An honeſt argument, but not Italian enough; Quis niſi mentis inops? And ſo they went back and choſe another. When Balaam came not at the firſt call, ſee how Balak reaſons, Numb. xxii. 37. 'Am I not able to promote thee?' But Mr Preſton had indeed another king in his thoughts, when he had found treaſure in the field, he parts with all for that, Matth. xiii. 44. A purchaſe is not worth the having, that hath not either ſome convenience annexed, or may not ſome way be improved. God was a greater good than man, heaven than earth, a crown of glory than a crown of gold. But this neglect and ſelf-denial was well interpreted by good men, and that opinion of affecting Puritanes, which blaſted him at court, began to blazon him at home, and work a reputation, that to him was more acceptable. Men thought him meet for to be truſted with the care of youth; and many had their eyes upon him, for their ſons or friends. Mr Morgan of Heyfords, had been ſometime dead, and had left his ſon and heir an orphan in truſt with ſome that were his kinſmen, and like to manage his eſtate to moſt advantage. This Mr Morgan's ſon, under whoſe ſhadow theſe Preſtons had for ſometime lived, was by his guardians now commended to his care; not only for that relation he had to Heyford's his native town, and to the family, but alſo that by that means the young gentleman might be preſerved from the influence of his other friends, who were many of them popiſh. King James had been ſo well pleaſed at the commencement held before him lately, that he reſolves upon another viſit. The heads agree to entertain him with a comedy. There was one Boggle's of Clare hall, that had made a jeering comedy againſt the lawyers called Ignoramus. This was reſolved on for to be acted before the king, and great care was taken for to furniſh and accommodate all parts, with actors anſwerable.

Mr Morgan was a comely modeſt gentleman, and it was believed would well become a woman's dreſs, and accordingly his tutor [Mr Preſton ſent to,] that he would give way and all encouragement unto the ſervice. He liked not the motion, could not believe that his friends intended he ſhould be a player, and ſo deſired to be excuſed. But the Guardians were not ſo exact and ſcrupulous, but thought if he played this game well, he might win more than could be hoped for elſewhere; and ſo Mr Morgan was allowed by his Guardians to play his part, and afterward removed unto Oxford, and ſuffered to play what part he would, and ſo relapſed unto popery, which hath proved fatal and infortunate to him and his.

But here was matter for Mr Preſton's back friends, to argue he was not a courtier, that would envy ſo ſmall a courteſy to thoſe, that had ſo freely offered greater unto him; and it was reſented with a kind of angry indignation, that their offers had ſo little influence upon him; and there were ſome that watched opportunities to make him ſenſible of this neglect. There is no ſuch ſolœciſme at court as independency. Si non vis ut per illos tibi bene ſit, ef ſciunt ut ſit male. But Mr Preſton by this time had caſt up all accounts, and reſolved to ſtand unto his bargain whatſoever it coſt him. Only he thought if he muſt be a puritan, and bid farewel to all his carnal and court deſigns, he would not be one of the lower rank, but would get places if he could. Mediocribus eſſe poetis, non dii, non homines, non conceſſere columnæ That counſel of the wiſe man, Eccl. ix. 10. 'Whatſoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might,' he always practiſed. And what is commonly ſaid was true in him, In magnis ingeniis nihil mediocre.

This faithfulneſs to Mr Morgan, attended with ſo great a ſhadow upon himſelf, increaſed his reputation in the country, ſo that now he was accounted the only tutor; and being careful to read unto them, and direct their ſtudies, he found himſelf abridged of his own time, that ſhould have been beſtowed on his body. He alſo grew acquainted with many eminent and godly miniſters, as Mr Dod and Mr Hilderſham, who would come often to his chamber; and he was ſo hardened in his way, that he would get them many times to go to prayer with his pupils, a boldneſs not adventured on by any other. But by theſe labours his able body was debilitated. It was a great orator that ſaid, Primo deſii velle cauſas agere, deinde deſii poſſe. At firſt, ſaid he, I would not plead, at laſt I could not. Mr Preſton in his youth would not ſleep, but let the bed cloaths hang down, and awaken him. Now he could not, but about midnight ſtill awakened, and ſlept no more; whereby in time his body languiſhed, and could not anſwer as in former times.

Mr Butler of Clare-hall was then oracle in phyſic, to him he goes, and opens his condition to him; who, after ſome queſtions, bids him take tobacco, and ſo leaves him. He knew that Butler was odd and humorous, and thought he might give this advice to try him, and therefore reſolves to wait a while before he meddled with ſo odd a medicine, which Hippocrates and Galen had never ordained to any of their patients, and was at that time not ſo common, and of no good report; but his want of reſt continuing, and his appetite unto his book encreaſing, he goes again to Mr Butler, as a ſtranger, and propounds the caſe again; Mr Butler gives the ſame advice, and being ſatisfied that he was ſerious now, falls to taking of it, and found that this copious fume aſcending, did draw thoſe crudities from the ſtomach's mouth that hindered concoction of his meat, and vapours from it that occaſion ſleep, and ſo reſtored his reſt, and that in time his ſtrength; and ſo he went on in his work, until Dr Tindal, maſter of the college died. He was an old man, and that preferment of the maſterſhip of Queen's was more accounted of than now it is. There were very many that had their eyes upon it, but Dr Mountain in a ſpecial manner, who was often heard for to profeſs, he would rather be maſter of that college than dean of Weſtminſter: but Mr Preſton had another in his eye, Dr Davenant was a gentleman deſcended, and was a fellow commoner, when under graduate, but very painful, and of great capacity, and grew accordingly in learning and in reputation, and for his worth and parts was already choſen Margaret profeſſor, and read in the ſchools, with much applauſe, thoſe excellent lectures upon the Coloſſians which now are printed; him Mr Preſton pitched upon, but knew it muſt be carried very privately; for the Mountain was already grown into ſome bigneſs, was one of parts, and firſt obſerved in acting Miles glorioſus in the college, and had been chaplain unto the earl of Eſſex, but like the heliotrope, or flower of the ſun, did now adore Sir Robert Carr, already viſcount Rocheſter, the only favourite.

When it was agreed among the Perſians that he ſhould reign, whoſe horſe firſt ſaw the riſing ſun, and neighed at it, one turned his horſe head towards the mountains, believing that the ſun would firſt ariſe there; but it fell not out ſo here. Mr Preſton having laid his plot before hand, and ſeen what mountain was in his way, had taken care that word ſhould be daily brought him how the old Dr did, and when he found him irrecovecable, had horſe and all things ready; and upon notice of his being dead, goes preſently, and was at London and in Whitehall before any light appeared on the mountain top: the court was quiet, and he had ſome friends there. His buſineſs only was to get a free election, which he made means for to procure. But knowing alſo with whom he had to do, makes ſome addreſſes unto Viſcount Rocheſter, in the behalf of Dr Davenant, who being unacquainted with his chaplain's appetite to that particular, was fair and willing to befriend a learned enterprize. So Mr Preſton returns unto the college before the maſter's death was much took notice of; and aſſembling Dr Davenant's friends, acquaints them what had paſt at court, and ſo they went immediately to election, and it was eaſily and fairly carried for Dr Davenant, who being called, was admitted preſently.

But when Dr Mountain underſtood that Dr Tindal was departed, he ſends and goes to court and college for to make friends; but, alas! the game was played, and he was ſhut out. Never did Ætna or Veſuvius more fume, but there was no cure; only he threatens, and takes on againſt the actors, but they were innocent, and not obnoxious. This Dr had made great promiſes, gave a very goodly piece of plate unto the college, with this inſcription, Sic incipio, but now he vowed it ſhould be Sic deſino. However the college for the preſent was well paid, and grew in reputation very much; and becauſe they wanted room to entertain the numbers that flocked to them, built that goodly fabric, that contains many fair lodgings both for ſcholars and fellows, towards King's college.

It was not long before it came to Mr Preſton's courſe for to be dean and catechiſt, which he reſolved to improve by going through a body of divinity, that might be a guide unto the ſcholars in their ſtudies in divinity; for it was not his opinion that others ſhould do as he had done, that is, peruſe the ſchoolmen firſt, and then come to the modern writers; but firſt, read ſums and ſyſtems in divinity,

nity, and ſettle their opinions and judgments, and then read fathers, ſchoolmen, or what they had a mind to. This being known, and ſome honeſt townſmen hearing him at firſt by chance, there came the next day very many for to hear him, and the next day more, both townſmen and ſcholars from other colleges, ſo that the outward chappel would be often full before the fellows came. Mr Preſton was of a very meek and quiet ſpirit, never reſented injuries, nor provoked any unto averſeneſs, yet had ſome enemies: Si injuria multos tibi fecit inimicos, faciet invidia multos What had Paul done, Acts xiii. 45. for to deſerve ſo ſharp an oppoſition, but envy moved them? There had been other deans and catechiſts before this gentleman, yet no ſuch crowding.

Complaint was made to the vice-chancellor of this unuſual kind of catechiſing, it was aſſured, not only that townſmen and ſcholars mingled, but other colleges intruded alſo, that the fellows for the croud and multitude could not get through, and come to chapel to their places; that it was not ſafe for any man to be thus adored and doted on, unleſs they had a mind to cry up puritaniſme, which would in ſhort time pull them down; that the croſier ſtaff would not ſupport them long, if ſuch aſſemblies were encouraged; Obſta principiis, ſero medicina paratur, &c.

Well, upon the whole, an order was agreed on in the conſiſtory, and ſent unto the college, that the ſcholars and townſmen ſhould be confined to their proper preachers, that no ſtranger, neither townſman nor ſcholar, ſhould preſume, on any pretence whatſoever, to come unto thoſe lectures, that were proper only to the members of the college. The edict was obſerved punctually, and the auditory by it much impaired. Had ſtrangers ſtill been ſuffered to attend, thoſe ſermons had been printed as well as others; for there were divers that exactly noted, and wrote out all fair, unto the time of this reſtraint, but no one after that could go on with it, and ſo it reſts. But he went on, and was aſſiduous to the year's end, and waded through it, which was a very great help unto many of his pupils who made the greater benefit of thoſe things, becauſe they were not common and in print.

About that time the lecture at Trinity-church, and the ſermons at St Andrews, were prohibited, and the ſcholars all confined to St Mary's, which did occaſion Mr Preſton to read divinity unto his pupils on the Lord's days, at three o'clock in the afternoon, which he alſo often did upon the week days; but the townſmen and the ſcholars of other colleges that had taſted of his ſpirit in the chapel, endeavoured that he would do it where they might hear. Buttolph's belongs unto queen's college, and is uſually ſupplied by one of that houſe; there he is willing to make a trial how it would take, and reſolves the next Lord's day to preach at three o'clock, after St Mary's ſermons ſhould be ended; which, though but very little known, occaſioned ſuch a throng and crowd as was incredible. Men were not cloyed with preaching then, nor waxed wanton.

There dwelt then in the pariſh one Dr Newcome, a civilian, and commiſſary to the chancellor of Ely, who, being in the church, and ſeeing the crowd, commanded that evening prayer only ſhould be read, but no ſermon; the miniſter entreated that for that time Mr Preſton might be allowed to preach, ſo did the earl of Lincoln and others in the church; but he was reſolute, and becauſe he would not be further importuned, went home with all his family, and left them to determine at their peril what they would do; ſo upon advice it was concluded that the ſermon ſhould go on, and Mr Preſton preached a very ſavoury and holy ſermon, upon 2 Pet. iii. 17. 18. There was ſo much time ſpent in debates about it, and meſſages before the commiſſary left the congregation, that it was too late to do both, and therefore they adventured for that time to forbear common prayer, that ſo the ſcholars might depart, and be at college prayers. But this inſtructed Dr Newcomb in his complaint. The court was then near hand, that is, at New-market; thither the commiſſary goes the next day, and having the biſhop of Ely there, and many other clergymen, aſſures them that Mr Preſton was in heart, and would quickly be in practice a non-conformiſt, and was ſo followed and adored in the univerſity, that unleſs ſome ſpeedy courſe were taken with him, they might caſt their caps at all conformity, and ſee their power trodden under foot; and told them gentleneſs was not the way, for he was cunning, and would recover all if he were not ſeriouſly and thoroughly dealt with.

There was no advocate for Mr Preſton, but the Dr being firſt in his own cauſe, ſeemed juſt, Prov. xviii. 17. 'And ſpake to thoſe that were willing to believe.' The puritans began to be conſiderable, and they doubted he might come in time to head them. It is a great ſecurity to a man to be deſpiſed; Contempto nullus diligenter caveat: A fellow that hath nothing in him, nor is not owned, may be exorbitant, as he of one in his time; Contemptu jam liber erat. But David that hath a party following him, muſt have an army to attend him; and therefore he did wiſely to profeſs himſelf to be a dead dog, or a flea, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14.

The king was made acquainted with this complaint, and aſſured that Mr Preſton had as ſtrong an influence into the puritans, as the principle of the Jeſuites, which was Agua viva, had upon them, and therefore it behoved him to conſider what to do. A word was enough to a wiſe and jealous king who did not love to play an after game, and therefore hears himſelf the doctor's information; enquires whether the biſhop's and chancellor's juriſdictions extended unto members of a college, and finally concludes to proceed againſt him by the power of the univerſity.

A letter is framed unto Dr Scot, maſter of Clare hall, vice chancellor at that time, and to the heads, to call before them Mr Preſton, to give a ſtrict account of that notorious diſobedience unto the commiſſary; he anſwers mildly, that he was not guilty; refers himſelf unto the auditory, that evening prayer was omitted, becauſe the ſcholars might depart in due time, ſeeing the time allotted for it was ſpent in treating with the commiſſary, not out of any diſreſpect unto the ſervice, which he himſelf did uſually attend at other times. When the wolf complained the lamb had fouled the water that he was to drink; the lamb anſwered that if he had defiled it, yet that could not prejudice the wolf that was above, and the mud would certainly be carried downward; but this anſwer did not fill the belly of the wolf. Mr Preſton's innocency did aggravate his crime, which was his popularity, and therefore they told him, they were engaged to ſupport, by all juſt means, the biſhop's juriſdiction: that the king had honoured him, in leaving that affront to be examined by his proper judges, and that except he ſhould take off the court, they muſt and would proceed to a very round and ſerious cenſure.

Muſa mihi cauſas memora, quo numine læſo
Quidve dolens regina Deum, tot volvere caſus,
Inſignem pietate virum, tot adire labores
Impulerit? Tantæne animis cœleſtibus iræ?

That a fellow of a college for preaching of an innocent and honeſt ſermon, in a church belonging to the college, by the conſent and in the hearing of the incumbent, ſhould be thus vigorouſly undertaken.

Among other gentlemen of quality that were pupils unto Mr Preſton at this time, there was one Sir Capel Bedels, an orphan, of a very fair eſtate in Huntingtonſhire, a daughter's ſon of old Sir Arthur Capel, who being guardian to his grandchild, had recommended him, as he had done many of his own ſons, unto his government. It was a great truſt, and Mr Preſton's care was anſwerable; and becauſe, plus vident oculi, he had his ſpies, that gave him notice of all their carriages and correſpondencies; by one of theſe he was informed that Sir Capel haunted Dr Newcomb's houſe, and was very familiar with his daughter, Mrs Jane Newcomb, a very proper well-bred gentlewoman; his tutor aſking if they were contracted, he anſwered, no, but would be very ſhortly, as he was told, for he was reſolved to have her. Mr Preſton charged him to keep all ſecret, that Sir Capel might not think he was acquainted with it, and immediately appoints a journey unto Safron-walden, to take the air, and ſee that ſtately pyle at Audley end, and takes divers of his fellow commoners along, as he uſed to do at other times; and among others this Sir Capel Bedels. When they had dined and viewed the houſe, it was propounded by one of them, that that they might go that night to Haddam, and viſit old Sir Arthur Capel, ſeeing they were thus far on their way, and it was late. Mr Preſton ſeemed to be indifferent, and ſo the propoſition took, and with none more than with Sir Caple, who knew his grandfather would fill his pockets, and that would ſweeten his Newcomb miſtreſs next embraces, and make him welcome to her. The old knight was glad to entertain ſuch welcome gueſts, and that night there was no diſcourſe, but of the ſtately rooms and goodly gallery of Audley end, and ſo the young men went to bed pleaſed, that the college-bell next morning would not awaken them; but Mr Preſton ſlept not in utramque aurem, but awakened betimes, and acquaints Sir Andrew with all the buſineſs, adviſeth him, by no means to permit the gentleman's return unto the college; for though the wound might ſeem quite cured, and he never ſo much engage forbearance, yet frequent apparitions would reditegrate: Et nihil facilius quam amor recrudeſcit. Sir Arthur was a very wiſe man, and had experience of the world, thanks Mr Preſton for his faithfulneſs; pretends Sir Capel wanted ſomething, and deſires his tutor to give him leave to ſtay a little while until he could be furniſhed, and then he ſhould be ſent, to which the tutor eaſily conſented: and ſo the reſt went home; and after a while the old man tells Sir Capel he grew in bigneſs, and it would be fit for him to travel before he ſettled, and he prevails with him to be content.

But what ſays Mrs Newcomb, who is robbed by this means of her vowed and reſolved ſervant, and her crafty father that beholds ſo good a morſel ſnatched from between his teeth; do ye think he had forgotten this when Mr Preſton came to preach within his juriſdiction? Pulvere qui læſunt, ſed læſi marmore ſcribunt: other injuries perhaps may be forgotten, but loſs of money is not: Plorantur lachrymis amiſſis pecunia veris.

Mr Preſton was not altogether a ſtranger at the court, however now there was no remedy; when he came to New-market, he found that biſhop Andrews, then biſhop of Ely, was chief; and that his juriſdiction in the commiſſary, was it that was pretended to be affronted, and therefore applied himſelf to him, and told him that he did not purpoſe to offend, but being engaged for to preach at that time, could not with honour diſappoint the auditory; if he ſuſpected him for any thing, deſired he would examine him, and ſatisfy himſelf. The biſhop told him, the king was told he was an enemy to forms of prayer, and held no prayer lawful but conceived: and therefore being popular, his judgment and opinion might do hurt. Mr Preſton anſwered that it was a ſlander, for he thought ſet forms lawful, and refuſed not on all occaſions to be preſent at the college prayers, and, when it was his turn, to read them. The biſhop anſwered, that he was glad, and would inform the king, and do him all the good he could, and bade him wait a while, and then repair again to him for ſatisfaction in it; and ſo time paſſed on, and there was nothing done.

There were ſome at Court that wiſhed well to Mr Preſton, ſed lapſuro affiſtere formidant, were loth to undertake a drooping cauſe; only there was one Dr Young, an honeſt Scotchman, that was dean of Wincheſter, and he told Mr Preſton plainly, that biſhop Andrews was his greateſt adverſary, and though he gave him good words, yet aſſured the king, that if Mr Preſton were not for this expelled the univerſity, lord biſhops would not long continue; but becauſe Mr Preſton was accounted, and not without cauſe, a learned man, he was not willing to appear againſt him; but deſired the puniſhment might be inflicted where the fact was done, and that was in the univerſity.

Mr Preſton ſaw now that the biſhop was a courtier, and could give words where deeds were not intended, and therefore goes again unto the biſhop, and tells him plainly, that he or none muſt put a period to his attendance, and that either he would ſpeak unto the king in his behalf, or tell him plainly that he would not, that he might know whence all this trouble flowed. The biſhop pauſed a while on this bold carriage, and at the laſt bad him come to him ſuch a time again, and he would deal with the king in his behalf.

So he goes unto the king, and tells him that however Mr Preſton was very dangerous, and it would be a very great ſecurity if he were handſomely expelled, yet he doubted it would not hear well, if it ſhould be done for this offence; for he would be abſolved in the opinions and minds of men, and be owned and applauded as their martyr, and might perhaps recover, and live to be revenged; and therefore thought it would be better, for to enjoin him to declare his judgment about forms of prayer; for that would be accounted a recantation and however would weaken his reputation with the puritans, which would be enough; for if they could divide him from his party they ſhould not fear him; for he ſaid, his carriage argued confidence in ſome aſſiſtance, which when they had removed, they ſhould be ſtrong enough at ſingle hand. All that the biſhop ſpake, was as if extripode. An order preſently was drawn, and ſent to the vice-chancellor, that Mr Preſton ſhould, in Buttolph's church, declare his judgment concerning forms of prayer, on ſuch a Sunday, or elſe they ſhould immediately proceed againſt him, according to their firſt inſtructions.

Mr Preſton was glad there was a way out, but ſenſible of the hard hand that had been carried towards him; but now there was no remedy, and it was vain to ſtrive againſt the ſtream: but before he could come home, the news was all about the town, that Mr Preſton was to preach a recantation ſermon at Buttolph's church on ſuch a day. This was good ſport to the brave blades, who came crouding as faſt as any for to hear, and it was no ſin now for any body to be from prayers: and indeed there was a very great aſſembly, though he did all he could to have concealed it. So he went upon his former text, and preached a very profitable ſermon, concerning growth in grace, and directed prayer, as a ſpecial means to make men grow in grace. Now that (he ſaid) was of two ſorts, either that which was ſudden, extemporary, and conceived; or ſet, enjoined, and preſcribed before, not only for the ſenſe and ſcope, but alſo words and phraſes. And whereas ſome thought this was to ſtint the ſpirit, he ſaid, there was a liberty to uſe conceived prayers at other times, wherein the ſpirit might expatiate and enlarge itſelf; and alſo the intention of the mind, though not in extenſion and variety of language. The blades that came to laugh, had no great cauſe to do it, for this paſſage was at the very cloſe, and the ſermon all along before was ſharp and ſearching; both ſides were ſilent and went home, nor without ſome prints of good upon their ſpirits: Optimus orator cenſendus, non qui meruit auditorum judicium, ſed qui abſtulit; he makes the beſt ſpeech that binds his hearers, rather to think what was ſaid, than who ſaid it.

The good-fellows were nothing ſo merry at the end, as at the beginning of the ſermon. Indifferent hearers praiſed all, and were confirmed in a good opinion of the preacher. Good men were glad he came ſo well off, and was at liberty to preach again, where they might hear him: himſelf was troubled, leſt any thing he ſaid ſhould be miſtaken or miſrepreſented, as he was apt to be.

But there were many eyes upon this action, and all men waited to ſee the iſſue. Courtiers did not like it, that after all theſe toſſings to and fro, he ſhould thus light upon his feet, yet would not meddle for the preſent, but wait occaſions. Thoſe that were well affected were glad he was engaged againſt the court and biſhops, and did preſage he might be inſtrumental to their downfall, and every body laboured to engage him more and more againſt them.

The Spaniſh match was then the common talk, and great unwilligneſs appeared in the people generally; and Dr Willet had preſumed to offer arguments unto the king againſt matching with idolaters. The king was greatly vexed at this adventure, and took great pains to perſuade the Dr that a papiſt was not an idolater: ſed non perſuadebat etiamſi perſuaſerat. The people were unſatisfied; and there being then a parliament, a very honourable and able member of the houſe of Lords prevailed with Mr Preſton to write ſome arguments againſt it. And though there were ſevere edicts and proclamations againſt ſcandalous papers, and intermeddling with myſteries of ſtate, yet he promiſed it ſhould be ſcattered and divulged unto fit perſons, and none ſhould know from whence, or from whom it came; accordingly, when it was finiſhed and written fair, one gave it to a porter, whom he met in Holborn, and bad him leave it, according to the direction. The next day a great Lord comes unto him, that had perſuaded Mr Preſton unto the ſervice, and tells him, that he had met with ſuch a piece againſt the Spaniſh match, as he never ſaw, and proteſted he was convinced that he muſt ſpeak againſt it in the houſe, whatever came of it. The other aſked him who made it, and where he had it. He aſſured him he knew not, but it was left at his lodgings, by he knew not whom. The lord deſired he might ſee it, and it was copied out, and ſpread among thoſe of the parliament they thought fit, but the author of it never known.

King James had ſomething always in his writings and ſpeeches againſt the puritans, which was ill taken, for that it was apparent, thoſe meant thereby were godly conſcientious perſons. The houſe of commons was the only mote in king James's eye, the remora, as he conceived unto his abſolute dominion, for he knew not how to engage them, as he did the lawyers and divines; but if he ſtopped one mouth with preferment this parliament, there would be others open the next againſt him. There were ſome now that adventured to apologize for puritans, and to ſay in parliament, that honeſt men were wounded under that name; and to propoſe, that godly miniſters might not be ſilenced, and thrown out of their freeholds for trifles and ceremonies. But king James would none of that ſtuff, breaks up the parliament, and ſets out proclamations: Sed quid proderit totius regionis ſilentium, ſi affectus fremant. People love not to be enforced to duty. Homines duci volunt non cogi.

The chaplains that attended monthly at the court, were not ambitious of preaching over often, and ſo a combination was agreed on for preachers before the king, whenever he ſhould lie within twelve miles of Cambridge. The king did not deſpair of making ſcholars his, and therefore uſed all endeavours to oblige them, eſpecially Cambridge men, where a ſeed of puritans had been a long time; and though the plains about Royſton and New market afforded better game than elſewhere, yet ſcholars he conceived might be catched ſometimes as well as hares, and ſo was willing they ſhould preach before him. Young men he knew would preach themſelves: Omnis oratio docet, aut rem, aut animum dicentis. He ſhould learn either things or perſons.

By this means it came to Mr Preſton's turn to preach before the king at Royſton; he was ſo muffled at court in Dr Newcomb's buſineſs that he knew not what to do could not decline it altogether, for that would have expoſed him unto too much obſervation; and yet he greatly feared what might befal him in the doing of it. Therefore he changed his courſe with one that was to preach a little after, and did it very privately, that if his enemies ſhould have deſigns they might be diſappointed, and ſo it was not much known.

When he was to preach, it fell out that his courſe came upon a Tueſday, when the king did lie at Finching-brook. The court was very thin, and the prince and duke of Buckingham were both abroad, and the king himſelf was for an hunting match that day, and gave order that the ſermon ſhould begin at eight o'clock. Mr Preſton had ſome at the court that were ſolicitous as well as he, and they told him it would give very great content, if he would take ſome occaſion in the ſermon to ſhew his judgment, as he had done before, about ſet forms. Dr Young, dean of Winchester, (of whom we ſpake before) did then attend; and when the king came in, and ſat down in the chair, he told him who it was that preached, and ſaid, he hoped he would give content: I pray God he do, ſaid the king.

The ſermon is in print, upon John i. 16. which he ſo clearly opened and applied, that the king ſat all the while as quiet as could be, and never ſtirred nor ſpake to any body, but by his looks diſcovered he was pleaſed: when all was done, he came unto him, as the manner was, to kiſs his hand; and the king aſked him of what Preſton he was deſcended, he anſwered, of that in Lancaſhire: then ſaid the king, You have many of your name and kindred very eminent; and Preſton the priſt, although a papiſt, is a very learned man.

Great haſte was made to bring in dinner, and the king was very pleaſant all the time, had his eye continually upon Mr Preſton, and ſpake of divers paſſages in the ſermon with much content; eſpecially that of the Arminians putting God into the ſame extremity that Darius was put in, Dan. vi. when he would have ſaved Daniel, but could not. But as ſoon as ever he was retired, the marquiſs Hamilton kneeled down, and beſought him, that he might commend the preacher to him for his chaplain, proteſted he did not ſo much as know him, but that he was moved by the weight and ſtrength of that he had delivered: told him, he ſpake no pen and inkhorn language, but as one that comprehended what he ſaid, and that he could not but have ſubſtance and matter in him. The king acknowleged all, but ſaid it was too early, remembered New market buſineſs, and was reſerved.

Sir Ralph Freeman, one of the maſters of requeſts, had married a kinſwoman of the duke of Buckingham's, and was a kinſman unto Mr Preſton; he makes a relation of the buſineſs unto the duke, and told him, if now he would appear in favour of his couſin Preſton, he might oblige the puritans, and lay a ground work for his own ſecurity, if tempeſts ſhould ariſe; aſſured him that Mr Preſton was ingenious, and might be made; that the king and all the court were taken with the ſermon, and did approve it. The duke of Buckingham was a wiſe man, and apprehenſive of what Sir Ralph ſuggeſted ſeaſonably, ſaw thoſe they called puritans were growing, and in the parliament were thought conſiderable; knew the king's affections might cool, and he might need friends, and took Sir Ralph's diſcourſe into his moſt ſerious thoughts.

An honeſt man, one Mr Packer, was then his ſecretary, and he ſet on what Sir Ralph Freeman had ſuggeſted, and ſo it came unto a reſolution, that Mr Preſton ſhould be owned; and the duke commanded Sir Ralph Freeman to go to Mr Preſton from him, and acquaint him of his good opinion of him, and deſire to ſee him; and indeed there was ſuch a concurrence and concerting of opinions and deſires among the courtiers, that it was aſſured Mr Preſton he might be chaplain unto whom he would, and that was now the deliberation, which of theſe offers he ſhould accept, and whom he would acknowlege his patron and protector for the time to come.

There was not ſo few clergymen at court at any time, and ſo no kind of oppoſition; yet the king himſelf hung back, and would do nothing haſtily: he was not reconcilable unto the puritans, and ſo deſired not in that reſpect to engage him; but he deſired to deprive them of Mr Preſton, and to divide him from them, and would do any thing that might drive that on. And conſidering how many he had won, that Mr Preſton was a young man, and might be drawn on, he would not hinder nor oppoſe; ſo it was the joint opinion of all his friends, that the beſt preferment was to be the prince's chaplain, who then was grown, and had an houſhold. This therefore was repreſented unto Sir Ralph Freeman, and his opinion required, who quickly yielded, and propoſed it unto the duke. Both prince and duke had been abroad, and neither of them heard the ſermon: when therefore Mr Preſton was brought unto the duke, he very ſeriouſly received him; and told him it was the prince's unhappineſs and his to be abſent when he did preach, and therefore deſired him that he would vouchſafe a copy of his ſermon to him, and believe that he would be ready to the beſt and utmoſt of his power to ſerve him.

There were many other courtiers that deſired copies of the ſermon; and the court not ſtaying there, Mr Preſton came home to furniſh copies. He never penned a ſermon word for word, but wrote what came into his mind, and as it came, and that in no good hand; and ſo it was a buſineſs to provide theſe copies, which yet he ſeriouſly attended till they were written fair, and then to court he goes, where the duke preſents him to the prince, and ſo he was made and admitted chaplain to the prince in ordinary; for as then the prince had not compleated the number he intended, which was ſix, who were accordingly to wait two months by the year, and preach unto the houſhold upon the Lord's days, and perform ſuch duties as were required of them:

But God was making other work for Mr Preſton, for Dr

Dr Tolſon, biſhop of Saliſbury dies, and leaves a wife and many children unprovided for; for he had been biſhop but a little while. This wife of his was Dr Davenant's ſiſter; in pity therefore and commiſeration of her caſe, it was propoſed to the king by thoſe that were his friends, that Dr Davenant, a ſingle man, and well deſerving, might ſucceed his brother in the biſhoprick, and ſo make ſome proviſion for his children. The king thought very well of Dr Davenant, not only for his ſingular abilities and labours in the univerſity, but for his pains alſo, and ſervice in the ſynod of Dort againſt Arminius: and it was looked on as a deed of charity, and ſo believed he would carry it, and he the man.

But this created Mr Preſton's cares, Dr Davenant had been his conſtant and faithful friend, and given countenance upon all occaſions to him and all his pupils. But now who ſhould ſucceed; and where ſhould Mr Preſton find another ſhelter? The fellows for the moſt part were not his friends, envied his numbers, and great relations, and there was no man like ſo to befriend him. Beſides, the Margaret profeſſor's place would be void alſo by this remove, and many able ſtiring batchelors in divinity, propoſed unto him that place, and aſſured him the election would be eaſily carried for him.

The truth is, he had no great hope to do any great good in the election of the maſter of the college, and one Dr Manſel being named, a very moderate good natured man, he let that care fall, and was more anxious about the profeſſor's place; for tho' ſound doctrine in the univerſity was of much uſe, yet Engliſh preaching was like to work more, and win more ſouls to God.

He always high valued, and frequently conſulted with Mr Dod; and he perſwaded Engliſh preaching, as that wherein God was more immediately ſerved, and ſaid there were others that might ſupply the univerſity in the profeſſor's place, that either could not, or would not labour mens converſion. And indeed the maſter of Sidney college Dr Ward, a vaſt ſcholar, was then in view and nomination for the profeſſor's place; yet Mr Preſton was ſo ſollicited by honeſt men, that he knew not what to do; two things he thought he wanted to enable him. The one was a Latin tongue, the other a latine ſtile; in both which, by reaſon of diſuetude, he was unready. For his ſtile therefore, he reſolves upon an exact and logical analyſis of all the epiſtles, which would actuate and exerciſe his ſtile, and acquaint him with the ſcripture phraſe and language; and if he were called to be profeſſor, might ſerve for lectures in the ſchools; which work he immediately applied himſelf unto, and very happily compleated; a work of great pains unto him, and in itſelf of great worth; but being Latin, and written only with his own ill hand, was not thought popular enough to come abroad, but lieth in the dark.

For the exerciſing of his Latin tongue, he reſolves a journey into the Netherlands, were he ſhould have much occaſion of ſpeaking Latin, and ſee thoſe colleges and univerſities; but there was no travelling beyond ſea, without a licenſe under the hands of privy counſellors; this he procures among his friends with all the ſecrecy that could be, and a great while before he meant to uſe it, that he might conceal it from the college and univerſity; but this his ſecrecy begot ſuſpicion that there was ſome plot. Velle putant quodcunque poteſt: It is not ſafe for men to have abilities. It was reſented ſo much the more, becauſe no clergy man was made acquainted with it, and the opinion was, that ſomething was brewing againſt Epiſcopacy. This they were ſure of, that Amſterdam was in the Netherlands, and ever had been fatal to the hierarchy. The lord keeper, then was biſhop Williams, he ſees this plague afar off Prov. xxii. 3, and provides a meſſenger to go along unknown to Mr Preſton, that ſhould obſerve and give intelligence weekly of all that paſſed: Integer vitæ ſceleriſque purus, non eget jaculis nec arcu. 'A breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs is a better guard than a ſhirt or coat of mail.' It was David's uprightneſs that did preſerve him, Pſal. xxv. 21. ſo was it Mr Preſtons; for he knew nothing of his attendance, till after his return, but gave out in the college, and among his pupils, that he would go the next vacation into Kent, and viſit ſir Richard Sands, and drink if he ſaw cauſe, the Tunbridge waters, concludes to take one of his pupils with him, a Yorkſhire gentleman, ſir Henry Slingſbys ſon and heir; and did accordingly acquaint his father and make proviſion for it long before.

The time came, and he goes into Kent, and is received in the paſſage boat for Rotterdam, in the garb and notion of a gentleman, with his ſcarlet cloak and gold hatband, and all things anſwerable; and ſo goes over all the provinces, both proteſtant and popiſh where there was any thing obſervable, and encounters frequently with divers prieſts and Jeſuites, profeſſing himſelf a proteſtant gentleman, that was willing to find out the truth, and try all tenets, and accordingly was courted by them very much, and ſolicited to be a papiſt; and they gave him very many popiſh books, and ſo he came back into Kent, and to the college at the time appointed, unknown to any in the college, but only one of his pupils, from whom he ſeldom concealed any thing. He was no ſooner ſettled in the college, but a rumour flies abroad that Mr Preſton had been beyond the ſeas; he ſhewed them that it was incredible, and wonders at their ſillineſs, that they would believe ſo unlikely a relation; the matter was not great, now all was paſt, and ſo it reſted doubtful and undetermined.

He had a long time been ſucceſsful in the way of pupils, but doctor Davenant's leaving of the college troubled him. A great tutor hath much occaſion to uſe the maſters influence for accomodation and advancement of his pupils, which now he ſaw he could not promiſe unto himſelf; and it fell out much about this time, that doctor Dunn, preacher at Lincolns inn died, and ſome in that ſociety propoſed that Mr Preſton might be tried whether he were willing to accept that place for term time: he was himſelf neither careleſs, nor cracking of his good name: famæ nec incuriоſus, nec venditator. But it was much grown by reaſon of his ſucceſs in the conflicts and encounters he had at court. It was ſome refreſhing unto honeſt men, that Mr Preſton, ſo reſolute, and conſtant in the ways of God, was yet the prince his chaplin, and helped forward the deſire of theſe men; it ſuited with him, to have an opportunity to exerciſe his miniſtry in a conſiderable and intelligent congregation, where he was aſſured, many parliament men, and others of his beſt acquaintance would be his hearers; and where in term time, he ſhould be well accomodated, ſo he conſented and undertook the place; the chapel then was very little, and at the firſt, the numbers that attended on his miniſtry, beſides their own ſociety were few, but when the chapel was new built, as now it is, the numbers were exceeding great, that were his conſtant hearers, and foundations laid, that will not eaſily be ruined.

This was ſome eaſe unto his grieved mind, for Dr Davenant's leaving of the college and univerſity; but filled not his great capacity and large deſire of doing good; the college he gave over in his thoughts, but not the univerſity, where his preaching was much reſented, and made great impreſſions; and tho' at Lincolns inn he had gown men to be his hearers, yet they were not like to propogate and ſpread it. A preacher in the univerſity, doth generare patres, beget begetters, and tranſmit unto poſterity, what God is pleaſed to reveal to him; in a word, doth what the apoſtle doth enjoin, 2 Tim. ii. 2. and he of all men, thirſted after opportunities of doing ſervice, and might well ſay with the ſpouſe, that 'he was ſick of love, Cant. ii. 5.

Some of the fellows of Emanuel college were very eminent for parts and learning, yet clouded and obſcured, (as they thought) by an opinion that lay upon the college, that they were puritans, that is, not only godly and religious, (for ſo they were, and were content to be eſteemed) but nonconformiſts, and averſe to government; for which cauſe there had been lately ſome alteration made, both in their chapel, and manner of their diet; they thought therefore, if they could prevail with Dr. Chaderton their preſent maſter, to reſign, who was eſtabliſh'd in it by the founder, and named in the ſtatute, but was grown very old, and had outlived many of thoſe great relations, which he had before, they might perhaps procure that Mr Preſton might ſucceed him, and bring the college into reputation, being a good man, and yet a courtier, the prince his chaplain, and very gracious with the duke of Buckingham. But this was ſooner ſaid than done, the old Doctor was exceeding wary and jealous not only of his own diſparagement, but eſpecially of the good and welfare of that brave foundation that had grown and flouriſhed under his government ſo long; for if it were but known that he were out, there were divers lay in wait to get a mandate, and come in againſt their minds; a freſh example whereof they had lately ſeen in their next neighbours, Chriſts college, where after Mr Pemberton was choſen, Dr Carew dean of Exeter, was forced on them, and did all he could to mould a new, and alter the conſtitution and genius of the college. But the fellows anſwered, that this might be better hindered and prevented whilſt he was alive, than at his death; for his reſignation might be carried pirvately, but his death could not, and if all the fellows were content, the election might be paſt before the reſignation were diſcovered; and ſo they promiſed to ſound and try the judgment of the other fellows, and then repair again unto him.

There were two things in the college that (in their opinions) greatly pinched them. The one was the ſtatute for attendance and continuance whilſt they were fellows, ſo that they had not opportunity to live in noblemens houſes, or take lectures to exerciſe their miniſtry, and make themſelves known unto ſuch as had it in their power to prefer them. Another was the ſtatute of departing at ſuch a ſtanding, whether they were provided or not provided: and there was then a freſh example in Dr. Travarſe a man of great worth, yet forced to ſojurn as a fellow commoner in Chriſts college until he could be better accomodated; the fellows therefore were eaſily induced to affect this change; for they thought Mr Preſton might be an inſtrument, by reaſon of his great acquaintance, either to get ſome mitigation of the ſtatute, or procure more livings to be annexed to the college for their preferment.

So they returned to the old man, and told him that the fellows were all agreed, and ready to do what he ſhould preſcribe, and it reſted now in him to prevent the danger that did threaten, not only them in their particular concernments, but the growing good and welfare alſo of the college. The poor man wiſt not what to do, to outlive the maſterſhip he thought was to outlive himſelf, and to go into his grave alive.

Yet he honoured and loved Mr Preſton very much, and could not anſwer that dilema of the college fafety; therefore he told them he would not be wanting to the college good, but it concerned them as well as himſelf, to provide they were not cheated, and another forced on them, whether they would or not; and therefore deſired that Mr Preſton might be reqeſted to deal with his friends at court, to procure ſome promiſe that there ſhould be no mandate granted, in caſe his reſignation ſhould be known; he told them likewiſe how unprovided he was for maintenance, when that was gone, and how unſeemly it would be for him now in his old age for to want, and therefore deſired he might be taken in this particular into conſideration. But Mr Preſton quickly eaſed the old man of all theſe fears, and procuring a letter from the duke of Buckingham in theſe words.

'SIR,

'I have moved his Majeſty, concerning Mr Preſton's ſucceeding of you, in the maſterſhip of Emanuel college, who is not only willing, but is alſo graciouſly pleaſed to recommend him to the place in eſpecial manner before any other; ſo that in making this way for him, you ſhall do a very acceptable thing to his majeſty, as alſo to the prince his maſter, of which I am likewiſe to give you notice, and to put you out of all doubt, that another may be thruſt upon you: you ſhall not need to fear any thing in regard that from his Majeſty there will be no hinderance to his ſucceſſion; and for that point of ſupply of maintenance, I ſhall (as I promiſed) take care for to procure it, when fit occaſion ſhall be offered; ſo taking kindly what you have done, I reſt, Theobalds, Sep. 20. 1612. Your very loving friend G. Buckingham.

When the doctor had received and read this letter, he was in all things ſatisfied, as to the court, but they all knew that doctor Travarſe lay in wait for this preferment; for being outed by the ſtatute at Emanuel college, he ſojourned at Chriſt's college as fellow commoner, and preſumed either by his friends at court, to get a mandate, or be choſen in the college by a party of the fellows, whom he thought his own; therefore great care was taken to keep all ſecret, and though the ſtatute do ordain a vacancy of ſeven days, and notice of a ſchedule paſted upon the chapel door, yet ſuch was the concurrent uniform agreement of all the fellows, that it was not diſcovered to any of the ſcholars until the day of election; and becauſe there is a ſacrament to be immediately before it, they were conſtrained to lock up all the gates that none might come in or go out till it was paſt; and then two of the fellows were diſpatched to queens college, to acquaint Mr Preſton with what they had done, and to deſire that at two of the clock he would repair unto the college to be admitted, and undertake the charge.

It was ſtrange news at queens, and all the college were much affected with it, wondering extremely that ſuch a great tranſaction ſhould be carried with ſo much ſecrecy, and that among Mr Preſton's twelve diſciples (as they called them) there ſhould be never a Judas but all concurred in it; but there was order given preſently that all the ſcholars ſhould be ready againſt two of the clock that day to attend Mr Preſton and the fellows to Emanuel college, in habits ſuitable unto their ſeveral qualities, which was done accordingly; and a very goodly company attended him from Queen's unto Emanuel, where they were chearfully received and entertained according to cuſtom, with a generous and coſtly banquet, and then returned unto Queen's again; but left Mr Preſton, the prop and glory of it, at Emanuel.

In the plantation of Emanuel college at the firſt, the godly founder took great care to ſtore his college with godly and able fellows from all the other colleges, and ſome were after added that were eminent; but now a maſter is beſtowed, God in mercy hath enabled that good ſociety to pay their debts by ſending not only members, but alſo heads into very many of the other colleges, ſo that they may now well ſay, Quæ regio in terris noſtri non plena laboris.

Sir Walter Mildmay their noble and religious founder, was wont to ſay unto his friends, that he had ſet an acorn that might perhaps in time become an oak; bleſſed be God our eyes have ſeen it, not only grown and flouriſhing, but fruitful, ſeaſonable ſhowers, a great promotion into a new plantation, and earneſt prayers unto God, a ſpecial means to bring theſe down, of which I think no college ever had more, which in theſe laſt years have returned a glorious harveſt: to God be praiſe.

The news ran ſwiftly all the kingdom over, and was received as men were affected. Good men were glad that honeſt men were not abhorred, as they had been at the court, and preſaged much of that enlargement and deliverance, which he have lived to ſee; the courtiers made full account that he was theirs, and would mount up from one ſtep to another, until he were a prelate; eſpecially the duke of Buckingham, who from this time ſeemed ſincerely to affect him, multum fuit ad annum, dediſſe beneficium, thought he had given earneſt, and could not be defrauded of the purchaſe. The earl of Pembroke, and the counteſs of Bedford, had a great intereſt in him and he in them; and all men looked on him as upon a riſing man, and reſpected him accordingly. As for Lincoln's-Inn, they made account they had a ſpecial influence into this honour, as having firſt expreſſed their good opinion of him; and there was an honeſt godly old man, one of the benchers, Mr Ayres, that upon hearing the news, would needs be young again, and made an Anagram upon his name, though he was uncertain how he wrote it in Latin, for he had ſeen it writen divers ways. Being therefore reſolute, and loath to miſs it, he reſolves to write it both ways, as he that uſed to ſay his prayers in Latin and Engliſh, that both might not fail, and ſo firſt he wrote it Johannes Preſtonius, with this Anagram, In flas pius honore: And this diſtich:

Doctrina, ingenium, virtus tua, præmia poſcunt:
En dedit Emanuel, flas in honore pius.

But

But leſt this ſhould be miſtaken, he writes it Johannes Preſtonus: with this Anagram, ſe neſſe, non turpia: And this diſtich:

Turpia non noviſſe, bonum: ſe noſſe, beatum;
Iſta docet alios, ſed prius ipſe facis.

The reſt of that ſociety rejoiced, that their lecturer was maſter of Emanuel, and took occaſion to expreſs it according to their ſeveral diſpoſitions and relations, when he came to them in the term, which ſhortly followed. There was one thing in the college ſtatutes that greatly troubled him; and that was that the maſter's abſence from the college was confined to a month in every quarter, and he ſaw not how he could attend at court, and preach at Lincoln's Inn in term time, but he ſhould tranſgreſs; but the fellows ſoon conſented to an interpretation, that abſolved him from the rigid ſenſe, there being in the ſtatute a double liberty; firſt, that in caſe of violent detention it ſhould hold; they reſolved, that not only a natural, but alſo a moral violence was to be underſtood. The other was, that in caſe of college buſineſs he ſhould not be eſteemed abſent. Now the college was at that time in ſuit for a living in the weſt, of good value, with one Mr Ewins, a gentleman in the pariſh, who had bred up a younger ſon to be a ſcholar in relation to that living; and therefore contended for it, as it had been his own inheritance; and when he was worſted at common law, prefers a bill in chancery, and thought by money to carry it againſt the college right. Biſhop Williams, the lord keeper then, was his great friend, and when after many delays it came at laſt to hearing would not allow the counſel for the college to ſpeak; Mr Preſton being preſent, craved leave to ſpeak in the cauſe himſelf, but was not only ſilenced, but ſeverely reprehended for it; it was trinity term, and the plague was very hot in London, ſo that Michaelmas term was wholly adjourned, and the next term was proclaimed at Redding, and the records removed thither; but before that, the lord-keeper was removed from his throne, and ſir Thomas Coventry, one of the college council that were not permitted before to ſpeak ſucceeded him; by by whoſe integrity and juſtice, the college was reſtored to their right, which ever ſince they have enjoyed, and ſo his following the college buſineſs excuſed his abſence all his time.

Being therefore now eſtabliſhed, and greatly minding the good thereof, he obſerved, that the ſcholars kept acts but ſeldom, and accordingly when they came unto it, performed it but meanly; he therefore adviſed with the fellows in it, and after many conſultations, it was reſolved, that the number of acts ſhould be in a manner doubled, of thoſe under maſters of art, which was a great advancement to learning of all ſorts in the college.

About this time, ſir Arthur Chicheſter, afterward an Iriſh baron, was choſen to go Embaſſador into Germany, about the palatinate affairs, and Mr Preſton was by the duke of Buckingham and other friends, deſigned to go along with him: he did not greatly fancy the employment, but would not contradict; only it was conſidered, that though he was the prince his chaplain, and maſter of a college, yet he was not doctor, which they thought might ſound ill abroad, and reflect upon his maſter, and there was not time to go unto it, in the ordinary way of acts and exerciſes; therefore a mandate was addreſſed to the vice chancellor and heads, foraſmuch as Mr Preſton was to wait upon my lord embaſſador, and could not in ſo ſhort a time perform his acts, he ſhould be forthwith admitted doctor in divinity, that he might be ready to attend the ſervice, which was done accordingly with all alacrity.

Being therefore thus engaged, and not knowing what might befal him in the voyage, he reſolved to ſettle his temporal eſtate before he went. He was not willing to be accounted rich; would often ſay, manifeſtus theſaurus cito expenditur. And therefore though he had great incomes from his pupils, and was not prodigal, yet he was not maſter of his money; for he had been adviſed to adventure in the Eaſt-India company then newly ſet up, and becauſe eſtates there were inviſible, he was the willinger, but by that means wanted money; for there was paying for many years but no returns; yet there was hope it might at laſt come in, and ſo it did without diminution of the principal, but not in his lifetime. Therefore he thought it needful to make a legal diſpoſition of his eſtate by will, and ſo he did, and named a very honourable perſon his executor, who lived to enjoy that money as well as other by virtue of it. But the voyage came to nothing; for ſir Arthur did not go as he intended yet this was his laſt will, and according to it all was enjoyed, though he made additions by way of requeſt or direction, which were accordingly performed.

It was ever his ambition not to be mercenary in his miniſtry, but at liberty to preach where he might do moſt good, without relation or reſpect unto the wages; and he conſidered that the maſter of Emanuel could have no living that had cure of ſouls annexed, and therefore was willing to give ear unto the ſollicitations of the townſmen, who greatly preſt him to be their lecturer at Trinity church; for they had applied themſelves to Dr Andrews biſhop of Ely, and propounded to him Mr Jeffries, one of the fellows of Pembroke-hall; and he had given way, and Mr Jeffries did preach at Trinity ſome years, but was deſirous of a more ſettled condition, and had deſired Dr Preſton to procure him to be chaplain unto ſome nobleman that was like to help him to a living, which was a very eaſy thing for him to do, having ſo much intereſt in many great ones; ſo he pitched upon marquis Hamilton, who preſently admitted Mr Jeffries, chaplain to him, and ſhewed him much reſpect, as well for Dr Preſton's ſake, as for his own, and long it was not before a living fell, namely the rectory of Dunmow in Eſſex, which the marquis procured and beſtowed upon his chaplain Mr Jeffries; for he had not then commenced doctor, and by that means the lecture at Trinity was ſhortly to be void.

The townſmen made account that now they had what they deſired, namely an opportunity to ſettle Dr Preſton in the lecture at Trinity; and great care was taken to increaſe the ſtipend from forty or fifty pounds per annum unto fourſcore, that the doctor might have twenty pounds a quarter paid him; for they thought the former inconſiderable, not knowing what principles the doctor lived by; and when they had effected that, they employed ſome of the chief to propoſe the matter to the doctor very ſolemnly; who was eaſily perſuaded to accept their offer, without relation to the ſtipend; but there was one of the fellows of Sidney college, Mr Middlethwite, that put in for it, and though few or none of the contributors or townſmen ſided with him, yet he procured letters from the biſhop of Ely, and engaged all his friends, both in the court and univerſity, that it came unto a very great conteſt. Dr Preſton, who was offered any biſhoprick he would reſolve on, and told at Royſton by the duke of Buckingham, that the biſhoprick of Glouceſter was then void, contends with Mr Middlethwite, to be lecturer at Trinity church, for a ſtipend of fourſcore pounds per annum, as the upſhot of all his hopes, and fruit of all his great atchievements at the court; and the contention was ſo great on all ſides, that it could not be concluded by any mediation, but was referred to an hearing at Royſton before king James, who was againſt the doctor's preaching in the univerſity, the conſequence whereof he well ſaw, and was informed fully of. I confeſs, I often wondered why Mr Middelthwite, an eminent ſcholar, and like enough to get preferment, as afterwards it is known he did, ſhould ſtickle for ſo ſmall an opportunity to preach, againſt the inclination and diſpoſition of the townſmen: until I underſtood that he was ſet on by the prelatical heads, who told him, that it was a ſervice acceptable to the king, and he ſhould be rewarded for it. At the time appointed it came unto an hearing, and an argument was urged againſt the doctor, namely, that it was a lecture maintained by ſixpence, a thing unſeemly for a maſter of a college, and the prince his chaplain, but the duke had taken care that nothing ſhould be ordered and concluded againſt the doctor's mind; for the duke reſolved not to loſe him; ſo the meeting was diſſolved and nothing done; but that night, ſir Edward Cowvey, then ſecretary, invited Dr Preſton to ſupper, and after ſupper told him, that the king had ordered him to tell him, that if he would give over his purſuance of that lecture, and let the heads diſpoſe of it, he ſhould make his choice of any other preferment that was more honourable and profitable for him; but the doctor's end was to do good, not to get good; the king, to make him uſeleſs, and divide him from the puritans. The duke was more indifferent, who laboured in him to win and gratify the puritans, whoſe power in parliament was very formidable; therefore, when nothing elſe would content him, he was confirmed lecturer at Trinity church, the laſt preferment he ever had, where he preached after all his time, and did much good.

The duke had now obliged Dr Preſton, in the judgment and opinion of all the honeſt party, and much diſpleaſed the prelatical; and he ſaw apparently that king James approved not his ſiding with them, yet he was more expreſs than ever in his affections to him, and freeneſs with him. He had indeed a very happy and rare compoſure of ſweetneſs and ſolidity, would play and dally with the king as if he were a woman, and yet enquire, apprehend, and argue counſels and debates of ſtate, as if a Burleigh, or a Walſingham; ſaw clearly the affections of the king were fading, which the puritans (though never ſo much his friends) could not repair, and therefore eyed and adored the riſing ſun who now was grown, and fit for marriage but no preparatives to find a conſort for him. He knew the Spaniſh match was but a colour, and a treaty dandled between Briſtol and king James, to fool the prince off, and ſhut his ears againſt the French propoſals. This he diſcovers to the prince, tells him, kings did not love an heir apparent, how near ſoever; that the daughter of Spain was deſigned to a monaſtery, and kept for a reſerve unto the houſe of Auſtria; that in France there was a lady much before her: that if he pleaſed he would wait upon him into Spain in a diſguiſe, and take the French court in their way, and ſee that lady, and ſo diſcover Briſtol's, and his father's juggling. The prince reſents, and hugs this overture. They tell king James; the earl of Briſtol, and the Spaniſh miniſters abuſed him, that it was time to bring that treaty to ſome concluſion; deſire they might go into Spain and play the game out.

The king ſaw who had ploughed with his heifer, feared, as he was apt to do, a check mate; yet for the preſent urgeth only his affections to them both, and aſked them how he ſhould ſubſiſt ſo long without their companies? but they perſiſting, he ſigns a warrant with his own hand for Jack Smith and Tom Smith, with each of them a ſervant and their horſes, to go beyond ſea.

The duke was not unmindful of Dr Preſton, but leaves order with the dutcheſs and counteſs of Denbigh, to be careful for him: and Sir Ralph Freeman having a child to baptize, Dr Preſton is entreated for to preach, and the dutcheſs and counteſs were both goſſips, who ſhewed to the Dr very great reſpect, and gave him hopes of doing good; and ſome he did, for he procured, by their means, Mr Hilderſham's liberty, and reſtitution to his place at Aſhby de la zouch, and gave great hopes unto good miniſters of fairer times than had been formerly; only he would relate, with much regret, that he often found Dr Laud then biſhop of St Davids, with them, and therefore doubted of the iſſue and event.

The Dr ſaw, by the debates about the lecture, that he had enemies as well as friends at court; that the duke was mutable, as well as mortal; knew that the king abhorred that journey into Spain, and would remember it, if able. Dulcis inexperto, cultura potentis amici expertus metuit. And therefore, though now he were ſettled and aſſured in the univerſity, yet would not leave his lecture at Lincoln's inn; but being ſtill in London in the term time, about the college buſineſs, continued preacher at Lincoln's inn, and thought it might be a good reſerve, in caſe the naughty heads, or factions in the court, ſhould fall upon him; and it was well he did, for the prince and duke returned the next October, highly offended with the Spaniſh gravity, and both they, and all their train, did nothing but tell ſtories of the Spaniſh baſeneſs: ſo a parliament was called, and the duke cried up by all the godly party in the kingdom.

The Spaniſh agent at the court, had order from his maſter out of Spain, for to defy him, and proteſt againſt him at the council table, but ſeriouſly he could not have done him a greater courteſy, for the people univerſally did hate the Spaniard, and now the duke became the people's martyr. I have ſeen verſes made in his defence and commendation; and agents was preſently diſpatched into France to treat of that match. King James liked not this ſtuff, but the prince was able now to go alone, and eſpecially when he had the duke for one of his ſupporters: all things are fairly carried for religion, and the duke of Buckingham, the prince's and peoples favourite. The people ſeemed now to have the better, and the court affairs to decline and droop.

Dr Preſton, like another Mordecai, was very great, the prince his maſter, and the courtiers eyes upon him, becauſe they ſaw he came not thither for preferment, as all men elſe did. Piſoni in imperium adeptato nihil in vultu mutatum, quaſi magis imperare poſſet, quam vellet. His honours altered nothing in him, but gave encouragement to all the godly party; and his ſermons at Lincoln's inn much wrought upon the parliament, ſo that a bold petition was contrived and preſented to the king at Whitehall, from both houſes of parliament, April 25. 1624, againſt the ſpreading and increaſe of popery, and the indulgence given unto prieſts and Jeſuits. King James was in the evening of his glory; his party in the court under a cloud; another ſun almoſt in view, and the day ſtar already riſen; and accordingly he anſwered warily to their petition, bewails his want of information, as the real ground of this their trouble, which otherwiſe he had prevented; acknowleged that whilſt the treaties laſted with Spain and Auſtria, he was obliged to comply; but now both being broken off, he would be rigid and ſevere againſt the prieſts and Jeſuits; bids them find out a way for to reſtrain the growth of popery, and he would ſecond them; but reſolves to pay the duke of Buckingham for all this, and gives order to the earl of Briſtol to prepare an information for that end; but the match with France, and other intervenient accidents, obſtruct it for the preſent.

The duke having told tales out of ſchool, and broken off the match with Spain, was much obliged to further and promote the French, which he did ſeriouſly excuſe to Dr Preſton, upon this ground, that there was not any Proteſtant for to be had; and for to marry with a ſubject had always been unlucky and fatal to the kings of England; that the French would not be rigid in religious obſervations, but the Dr conſtantly oppoſed; only acknowleged this difference, that Spaniſh popery was an abſolute ingredient to their weſtern monarchy, but French was not ſo; and ſo this was leſs evil.

But the French found out this obligation, and were untractable, unleſs the duke would aid the king of France againſt the Rochellers: this was a hard chapter for one ſo much obliged unto the puritans and Dr Preſton, and he therefore declined all he could, but nothing elſe would ſerve, and he knew king James lay ready to take advantages; ſo in concluſion eight ſhips were granted to oppoſe the Rochel fleet, and many colours fought to cloud it and hide it from the world; but from that time Dr Preſton doubted of the ſainteſhip of the duke of Buckingham, whom otherwiſe he honoured and loved very much.

But it was high time for the duke to look about him; king James was not to learn now how to play his game, he was an old, but not a fooliſh king, Eccl. iv. 13. and therefore failed not to make proviſion, and lay rods in piſe, that he might uſe upon occaſion. Kings uſe for to account an ague in the ſpring their phyſic, yet phyſic till March be paſt is not good, but this ague antidates the months, and comes in February. The king was then at Theobalds, and the ague was made but ſmall account of. He feared death, but was the moſt impatient and diſordered of any living; what rules ſoever the phyſicians gave, he would obſerve none; which intemperance might very well occaſion the growing ſtrength and vigour of the diſeaſe, which howſoever more and more encreaſed, and at laſt began to be conſiderable; then he began to take advice, and to ſubmit to rules, but now it was too late; for March 27. 1625, on the Lord's day, in the morning, about ten o'clock, at Theobalds the king dies. Dr Preſton then attended in his month, and was ſometimes haſtened to the prince to comfort him, and ſometimes to the duke; and indeed it was a very mournful morning. Death is a very ſerious thing, and knocks alike at palaces as at the meaneſt meaneſt cottage. King James was very much beloved of all his ſervants; ſome of the huntſmen could not be gotten from him; the prince and duke were both of them retired, and wept exceedingly. But Sir Edward Conwey, and ſome of the lords, drew up a writing, and proclaimed Charles Stewart king, with all his titles; and haſte was made to pack away to London. The prince, duke, and Dr Preſton, in coaches ſhut down, haſten to Whitehall, and there he is proclaimed again with more formalities, and the lord mayor and the city ſent to, where it was done with much ſolemnity, and great rejoicing of the people; for the prince had that exceeding happineſs to come upon the ſtage unprejudiced; for he had never interpoſed nor acted but in the Spaniſh buſineſs, and that ſucceeded to his great advantage, ſo that if he liſted he might have been as popular as ever any were.

This fall occaſions many alterations in the court; the biſhops generally, and Dr Preſton's enemies, and all that had contended with the duke, were creſt fallen. King James was like enough to have out-lived the duke of Buckingham, who had been very ſick ſince his return from Spain, but all is altered, and the duke does all. But he had many things to do; the affronts received in Madrid, and at the council table by the agent, were to be ſent back by a puiſſant and mighty navy, and proviſions made accordingly; king James to be interred; a parliament to be ſummoned; the French lady to be ſent for, and brought into England, which the duke eſpecially intended, and ſpake to all the gallants of his retinue to attend him, and to many others of the gentry and nobility throughout the kingdom. But he found it hard thus in the morning of his affairs to be abroad, there being then a parliament, and the ſickneſs much encreaſing in the city, ſo he was conſtrained to employ the Earl of Holland, and attend himſelf at home.

All were not gratified in this great revolution and mutation of affairs, and the diſcontented party murmurred, and let fly at the duke, and (the ſickneſs much encreaſing) began to make a mutiny; and it was much deſired that the parliament might be prorogued till ſome other more healthful, and leſs dangerous time. But the navy againſt the Spaniards, and the preſſing wants of all ſorts that depended on the court, would not permit, ſo it was only adjourned to Oxford; yet there the ſickneſs was as ſoon as they, and ſome of their members ſmarted for it: but haſte was made to gratify the new king, and the proviſions for the navy went forward, many men engaged, and the king reſolved to attend that buſineſs, as admitting no delay.

There was one thing that invited Dr Preſton to a journey that year, and that was a ſtrong ſuſpicion that the plague was in the town, in which caſe there is a liberty to diſſolve the college, without any detriment unto the officers and members of it. He was not willing to omit the opportunity, becauſe he had many invitations into the weſt. The biſhop of Saliſbury he deſired to conſult with, about a book of Mr Montague's, that was commended to him by the duke of Buckingham, to peruſe and give his ſenſe upon it. Mr Shervil, the recorder of Saliſbury, was a bencher of Lincoln's inn, and a very good friend of his; he had divers friends at Dorcheſter, and was deſirous to be ſea ſick, and was ſtill enticed forward, and at laſt reſolved to wait upon the king and duke at Plymouth, whether they were gone to ſee the navy ſet ſail. Whilſt he was there, the Rochel fleet was broken by thoſe ſhips the king had, and Monſieur Sabeeza came into Falmouth with the remainder, and thence to Plymouth, with moſt lamentable outcries againſt the duke, who ſeemed to be very much affected with it, and made mighty promiſes of wonderful repairs, but Dr Preſton failed not to ſet that buſineſs home, he did believe the duke was over-ruled to lend them, and ſorry when he ſaw the ſad effects.

But whilſt the duke was thus detained in the weſt, the earl of Briſtol, and the lord keeper Williams, combined againſt him, and drew in many to their party, among others the earl of Pembroke, and divers great ones in the houſe of commons, and was ſo encouraged and heartened in it, that the earl of Briſtol, May 1. 1626, preferred in the houſe of Lords twelve articles againſt the duke of Buckingham, tending to prove, 'That the duke had promiſed unto the pope, and miniſters of Spain, to make the king a papiſt; and over-ruled him againſt the judgment of the earl of Briſtol, to write unto the pope with the title of Sanctiſſime Pater: that his carriage in the matters of religion was ſo offenſive, that he ſtuck not to kneel before the hoſt as often as he met it: that he was ſo licentious and unchaſte in his behaviour, that the Spaniſh miniſters reſolved not to have any thing to do with him: that when he could not bring about the match to his own peculiar advantage, he uſed means to obſtruct it, and break it off: that he had informed king James of all theſe things, who promiſed to hear him, and leave the offender unto juſtice, and that not many days before his ſickneſs.'

The duke had now reaſon to look about him, and was very able ſo to do; and firſt he labours to divide the party, by drawing off the earl of Pembroke, by promiſing his daughter to the earl of Montgomery's ſon, which afterward he did accompliſh: then he endeavoured to oblige the puritans, by gratifying Dr Preſton all the ways he could, and particularly in the buſineſs of the college ſuit, by depriving biſhop William's of the ſeal, and giving it to Sir Thomas Coventry, who was one of the college counſel; yea, he went ſo far as to nominate the doctor to the king to be lord-keeper, and the king was ſo firm to him, that the earl of Briſtol could do no good, and ſo withdrew his articles.

Dr Preſton's friends were neuter all this while, and looked on, neither engaged for him nor againſt him which was ſadly repreſented to the duke, by the biſhop's, and that party, who wondered he ſhould dote upon a man that either could not, or would not own him in his need; bade him conſider whether puritans were like to be his friends, whoſe ways were toto cœlo, different; and told him plainly he could not have them both. If he adherred to thoſe that ſought their ruin, they muſt adhere to ſuch as would ſupport them; ſo that the duke was in a great ſtrait, and knew not what to do.

Dr Preſton was alſo importuned to put it to an iſſue and if he would not leave the rotten and corrupted clergy then to leave him; and becauſe there had been informations of that book of Montague's, they propounded it might come to a debate, and not remain, as now it did, unſettled.

The doctor and the duke were both of them unwilling to an open breach, loved for to temporize and wait upon events: but Dr Preſton's friends would not be ſatisfied, but urged a conference, whereunto they were encouraged by ſome orthodox and very learned biſhops; and at laſt it was concluded by two religious noblemen that a conference there ſhould be, the biſhop of Rocheſter and Dr White, then dean of Carliſle, on the one ſide, and the biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield and Dr Preſton on the other. A day was ſet, a Saturday in Hillary term, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the place was York houſe, and Dr Preſton ſent to in the morning for to attend it. The noblemen came unto the biſhop's lodgings about two o'clock, and ſent for Dr Preſton to them, who gave many reaſons why he could not go, but they were reſolute, and taking the biſhop with them went without him; but the doctor conſidering, and fearing his abſence might betray the cauſe, and give encouragement unto the other ſide, went afterward himſelf unto the place, and ſat by as an hearer, ſilent, until all was done; but talking afterwards occaſionally of falling from grace, the biſhop ſhewed that a godly man might go far, and yet return, by the inſtance of the prodigal, Luke xv. But Dr White exclaimed againſt any that ſhould think the prodigal in acts of drunkenneſs and whoredom not to be fallen from grace, and urged that of the apoſtle, Rom. i. 32. 'That thoſe that do ſuch things are worthy of death;' that is, ſaid he, in a ſtate of everlaſting death, and therefore fallen from grace; ſo 1 Cor. vi. 9. 10 'ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God;' that is, are not ſons, for 'if ſons then heirs,' Rom. viii. 17.

But Dr Preſton anſwered, that theſe ſins made indeed a forfeiture of all their intereſt into the hands of God, and he might make the ſeizure if he pleaſed, but did not unto thoſe which were his children, and in covenant with him; as two tenants, by not paying of their rent, or keeping covenants, forfeited their leaſes, yet the lord might ſeize the one, and not the other, as he pleaſed. But the biſhop biſhop and the dean both cried out, this was the way to all licentiouſneſs and looſeneſs. To which the doctor anſwered, That the 'ſeed of God,' as the apoſtle calls it, 1 John iii. 9 remaining in the ſinning ſaint, or ſon, and would repair him; as in water there remains a principle of cold, even when it boileth over, that will undoubtedly reduce it when the heat and fire is removed, as in Peter, David, Sampſon, and others, was apparent, ſo that they could not run out into all licentiouſneſs; 'for the ſpirit luſted againſt the fleſh, that they cannot do the things they would,' Gal. v. 17. and though he did not diſinherit them, and blot their names out of the book of life, Phil. iv. 3. yet he might, and would withdraw his favour, imbitter all their comforts, Matth. xxvi. 75 raiſe trouble to them from their deareſt intereſts, 2 Sam. xii 11. fill them with anguiſh, Pſal. xxxviii 3. 4. which in reaſon will keep them from running out, ſeeing the evil is commenſurable unto that good of pleaſure or profit their ſin afforded; and, if need be, he can add unto it eternal apprehenſions, and make them feel the fierceneſs of his anger, Pſal lxxxviii. 6. 7 without any hope of being eaſed; and after this can reſtrain or with hold them, as he did Abimelech, Gen. xx. 6 For if one ceaſe to be a ſon becauſe he commits a ſin that doth deſerve eternal death, then every ſin a child of God commits, rends his relation or ſon-ſhip off; for every ſin deſerves eternal death, Rom. vi. 23. And becauſe in many things we offend all, Jam. iii. 2. we ſhould be always out of ſon ſhip, and have neither certainty nor comfort in our eſtate, unleſs he could give ſome good ground out of ſcripture, to aſſure what ſins put us out, and what did not.

The duke had ſent to Dr Preſton to decline this cloſhing conference, and aſſured him he was as much his friend as ever, and would not have ſtopt it if he could; but the biſhops had over-ruled it, which the doctor at the firſt believed and ſo was backward; but when he ſaw the confidence of Dr White and his companion, he doubted the ſincerity of that aſſurance, and was afterwards informed, that there had been a meeting at the counteſs of Denby's, and the duke had promiſed to leave him. This gave him reſolution and encouragement againſt the ſecond conference, which was managed in a manner by him alone, againſt Mr Montague and Dr White; for when the doctor ſaw the duke begun to double with him, he was leſs fearful to offend him. though the duke ſtill carried it with all the fairneſs he could, and appeared not in perſon.

When the time came for the ſecond conference, the doctor readily appeared and the firſt thing he charged Mr Montague with, was about his doctrine of traditions, which he affirmed he had delivered as groſſly and erroneouſly as any papiſt, Gag. p. 38. 39. 40. For he juſtified that place in Bazil, where he ſays, 'The doctrine retained in the church was delivered, partly by written inſtructions, partly by unwritten traditions, having both a like force unto piety;' which was ſo unlike to Bazil, and the opinion of thoſe times, that it was generally believed to be put in by the papiſts of latter times.

Mr Montague confeſſed, it was ſuſpected by ſome of the preciſer cut; but Dr Preſton told him, biſhop Bilſon was none of them, yet he did judge it ſuppoſititious; and it muſt be ſo, or Bazil acknowleged to be erroneous For he inſtanceth in praying towards the eaſt, and uſe of chriſm or oil in baptiſm; both which being rejected by the church of England, argues they held that place of Bazil not canonical.

Maſter Montague anſwered, that dogma there uſed by St. Bazil, might ſignifie a thing that ſeemed ſo, and ſo the ſenſe might be, that ſome things that ſeemed true, of leſs eſteem and conſequence, might be delivered by tradition, as long as matters more ſubſtantial were taken from the ſcripture. But Dr. Preſton ſhewed that dogma ſignified oftentimes doctrine, and was uſed here by Bazil for thoſe heads of doctrine that were more principal, and leſs expoſed, comparing them unto thoſe places in the temple, whereunto the people had no acceſs.

Mr Montague anſwered farther, that the aſſertion was hypothetical, that if a doctrine came from the ſame author, it was no great matter, whether it were by writing or word of mouth, for either had the ſame authority. But Dr. Preſton told him, Bazil was poſitive, and ſpake directly, and him he juſtified, and therefore could not be hypothetical, as he pretended.

It is a great ſtep unto victory for to divide, Paul ſaw the Phariſees againſt the Sadducees, Acts xxiii. 6, 7, 8. that he might ſave himſelf. The Jeſuites are ſo good at it that though they have but one to be their adverſary, they will endeavour to divide him from himſelf. by moving paſſion, or compaſſion, or ſome affection of his own againſt him. Dr White had openly in the commencement houſe, maintained that election is not ex prævisis operibus, and therefore Dr Preſton reſolved to pinch Mr Montague in that particular, that he might bereave him of his animating champion Dr White.

There were four ſeveral places that Dr Preſton had obſerved to make good this charge, the firſt which he produced, was Gag. pag 179. Some proteſtants hold that Peter was ſaved, becauſe God would have it ſo, without reſpect unto his faith and obedience; and Judas damned, becauſe God would have it ſo, without reſpect unto his ſin. And added, this is not the doctrine of the proteſtants, this is not the doctrine of the church, the church of England hath not taught it, doth not believe it, hath oppoſed it.

Now Dr White was very fierce and eager to engage, told him it was no doctrine of the church of England, but a private fancy of ſome, that Judas was condemned, without reſpect unto his ſin; 'For the wages of ſin is death,' Rom. vi. 23. 'The ſoul that ſinneth ſhall die,' Ezek. xviii. 4. But Dr Preſton anſwered he did not charge that upon Mr Montague, but the former part of the aſſertion, that Peter was not ſaved, without reſpect unto his believing and obedience, and ſo election ſhould not be abſolute, but grounded upon faith and works foreſeen. Then faith Dr White, I have nothing againſt that, but leave Mr Montague to anſwer for himſelf.

Dr Preſton was glad that he was eaſed of Dr White, and yet reſolved to make advantage of it, and therefore told Dr White, if he thought election was not ex fide Prævisa, he deſired to know whether ſaving grace were an affect, and fruit of election, or no? Dr White acknowleged readily it was; then ſaid Dr Preſton, whoſoever hath ſaving grace is elected. Now you know that an elect perſon, can never finally miſcarry, or fall away; therefore whoever hath true grace can never fall away. The old man ſaw the ſnare, and would have avoided it, by denying the conſequence, But the doctor urged, that whereſoever the effect is, there muſt be the cauſe. but ſaving grace is an effect of election This Dr White would have denied, but the hearers murmured that the effect could not be without the cauſe. as the day is not without the preſence of the ſun. Then Dr White anſwered, that ſaving grace was an effect indeed but a common effect. But Dr Preſton urged, that it was not more common than election; for all the elect had ſaving grace, (and none but they) and therefore they could never fall away. But this (ſaid he) is by the way, I will now apply myſelf to Mr Montague.

But when Mr Montague perceived that his great Goliah Dr White forſook him, he was greatly troubled, and cavilled at the words a while, but the book, adjudging it for Dr Preſton, he ſaid the church of England had not declared any thing againſt it. Dr Preſton alleged the ſeventeenth article, but told Mr Montague, that he affirmed the church of England did oppoſe it, and he deſired to know where.

But after one of the lords had whiſpered with Mr Montague, he confeſſed that for Arminius, he had never read him, and that he had written ſome things negligently in that book which he never thought ſhould thus be ſcanned among friends, and therefore promiſed to write another book in butter and honey, and therein more exactly for to acquit himſelf.

Some of the good lords propoſed, that in ſtead of this book which Mr Montague had promiſed to write, the ſynod of Dort might be received and eſtabliſhed as the doctrine of the church of England, ſeeing there was nothing there determined, but what our delegates approved. But Dr. White oppoſed this mainly; for (ſaid he) the church of England in her catechiſm teacheth to believe in God the

ſon, who redeemed me and all mankind, which that ſynod did deny.

Dr Preſton anſwered, that by redemption there, was only meant the freeing of mankind from that inevitable ruin, the ſin of Adam had involved them in, and making of them ſaveable upon conditions of another covenant, Joh. iii. 16, 17. ſo as now ſalvation was not impoſſible, as it was before the death of Chriſt, but might be offered unto any man, according to the tenor of that commiſſion, Mark xvi. 15, 16. Which could not be unto the devils, for they were left in that forlorn condition, whereinto their ſin and diſobedience put them, Heb. ii. 16. 2 Pet. ii. 4. that the jailor was a boiſterous bloody fellow, Acts xvi. 24, 27. yet Paul makes no doubt for to tell him, ver. 31. 'That if he believed on the Lord Jeſus, he ſhould be ſaved with his houſe.'

But Dr White in no ſort received this, but affirmed earneſtly, that Chriſt died for all alike in God's intention and decree, for Cain as well as Abel, for Saul as much as David, for Judas as much as Peter, for the reprobate and damned in hell, as well as for the elect and ſaints in heaven.

But Dr Preſton anſwered, that there was a ſpecial ſalvation afforded to believers, 1 Tim. iv. 10 that Chriſt was indeed a ranſom for all, 1 Tim. ii. 6. but the Saviour only of his body, Eph. v 23. that he redeems all, but called, juſtified and glorified whom he knew before, 'and had predeſtinated to be conform to the image of his ſon Rom. viii. 29. 30. that to whom in this ſenſe Chriſt was given, to them were given alſo 'all things appertaining unto life and godlineſs, 2 Pet. i. 3. as faith, 2 Pet i. 1. Phil. i. 29. Eph. ii. 8. repentance, Act. xi. 18. 2 Tim. ii. 25 a new heart, Exek. xxxvi. 26 his ſpirit, Gal. iv. 5. 6. So that nothing can be charged on them, but Jeſus Chriſt hath undertaken, and is engaged to diſcharge them Rom. viii. 21, 32, 33, 34. ſo that they can never periſh, nor be taken out of Chriſt's hand, Joh. x. 28. 29, 30. but as they are begotten again unto a 'lively hope,' 1 Pet. i. 3. ſo they are 'kept by the power of God through faith unto ſalvation, ver. 5. where as Judas was loſt, Joh. xvii. 12. and is gone 'to his own place,' Act. i. 25. and there are many nations and people of the world that have no outward offer made unto them in the goſpel, Pſal. cxxvii. 19, 20. Act. xvi. 6, 7. and thoſe that have it, have not hearts given them to underſtand it, and believe it. Deut. xxix. 2, 3, 4. Iſa. vi. 9. 10. Mat. xiii. 13, 14. 15 and therefore they are loſt, 2 Cor. iv. 3 4 and are damned, 2 Theſ. x. 11: 12 for he ſhewed that in Adam all men were loſt, Rom. v. 12. and none recovered but by Chriſt; therefore ſuch as had not Chriſt's interceſſion, could not recover; but Chriſt prayed not for ſome, John xvii 9. and therefore ſuch could not be ſaved. Heb. vii. 25.

Dr. White acknowleged that there was a difference; for though all had ſo much as by good improvement might ſerve their turn, yet the elect had more, for God abounded towards them, Eph. i. 8, 9. Rom. v. 15, 17, 20. As all the troop have horſes, but the officers have better. Both travellers have ſtaves to leap over the ditch, but the one a better and ſtronger than the other. The worſt had grace enough to keep corruption, and the renitency of their natures down; but the elect, ſuch as would do it eaſily; for Chriſt had taſted death for every man, Heb. 2. 9. and died for thoſe which yet might periſh, 1 Cor. 8. 11. and bought thoſe, that yet brought upon themſelves ſwift damnation, 2 Pet. 2. 1. becauſe they did not huſband and improve the favour offered to them.

Dr Preſton anſwered, That Chriſt was in himſelf ſufficient to ſave all, and might be ſaid to be provided for that end and uſe, as a medicine is to cure infected perſons, though it cure none actually, but thoſe that drink it, as Proſper, Habet in ſe quod omnibus proſit, ſed ſi non bibitur non medetur. As Job i. 5 11, 12. but many did not thus apply Chriſt, becauſe they had him not ſo offered and exhibited as others had Mat. 11. 21. Luke. 10. 13. for God gave ſome faith and repentance as we have ſhewed; as the ſerpent that Moſes was commanded for to make, was in it ſelf ſufficient to cure thoſe that were bitten, Numb. 21. 8, 9. yet cured none, but only thoſe that looked on it. So as Moſes lift up the 'ſerpent in the wilderneſs, ſo ſhall the Son of man be lift up, that whoſoever believeth in him ſhould not periſh, but have life everlaſting,' Job. 3. 14, 15.

But Doctor White urged that place Iſa. 5 4. that God had done all he could, but they neglected and rejected the counſel of God againſt themſelves,' Luke. 7 30.

Dr. Preſton anſwered, that God had done all that they could challenge of him, for he had given them in Adam power, Eccl. vii. 29. and propoſed another way of mercy in a mediator, and therefore he appeals to every one that was indifferent, Iſa. v. 3 but this was not Iſrael. he 'dealt not ſo with other nations,' Pſal. cxlix. 20. Beſide he had done what he could, without reverſing and reſcinding his decree, John xii. 38 39 40 for otherwiſe he could have given them the ſame ſpirit of faith 2 Cor. iv. 13. the like gift that he gave to others who believed on the Lord Jeſus, Acts xi. 17. could have wrought in them both 'to will and to do' according to his good pleaſure, Phil ii. 13. could have healed them as he had promiſed, Iſa. lvii. 18. and as he did perſecuting Saul, 1 Tim. i. 6. But God had other ends, Rom. ix. 17, and attributes, Rom. ix. 22. which he was willing to diſcover, Prov. xvi. 4.

But Dr White aſked, how then he could require faith and repentance, Mark i. 15 Acts xvii. 30. which was all one, as if he ſhould require one to give his judgment and opinion of a colour that had his eyes ſhut, and then ſhut his eyes as faſt as he could.

Dr Preſton anſwered that he might do it to ſhew and diſcover our impotency, as we bid our little children riſe, that by their own fault fell, that we may let them know their inability, and be the more beholden unto us to help them up, as Mark xi. 23, 24 and becauſe the call and command of Chriſt is the vehiculum and conduit pipe of ſtrength and power, Acts xiv 10 John v. 6. 9. as Lazarus, John xi. 43. 44. Thus God by bidding and commanding men to take grace, does thereby fit them and enable them to do it, as that cripple, Acts iii 6, 7 8. was by the command inabled; ſo Saul Acts xxii. 13. being commanded to receive his ſight, was inabled the ſame moment to look upon him and ſo ver. 16. being commanded to 'waſh away his ſins,' had the blood of Chriſt provided ready for to do it. So theſe commands are not like thoſe the apoſtle ſpeaks of, Jam. ii. 16. for here is ſomething given: when God bids, he doth not, verba dare, ſed rem.

But it was further urged by the doctor, that God had no pleaſure in the death of wicked men, Ezek. xxxiii. 11. but that he would 'rather they ſhould repent' and leave their ſins, Ezek. xviii. 23. and ver. 32. if therefore God were not ready to the utmoſt of his power to give them grace, he could not be excuſed from diſſembling and double dealing.

But Dr Preſton anſwered, that ſuperiors may command unable perſons for many reaſons, but cannot be ſaid for to diſſemble, unleſs they refuſe to give, when the required condition is performed. And if I bid one come unto me, and I will give him ſix pence, if I refuſe when he is come I did diſſemble; but if he comes not, he cannot charge me; for their not coming may be for want of will, John v. 40. as well as for want of power, John vi. 44. Now if I know a cripple will not come, tho' he could, I may puniſh him for it. It's true, God delights in nothing but himſelf, his joy and comfort is terminated only in himſelf, not in the creature, but as ſome way ſerved and repreſented by it; for God 'made all things for himſelf,' Prov. xvi. 4. yea for his 'pleaſure,' Rev. iv. 11. That is, the exerciſe and illuſtration of ſome one of his attributes; as his 'power', Exod. xi. 16. Rom. ix. 17. his 'wrath', Rom. ix. 22. Never did ſtrong man glory of his ſtrength more than God doth of his ſovereignty and omnipotency, Job 40. 9. 10. 11, 12, 13. Now, if it fall out, that in the illuſtration and exerciſe of theſe his glorious attributes and excellencies, ſome creatures ſmart, yet he delights not in their ſmart and ſufferings, but in the demonſtration of his own omnipotency. Ahaſuerus makes a feaſt to all the ſtates and orders of his kingdom, to ſhew the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honour of his excellent majeſty, Eſt. i. 3. 4. This was not done without the ſmart and ſuffering of many of the creatures, yet he delights not in their ſufferings, but in his own magnificence and bounty. When Chriſt was at the feaſt, John ii. 1, 2. he doth not condole the death of all thoſe innocents that went to make it up; Qui fruitur pœna, ferus eſt: but rejoiced in the good cheer, and good will of the friend that bade him.

There were few preſent of Dr Preſton's friends, and accordingly this conference was repreſented and reported with all the diſadvantage that could be to him; inſomuch, that many parliament men that were his friends, were much offended at it; which occaſioned him as ſoon as he came to Cambridge, to write the ſeveral paſſages, and ſend them to thoſe friends that were unſatisfied. But it was an evidence, that the duke and Dr Preſton were not ſo great, but that he ſticked to the prelates, and would in the iſſue leave Dr Preſton and the puritans, which much abated good mens affections to the duke; and it was believed, that he had no ſuch footing in the king's affections, as he did pretend unto: Poſtea Mæcenas ſpeciem potius, quam vim tenuit in amicitia principis. They thought his greatneſs began to languiſh; and it was believed in the univerſity, that there was another favourite in being, though yet obſcure; for the earl of Suffolk much about this time died, who had been a long time chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, and great means was uſed to ſet the duke up for to ſucceed him; but good men were fallen off becauſe of his deſerting Dr Preſton, and others did believe his glory was departed; and ſo the earl of Berkſhire, the former chancellor's ſecond ſon, was ſet up againſt the duke, and many viſited for him that loved greatneſs, and were ſervants good enough unto the times; and it is believed, it had been carried for him againſt the duke, if the wiſdom of Dr Goſſing, then vice chancellor, and ſome others in the ſcrutiny had not prevented it; but it was pronounced for the duke, and great care was taken for the inveſting of him in a very ſolemn manner. A repreſentative of the univerſity is deſigned to attend him at York houſe in their habits, and a ſumptuous feaſt provided for their entertainment; the duke ſat in the midſt of the table among the doctors, where, by ſome body, there was an health begun unto the king. When it came to Dr Preſton for to pledge it, he was uncovered and bowed as others had done, but drank but very little, and ſo delivered it unto the next; but one of the doctors took notice, that he drank not all, and told him, he had ſeen him drink as great a glaſs of wine, and did believe he could have drunk this if he would, but that he loved to be ſingular. The doctor acknowleged he was not ſkilful in the laws of drinking healths, and therefore if he had offended, he deſired it might be imputed to his ignorance; but he thought the end was to ſhew reſpect unto the perſons named, which was done beſt by the ceremonies that preceded, as being bare, ſtanding up, and ſuch like; wherein (he ſaid) he had not willingly offended; but if it were an engine to court intemperance, and to engage men unto greater quantities than themſelves liked, it fell ſhort of that modeſty and freedom of the Heathens. Eſth. i. 8. and was a ſin in all, but of men of their degree and rank an abominable wickedneſs.

The duke miſliked this incivility, and frowned on the doctor that occaſioned it; but it was believed it could not have been done, without aſſurance that the duke's affections were ebbing towards Dr Preſton. And no wonder; for his end being to make impreſſions of good upon the court, he could not but ſee, if they did not ſucceed, they would recoil. If you manure and ſow your land, if the ſeeds ſubdues it not, and conquers it not, it is enabled to bring forth the ſtronger weeds, Heb. vi. 7, 8. If your pearls be caſt before ſwine, they will alſo turn again and rend you, Matth. vii. 6. The duke had now ſeen the worth and way of Dr Preſton; he had found that he could not win him, and make him his, he could not therefore in the way of policy, but labour and reſolve to wrack and ſink him. When Herod was convented by prevailing conquering Auguſtus, for his great aſſiſtance of Mark Anthony his adverſary, and knew it would be in Auguſtus power to take his head off, he ſettled his affairs, but gave peremptory order that his beloved Mariamne ſhould be put to death; for this only reaſon, becauſe another ſhould not enjoy ſo great a beauty. So the duke would not another ſhould enjoy the great abilities of Dr Preſton, but was reſolved to break him if he could; yet in a civil court way.

But the doctor was too knowing not to ſee thus far off, Prov. xxii. 3. Quæ alii levia faciunt, diu patiendo; ea ſapiens, diu cogitando: and had accordingly provided a ſucceſſion of reſerves wherein to hide himſelf. The firſt and ſureſt was his conſcience, 2 Cor. i. 12. 'This is our rejoicing, the teſtimony of our conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our converſation in the world.' If a man be welcome into his conſcience, he need not fear the ſtorms and bluſters that he meets abroad. Ire te recedas, cum cogeris in turba eſſe. When a man is forced to be where he would not, as Peter was foretold he ſhould be, John xxi. 18. yet he may in deſpite of them retire into himſelf. Paul made it his buſineſs to have his 'conſcience always void of offence,' Acts xxiv. 16. and ſo did Dr Preſton; for though his actings, being many of them above the common ſize, were not always underſtood, and very often miſinterpreted, yet he was innocent and upright always in them. An undeniable argument whereof was, that he never ſued for the leaſt preferment, as we have ſaid, but ſtudied, and often conſulted, how without breaking he might avoid them.

And though he lived like himſelf, and gave relief to others, yet it was ever of his own, as very many yet alive can witneſs. And indeed, he was a man of very much communion and ſweet ſociety with God; prayed much in private, and by himſelf, beſides as tutor with his pupils, and after, as maſter in his family. Whatever weakneſs he was in, or buſineſs did occur, kept many private days of faſting by himſelf, eſpecially before the ſacraments and Sabbath days; and, accordingly enjoyed a conſtant clearneſs and aſſurance of his juſtification, and intereſt in the blood of Chriſt; even then, when frailties and infirmities did moſt of all afflict and wound him. He never (that I know) was troubled or perplexed about adoption, though very often about the imperfection of his graces, and the unconſtancy of ſanctification; ſo as he ſtudied moſt exactly that treatiſe of the ſaints infirmities, and there is nothing in all his works that may more properly be called his.

His next retreat was to Lincoln's Inn; for now he ſaid, the duke was chancellor, and would endeavour to ingratiate himſelf, and be a benefactor; and had brought Lopinius' manuſcripts, and did verily intend to found a library; and ſo it would be eaſy, and in his power, to our hired the college and univerſity. For there was a reſolution in ſome of the fellows, to petition the duke without him, and to annul the ſtatute of continuance or commoration in the college; yet he conceived the lawyers would prevail a kind of freedom and exemption. For he ſaw, when that holy bleſſed Dr Sibbs was outed, both of fellowſhip and lecture in the univerſity, yet by the goodneſs and prudence of ſir Henry Yelverton, that conſtant patron unto godly miniſters, (a virtue yet running in the veins of his poſterity), he was received and retained at Gray's-Inn, unto his death; therefore he would in no ſort leave his title unto, and intereſt in Lincoln's-Inn, but reſerved it in his power unto his dying day.

But he knew kings had long hands, and that the duke's were nothing ſhorter; and that Lincoln's-Inn, though a great deal ſtronger and better built than Gray's Inn, yet would not hold out long, in caſe the duke ſhould ſeriouſly belaguer it; therefore he pondered of removing farther off if need were. And having weighed all retreats, reſolved upon Baſil in the Switzer's country, as a place which the kings had ſeldom touched, even when it was a receptacle of their greateſt enemies; and therefore he reſolved, in caſe he could not be free in England to ſend there, and ſpend the reſidue of his ſurviving days, in writing what he was not ſuffered to preach, or had not publiſhed according to his mind.

He was naturally very affable and courteous unto ſtrangers of every country, and by converſing much with them, endeavoured to preſerve his knowlege in the French and Italian languages. But, after he had thus reſolved upon Baſil, he was very friendly to all the Germans, that were diſperſed from ſeveral univerſities, eſpecially from from the Palatinate; for whom he procured ſeveral ſorts of entertainments, both in the country abroad, and in the univerſity; for which, as he had very many gratulatory epiſtles from particular perſons, ſo one of note from the king of Bohemia, under his hand and ſeal.

But he knew that theſe were but the foxes earths, that might ſucceſſively be taken and poſſeſſed. He therefore alſo thought upon that unum magnum of the cat, or rather of the Holy Ghoſt, Prov. xviii. 10. the name of the Lord, that is, the goodneſs, mercy, power of the mighty God, where he was well aſſured, he ſhould for ever be free enough from the kings and dukes. Yet theſe did no way retard his induſtry in uſing means. Obſtructions quicken induſtrious and active minds, but damp and clog the dull. There is a ſtateſman of no mean eſteem, that writes profeſſedly againſt the uſe of citadels and forts, becauſe it makes the ſoldier leſs reſolved in engagements. And the Spartans were forbidden to wall their city, becauſe it would encourage cowardice. But it did not take off Dr Preſton from his duty. For finding that his ſtanding at court was undermined, he reſolved upon buttreſſes to underprop him in the country.

There was in the county of Northampton a gentleman of very able parts, and clear affections to the public good, no ſtranger to the court in former times, nor to the duke of Buckingham, with whom the doctor uſed to communicate affairs, and who was then a parliament man of much eſteem; to him the doctor, in a letter, diſcovers all, ſhews him the hopeleſs poſture of the duke, how much they were both diſappointed in him; lays ſome directions what to do, and urgeth activeneſs. This letter, by a ſad miſfortune, was let fall, by him that was intruſted to convey it, about Temple bar, and handed from one to one, until it came to Sir Henry Spillers; who having viewed, and pondered the contents, concluded it was a purchaſe that would ingratiate him unto the duke, and ſo immediately preſents it to him.

The duke was troubled to read his faults and fate ſo ſtrongly intimated and preſaged. His temper was exceeding good, and he could manage his affections many times, with much ſerenity and moderation; but now he was quite off, and could not think of any thing but a revenge. I have not known any thing ſo trouble and afflict the doctor as this did, that the duke ſhould have his hand againſt him, and that he had involved ſo good a man to whom he wrote.

But it pleaſed God to cut the duke out other work, for the cry of Rochel, and the proteſtants of France, was ſo exceeding great, and ſo much reſented by the parliament, that the duke reſolves to vindicate his honour by relieving them. And whilſt he was buſy to ſet that fleet out, and furniſh forces for ſurprizing the iſle of Rhees, he could not undertake that work of revenge intended againſt Dr Preſton. But the doctor thought not that he had done enough, unleſs he proclaimed in the pulpit what he had often told the duke in private; according to that command of Chriſt, Matth. vi. 27. 'What I tell you in darkneſs, that ſpeak you in light; and what you hear in the ear, that preach on the houſe tops.' As Chryſoſtome ſaid to his people; Cum verum ſinguli audire non vultis, publice auditis.

When the French match was concluded, he preached that ſermon of the pillar and ground of truth, againſt the mingling of religions, and mixing truth with falſehood; and ſhewed how impoſſible it was to mingle truth with error, or make up one religion out of theirs and ours. For, ſhould they leave out any tenet of their church, it would follow, that the church in that before had erred; and ſo that pillar would be overthrown, on which have hanged ſo many neceſſary points of popery. Neither could we put with any one truth, for religion is of a brittle nature, break it you may, bend it you cannot. It cannot be accommodated to reſpects of policy, and intereſts of ſtates and kingdoms; but as elements, when mingled in a compound body, do loſe their proper forms; ſo religions, when made ingredients, and compounding parts of any other, do loſe their forms, and ceaſe to be religions in God's account, 2 Kings xvii. 33. 34. Pillar and ground, p. 16.

And when the Rochellers were in diſtreſs, and laid their ruin and diſaſters at our door, fathered their loſſes and calamities on us, he preached that ſermon of the new life, where (p. 48) we have theſe words: 'We cannot ſtand alone; what meaſure we mete to others in their diſtreſs, men ſhall meaſure the ſame to us in our neceſſity, Luke vi. 38. And how ſoon alſo the fire may take here we know not.' And p. 52. 'If any be an impediment, nay, if any do not do their beſt, I pronounce this in the name of the moſt true God, that ſhall make it good ſooner or latter, that they and their houſes ſhall periſh.' Eſth. iv. 14. The court was hoodwink'd in all theſe comminations; for by church, they underſtood the prelates and their party; and the king thought if he adhered to them, and did their work, he was abſolved. But thoſe that read the commentaries that have been written ſince in red letters, will have occaſion to believe the contrary.

And when the duke was in the iſle of Rhees, in which voyage he had engaged many of his very good friends, and much of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom, the doctor preached that ſermon, called the demonſtration of the Deity, where (p. 81.) ye have theſe words; 'It is certain that evil is intended againſt us, and will come upon us, except ſomething be done for to prevent it; for there is a covenant between God and us, and breach of covenant cauſeth a quarrel; now the quarrel of God ſhall not go unrevenged, Lev. xxvi. 25. 'I will ſend a ſword upon you, which ſhall avenge the quarrel of my covenant.' God's quarrels are not raſh and paſſionate as mens are; and therefore he will not lay them aſide without ſome true and real ſatisfaction. If we will not believe his word, yet will we not believe his actions: are not our allies waſted? are not many branches of the church cut off already, and more in hazard? In a word, have not our enterprizes been blaſted and withered under our hands for the moſt part? Have not things been long going down the hill, and are even now haſtening to a period?' This ſermon was preached to the king at Whitehall, on the Lord's day, and on the Wedneſday following the news came of the total routing of our army in the iſle of Rhees, which was ſuch a ratification of his prediction, but the Sabbath day before, as made many to believe he was a prophet; and they called him Micaiah, becauſe he ſeldom propheſied good unto them. And Dr Neal, then biſhop of Winchester, ſaid, That he talked like one that was familiar with God almighty. And they were the more affected with it, becauſe the doctor had another courſe to preach before his month was out, (for every chaplain was to preach twice, once upon the Lord's day, and alſo upon the Tueſday;) but the doctor was deſirous to exchange his courſe upon the Tueſday for a Sabbath day; ſo Dr Potter preached on the Tueſday, and Dr Preſton was to preach upon the Lord's day following, and was reſolved to proceed on the ſame text, but to handle a point relating to the third verſe. For having ſhewed in this ſermon that things were not done by chance, but by God, he now reſolved for to ſhew, that God did things that men do not look for; which being known among the biſhops, and they affrighted with that diſaſter at the iſle of Rhees, they interceded with the clerk of the cloſet, that ſeeing Dr Preſton's turn was paſt already, and this was Dr Potter's, another might be put up, and he deferred till another time; which was conſented and yielded to: and ſo, upon the Friday before, a meſſenger was ſent unto the doctor, to tell him that another was provided to preach for Dr Potter, and he might ſpare his pains. The doctor wondered at the providence; for he was reſolved fully to have ſaid that in that ſermon, if he had been ſuffered, that would in reaſon have deſerved Micaiah's entertainment, 1 Kings xxii. 27. But God was merciful unto him, and uſed his enemies as inſtruments to ſave him from the danger. It would have damped ſome men to be thus refuſed. He might have ſaid with him, Matth. xxii. 4. 'Behold, I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and fatlings are killed, and all things are ready.' But he conſidered what he had preached before, 'That a ſparrow fell not to the ground without God's will. That his will and reſolution for to ſacrifice his all was now accepted, as Abraham's was; that his ſermon, whilſt an embryo, and only in intention, had an efficacious operation upon the auditory: for as they had ſhewed and diſcovered their fears, ſo good men did their joys; and the ſermon was more talked of at court and in the city, than any ſermon that ever he had preached before. For all men enquired what the ſermon was that Dr Preſton was not ſuffered to preach; and many wiſe men were perſuaded, that it did more good than it would have done, in caſe it had been preached. So that inſtead of being damped and dejected at the affront, he was enlivened and encouraged: Repulſus generoſo excitat iram. languido triſtitiam. I never knew him come from the court more ſatisfied than he did this time, nor more encouraged in his miniſtry at Cambridge, for he was then upon thoſe ſermons of the attributes, that ſince are printed, and God was greatly with him in them.

Thoſe fellows at Emmanuel, that had been active in making of him maſter there, were much diſſatisfied, becauſe the doctor never would conſent to the annulling of that ſtatute, De mora ſociorum in colligio; for he was convinced, that the founder had added it upon very weighty grounds, and he ſaw it was a means to make the fellows preach, and look abroad, and leſs intend the actings of the maſter; that young ſcholars were heartened in their ſtudies, with hopes that there would be preferments ready for them. And it was ordinary among the ſcholars, to obſerve how long ſome fellows were to ſtay. Therefore obſerving theſe affronts at court, they petitioned the king, that that ſtatute might be abrogated. The duke was glad of this occaſion to be revenged upon his old friend Dr Preſton, and did embrace it with all alacrity. Commiſſions were diſpatched for to hear and conſider their allegations, and many meetings and debates were had about it; in which it was acknowleged it was a ſtatute of equal power and validity with the reſt, though added three years after: and upon that, one of the fellows that had petitioned fell off The doctor uſed all his friends for to ſupport and keep in power and effect this ſtatute and found many very forward to aſſiſt him it; but above all, a very noble grandchild of the founder's, yet living, did much encourage and enable the defence; for though a courtier, and much obliged, yet adventured, and waved all his intereſt, rather than he would behold his grandfather's pious and prudent care ſo overthrown So a temper was at laſt agreed on, that it ſhould be ſuſpended from effects in law, until ſix livings of an 100 l. per annum, ſhould be annexed to the college.

The ſoul is the undoubted ſovereign of the body, and hath therein deſpoticum imperium an abſolute and uncontrouled juriſdiction; and in caſe of injury or over-burdening, there is no action lies. But ſouls ſhould conſider, ſoft and fair goes far: Qui vult regnare diu, languida regnat manu. It was Hooſon that told the ſcholars they would come time enough to London, if they did not ride too faſt. It was incurable in this good man to over-ride himſelf. for the body is pars compoſiti, when it is tired we cannot take a new one at the next ſtage, as we do horſes; but he thought all was one: ſome lived as much in ſeven years, as others did in ſeventy. Non diu vixit, ſed diu fuit, was his opinion of many men; That our life is like to iron, that will conſume with ruſt as much as employment. Vita ſicut ferrum, exerceat, vel pereat. Theſe were his principles, and his actings were according; the moſt unmerciful unto his fleſh of any living. And it is true, that not time, but actions ſhould be the met wand of all men's lives: Non annos meos ſed victorias numero; Not how long I have lived, but how? Yet God doth uſually allow his deareſt ſervants time to do their work in. Moſes 120 years of age, Deut xxxiv. 7. David an old man before he dies, 1 Chron xxix 28. Paul aged, Phil. ix. notwithſtanding all his labours and activity. But the doctor had a ſhorter period put unto his days; all mens is ſet, Job vii. 1. his was ſhort. It was no diſparagement to good Joſiah to die about the doctor's age, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 1. Our glorious king Edward, that ſcarce outlived his minority, out ſtripped, nowithſtanding, all his longeſt living predeceſſors in doing good. God that ſet his time, haſtened his ſervice. and ſo he did the doctor's. His preaching and ſtudying labours were exceeding great; but that which ſpent and wore him, was his care and trouble for the church's ſafety and proſperity; often he would inculcate that, 2 Cor. 11. 28. 'That which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.'

When his body therefore began to be ſick and languiſh, he was content a little to abate and take off, and thought a country houſe in ſome good air might help, as formerly it had done; and accordingly took one at Linton, near the hills, about ſix miles off, which he furniſhed, and purpoſed to be in all the week, and come on Saturdays to preach upon the Lord's days; and had this courſe been taken time enough, much might have been. But now he feared ſolicitude would be changed into ſolitude, the air of ſuitable converſe, he doubted, would be wanting there; and being alone, he ſaw, would too much gratify his melancholy. The ſpring therefore approaching he was willing to conſult with ſome phyſicians; and London being far off, he ſent to Bury for Dr Deſpotine. His preſent malady was want of reſt, which now tobacco would not help him to, as formerly it had done; and therefore he propoſed letting blood. The doctor plainly told him that might perhaps allay his heats, and purchaſe ſleep; but if he were within the verge of a conſumption. it would be fatal to him. He was inticed, notwithſtanding, with the deceitful hopes of preſent eaſe, and ſo was let blood, but never lived to repair that loſs. For ſinking more and more, he went to London, and took advice of thoſe that were beſt acquainted with his ſtate of health; by their advice he retired a little unto Newington, unto a loving friend of his that lived there, and then to Hartfordſhire, unto a thiner and more penetrating air. The malady they all agreed, was in his lungs, which were not ulcerated neither, but obſtructed, and oppreſt with ſtiff and clammy matter, that he could not void, and perſpiration was what he wanted, and they ſuppoſed a penetrating air might do the cure: but that was found too ſearching and corroſive for the other parts, which were pervious enough and penetrable. He therefore thought upon Northamptonſhire, his native country, which would in reaſon be moſt propitious unto him. However he would leave his breath where firſt he found it, and thankfully return what had been ſerviceable now a long time to him.

He had at Preſton, four miles from Heyford, a very dear and boſom friend, that was ambitious of entertaining good men; old Mr Dod was but a mile off, and being ſeriouſly invited thither, he pitched upon it, where he enjoyed great contentment, what air, converſe of friends, and loving entertainment could afford, and at the firſt was much refreſhed by it; but nature being ſpent, and no foundation being left to work upon, all his refreſhing quickly flagged.

He had before made uſe of Dr Aſhworth, and he was one of much experience, and knew his body well; therefore he thinks of riding over unto Oxford to him, which he did: and there continued about twelve days, and conſulted with ſuch as were there of any note. Men die and periſh when their time is come, as well errore medici, ut vi morbi. Dr Aſhworth was perſuaded that the ſcorbute was his diſeaſe, and that the London doctors had all miſtook their mark, and therefore pitched upon applications ſuitable: a great error for ſo experienced and grave a doctor. Deſire of reſtitution into a ſtate of health, made ſhift to flatter him into the belief it was ſo. The old man upon this perſuaſion comes over unto Preſton with him, ſteeps and ſtrains ſcurvy-graſs, and gives him drenches able to have weakened a ſtronger man than he was now: and having ſtayed and tampered with him about three weeks, and finding nothing anſwer his expectation. he takes his laſt leave of him, giving ſuch order and direction as he thought good; and ſo leaves him, and returns to Oxford, July 9 1628.

When this dream and fancy of the ſcorbute failed, and Dr Aſhworth was gone, he reſigned up himſelf to God alone, and let all care of phyſic and the doctors go. He had a ſervant who had been laborious with him, and whom he often uſed as a friend; he would ſay, Servi ſunt humiles amici, which was very true of him. To him he therefore now unboſomed himſelf, not only touching the vanity and emptineſs of all things here below, but his own belief and expectation of a ſudden change; not of my company, ſaith he, for I ſhall ſtill converſe with God and ſaints, but of my place and way of doing it. His will was made (as we have ſaid) ſome years before, but he was doubtful if it came to proving, it might be baffled and affronted, and therefore purpoſed to wave it, and make a deed of gift to him that was in that will his executor, with ſuch reſtrictions and limitations as he thought good, all which he ſet down with his own hand; wherein he carefully provided for his mother during life, and both his brothers.

His books and all the furniture and goods belonging to and in his lodgings at Emmanuel college, he gave one of his pupils that was fellow there, whom he always greatly favoured. Some exhibitions he gave ſcholars there to be diſpoſed of from time to time by him that was executor. And as he truly valued, ſo he liberally rewarded his ſervant's faithfulneſs, who liveth yet in very good condition and reputation; of whom is verified what is ſaid, Prov. xxvii. 18. 'Whoſo keepeth the fig tree ſhall eat the fruit thereof; ſo he that waiteth on his maſter ſhall ſurely come to honour.'

And having thus diſcumbered himſelf of worldly cares he took care for the places he now poſſeſſed, prayed for the college that it might continue a flouriſhing nurſery of religion and learning, told thoſe about him, as David before his death, 1 Chron. xxix. 2, 3 &c. what he had done towards that goodly building ſince erected, and what care he had taken to get thoſe rectories in the king's letter mentioned, whereof we ſpake before; prayed God to furniſh Lincoln's inn, from time to time with able preaching miniſters, and ſo the lecture at Cambridge, that had coſt ſo much trouble in the procuring. Then for his ſermons, that they might not come into the world like vagabonds; but ſeeing the father lived not to ſee them ſettled and provided for, thoſe would be careful whom then he named, and is long ſince intimated upon occaſion. In all which great things God hath ſo anſwered him, as I think no man was ſince Eliſha. 2 Kings ii 9, 10.

The night before he died being Saturday, he went to bed, and lay about three hours deſirous to ſleep, but ſlept not; then ſaid, 'My diſſolution is at hand, let me go to my home, and to Jeſus Chriſt, who hath bought me with his precious blood.' And ſo lay ſtill, as in a ſlumber, till about two o'clock in the morning; then drinking, and reſting on his ſervant's arms, he fell into a cold and clammy ſweat, which he told them was the meſſenger of death, and ſo continued for about two hours very ſilent. About four o'clock he ſaid, I feel death coming to my heart, my pain ſhall now be quickly turned into joy; and ſo his friends were call'd that were preſent in the houſe, who ſpake unto him, but had no anſwer from him, as they were uſed to have. They kneeled all down, and a reverend divine there preſent prayed. When prayer was ended, he looked on them, and (turning away his head) gave up the ghoſt.

It was about five o'clock on the Lord's day, but to him an everlaſting Sabbath. He never (by his good will) reſted that day, ſince God was truly known unto him till now; God gave him therefore now an everlaſting reſt. No man deſerved better funeral ſolemnities; but Mr Dod was much againſt it; and his friends at Cambridge, who did highly honour him, and deſired nothing more than to have waited on his duſt unto its long home, were now obliged to attend the election of another maſter, that they durſt not ſo much as make it known, or do any thing from which it might be gathered. So he was buried decently but without ſtate, in Fawſley church, in the county of Northampton. Old Mr Dod, the miniſter of that place, preached, and a world of godly people came together July 20. 1628. being within a little of forty-one years of age.

Dr Preſton, juſt before his death, aſked what day it was? and being anſwered that it was Sabbath-day; a fit day, ſaid he, to be ſacrificed on. I have accompanied ſaints on earth, and now I ſhall accompany angels in heaven. Alſo, Mrs Chaderton telling him of his preaching ſo profoundly on God's attributes, he anſwered; If it ſhall pleaſe God to prolong my life, I will make all ſo plain, that every one ſhall be able to underſtand it.

NUMB. 12.

The Life of Mr ARTHUR HILDERSAM, who died Anno Chriſti 1631.

ARTHUR HILDERSAM was born at Stetchworth, near New-market in Cambridgeſhire, October 6. 1564: he was ſon of Thomas Hilderſam of the ſaid town, (a gentleman of an antient family) and Anne Poole, his ſecond wife daughter to Sir Jeffery Poole, fourth ſon to Sir Richard Poole, (who was couſin german to king Henry VII.) and Margaret counteſs of Saliſbury that was daughter to George duke of Clarence, the ſecond brother to king Edward IV. and Iſabel the eldeſt daughter and coheir of Richard the great earl of Warwick and Saliſbury. Thus much for his birth.

For his education: In his childhood he was brought up in the popiſh manner, taught to ſay his prayers in Latin; both his parents, and their kindred, eſpecially his mother, being zealous papiſts. When he was to be ſent abroad to ſchool, his father's aim was only to ſend him to a good ſchool, where many gentlemen's ſons were taught; but God ſo ordered it, by his good providence, that his father, unawares placed him at Saffron Walden ſchool in Eſſex, with one Mr Doſborough, a godly man, and a religious proteſtant, who taking great affection to him for his wit and diſpoſition, was very careful of him, and taught him not only that human learning fitting for his years, but the grounds of the proteſtant religion. This his ſchool-maſter was the firſt bleſſed inſtrument that God was pleaſed to make uſe of, to work in him a liking and reliſh of the reformed religion.

He continued with him till he was fit for the univerſity, which was not long; for when he was about thirteen years of age, he was placed by his father (the good hand of God ſtill over ruling him) with a very godly and religious tutor in Chriſt's college in Cambridge, where he continued till after he was maſter of arts, where he gained much love and eſteem for his piety, learning, ingenuity, affability, and harmleſs inoffenſive witty converſe.

When he had continued in Cambridge two years, or thereabouts, his father ſent him up to London, intending to ſend him to Rome, (being confident he ſhould neither want reſpect, encouragement, nor preferment, for his great uncle's ſake, (cardinal Pool) brother to his mother's father) but he refuſing to go, his father kept him long at London, taking him from one popiſh ordinary to another, hoping that ſuch company would at length have prevailed with him to have gone, according to his deſire; but he continuing firm in his reſolution not to go to Rome, his father reſolved to caſt him off, which ſoon after he did. Thus he, whom God had appointed to ſuffer much for him, began to 'bear the yoke in his youth;' and in his tender years became a confeſſor, in forſaking father, friends, all preſent maintainance, and probable hopes of great future preferment, for Chriſt's ſake.

Being in this dejected and forlorn condition, 'God that comforteth thoſe that are caſt down' comforted him, by meeting with Mr John Ireton (then fellow of Chriſt's college, afterwards rector of Kegworth in Leiceſterſhire, a man famous for piety and learning) in London, who, at their meeting, ſaid unto him, 'Arthur, why art thou ſo long from thy book, and loſeſt ſo much time?' 'Alas, Sir, (ſaid he) I ſhall go no more to Cambridge:' and thereupon told him his condition, and the occaſion of it. 'Be not diſcouraged, (ſaith Mr Ireton) thou haſt a noble kinſman, whom I will acquaint with thy caſe; and I doubt not but he will provide for thee.' Accordingly Mr Ireton, ſoon after, went to the right honourable Henry earl of Huntington, lord preſident of the north, (whoſe mother and Mr Hilderſam's mother were brother's children) and repreſenteth to him the ſad condition of his poor kinſman: the noble earl gladly embraced this opportunity of doing good, and ſent for him, encouraged him, promiſed him maintainance, and gave order to Mr Ireton to ſend him back to Cambridge, and to place him with a good tutor; 'for (ſaid he) I ſuppoſe his father did place him with a papiſt.' But when Mr Ireton aſſured him the contrary, he gave order he ſhould go to his former tutor, of whoſe love to him, and care of him, Mr Hilderſam was wont often to ſpeak.

When Mr. Hilderſham was maſter of arts, he was ſoon after to common-place [a college exerciſe in divinity, not differing from a ſermon, but in length] he being loth to adventure upon that exerciſe, intreated one of the fellows (his ſpecial friend) to ſupply his place the firſt time; but he out of love refuſed to gratify him in that, and wiſhed him to remember one Mr Sidney Zouch, maſter of arts of that college, who getting one to ſupply his place the firſt time, and hearing afterwards ſome of his own year perform that exerciſe ſo well, that he deſpaired of doing the like; could never after, be perſwaded either to common place, or preach, though he were a very able ſcholar. The firſt time he was to common place, he was much afraid; but obſerving that there ſat a very godly man (his friend on the other ſide of the chapel, he thought, that, that man prayed for him, which much encouraged him.

He was of ſo good repute for his piety and learning, that by the major part of the fellows he was choſen fellow of that college; but Dr Barwell (the maſter) making uſe of his negative voice, ſtopped him; and the matter came to the viſitors, two of which, viz. Dr Perne, and Dr Goad, favouring the competitor, Mr Willet, (who was afterwards Dr Willet,) made him fellow. Not long after, he was choſen divine of Trinity hall in the ſaid univerſity; where he continued till Sep. the 14 1587, at which time by the foreſaid right honourable earl, he was called to be and placed preacher at Aſhby de la zouch in Leiceſter ſhire. The impropriate tithes of the ſame pariſh being ſettled upon him for his life by the ſaid earl, and continued to him by the favour of the two ſucceeding earls, George and Henry, until his death. He hath given public notice to the world, of his duty and thankfulneſs to that noble houſe in his dedicatory epiſtle to his lectures on John iv.

January 15 1590. He married Mrs Ann Barfoot (daughter to Mr Barfoot of Lamborn hall in Eſſex, who was a very loving and careful wife of him, and the like mother of his children;) ſhe ſurvived him about eight years. He was ſilenced in June 1590. and reſtored again in January, 1591. He was inſtituted and inducted into the vicarage of Aſby, Oct. 4 1593

He preached at the aſſizes at Leiceſter in the time of a great dearth, July 20. 1599. a godly, learned, zealous, plain and powerful ſermon, upon thoſe words, 1 King. xviii. 17, 18. 'And it came to paſs when Ahab ſaw Elijah, that Ahab ſaid unto him, art thou he that troubleth Iſrael? and he anſwered, I have not troubled Iſrael, but thou and thy father's houſe, in that ye have forſaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou haſt followed Baalim In the handling of which text he ſo offended judge Anderſon, that he manifeſted his anger and diſpleaſure both by his countenance and geſture, ariſing to go away; but Mr. Hilderſam ſpeaking ſome words unto him with miniſterial authority, he ſtayed till the ſermon was done. After ſermon the judge would have had the grand jury to have indited him; but in thoſe days it would have been hard to have found a grand jury in Leiceſterſhire, that would have done that Some farther and greater danger Mr Hilderſam was in, by reaſon of that judge's diſpleaſure for that ſermon, but God in mercy prevented it.

In the year 1598 there was an attachment ſent out of the high commiſſion for his apprehenſion. In the beginning of king James his reign, when many petitioned for reformation, (which petitions were very modeſt and moderate, ſubſcribed by above ſeven hundred and fifty godly able preachers, in but twenty five counties; which petition was directed to the parliament, and other petitions to his majeſty and the lords of the council, and to the biſhops) he with ſome few others of his brethren, were choſen, and chiefly intruſted to manage that important buſineſs, to proſecute the petitions, to ſolicit the cauſe; and if required, to diſpute it. And whereas there were ſome appointed to deal (for thoſe that deſired reformation,) in the conference at Hampton court, be, with Mr Stephen Egerton of London, and Mr Edward Fleetwood of Lancaſhire, delivered to them ſome ten demands and requeſts made by thirty reverend miniſters: in the name of themſelves and many others, which they intreated them to ſolicite his majeſty for, in the behalf of the church.

He was deprived and ſilenced by William Chaderton then biſhop of Lincoln, April 24, 1605 for refuſal of ſubſcription and conformity; yet after ſome time, by the connivance and favour of William Overton, then biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield, he preached ſometime in that dioceſe, ſpecially at thoſe two famous exerciſes at Burton, upon Trent ot Staffordſhire, and Repton in Derbyſhire, which were the means of great good to the ſouls of many both miniſters and private chriſtians in the parts adjacent. He was the main upholder of theſe two exerciſes for many years.

In January 1608. by the favour of William Barlow, then biſhop of Lincoln, he was allowed to preach again at Aſhby aforeſaid, where he began his lectures on John iv. 10. January 31 and continued that lecture weekly on Tueſday, till Nov. 12. 1611. Theſe lectures being one hundred and eight he publiſhed in his life time, 1618. having them all written by himſelf, before he preached them; which courſe he took when he began theſe Lectures, and continued it to his dying day, blaming himſelf much that he began it no ſooner, and by that neglect both himſelf and others were deprived (in a great part) of the benefit of his former labours.

Nov. 1611 he was ſilenced by Richard Neal's means then biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield, who complaining to the king of him, the king commanded the arch biſhop to write to the biſhop of Lincoln, to ſend for Mr Hilderſam, and to ſilence him, which was accordingly preſently done. The occaſion of biſhop Neal's complaint to king James was this: one Edward Wightman a damnable heretick (afterwards burnt at Lichfield for blaſphemy and hereſy,) dwelling in Burton upon Trent aforeſaid; and coming ſometimes to the exerciſe there, the biſhop and his friends gave out that Wightman learned his opinion (at leaſt that of the ſouls ſleeping) of the Puritans, and at the foreſaid exerciſes, and of Mr Hilderſham by name. biſhop Neal informing king James of this, the king commanded him, (when he went into the country) to ſend for Mr Hilderſam and to hear what he could anſwer Wightman in this matter. The biſhop accordingly ſent for Mr Hilderſam, but would not hear his defence till Wightman came. Wightman being called to his ſecond public hearing, Nov. 26 1611. (in the hearing of more than five hundred people) charged the biſhop with ſundry wrongs he had done him, naming this for one; that he had given it out, that he had learned his opinions from Mr Hilderſam: whereas I profeſs (ſaid he) he never taught nor confirmed me in any of them; but was of all men over moſt oppoſite unto me in them, and cauſed mine own friends to reject me for them. Mr Hilderſam had long before in a private conference in the preſence of Mr Aberly the miniſter of Burton (who had intreated him to uſe ſome pains to reclaim Wightman,) ſhewed him that his opinion of the ſouls ſleeping, was entirely repugnant to the holy ſcriptures, and an hereſie long ſince condemned in the church. The places of ſcripture he urged againſt him, were theſe, Luke xvi. 22, 23. and xxiii. 43. Phil. i. 23. Soon after, he received a letter from Wightman, March 10. 1608. and perceiving by that, and the report of others, that he grew more and more obſtinate in his errors, and laboured to draw others into it, Mr Hilderſam took occaſion in the next exerciſe held at Burton, viz. upon March 15. 1608. publicly and at large to confute his error; the text that fell out that day to be handled, leading him directly unto it, viz. Heb. xi. 27. About a month after the ſaid exeeciſe, viz. April 21. 1609. Wightman ſent him another letter, wherein he reviled him for the ſaid ſpeech, at the ſaid exerciſe, and took upon him after his manner to anſwer it Yet after this, viz. November 27. 1611. before the biſhop, he impudently avouched to Mr Hilderſam's face, that at the conference forenamed, he ſhould ſay, that the whole drift of the ſcripture indeed, did make for the opinion of the ſouls ſleeping, but that the church had otherwiſe judged of the matter. Mr Hilderſam did proteſt, that he never ſpake or thought ſo; and offered by oath, or any other means that ſhould be required to avow, that he ever held this his opinion, to be directly contrary to the ſcriptures, and a moſt deteſtable hereſie: Mr Aberly alſo, who was preſent ſat at the conference was ready to depoſe that Mr Hilderſam ſpake no ſuch thing at that time, but the direct contrary. So that not only the reſt that were there, were fully ſatisfied; but the biſhop himſelf alſo openly profeſſed, that he was aſſuredly perſwaded, that Wightman had greatly wronged him in this that he had ſaid of him. Thus was Mr Hilderſam's innocency cleared in a public audience, during the time of Wightman's trial at Leichfield; yet he remained under the cenſure of ſilencing, which was procured to be inflicted on him upon this occaſion; and the two forenamed exerciſes were put down. Concerning which, all the chief gentlemen of worth in thoſe parts, certified unto the arch-biſhop Bancroft a little before his death, that the profit which that country (which above moſt other places of the land beſides, was known to ſtand in great need of ſuch means of inſtruction) received by them was exceeding great.

Mr Hilderſam continued ſilenced a long time, yet could not live peaceably from men, tho' he lived quietly with men. For December 8. 1612. Letters miſſive were ſent out of the high commiſſion court, requiring his appearance there; accordingly he appeared, April 22. 1613. at which time he was judicially admoniſhed and enjoined, that (having the catechizing of his own family only) he ſhould not at any time hereafter preach, catechize, or uſe any part of the office, or function of a miniſter, either publicly or privately, until he ſhould be lawfully reſtored and releaſed of his ſaid ſuſpenſion.

In the ſpring 1614. he fell into a violent fever, which held him long, the malignity of which, ſtruck up into the roof of his mouth, and the griſtle of his noſe, which endangered him much; but by the bleſſing of God, upon the care and ſkill of phyſicians and ſurgeons, he was recovered.

In Eaſter term 1615. by letters miſſive he appeared in the high commiſſion court again, which committed him to the fleet, (for refuſal of the oath ex officio,) where he continued a priſoner divers weeks; at length he was removed by habeas corpus unto the king's bench, where he continued a great while. In both places, he endured imprisonment three months. Then he was delivered out of priſon, upon bond, to appear the firſt court day, term, Mich. 1615. but by dangerous ſickneſs (whereof affidavit was made in court) he was hindred from appearing at that time.

Sep. 4, 5 6. 1616. The commiſſioners, doctor Lamb Mr Owen, Mr Middleton, and others ſat at Aſhby, to examine witneſſes to prove the articles exhibited againſt Mr Hilderſam, and his neighbours, Mr Dighton and Mr Holt, where the deponents were, many of them, profeſſed adverſaries, eſpecially Mr Hacket, (then vicar of Aſhby) who was the principal accuſer and informer of the court againſt them; and ſo his teſtimonies ought not in law to have been received againſt them. It might well have been diſcerned by the diſpoſition of many of the deponents, what little credit was to be given to them; and that Mr Hilderſam might have had the moſt odious and capital crimes depoſed againſt him by ſuch witneſſes, who did not only in matter of fact affirm upon oath, that which all the pariſh knew to be notoriouſly falſe; but did alſo take upon them to know and deliver upon their oath, the reaſon and ground of his pretended practice, which (they having never been, as all the neighbours knew, meer ſtrangers to him) was impoſſible for him to do it.

The next term the cauſe came to be heard and cenſured; but Mr Hilderſam hearing of the heavy ſentence againſt Mr Dighton, and Mr Holt, November 21. 1616. (viz. to return back to priſon, there to remain till they conformed themſelves; they were alſo fined a thouſand pounds a piece, pronounced excommunicate, and ordered to be ſo publicly denounced, and enjoined to make their ſubmiſſions, in conceptis verbis, in three ſeveral places; and laſtly, they were condemned in expences and coſts of the ſuit) concealed himſelf, and did not appear at the day of his calling and cenſuring, but eight days before ſend a copy of his anſwer to the ſeveral points that were depoſed againſt him, to his advocate, Dr Huſſey, to be ſhewed to the court; which anſwer, in the judgment of rational, honeſt, indifferent men, was full and ſatisfactory.

To inſtance but in the proof of one article, and his anſwer thereunto. One George Reading depoſed, 'That upon Palm ſunday was two years, he was one of thoſe that came up to the communion-table in Aſhby church in ſeveral companies, and (though Mr Hacket had before given warnings, that he would admit none that would not receive it kneeling) refuſed ſo to receive it, but would have received it ſtanding; and when he could not have it ſo, yet ſtood ſtill among them that kneeled, till the communion was done.' To which depoſition Mr Hilderſam's anſwer was, That it is notoriouſly known to all the inhabitants at Aſhby, that I was at that time ſick in my bed, and for many weeks before, and after, utterly unable to ſtir out of my chamber; neither did I ever at any time preſent myſelf in that manner to the communion table, neither doth Mr Hacket, or any other deponent charge me with any ſuch matter. And this fellow that had deviſed this againſt me, (whereof there was no colour at all of truth) would in all likelihood have ſworn any thing that might have done me hurt, if he had been required to do it. Notwithſtanding this his anſwer to that, and his anſwer to all the reſt, delivered as aforeſaid to his advocate, the court proceeded to cenſure him, November 28. 1616, whereby he was pronounced a man refractory and diſobedient to the orders, rites and ceremonies of the church of England. And becauſe he yet refuſed to ſubmit himſelf, and to join in the adminiſtration of public prayer, and divine ſervice and ſacraments, as they are here lawfully adminiſtred; wherefore he was by the court pronounced a ſciſmatical perſon, and a ſchiſmatic, and thought well worthy of ſevere puniſhment. And, in reſpect, that he was the prime ring-leader of all the ſchiſmatical perſons in that country, both of the clergy and laity, he was firſt fined two thouſand pounds to his majeſty's uſe, pronounced excommunicate, and ordered to be ſo publicly denounced; as alſo was ordered to be attached and committed to priſon, and ſo to be brought before the commiſſioners, to be degraded from his miniſtry; and was further ordered to make his public ſubmiſſion conceptis verbis (as ſhall be preſcribed him by this court;) and, laſtly, he was condemned in charges.

When he heard of this terribly cruel ſentence, it was his wiſdom now to conceal himſelf, which accordingly he did for a time long in the city; and God ſo hid him under the ſhadow of his wings, that his adverſaries could not meet with him.

During this time of his keeping cloſe, one Mr John Hartly, one of the elders of the Engliſh congregation at Leyden in Holland, came with letters of credence from the congregation, making offer to him of the paſtor's place, then vacant; which he reſolved to have accepted of, had not his wife's unwillingneſs to go over the ſeas, retained him here. The foreſaid fine of two thouſand pounds was eſtreated without abatement into the Exchequer, March 12. 1616, whence ſeveral proceſſes were iſſued to the ſheriffs of Leiceſterſhire, to enquire of his eſtate; but they, by ſeveral returns, anſwered, They could find none. At length, the ſaid fine was begged, and granted by his Majeſty, king James, under the great ſeal, to Mr Williams, page to the (then) marquis of Buckingham; whereupon Mr Hilderſam compounded both with him, (giving him a great ſum of money), and with the regiſters alſo of the high commiſſion court, for their part of the fine, and obtained a diſcharge from them both. I ſuppoſe it will be hard to find, that any man was before, or ſcarce hath been once, in that court, ſo deeply fined, and heavily cenſured, merely for his judgment and conſcience; having done nothing either factiouſly or contemptuouſly againſt that government, and thoſe orders of the church that were then eſtabliſhed. He was indeed always, from his firſt entering into the miniſtry, a reſolved and conſcientious non conformiſt, as appeareth by the foregoing ſtory, and ſo continued to his dying day: witneſs that clauſe in his laſt will; 'I do hereby declare and proteſt, that I do continue and end my days in the very ſame faith and judgment, touching all points of religion, as I have ever been known to hold and profeſs, and which I have, both by my doctrine and practice, and by my ſufferings alſo, given teſtimony unto.' He was a great admirer, follower, and friend, of Mr Thomas Cartwright, famous for religion and learning, who left his his papers to Mr John Dod and him, to peruſe and publiſh what they thought fit.

Though he himſelf was a conſtant non-conformiſt, yet ſuch was his ingenuity and chriſtian charity, that he reſpected, eſteemed and was very familiar with thoſe he knew to be religious and learned, though of another judgement. He did always oppoſe the ſeparation of the Browniſts, and the ſemi ſeparation of Mr Jacob, with whom, as alſo with ſome ring leaders of the former ſort, he had divers conferences and diſputes. He is called by Dr Willet (his contemporary, and ſometimes competitor) 'The hammer of ſchiſmatics, whom they commonly call Browniſts;' as you have it in f. . his epiſtle to the Reader, before the forenamed lectures, on John iv. that is, Mr John Cotton's of New-England, (his dear and familiar friend), who there expreſſes his high opinion of the author thoſe lectures, and his treatiſe of the doctrine of the Lord's ſupper, printed 1680, annexed to a little treatiſe of the like argument ſet forth by a learned godly man (his intimate friend) Mr William Bradſhaw, of which treatiſe of Mr Hilderſam's, Mr Cotton gives this teſtimony: 'That it hath been of ſingular good uſe to many poor ſouls for their preparation to that ordinance. And in very deed (ſaith he) thoſe queſtions and anſwers do more fully furniſh a chriſtian to that whole ſpiritual duty than any other, in any language (that I know) in ſo ſmall a compaſs.' Mr Cotton always mentioneth in the foreſaid epiſtle, a letter of Mr Hilderſam's to a gentlewoman, againſt ſeparation, which, without his conſent, a ſeparatiſt, Mr Francis Johnſon) printed and refuted; 'Which, (ſaith Mr Cotton) hath ſo ſtrongly and clearly convinced the iniquity of that way, that I could not but acknowlege in it both the wiſdom of God, and the weakneſs of the Separatiſt; his wiſdom, in bringing to light ſuch a beam of the light of his truth, by the hand of an adverſary, againſt the author's mind; and the weakneſs of the other, to advance the hand of his adverſary, to give himſelf and his cauſe ſuch a deadly wound in open view, as neither himſelf, nor his aſſociates can be able to heal.' His judgment and teſtimony of the author, and his lectures on John iv. you may read in that epiſtle. In a private letter of his from Boſton, February 3 1629. to him; he mentioneth a letter he received from a Dutch miniſter in London, (one Timotheus Van Ulcren) who telleth him, he had ſent ſundry of the books on John iv. to miniſters beyond the ſeas, who do read them with great ſatisfaction, that the ſaid Dutch miniſter did, in the name of many others, intreat Mr Cotton, to beſeech Mr Hilderſam to put forth his ſermon on Pſal. li. and other his lucubrations. And accordingly, Mr Cotton in that letter writeth thus; 'Since the ſermons already on part of the Pſalm, do ariſe to a juſt and full volume, be entreated to hearken to the deſires of ſo many at home and abroad, and give them leave to be doing good, whilſt the reſt are preparing. You have cauſe to love the Lord your God with all your might; and therefore, ſince thoſe ſermon might be ſhewing your love to God in working his work before theſe fellows, do not hold back any part of this ſervice to the church, for the preſent time.' This his requeſt he renewed, in another letter of July 23. 1629.

Having mentioned the teſtimony and judgment of the reverend Mr Cotton, concerning Mr Hilderſam and his labours, whom in his reply to Mr Roger William's anſwer of his letter, p. 177 he ſtileth him 'a man of a thouſand;' I ſhall inſert another teſtimony of a man deſervedly famous in the church Dr Preſton, then fellow of Queen's college in Cambridge, concerning the forementioned lectures on John iv. He having long deſired, at length obtained of Mr Hilderſam the copy of them, which he kept a long time, and peruſed, and being deſired to deliver his opinion of them, in his letter to the author, Nov. 28. 1615. ſpeaketh thus.

"I will ſay to you faithfully and ingeniouſly what I think, without adding a word more than mine own heart is perſwaded of. Firſt in general, for putting them to the preſs, I do not only think that they are worthy of it, but ſo far as any intreaty of mine might prevail, I ſhould preſs you to it, as depriving God's church of a very great benefit, if you ſhould refuſe. In particular, beſides the profitableneſs of the matter, theſe two things I obſerve in the reading of it: Firſt, throughout the whole carriage there appeareth a continued ſtrength (that I may ſo call it) without any failing or deficiency, without any inequality, unevenneſs or deformity of ſome parts with the reſt. Secondly, it is preciſe and ſuccinct (tho' large) the things choice and pertinent, and throughly depending each on other. In brief, ſo it is, there is nothing that need be added, and nihil quod amputem. So that when I went about to take out ſome things for mine own uſe briefly, I could not almoſt tell what to leave out. To ſay all in a word ſir, I do think it is ſuch as will anſwer to your name, and ſuch as men would look for from you. There are very few writings, but wherein we commonly ſee ſome failings in theſe two particulars, which I mentioned. Beſides, the method I much like, as very judicious; which hath not ruled you, but you it in a ſeaſonable changing it, as your matter lieth, ſo caſting the frame of it, that it extorteth not more than is neceſſary from you, nor cutteth off any thing that you would deliver: which one preciſe, uniform method ſtrictly kept, often doth, I hope it will be a good help to miniſters when they read it, and bring the method of doctrine and uſes into more credit." Theſe are Doctor Preſton's own words in his letter, unto this ample and laudable teſtimony given, by theſe two worthies, this may be added, that his moſt grave and authoritative manner of preaching, did give an edge and excellency unto his miniſtry.

Though Maſter Hilderſam, in the judgment of theſe eminent divines at home and abroad, and moſt others that knew him, were a man of ſuch worth and ability, and whoſe labours were ſo uſeful in the church; yet was he for a long time, by the then prevailing power in the church caſt aſide like a broken veſſel,

After his cenſure in the high commiſſion court, he lived privately a long time, ſometimes in the city, ſometimes in the country.

He was always, whether ſilent or having liberty to preach a conſtant ſtudent. When he was in the country, and had conveniency of place and weather, he uſed to walk alone every morning near an hour, to meditate. In the morning he read conſtantly a chapter, whence he gathered ſome obſervations, and wrote them in a book, with the reference to ſome common place in the margin, which he referred to his common place book by numbers. The like he did out of many books that he read; in others which he read, he referred the moſt obſervable things in them to his common place book, by the pages in them. As he was much in ſecret prayer, ſo was he fervent therein; yea, frequent in holy ejaculations audibly expreſſed, as was obſerved by ſome godly friends, whoſe occaſions brought them often near to the place where he ſtudied.

He was always a diligent attender of the public aſſemblies, whether he were in the city or country; he uſed often even in his old age to write ſermons in the church. He highly prized the miniſtry of the word, that he would often ſay, "he never heard any godly miniſter preach, tho' but of weak parts, but he got ſome benefit by him.

He ſojourned in many families, and always by his godly and amiable carriage, got love and eſteem of all in the houſe.

In all places where he did reſide, or whether he came occaſionally, he was always helpful in family prayers, in expounding the ſcriptures read, and in the repitition of the ſermons preached in the public congregations; being alſo willing by private conference to inſtruct the ignorant, to ſatisfie the doubtful, to ſettle the wavering, to comfort the dejected, and to encourage all ſorts in the exerciſe of religion.

He was much in the houſe of Mrs Katharine Redich of Newhall in Derbyſhire, (widow to Alexander Redich of Redich in Lancaſhire eſquire, his boſom friend) his ancient acquaintance, and conſtant dear friend to his death, who ſurvived him not above eight days; the grief for his death haſtening (as it was ſuppoſed) her end. In her houſe at Hamſtead near London, Auguſt 21. 1624. he fell ſick of a violent fever, which put him into ſuch danger, that the phyſicians doubted of his recovery; he overhearing ſome intimation of it, when he thought none were in the room, the curtains being drawn about his bed, he was overheard by one in the room, to ſpeak ſuddenly those words of Pſal. cxviii. 17. 'I ſhall not die, but live and declare the works of the Lord.' At that time there was as little hope of his preaching, as of his recovery. But God, in great mercy, ſoon after reſtored him both to health and liberty. The next year viz. June 20. 1625. he was licenſed by Dr Ridley, then vicar general to the moſt reverend biſhop of Canterbury, to preach in the dioces of London, Lincoln, and Coventry, and Lichfield, under the ſeal of that office. By vertue of which Licenſe he began to preach, Auguſt 3 1625. in Aſhby church aforeſaid, thoſe eight ſermons on Pſal. xxxvi. 13 concerning faſting, prayer and humiliation for ſin, which were published ſince his death, viz. 1632 according to his own copy left under his hand, by his ſon Mr Samuel Hilderſam.

September 28 1625 he began his one hundred and fifty two lectures on Pſal. li. publiſhed in the like nature, 1635.

After the laſt forementioned licenſing, he was ſilenced again, March 25. 1630. by notice given him from the court at Leiceſter of the king's inſtructions, for every lecturer to read ſervice in ſurplice and hood, and he began to preach again Aug 2. 1631. and ſo continued till December 27. 1631. which was the laſt ſermon that he preached.

Soon after he fell ſick, of his laſt ſickneſs, and diſcerning it to increaſe, he ſent for his forenamed ſon dwelling at Weſt Felton in Shropſhire, forty nine miles from Aſh, by; he with his wife came to him with all convenient ſpeed, January 13 and ſtayed with him till his death.

Their company and attendance at that time (as always formerly) was very contenting and comfortable. And of his daughter in law (who was by himſelf propounded as a meet wife for his deareſt ſon, and in whom he ever took a great delight) he was heard, with affection to ſpeak theſe words, 'never man had a kinder daughter in law.'

His diſeaſe, (tho' not diſcerned to be ſo at the firſt) proved the ſcorbute, the which being a dull and melancholic diſtemper, indiſpoſed him to ſpeak much; yet as he ſhewed wonderful patience through his whole ſickneſs, ſo he uſed many holy and heavenly expreſſions to thoſe that attended him, or came to viſit him, who (he being ſo much beloved and honoured in the country) were not a few.

He ſuggeſted unto ſome dear friends, his fears that wolves would ere long come in amongſt them, and thereupon earneſtly exhorted them to continue ſtedfaſt in the truth, which they had received. And occaſion being given to mention theſe words, 1 Tim. iii. v. 'How ſhall he take care of the church of God?' Looking to his ſon, he ſaid, 'oh ſon, ſon, that care of the flock, is the main thing.'

The moſt godly people in thoſe parts, his conſtant hearers (who had been either converted to Chriſt, or edified and confirmed in grace by his miniſtry) being very ſenſible of the great loſs, which not themſelves only, but the whole church of God alſo would ſuſtain by his death, (that they might not ſeem negligent in the uſe of any means within their reach, to prolong his life and their own comfort,) did reſolve among themſelves to ſet apart a day that they might ſolemnly in public ſeek the Lord by faſting and prayer in his behalf wherein they had the hearty help of Mr Simeon Aſh, both in the morning and afternoon by ſermons and ſupplications, who did more owe himſelf unto Mr Hilderſam, than to any other man, having been firſt placed in the univerſity, under the tuition of famous Mr Thomas Hooker, fellow of Emanuel college, and afterwards directed and encouraged by his miniſtry, by his great care and love.

March 4. being the Lord's day, he grew very weak, and was prayed for in the congregation in Aſhby church, both at the morning and evening exerciſe. His ſon prayed with him divers times that day, and whilſt he was praying the laſt time, he departed, and ſlept in the Lord, between nine and ten of the clock that night, viz. March 4. 1631. Thus he who had diligently heretofore, kept the holy reſt of the ſabbath, did in the cloſe of the ſabbath, reſt from his labours; and having glorified God often, both in public and private, on that day before, was at laſt on that day received into glory. Mr Herring (his dear and familiar friend) being then at Coventry, was ſent for the next day, and came and preached the lecture in Aſhby church on Tueſday, March 6 in the morning. Mr Hilderſam having taken order in his will, that there ſhould be no funeral ſermon in his burial, and then ſpake like himſelf, holily, diſcreetly, learnedly, and affectionately, concerning the loſs that, that congregation, the country, and whole church had ſuſtained by the death of him that was lately dead. In the afternoon of that day, his body was born by neighbour miniſters to the grave, accompanied by a great multitude both of miniſters and others, who expreſſed much ſorrow and lamentation.

He lived in Aſhby aforeſaid for the moſt part (yet being often forced to remove his dwelling) of forty three years, and ſix months, with great ſucceſs in his miniſtry, love and reverence of all ſorts. He was very charitable to the poor himſelf, and in exciting of his auditors to contribute towards their relief. In few country congregations in England the collections for the poor were ſo large, as they were at the quarter days at his Lectures.

The loſs of poor Aſhby by his death was exceeding great; for he was the peace maker among neighbours, and the patron of the poor; wickedneſs was checked, and godlineſs cheriſhed by his great care and wiſdom. He was a friend to every one in a good cauſe, and it was his unwearied delight to be chriſtianly ſerviceable in any kind.

He lived to a great age, conſidering that his pains in preaching did ordinarily weaken him ſo much, ſixty eight years and five months; yet this happineſs God vouchſafed to him, which was more than ordinary, that he outlived not his parts, but as his graces increaſed towards his end, ſo his abilities of invention, judgment, memory, elocution decayed not in his age. He left a precious memory behind him; had letters of commendation written in the hearts of many, of which ſome live here, ſome in glory. His books will prove more durable monuments of his name, than that his ſon erected for him in Aſhby church.

And yet his name with the lively picture of his perſon, lives in his worthy ſon, Mr Samuel Hilderſam, whoſe learning Cambridge knew, while he was fellow of Emanuel college; and whoſe preſent miniſterial labours, and pious converſation at Weſtfelton in Shropſhire, do perpetuate the honour of his reverend father, whoſe very memory he doth much reverence, and whoſe rich vertues, both perſonal and miniſterial, he doth happily imitate. And his good help from his father's papers, and other ways, hath moſt conduced to the drawing up of this faithful relation, that God may be glorified, and many ſouls may be edified by this famous example, thus preſented unto public view.

The Life of Dr THOMAS TAYLOR, ſometimes Paſtor of Aldermanſbury London, who died Anno Chriſti 1632.

THOMAS TAYLOR was born at Richmond in Yorkſhire, of worthy and godly parents, his father was recorder of that town, and a very Gaius or Oneſiphorus to the ſilenced miniſters of England, and to the exiled miniſters of Scotland. He brought up divers ſons into the miniſtry. This ſon of his (as the other) was of a child trained up in the holy ſcriptures, which are able to make wiſe to ſalvation. Afterward, as age came on, he was well grounded in other learning, and was ſent to Cambridge, where he became fellow of Chriſt's college, as one that ſhould do the Lord Chriſt abundance of good ſervice. He was there moſt painful and unwearied in the ſtudy of tongues, arts, ſciences, all ſorts of exerciſes about them; and eſpecially for divinity, which was his profeſſion. One while he was Hebrew reader to the college. Being ſoon ripe, he entred into the miniſtry at the age of one and twenty years.

In queen Elizabeth's time, he was called to preach at Paul's croſs, and preached the ſermon in king James's time.

In the courſe and work of his miniſtry, he ſpent thirty five years, with all diligence and painfulneſs, even to the very end, when by right he might have ſpared himſelf; living living in all ſincerity and godly pureneſs, with entire love of ſouls, with all watchfulneſs, with meekneſs, wonderfully quickned with zeal. He was an utter enemy of popery, arminianiſm, antinomianiſm, and other ſects which crept up in thoſe times, as appeareth partly by his writings.

Amidſt all his pithy diſcourſes, he was alſo an excellent and nimble orator, and wound up his matter with a good farewel, even when at times it was but ordinary. And from this his courſe he would ſcarce ſuffer himſelf to be withdrawn at any time, to refreſh his ſpirits by a little freedom. Yea, ſometimes when he was drawn forth into the country for recreation, by the ſolicitation of God's people, he eſcaped not without his uſual burden: or, he ſpent his vacant time in preparing books for the preſs, which were both many and very uſeful, and will be to poſterity, who have cauſe to bleſs God who giveth gifts to men, and public minds, that they may profit far and near, both bearers and ſtrangers, all debtors to him. And men of underſtanding obſerved a great ſeal put to his miniſtry, in ſeveral places whereto he was called; ſome converted, others confirmed, others comforted in the way of God. And in theſe times of diviſion, wherein many profeſſors have turned into by-ways thoſe that were his conſtant hearers continue in that way ſtedfaſt, and unſhaken in faith and love which is in Chriſt Jeſus. Yea at Reading there was a generation of young preachers, who under his miniſtry grew up in knowlege and holineſs, and ſome eminency of gifts, profiting by him and his pains there; and ſome profeſs it at this day. Perhaps alſo in the great city of London, and at Cambridge.

Neither was he altogether for the public, but pious in private, and not only in the courſe of his family, but in keeping faſts among the godly of the place, which in thoſe days was ſomething of a dangerous exerciſe. And to make them ſolid profeſſors indeed, he put them upon a weekly way of handling catecherical points of divinity; that is, every week to confer of one of the heads of religion, according to the catechiſm ſubjoined to Mr Dod's treatiſe on the commandments, ſtill proving the doctrines by teſtimonies of ſcripture. For the other perſonal qualifications, he was a man full of love, alms deeds, and merciful conſideration of the needy, though not with a trumpet: and he was a man bleſt of God with all the bleſſings of wiſdom, Prov. iii. 16. 'Length of days, riches, and honour:' he had every where both godly and great friends, and is likely ſtill to have, among that ſhall converſe in his worthy works.

In that his bleſſed and holy courſe he drew on towards his end. It was his clymacterical year of 56; having over laboured himſelf with preaching in the city, he betook himſelf to his country houſe at Iſleworth, to be a little refreſhed. But, having inflamed and corrupted his blood by preaching, he ſoon fell into a mortal diſeaſe, a pleurity, for curing whereof, though no means were wanting, yet the deſired effect, through the counſel of God, followed not.

In the beginning of his ſickneſs he ſet his houſe in order moſt holily, and as became ſo worthy a father, and then bade farewel to all, as one throughly prepared for his departure, full of faith and patience, and joy in the holy Ghoſt, a great help in that acute diſeaſe; careful of the welfare of the church at home, then in danger to be corrupted; grieved for the evils he knew in ſome mens dealings; rejoicing greatly in the midſt of the apprehenſion of death, for the happy proceedings of the heroical king of Sweden, then victorious in Bavaria. And once when he was told, he muſt a little help himſelf by cherrfulneſs, he fell into a moſt contentful diſcourſe of thoſe noble deliverances and victories; and more would have ſpoken, if weakneſs had permitted; but eſpecially his joy in God, and in the conqueſt of Chriſt, 'Oh! (ſaid he) we ſerve a good Lord, who covers all imperfections, and gives great wages for little work; and in mercy he hath provided for me ſome of the greateſt:' with other holy ſpeeches, full of faith and joy, which his infirmity would not ſuffer him to utter perfectly. In which manner he languiſhed by degrees, and at laſt, on the Lord's day, being the uſual day of his principal labours, he was diſmiſſed of all, and went to keep a perpetual Sabbath in heaven, where now he reſteth from his labours, and his works follow him, even a full reward in endleſs glory. 'Which eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither can enter into the heart of man to conceive, what things thoſe are which God hath prepared for them that love him.'

The Life of Mr HUGH CLARK, who died Anno Chriſti 1634.

HUGH CLARK was born at Burton upon Trent, in the county of Stafford, Auguſt 15. 1563. of honeſt parents, who were very careful of his education, both in religion and learning; and when he was fitted for the univerſity they ſent him to Cambridge, where he was admitted unto Jeſus college, under the tuition of Mr Duport, (afterwards Dr Duport, and maſter of that college); in that place he followed his ſtudy very hard, and his proficiency was very exemplary; but after two years and an half, the air not well agreeing with his conſtitution, he removed to Oxford and continued there till he was maſter of arts. He was a good logician and a very acute diſputant.

The firſt place that he was called to exerciſe his miniſtry in, was about Oundle in Northamptonſhire, where he met with a people that, for the generality of them, were very ignorant and ungodly and much addicted to the prophanation of the Lord's day, by Whitſon-ales, morris-dancing, &c. which ſins Mr Clark, in his miniſtry, much ſet himſelf againſt, endeavouring from God's word to convince them of the evil, and denouncing God's judgments, in caſe of their obſtinate perſeverance in ſuch provoking courſes: but they, having been always trained up in ſuch practices, and having their hearts hardened against admonition, ſtill perſevered in their former courſes; and that the rather, becauſe they were oppoſed by the word of God therein; but the judgment of God found them out for this their wickedneſs; for ſhortly after, on a Lord's day, the leader of the dance, being a luſty young man, in the midſt of their profane paſtimes, ſuddenly fell down and died. Yet theſe obdurate perſons (though a little affected for the preſent) ſoon ſhaked off their fears, and returned to their vomit again.

Mr Clark, the Sabbath following, took occaſion from this ſad diſpenſation of God, to ſhew them the greatneſs of their ſins, and how highly God uſed to be diſpleaſed with thoſe which took liberty to prophane his holy day, withal quoting Jer. xvii. 27. 'If thou will not hearken unto me, to hallow the Sabbath day, &c. then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it ſhall devour the palaces of Jeruſalem, and it ſhall not be quenched;' opening, urging, and preſſing it home upon their conſciences; yet ſtill they kicked againſt theſe warnings; and the evening following returned to their ſports again. Amongſt them there was a ſmith that was a chief ringleader; but it pleaſed God the very next day, that two huſbandmen coming to his ſhop to ſharpen their plough ſhares, a ſpark from the red hot iron, as he beat it on the anvil, flew into the thatch, which both the ſmith and his neighbours ſaw, and ſtood gazing upon it, and might at firſt with one of their fingers have pulled it down, the thatch being low, but God took away their power of moving towards it, ſo that they ſaw it at firſt burn like a candle, then like a torch, and preſently the whole ſhop was on fire; and the men running out, both ſhop, houſe, and all the ſmith's goods were conſumed in the fire, and yet a neighbour's houſe that ſtood very near it eſcaped.

This ſecond remarkable judgment was again, by Mr Clark, preſſed upon their conſciences, yet nothing would prevail; but as if they had made 'a covenant with death, and were at an agreement with hell, they ſtill perſiſted in their ungodly practices; and God, who threatens to walk contrary to them that walk contrary to him, puniſhed them with one judgment after another; and amongſt others this was very remarkable. That, upon the Sabbath day which they had highly prophaned by drinking, dancing, &c. in the night, when they were retired to their ſeveral homes, there was heard a great noiſe, and rattling of chains up and down the town, which was accompanied with ſuch a ſmell and ſtink of fire and brimſtone, that many of their guilty conſciences ſuggeſted unto them, that the devil was come to fetch them away quick to hell. This ſo terrified and wrought upon them, that they began to give better heed to the miniſtry of God's word, and to break off their prophane courſes, for the greateſt part, ſo that there was an eminent reformation wrought amongſt them; at leaſt ſixteen of thoſe poor ſouls being effectually wrought upon, and brought home to Chriſt; and ſome others that relapſed to their former ways, God purſued them with his judgments till he had brought them to beggary.

During Mr Clark's abode in this place he had experience of God's gracious protecting him from the rage of ſome deſperately wicked men; and amongſt others, this is very remarkable: Mr Clark having one day preſſed God's judgments againſt ſome ſins, that he ſaw ſome of the people much addicted to, there came the next morning, a luſty young man, a ſtranger, to enquire for him, as deſirous to ſpeak with him. Mr Clark being made acquainted with it, ſent for him into his chamber, and knowing his vitious life, took occaſion ſharply to reprove him, and to tell him of the danger he was in by reaſon of the ſame in caſe he perſevered in his lewd courſes. This round and faithful dealing, through God's mercy, wrought ſo effectually upon him, that falling upon his knees, he entreated him to forgive him. Mr Clark anſwered, that he ſhould beg pardon at the hands of God, againſt whom he had ſinned, for he knew not for his own part, wherein he had offended him: yea, ſaid the other, 'I have not only offended God by ſinning thus and thus againſt him, but you alſo; for I came hither with a full reſolution to ſtab you with this dagger here at my back, but God hath ſo over-awed my ſpirit, that I have not had power to move an hand to accompliſh ſuch a wickedneſs; and this reſolution of mine proceeded from the ſermon which you preached yeſterday, which ſo terrified my conſcience, that my whole body fell into ſuch a trembling, that I was not able to ſit, whereupon I roſe up, and ſet my back to a pillar to ſtay me, yet neither would that prevail to ſtay my trembling &c. But now if you pleaſe to forgive me, I ſhall, by God's grace, never entertain any ſuch deſperate thoughts again.' Mr Clark freely forgave him, and, after ſome wholeſome and reaſonable admonitions, diſmiſſed him.

About this time the ſchiſm and errors of the Browniſts began to ſpread in Northamptonſhire, and Mr Clark had many bickerings and diſputations with ſome of the chief of them, whom he mightily confuted; and, through God's grace, reclaimed ſome of them.

In the year 1590, he was ſent for by Roger Wigſtone, eſq; who lived at Woolſtone in the county of Warwick, by whom he was choſen to ſucceed Mr Lord, an able and eminent divine, in the paſtoral charge in that place; and having preached ſometimes amongſt them, he was freely choſen by the people alſo. Then having his preſentation from Mr Wigſtone, (who was a gentleman of eminent piety in thoſe days, and a great friend to godly miniſters), he went to Dr Overton, biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, for his inſtitution; but the biſhop having deſigned the living for one of his chaplains, he endeavoured to perſuade Mr Clark to deſert his title to it, promiſing that he would remember him when ſome other preferment ſhould fall. Mr Clark conſidering his fair and direct call to the place, and therefore hoping that God had a work for him to do there, he abſolutely refuſed to gratify the biſhop in his requeſt, telling him, that he could not with a good conſcience do it, and therefore importuned him for his inſtitution. Then did the biſhop ſet his acuteſt chaplains upon him, to examine and diſpute with him, hoping thereby to get ſome ground of exception againſt him; but when that prevailed not, he framed other excuſes to defer the inſtituting of him, one while alleging that his regiſter was not with him, and then that he had ſo many days allowed by the law to make enquiry after him. And hereby he made Mr Clark to ride three or four journeys without attaining his deſire, and this the biſhop did, that the living might fall into the lapſe. Mr Clark perceiving his drift, told him, that if he refuſed any longer to grant him inſtitution, he would bring his quare impedit againſt him, which occaſioned the biſhop at laſt to grant it him; but withal, he ſent at ſeveral times, ſometimes an apparitor, ſometimes one of his chaplains, and other ſubtile perſons, to attend his prayers and ſermons, to ſee if they could catch any advantage againſt him, and upon trivial occaſions cited him oft to his court, and thereby much moleſted him. At laſt the biſhop himſelf, being at Coventry upon a Sabbath day, he, with ſome of his ſervants, came in the morning to Woolſtone, being but four miles off, and coming into the church, he ſet him down in a ſeat juſt before Mr Clark, none elſe of the congregation knowing him. Mr Clark ſeeing the biſhop, abated nothing of his zeal and fervency in preaching of the word, inſomuch as the biſhop being much nettled by the ſermon, ſhifted and ſhuffled up and down, as if he had ſit upon thorns; an honeſt man by, obſerving it, fetched him a cuſhion firſt to ſit on, and then another to lean on, but yet the biſhop ſeemed very reſtleſs.

The ſermon and prayer being ended, the biſhop ſaid openly, 'This is an hot fellow indeed but I will cool him.' Mr Clark hearing it replied, 'My Lord, if I have not faithfully delivered the truth of God, I beſeech you declare what I have ſaid amiſs, that I may make my defence here before my people.' The biſhop anſwered as before, 'You are an hot fellow indeed, but I will cool you;' and ſo departed: Mr Clark replying, 'It is good to be zealous in the work of the Lord.'

After this the biſhop picked a quarrel againſt him, and ſuſpended him from preaching; whereupon Mr Clark uſed to expound the word, then did the biſhop ſuſpend him from expounding; whereupon he catechiſed with expoſition and application; then was he ſuſpended from catechiſing alſo. Whereupon, at the uſual times, in the church, he cauſed an honeſt man that was his neighbour, to read a chapter, and at the end of every verſe, to aſk him the meaning of it, and what inſtructions and uſes might be gathered out of it. This ſo angered the biſhop that he proceeded to excommunicate him; whereupon Mr Clark repaired to Dr Whitgift archbiſhop of Canterbury, and from him procured his abſolution; and as he returned homewards about Dunſtable, he met biſhop Overton going towards London to whom he ſhewed his abſolution, and ſo went on in his miniſtry as before.

This ſo irritated the biſhop that he ſtill ſuborned ſome to watch him in all his public prayers and ſermons. About this time the perſecution growing hot againſt the non conformiſts, Mr Clark, in his prayer, requeſted of God to forgive the queen her ſins, though in modeſt expreſſions. This the biſhop being informed of and ſuppoſing that he had now gotten that advantage which he had long waited for, he charged Mr Clark with treaſon, and cauſed him to be committed to the common jail of Warwick, where he lay (bail being refuſed) till the aſſizes; and then the biſhop cauſed him to be arraigned at the bar, and had ſo exaſperated the judge againſt him, that he would have had the jury to find the bill. But it pleaſed God to ſtir up the heart of a noble gentleman, a juſtice upon the bench, from that good report which he had heard of Mr Clark, to ſtand up, and publicly to tell the judge, that before Mr Clark ſhould have any wrong, he would kneel before the queen for him. This ſo prevailed with the jury that he was acquitted.

Upon his releaſe, Mr Clark repaired again to archbiſhop Whitgift, complaining to him of all this wrong which he had received from the biſhop; the archbiſhop (very worthily) ſent for the biſhop and upon a fair and equal hearing of the buſineſs betwixt them, he enjoined the biſhop to go down, and in Mr Clark's church, upon a Sabbath day, before the congregation, to acknowlege the wrong which he had done him; which the biſhop accordingly did perform, and ever after, upon all occaſions, was Mr Clark's great friend ſo long as he lived.

Not long after the devil ſtirred up new adverſaries againſt him in his own pariſh, his miniſtry being very quick, powerful, and ſearching, ſo that ſome wicked perſons, that found themſelves to be galled by it, railed upon him, threatening to kill him; ſo that Mr Clark, being a ſtrong luſty man, for a time, walked not abroad without his rapier in his hand, for his own defence. At laſt, one of theſe wicked men, whoſe conſcience the miniſtry had galled, vowed his death; and as Mr Clark was coming from Coventry, he way laid him in a wood. Mr Clark, in the evening, came alone homewards, with nothing but a wand in his hand; whereupon this man rode up to him, and falling into discourse with him, Mr Clark took the opportunity to reprove him for his disordered life, and so laid open God's judgments due to him for the same, that he fell into a great trembling, confessed his intention to have killed him, and begged pardon. Yet still he persisted in his wicked ways, and God's judgments found him out at last; for though he had a very good living, yet he fell into misery and want, and died in Warwick jail for debt.

Mr Clark had in his parish a chappel of ease, which had two townships belonging to it, one of them two miles from the parish church, the chaple itself near two miles from it, and the profits of both (the tithes being impropriated) scarce amounting to a competent maintenance for one man. Mr Clark was fain to supply them both himself. And indeed, God had extraordinarily fitted him for it, having given him a very strong able and healthful body, so that for the greatest part of his life there, which was about forty four years; he rode four times a day in winter and summer between the two churches, read the word, and preached four times a day, administred the sacraments, and performed all other ministerial duties in them both. He preached upon several texts in each of the churches, so that divers godly persons, old and young, went betwixt the two churches, hearing several sermons to their great profit and comfort. Besid s this, every holy-day he supplied both the churches, sometimes preached, but constantly expounded in each of them, and for the most part twice a day also; and God so blessed his labours, that he begat many sons and daughters unto God.

He was very careful in the education of his children, first to train them up in the knowlege and fear of God; for which end, he would take all opportunities to whet the word of God upon them, when he lay down, and when he rose up, and as he walked by the way, &c. and God so blest his labours, that he lived to see, to his great comfort, the work of grace wrought in the hearts of all his seven children. And next to this, his care was to train up his children in learning, and to honest callings; often saying, that if he could leave them no other portion, yet he would give them that education, that they should be able to get their own livings, in any part of the world, where God should cast their lot.

Towards the later end of his life, came forth the book for recreations on the Sabbath day, and some young persons in the town where he lived, having been encouraged thereby, and by a popish landlord which they had, would needs have a Whitson ale, and Morris-dance, an heathenish sport, long before, through God's goodness, banished out of that town. Mr Clark laboured by his ministry, to beat down the first rising of this motion; but these persons were so backed and encouraged by some that set them on, that they would needs prosecute their design, notwithstanding all the warnings given them by their faithful pastor. But God that hath said, 'He that despiseth you, despiseth me, &c. made their sin quickly to find them out in a terrible judgment that suddenly ensued; for in that barn, standing near a smith's shop, where their revels were most kept, there was a violent fire kindled, which notwithstanding all help, quickly burnt it down, and in a strange manner flying against the wind, it went from house to house, burning down all the houses of the chief of those which had an hand in these prophane sports.

Mr Clark was a man (like Apollos) mighty in the scriptures, and so studied in the body of divinity, that upon short warning, he could preach very pertinently and profitably. He had an excellent pair of lungs, and was exceeding powerful in his ministry, striking shame and terror into the hearts of the wicked, to whom he was a Boanerges, and yet withal, he was a Barnabas to humbled, broken, bleeding souls.

His old age was accompanied with a lingering and painful disease, which yet he bore with great patience, and as he came nearer to heaven, so his motion thitherward was more quick and lively. Many godly persons came to visit him in his disease, and none of them went away without some spiritual and comfortable instructions from him. At last, having long glorified God on earth, and finished his work, he went to receive his wages, quietly resigning up his spirit unto God, November 4. 1634, having lived seventy one years, two months, and nineteen days, and having been pastor of Woolstone forty four years.

'This Mr Hugh Clark was my father.'

The Life and Death of Mr JOHN CARTER, who died Anno Christi 1634.

MR John Carter was born at Wickham in Kent, near Canterbury, about the year of our Lord 1554. He was descended but of mean parents, yet were they religious, and of good report, who not being able to maintain him at the university, wholly upon their own charge; there was one Mr Rose, a rich man in Canterbury, who taking notice of his piety in those his tender years, of his ingenuity, studiousness and proficiency in all school learning, even beyond the pitch of a grammar-scholar; and finding him hopeful, and likely to prove a precious instrument in the church of Christ, he took him into his care sent him to Cambridge, and contributed such sums of money to him from time to time as were needful. He was admitted into Clare Hall, and was pupil to Dr Bing, a famous Civilian, and master of that house.

Presently after his first admission into that house, he was taken notice of as one of singular learning and ripeness for his years. Amongst the rest that were of his year, he had a theme given him to make upon this subject, Frugalitas virtutum maxima: and when the young students brought in their themes, the lecturer took and read them, and when he came to Carter's theme he stood, and paused a while, and at last, said before them all: here is the best theme that ever I read; and gave him some money for his encouragement, and highly commended his industry; and always after cast a favourable eye upon him, and sought opportunities to do him good.

When Mr Carter had taken his degrees of batchelor, and master of arts, his tutor, Dr Bing (out of his singular love to him for his piety and learning) gave him a chamber in his own lodgings, where he continued a year or two, which conduced much to the compleating of him for the work of the ministry; and all the while that he continued a gremial in the lap, and bosom of his mother the university, he held constant meetings with divers of, his famous contemporaries, and that every week, as with Dr Chaderton, Dr Andrews, (afterwards bishop of Ely) Mr Culverwel, Mr Knewstubs and divers others, whom God raised up and fitted to send forth into his harvest, to gather his corn, then ripe for the sickle, into his barn. At their meetings they had constant exercises; first, they began with prayer, and then applied themselves to the study of the scriptures; one was for the original languages, another's task was for the grammatical interpretation; another's for the logical analysis; another's for the true sense and meaning of the text; another gathered the doctrines, and thus they carried on their several employments, till at last they went out, like Apollos, eloquent men, and mighty in the scriptures; and the Lord was with them; so that they brought in a very greatest harvest into God's barn.

Mr Carter would not run before he was sent, though he was so excellently qualified for the work; he durst not venture upon the exercise of the holy work of the ministry till he had not only an inward but an outward call also, viz. an allignation, approbation, and solemn admission by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. When he was ordained, the bishop (who in their days was Primus Presbyter, or Praes) seeking to oppose him, asked him this question, Have you read the Bible through? Yes, said he, 'I have read the Old Testament twice through in the Hebrew, and the New Testament through in the Greek; and if you please examine me in any particular place, I shall endeavour to give you an account of it.' Nay, said the bishop, if it be so, I shall need to say no more to you; only some words of commendation and encouragement he gave him, and so with other assistants he ordained him.

Anno Christi, 1583. the vicarige of Bramford in Suffolk, near Ipswich, fell void, and Mr Rose of Canterbury, before mentioned, procured the presentation thereof for

Mr

Mr Carter, of the dean and chapter of Canterbury, in whose gift it was. The salary at first was only twenty marks per annum, but afterwards the church raised it to twenty pounds per annum, and that was the most that ever he had there, yet he accepted of it, and being settled in it, he set himself to do the work of Christ faithfully with all his might, 'as a workman that needed not to be ashamed.

Every Lord's day, he preached twice very powerfully, and catechised the younger sort. He also preached a lecture every Thursday, to which multitudes from Ipswich, and other adjacent places did resort: And God gave such success to his ministry, that by his labours many sons and daughters were from time to time begotten unto God. Many precious christians that remain unto this day, acknowlege, that their conversion was by Mr Carter's ministry.

Before his sermons he made but a short prayer, and that always in the same words: after sermon he used to be large, and full, and expressed himself with great variety of phrases, and with much fervency, and always he concluded with the 'Lords Prayer.'

He was very diligent in visiting the sick, especially the poorer sort; and he never went to a house of any poor creature, but he left a purse alms, as well as a spiritual alms of good, and heavenly advice, and prayer. No poor body ever came to his door that went away empty; his wife also looking to that as carefully as himself.

Every Saturday throughout the whole year he gave the milk of his cows to the poor of the town; and indeed he gave more to the poor every year than the revenue of his slender vicarage came to in the whole; yet God so blessed him, that whilst he was in Bramford, he quickly paid Mr Rose of Canterbury all the money that he had disbursed towards his education in the university; and before he purchased about twenty pound per annum; God's blessing only makes rich.

He had but two sons, and he brought them both up in learning, and maintained them in the university in good fashion.

He was sound and orthodox in his judgment: an able, and resolute champion against all manner of popery and arminianism; as also against anabaptism, and Brownism, which did then begin to peep up, and infest the church, or tear and rent the seamless coat of Christ.

He was always a nonconformist, one of the good old puritans in England. He never swallowed any of the ceremonies against his conscience: so that he was often troubled by the bishops, but God raised him up friends that always brought him off, and maintained his liberty. He was prudent, and of a peaceable spirit, and never censured any that could, and did conform, if he judged them conscientious, and saw any thing of God in them.

At his first coming to Bramford, he saw of the travel of his soul. He had a plentiful harvest, many souls being added to the church, by his powerful ministry and holy life. But after he had abode many years amongst them, the people began to be glutted with heavenly manna, and loathed it, so that there grew a great decay in their first love: and about the year 1615. or something before, there arose up a generation of malignant spirits, who were haters of a plain, powerful, and searching ministry, and of the life and power of godliness: these were the gentry and chief of the parish. These rose up against Mr Carter pressed him to conformity, complained of him to the bishop, and threatned that they would either bring him to conformity or eject him.

At this very juncture of time, through God's gracious providence the rectory of little Belsted fell to be void. A very small village, some three miles from Ipswich, and a solitary place; the means indeed was better than Bramford, yet short of a competency, and of the deserts of so eminent a pillar in the church of Christ: it being but about fifty pound, and at the most not worth above fifty pounds per annum.

The patron (Mr Bloss) became a suitor to Mr Carter to accept of it, which he refused again, and again, being resolved rather to endure persecution at Bramford, to grapple with all difficulties, and to die there, rather than to remove. But God's providence over ruled him. At Bramford he saw that he must be outed, and Mr Bloss would take no denial: yea, and he he found favour in the eyes of the bishop, so that he was instituted without subscription, or submitting to the ceremonies; and then at last, God (as it were) taking him by the hand, and pulling him whether he would or no, he removed from Bramford, after he had done faithful service in the work of the ministry for about thirty four years in that place, and was settled at elsted personage, where he continued eighteen years before God caused him to rest from his labours: and in all that time he discharged his holy function just as he had done in Bramford in his younger years; though his congregation here was but small: yet it pleased God that many fish came within the compass of his net from Ipswich, and other neighbouring towns, where they were destitute of faithful shepherds, so that his latter crop in God's harvest field, was very considerable.

Little Belsted was a Tusculanum to him, where in his old age he had much secret and sweet communion with God in the house, and as an Isaac, with him in the fields, which was a begining of that glorious communion which he now enjoys with God in the 'mountains of spices.' He 'being dead, yet speaks;' and his 'works praise him in the gates.' For from the press we have his learned and pithy commentary on the sermon of Christ in the mount: and two short, but substantial, solid, and profitable catechisms: one milk for children: the other, winter evening communication.

His pains in the study of the Revelations were indefatigable. He wrote much in a little room; but these labours of his yet never saw the light. Many ministers that privately did converse with him, lighted their candles at his.

For his carriage and deportment in his family, it was sober, grave, and very religious. He there offered up the morning and evening sacrifice of prayer, and praise continually; so that his house was a little church. Thrice a day he had the scriptures read, and after that the psalm or chapter, were ended, he used to ask all his children and servants what they remembred, and whatsoever sentences they rehearsed, he would speak sometime out of them that might tend to their edification. For his own and his wife,s habit, it was very plain, and homely, of the old fashion, yet very cleanly and decent; insomuch that all that came to his house would say, they had seen Adam and Eve, or some of the old patriarchs.

In all his house also, there was nothing but honest plainess. He was such a one as Jacob, a plain, sincere I had almost said a perfect man; I am sure a true Nathaniel, 'in whom was no guile.'

He never used any plate in his house, but vessels of wood and earth; pewter and brass were the highest mettals for his utensils. All the time of his house keeping he used constantly at his table a little wooden salt, which with age was grown to be of a duskish black, which was much taken notice of by all comers.

He never made feasts, yet always had wholesom, full and liberal diet in his house, and all fared alike: he and his wife, did never think that his children, and servants and poor folk did eat enough.

'The righteous man (says Solomon) is merciful to his beast:' So he was careful even for the brute creatures, that they should be fed to the full. All his cattle were like to the first kine that Pharaoh saw feeding in the meadow, they were fat fleshed, and well favoured; insomuch as some godly people used to say merrily: if they would be a cow, or a horse, or a hog, or a dog, they would chuse Mr Carter for their master.

He had a sharp wit, and was sweet, mild, affable, and pleasant in his conversation; yet were there not any of his most facetious passages, that did not savour of holiness. His communication and discourse was allways heavenly, and his eyes were frequently lifted up towards heaven: he did not eat or drink without praising God with his mouth and eyes. His 'whole conversation was in heaven.'

Besides his family duties, and prayers, he prayed constantly in his closet at his first going to his study, and before he came forth to dinner and supper. He prayed very loud, and mostly very long: for the extension of his voice he had a double reason: one, that by his earnest speech he

he might quicken, and raise up his own heart, and devotion: the other, that he might give a good example for secret prayer to his children and servants; and he never closed any prayer, without adding the Lord's prayer; and his ground for that practice was this; he judged his own best prayers imperfect, and that of Christ most perfect and comprehensive of all necessities.

That you may be the better satisfied concerning his sense and judgement of this matter, take this transcript out of his printed commentary upon Mat. vi. 9. Whereafter he hath set forth the excellency, and perfection of Christ's prayer, he addeth, "Christ now directs us to the right performance of the duty of prayer. 'After this manner pray ye:' or, as St. Luke sets it down, 'when ye pray say' Not binding us strictly to use these words always, and none other, but to use the matter, manner and like affections: but as for them who cannot so well enlarge their suits in other words, or for those also who can, and do it, and yet remain still unsatisfied, as not having done it sufficiently (and who can do it sufficiently?) the Lord Christ hath left this most excellent help to use the very words of this divine prayer, as the most worthy servants of God have ever used to do: and learn we here by the way, that an absolute necessity lieth upon us (which ought to be our greatest glory and comfort) to pray in these words, or in this manner. For it is the undispensible commandment of our Lord Christ:" 'after this manner pray.'

He had a special dexterity in comforting afflicted consciences; resolving doubts, and answering questions; when some came to him (not long before he changed this earthly for an heavenly mansion) and told him of the rigour of the prelates; how it grew higher every day, how they persecuted conscionable ministers and christians: of their innovations, and of the book for liberty of sports on the sabbath days, tending to the fearful profanation thereof: he used these expressions: 'I have had a longing desire to see, or hear of the fall of antichrist: but I check myself, I shall go to heaven, and there news of it will come thick thick, thick.

When others came to him, and pressed him with importunity to tell them his judgement concerning the future state of the church, saying to him, that he had travelled much in the study of the Revelations, and they were perswaded that God had revealed something more than ordinary to him. What do you think (said they) shall we have popery once again, or no? he answered, 'you shall not need to fear fire and faggot any more: but such dreadful divisions will be amongst God's people and professors, as will equalize the greatest persecutions.

A man meeting him near his house, called to him saying oh Mr Carter! what shall I do? my wife is entering into her travel, and I think she will die with very fear: Mr Carter answered, 'make haste, run to your wife, and tell her, that I am going to my closet as fast as I can to pray for her; therefore bid her not faint, but to be of good courage and comfort.' the man accordingly ran to his wife, and told her what had passed between Mr Carter and him, presently her fears vanished, God gave her strength, and she was delivered immediately, and safely: and strait after, her husband went to Mr Carter, (even before he came out of his closet) and told him what God had done for him.

Another time a poor man met him by the way, and cried to him piteously, saying, Mr Carter! what shall become of me? I work hard, and fare hard, and yet I cannot thrive, I continue bare, and know not how in the world to live. He answered him: 'yet still you want one thing, and I will tell you what you shall do, work hard and fare hard, and pray hard, and I will warrant you shall thrive.

There dwelled in that parish a tanner, that was a very godly man, and one that had much familiar society with Mr Carter. This man as he was very busie in tanning a hide with all his might, not so much as turning his head aside any way: Mr Carter coming by accidentally, came softly behind him, and merrily gave him a little clap on the back: the man started, and looking behind him suddenly, blushed, and said, sir, I am ashamed that you should find me thus: to whom Mr Carter replied, 'let Christ when he comes find me so doing:' what (said the man) doing thus? yes (said Mr Carter to him) 'faithfully performing the duties of my calling.'

Being at dinner at Ipswich at one of the magistrate's houses, divers other ministers being at the table also: one among the rest (who was old enough, and had learned enough to have taught him more humility) was very full of talk, bragged much of parts and skill, &c. and made a challenge, saying, here are many learned men, if any of you will propound any question in divinity, or philosophy, I will dispute with him, resolve his doubt and satisfie him fully. All at the table (except himself) were silent for a while: then said Mr Carter, (when he saw none else would speak) to him, calling him by his name: 'I will go no further than my trencher to puzle you: here is a sole: now tell me the reason why this fish that hath lived always in the salt water, should come out fresh? to this, this forward gentleman could say nothing, and so was laughed at, and shamed out of his vanity.

At another time a certain man came to him, and made his moan, saying, I have lost the greatest friend that I had in the world: I had (in a manner) all my livelihood from him: to whom Mr Carter answered: 'when the fountain is dried up in one place, God will open it in another.

To one of his sons he said, 'son John, God hath always brought water for me out of the hard flinty rock. Those covetous hard hearted men, who have been enemies to my person and ministry, have many times come in and given me countenance and maintenance.

His eldest son whom he had bred up to the ministry, and who proved a blessed instrument in the church of Christ, being dead, Mr Carter took care of his eldest son, sent him to Cambrige, and walking with him towards the stable took his leave of him, in these words in latin. Cave, mi fili, fastum, Ignaviam, antichristum. my son, beware of pride, sloth and antichrist.

His usual saying was, 'a traveller must have a swines belly, an ass's back, and a merchant's purse:' meaning that he must be content with any fare, bear all injuries, and provide for vast expences. We are pilgrims and travellers here, and we must prepare for wants, wrongs, and spoiling of our goods.

It might well be said of him, Semper erat ubi non erat: his heart was where his head was, and now his soul is, to wit, in heaven.

His whole life was nothing else but a communion-day: old Jacob seemed to live in him; and sure the spirit of God breathed as much in him, in his words and writings, (holiness dropped from his pen in every ordinary letter that he wrote) in his actions and soliloquies, as in any man's in these latter times. He was always instilling precious precepts, exhortations, instructions, or consolations into those with whom he had occasion to converse.

A godly woman told his son, that she had been servant to a religious gentleman to whose house Mr Carter did often resort, and that she was won to Christ at first, by hearing the heavenly speeches, and sweet principles that dropped from him as she was warming his bed, and as she waited upon him in his chamber.

He was always most just and exact in his dealings: he put a clause in his will, for the faithful and careful payment of his debts; yet when his son John and his daughter Eunice, whom he made his executors, enquired what his debts were, he could find nothing that he owed, except to the smith for shoeing of an horse or two.

His son when he came to look over his library, found two or three books, not one of them worth a groat, upon which he had written, 'This book was borrowed of such an one; let it be restored: or if the owner cannot be found, allow something to the poor for it, and that liberally.

Once, being in a journey many miles from home, in changing a piece of gold at a shop, he took a half-crown piece instead of a shilling neither he nor the shop-keeper knowing it; but as soon as he came home he found the mistake: whereupon he could not rest satisfied, but the next day took a long journey back again on purpose to that town, to carry back the half-crown again.

He was of a sweet, mild, and gentle nature, and of a gra-gracious ſpirit; a loving and faithful huſband to his wife, and a tender and indulgent father to his children; and if he failed in any thing, it was in his carriage to his ſervants, for truly he carried not himſelf to them as a maſter to his ſervants, but as a familiar friend to his friends: he would make them to ſit down with him at his table, and would drink to them at his meals

He and his wife were married together almoſt threeſcore years, and in all that time there was never heard any diſ uſteful word to paſs betwixt them. Neither indeed could it be otherwiſe, for he lived and walked with her as a man of knowlege: he was to her a prudent, faithful, and tender guide; and ſhe was humble, and meek reverenced and highly eſteemed him: every word he ſpake was an oracle to her, and her will ever cloſed with his judgment.

He lived to the age of fourſcore: when his youngeſt ſon John was born, who was the youngeſt of nine, he called him the ſon of his age, and yet he lived to ſee him forty years old before he died, being forty years old when he was born.

He was much and frequent in ſecret faſtings, and when he kept ſuch a day, he told none of his houſe of it, ſave his wife only, and ſhe would not eat any thing that day on which he faſted, but oftimes ſhe was with him in his retiring chamber to join with him in prayer; yet could it not be concealed from the reſt of the family, becauſe at night he ſupped not, but only had a toaſt, and a draught of ordinary beer to ſuſtain nature.

On the Sabbath days, he never had any roaſt meat at dinner, becauſe he would have none thereby kept from the public ordinances; the pot was hung on with a piece of beef and a pudding in it, and that was their conſtant Lord's days dinner, for well nigh ſixty years together.

His church at Belſted ſtood in a very ſolitary place, whereof he always kept a key, and would often reſort thither all alone. A gentleman once eſpying him as he went towards the church on a private day, hid himſelf till Mr Carter was paſt, and gone into the church, and then he came cloſe up to the church-wall, deſiring to peep in at ſome window to ſee what he did, and to liſten if he ſaid any thing; and this gentleman afterwards told his ſon John, that he firſt prayed, then read a chapter, and after that prayed largely, and very heavenly, as if he had been in his family, or in the public congregation.

He vigorouſly held on the conſtant courſe of his miniſtry to the laſt. It may be ſaid of him as of Caleb and Joſhua, he was as fit for ſervice in God's harveſt-field at fourſcore as he was of forty.

Indeed ſome abatement of bodily ſtrength there was, as old age did ſteal upon him. After his afternoon ſermon on the Sabbath days he would be ſomething faint, and commonly when he came home he would call for ſome comfortable draught, and when he had lifted up his eyes to heaven, and taken it, he would ſay to them about him, 'Theſe are crutches to ſhore up a ruinous houſe;' but in his intellectuals and ſpiritual ſtrength there was no decay.

Old Mr Benton of Wramplingham in Norfolk, a holy man of God, being upon occaſion in Suffolk in thoſe parts, could not but give a viſit to his old friend Mr Carter of Belſted; and being with him he heard him diſcourſe with ſuch holy gravity, and a mixture of all kind of learning, ſolidity, and wit, that he ſtood amazed at it, and ſaid, 'Mr Carter, I ſee you are like unto the palm and cedar tree, you bring forth more fruit in your age.' 'I thank you, (ſaid Mr Carter) you tell me what I ſhould be.'

And now the time of his departure was at hand; about a fortnight or three weeks before his tranſlation there appeared ſome decays in his body and memory, which now began to fail him: he would ſometimes (but rarely) call to go to ſea, and to his better country; yet he ſat up from morning to night, and commonly walked up and down the room, and never failed to perform prayer and other family exerciſes, ſo that none could diſcern any conſiderable defect either in his ſpiritual or natural ſtrength; only in this, that when he had done, he would preſently call to begin again; and ſay to his daughter Eunice, who was now the ſtay of his houſe, and the ſtaff of his old age, (God having taken away his dear wife about two years before) 'Daughter, ſhall we not go to prayer?' and when ſhe anſwered him, 'Sir, we have been at prayer already:' 'And you are weary, (he would reply) 'I fear we have not done what we ſhould do.'

It was one of his conſtant and ordinary petitions in every prayer, that God would vouchſafe him a merciful and eaſy paſſage out of this life, and the Lord did moſt graciouſly anſwer him therein.

February 21. in the year 1634, being the day before the Sabbath, in the evening, he called very earneſtly for paper, ink, and two pens; 'For, (ſaid he) by God's grace, to-morrow I will preach twice.' But, God knows, he was not in a fit condition for ſtudy; yet with that reſolution he went to bed, and God gave him ſome reſt that night. In the morning, upon the Sabbath day, he did riſe from his bed, as he uſed to do, and came out of his bed-chamber into the hall, and after prayer, he called for his ordinary breakfaſt, which he uſed before he went to church, (for ſtill he held his reſolution for preaching) which was an egg; he took it into his hand, but alas! it would not down; whereupon he ſaid to his daughter; 'Eunice, I am not able to go to church, yet I pray thee lead me to my bed, I will ly down a little and reſt me.' So he roſe up out of his chair and walked up and down, ſhe ſupporting him; and when he came to the parlour door, before he put his foot over the threſhold, 'Oh Eunice! (ſaith he) what ſhall I do?' Put your truſt, ſaith ſhe, in that God of whom you have had ſo much experience, who never yet did leave you nor forſake you. 'Yea, (ſaith he) the Lord be thanked.'

So he gathered up his ſtrength, went to the bed ſide, ſat down upon it, and immediately compoſed himſelf to ly down: he lifted up one of his legs upon the bed, without any great difficulty, laid down his body, and reſted his head upon the pillow. His daughter ſtill ſtood by, expecting when ſhe ſhould lift his other leg upon the bed, thinking he had been fallen aſleep; and ſhe was not miſtaken, for ſo he was; it proved his laſt ſleep: and before ſhe could diſcern any change in him, his ſoul had taken its flight into heaven, even into the arms and embraces of his bleſſed Saviour, whom he had faithfully ſerved all his life long; being about fourſcore years old.

He intended a Sabbath's labour for Chriſt, and Chriſt gave him reſt from his labour, even the reſt of an eternal Sabbath. When his daughter began to ſpeak to him, and to lift him, ſhe found that his breath was departed, yet was there not any change in his countenance at all; his eyes and his mouth continuing in the ſame poſture they uſed to be in his ſweeteſt ſleeps.

Thus the Lord gave unto his faithful ſervant the deſire of his ſoul, and a return of his prayers, ſuch an eaſy paſſage as that his death could not be diſcerned from a ſweet natural ſleep.

Not many days before his death he called his daughter, and ſaid to her, 'Daughter, remember my love to my ſon John, I ſhall ſee him no more in this life; and remember me to the reſt of my children and family, and deliver this meſſage to them all from me; 'Stand faſt in the faith, and love one another.' This was the laſt meſſage that ever he ſent to them.

He ended his life with a doxology, breathing out his laſt with theſe words, 'The Lord be thanked.'

When he had thus yielded up his ſpirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, his daughter Eunice diſpatched away a meſſenger to his ſon John at Norwich; for ſo had her father given order before he died, that his body ſhould not be put into a coffin till his ſon John came: and God carried him through the journey in hard weather, ſo that through God's providence, he arrived at Belſted early on Tueſday, and going into the houſe of mourning, he found the body of his deceaſed father ſtill lying upon the bed; they uncovered his face, and ſweetly he lay, and with a ſmiling countenance, and no difference appearing to the eye between his countenance alive and dead, only that he was wont to rejoice, and to bleſs his ſon at their meeting, and now he was ſilent: his ſon fell upon his face and kiſſed him, and lift up his voice and wept, and ſo took his laſt leave of him, till they ſhould meet in a better world.

February the 4th, in the afternoon, in the year 1634, was he interred, at which time there was a great confluence of people from all parts thereabout, miniſters and others thers, all taking up the words of Joash king of Israel, 'Oh! my father! my father! the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.'

Good Mr Samuel Ward, that famous divine, and the glory of Ipswich, came to the funeral, brought with him a mourning gown; and offered very respectfully to have preached his funeral sermon, now that such a congregation was gathered together, and upon such an occasion; but his son and daughter durst not give way unto it; for so their father had often charged them in his life time, and that upon his blessing, that there should be no sermon at his burial; 'for (said he) it may give occasion to speak some good of me that I deserve not, and so false things may be uttered in the pulpit.'

Mr Ward rested satisfied with this, and accordingly did forbear; but the next Friday at Ipswich, he turned his whole lecture into a funeral sermon for Mr Carter, in which he honoured him, and lamented the church's loss, to the great satisfaction of the whole auditory. Gloria fugientis sequitur.

Glory is like your shadow! follow it, and it will fly away from you; but fly from it, and it will follow you. And so it proved with Mr Carter.

He was most eminent for humility; humble he was in his habit, and humble in all his deportment; for though his gifts called him before great men, yet his most ordinary converse was with those of an inferior rank; in whom he saw most of the power of godliness; so that he might truly say with David, Psal. cxix. 63. 'I am companion of all that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.'

He wrote very much; but he left nothing behind him save what is printed, and his exposition upon the revelations, and a petition to king James for the taking away burdensome ceremonies out of the church: nothing else but a few broken papers which he regarded not. Probably he burnt the rest, when he saw his appointed time draw near, merely out of a low opinion of himself, and his own gifts.

He avoided all things that might tend to outward pomp and ostentation: he would have no funeral sermon: he left order in his will not to be buried in the church, but in the church-yard; where he and his wife, that glorious pair, ly interred together, without so much (or rather so little) as a poor grave-stone over them.

He had learned of Christ to be meek and lowly in heart: he was humble in his life, and humble in his death, and now the Lord hath highly exalted him.

He kept a constant diary, or day-book, in which every day he set down God's extraordinary dispensations, his own actions, or whatsoever memorable things he heard, or read that day.

He cast up his accounts with God every day; and his sins were blotted out before he came to his last reckoning his day of refreshing came, and he rests from his labours.

Plus vivitur exemplis quam preceptis, saith Seneca; Examples of the dead are sermons for the living.

He was a true child of Abraham, and the blessing of Abraham fell upon him. 'I will bless them (saith the Lord to him) that bless thee, and I will curse them that curse thee.'

Some years after his death, his son John being at Bramford, there was an antient gentleman that had lived there long, and was Mr Carter's old friend, who spake thus unto him, 'Mr Carter, I have now lived to see the downfall of all your father's opposites, and enemies; there is not one of them, but their families are scattered and come to ruin.' Let all the enemies of God's faithful messengers hear and fear, and do no more so wickedly.

It may be truly said of him, and his faithful yoke fellow, as it is written of Zacharias and Elizabeth, 'They were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.' And truly the world will, and can testify, that neither of them did ever do that thing that was evil, or unjust, or scandalous, or uncomely, even their enemies themselves being judges; they were, as to men, without blemish; their life was a sweet savour, and they went out of this life as a fragrant perfume.

This life was drawn up by Mr John Carter, junior, now also with the Lord; one who degenerated not from the steps of his learned and holy father, and by him was sent to me some years since, together with this ensuing epistle; which I have the rather inserted to provoke and stir up others, who can in this way revive the memories of the dead saints, to do it, which will be a more lasting monument to them, and far more beneficial and advantageous to the church of God, than any sumptuous and costly funerals, or grave-stones, whatsoever.

To my reverend Brother, and fellow Labourer in the Lord's Vineyard, Mr Samuel Clark, Pastor of Bennet Fink, London.

Worthy Sir,

THat which Naomi spake to Ruth concerning Boaz, 'He hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead,' it is fully verified of yourself; you cease not to shew kindness to the living and to the dead. To the living, by your preaching and ministry you make saints daily. To the dead saints you shew kindness, by perpetuating their names, to their honours, and the good of many: and herein you are a great gainer; you shine yourself, by making others shine. Amongst the rest of those that honour you, I am one, though I never saw your face, otherwise than in the frontispiece of your learned books.

In the first part of your Marrow of Ecclesiastical History, we had information, that you did resolve to add a second part, and to put in the lives of such godly divines, and others, as were eminent in these latter times, if you were furnished with faithful informations; hereupon, divers did set upon me, with very great importunity, to write the life of my dear father, and to send it to you. Truly, worthy Sir, I was desirous of the thing, but durst not undertake the work: I was sensible of mine own weakness, and also that his sayings and doings had so far slipped the memories of this generation, that I should have brought to light such an imperfect thing, as rather would have been a blemish to so eminent a saint, than any honour; hereupon I laid aside all thoughts of meddling, or attempting such a thing. I know that he is glorious in heaven, and on earth too, so far as his name is spread.

Now, good Sir, let me be bold to give a short account of myself. Some few days since I went about to make a new diary for myself; I was desirous in the first place, to set down some passages of my father, for mine own satisfaction and use. I began so, and before I was aware, it amounted to so much, as I thought better that that should be published, than nothing at all: and at last my spirit grew restless, I could not satisfy myself till I had digested it into some order, and made it public. And now, Sir, here it is; I present it to your judicious view; accept it in good part from a meer stranger.

My humble request to you, worthy Sir, is this, that, though I slipped the last opportunity, yet if you shall set forth any more lives, or if you shall have a new impression of any of the former, that you would extract so much of my precious father's life as you shall judge fit, and place it where you please in your Ecclesiastical history. Your monuments will be lasting in after ages, when my poor pamphlet will be worn out with time. Pardon my boldness: The Lord lengthen out your days, for the good of his church, and the honour of his saints.

Your most observant friend and brother, that truly honoureth you,
JOHN CARTER.

The Life of Dr RICHARD SIBS, who died Anno Christi 1635.

RICHARD SIBS was born upon the edges of Suffolk, near Sudbury, and being trained up at school, when he was grown ripe and ready for the university, he was sent to Cambridge, in the year 1595, and was admitted into St John's college, where he, by his sedulity and industry, so profited in learning, and approved himself by his godly and blameless conversation, that he was promoted from one degree to another in the college; being chosen first firſt ſcholar, and then fellow of that houſe: he alſo took all the degrees of the univerſity, with general approbation and applauſe.

It pleaſed God to convert him by the miniſtry of Paul Bains, whilſt he was lecturer at St Andrews in Cambridge. And when Mr Sibs had been maſter of arts ſome while, he entered into the miniſtry, and ſhortly after was choſen lecturer himſelf at Trinity church in Cambridge, to whoſe miniſtry, beſides the townſmen, many ſcholars reſorted, ſo that he became a worthy inſtrument of begetting many ſons and daughters unto God, beſides the edifying and building up of others.

He ſometimes had a little ſtammering in the time of his preaching, but then his judicious hearers always expected ſome rare and excellent notion from him, as Dr Gouge, his frequent hearer, told me.

About the year 1625, or 26, he was choſen maſter of Katharine-hall in Cambridge, the government whereof he continued till his dying day; and indeed, like a faithful governor, he was always very ſolicitous and careful to procure and advance the good of that little houſe; for he procured good means and maintainance, by his intereſt in many worthy perſons, for the enlargement of the college, and was a mean and inſtrument to eſtabliſh learned and religious fellows there; inſomuch as in his time it proved a very famous ſociety for piety and learning, both in fellows and ſcholars.

But before this, viz. about the year 1618, he was choſen preacher to Gray's inn, one of the learneſt ſocieties in England, where his miniſtry found ſuch general approbation and acceptance, that beſides the learned lawyers of the houſe, many noble perſonages, and many of the gentry and citizens reſorted to hear him, and many, till this day, bleſs God for the benefit which they received by him.

His learning was mixed with much humility, whereby he always eſteemed lowly of himſelf, and was ready to undervalue his own labours, though others judged them to breathe ſpirit and life, to be ſtrong of heaven, ſpeaking with authority and power to mens conſciences. His care in the courſe of his miniſtry was to lay a good foundation in the heads and hearts of his hearers; and though he was a wiſe maſter builder, and that in one of the eminent eſt auditories for learning and piety that was in the land, as was ſaid before; yet, according to the grace which was given to him, (which was indeed like that of Eliſha, in regard of the other prophets. 2 Kings i. 9. the elder brother's privilege, a double portion) he was ſtill taking all occaſions to preach of the fundamentals to them, and amongſt the reſt, of the incarnation of the ſon of God, one of the chief fundamentals of our faith, one of the chief of thoſe wonders in the mercy-ſeat, which the cherubims gaze at, which the angels deſire to pry into, 1 Pet. i. 12. And preaching at ſeveral times, and by occaſion of ſo many ſeveral texts of ſcripture concerning this ſubject, there is ſcarce any one of thoſe incomparable benefits which acrue to us thereby, nor any of thoſe holy impreſſions, which the meditation hereof ought to work in our hearts, which was not by him ſweetly unfolded, as may appear by thoſe ſermons now in print: and therefore, ſaith a reverend divine, 'The noted humility of the author I leſs wonder at, finding how often his thoughts dwelt upon the humiliation of Chriſt.'

As for his ſermons upon Cant. v. reverend and holy Mr Dod, upon the peruſal of the manuſcript, was ſo taken with them, that he profeſſed that he found them ſo full of heavenly treaſure, and containing ſuch lively expreſſions of the unvaluable riches of the love of Chriſt towards all his poor ſervants, that ſue and ſeek unto him for it, that by his great importunity he prevailed with Dr Sibs, otherwiſe much undervaluing his own meditations, to commit the ſame to the preſs; to which Mr Dod gave this atteſtation:

'I (ſaith he) judge it altogether unmeet, that ſuch precious matter ſhould be concealed from the public uſe. I judge theſe ſermons a very profitable and excellent help, both to the underſtanding of that dark and moſt divine ſcripture, as alſo to kindle in the heart all heavenly affections towards Jeſus Chriſt; the whole frame whereof is carried with ſuch wiſdom, piety, and experience, that it commends itſelf to all that are godly wiſe; and I doubt not but they ſhall find their temptations anſwered, their fainting ſpirits revived, their underſtandings enlightened, and their graces confirmed; ſo that they ſhall have cauſe to praiſe God, for the worthy author's godly and painful labours.

Indeed he was thoroughly ſtudied in the holy ſcriptures, which made him a man of God, 'perfect, thoroughly furniſhed unto every good work:' and, as became a faithful ſteward of the manifold graces of God, he endeavoured to teach to others the whole counſel of God, and to reſtore them, with the knowlege of God's will, in all wiſdom and ſpiritual underſtanding.

He was a man that enjoyed much communion with God, 'walking in all the laws of God blameleſs:' and, like John the Baptiſt, was 'a burning and ſhining light,' waſting and ſpending himſelf to enlighten others.

He was upon all occaſions very charitable, drawing forth, not only his purſe in relieving, but his very bowels in commiſerating the wants and neceſſities of the poor members of Chriſt.

He uſed ſometimes, in the ſummer-time, to go abroad to the houſes of ſome worthy perſonages, where he was an inſtrument of much good, not only by his private labours, but by his prudent counſel and advice, that upon every occaſion he was ready to miniſter unto them.

And thus having done his work on earth, he went to receive his wages in heaven, peaceably and comfortably reſigning up his ſpirit unto God, in the year 1631, and of his age 58.

The Life of Dr LAURENCE CHADERTON, who died Anno Chriſti 1640.

LAURENCE CHADERTON was born of an antient family at Chatterton in Lancaſhire, about the year 1546; and his parents being both papiſts, they trained him up in that religion, yet bred him to learning; and when he came to ſome maturity of years, his father ſent him to the inns of court; but he being not pleaſed with that kind of life, through the motion of God's holy ſpirit, who had a work for him to do in another calling and place, left the inns of court, and went to Cambridge, about the twentieth year of his age, and the ſixth year of queen Elizabeth: and getting ſome acquaintance in Chriſt's college, it pleaſed God that the maſter and fellows took ſuch a liking to him, for his ingenuity and induſtry, that they admitted him into a poor ſcholar's place.

Then did he write to his father, to acquaint him with his preſent condition, and to requeſt ſome means of maintainance from him: but his father diſliking his change of place and ſtudies, but eſpecially of religion, ſent him a pock, with a groat in it, to go a begging with; further ſignifying to him, that he was reſolved to diſinherit him, which he alſo did; yet did the Lord ſupport his ſpirit, to prefer an heavenly before an earthly inheritance; and ſeeing that he had nothing elſe to truſt to, he fell cloſe to his ſtudies; and through God's bleſſing upon the ſame, he ſo eminently profited in all ſorts of learning, that in the year 1567, being but yet batchelor of arts, he was choſen fellow of Chriſt's college. In the year 1578. he commenced batchelor of divinity; and the ſame year, October 26. he preached a ſermon at Paul's croſs, which he alſo printed.

He was choſen lecturer at St Clement's church in Cambridge, which place he ſupplied about the ſpace of ſixteen years, and by his holy, learned, and judicious ſermons did very much good, and was ſucceeded therein by Mr Michael Bentley, fellow of Chriſt's college, a godly, plain, and profitable preacher.

He was a man famous for gravity, learning, and religion; ſo that when Sir Walter Mildmay (counſellor of ſtate to queen Elizabeth, chancellor, and under-treaſurer of the exchequer) founded Emmanuel college, in the year 1584, he made choice of this man for the firſt maſter; and when Mr Chaderton ſhewed himſelf not unwilling to undertake that great charge, Sir Walter replied, ſaying, 'If you will not be the maſter, I will not be the founder of it.'

In the beginning of king James's reign, he was one of the four divines for the conference at Hampton-court, choſen chosen by the ministers that desired a reformation in the church government; and for his learning and sufficiency was the same year chosen to be one of the translators of the Bible.

In the year 1612, when the prince elector Palatine came to visit Cambridge, he would needs have Mr Chaderton commence doctor of divinity, which accordingly he did.

He deserved very well of Emmanuel college, for whereas the founder gave allowance for the maintainance of three fellows only, together with the advouson of Stranground rectory in Huntingtonshire, near Peterburrough, Dr Chaderton procured, by his friends and acquaintance, allowance for twelve fellows, and above forty scholars of the house, besides the advousons of Auler and Northcud-berry rectories; as also of the vicarage of Dulverton in Somersetshire, Piddle Hinton in Dorcetshire and Loughburrow in Leicesterthire, of the noble Henry Hastings earl of Huntington, which nobleman was a great friend to godly ministers.

After he was master of Emmanuel, his manner was, not to suffer any young scholars to go into the country to preach, till he had heard them first in the college chappel. All his younger days he used to expound a portion of scripture twice a week in his family.

He was married fifty three years, and yet in all that time he never kept any of his servants from church to dress his meat, saying, that he desired as much to have his servants know God as himself. If at any time he had a servant upon trial, though they could do as much work as three others yet if they were given to lying, or any other vice, he would by no means suffer them to dwell in his house.

Towards his latter end Arminianism began to sprout up apace in the university, and he being fearful that an Arminian might come to succeed him in his place after his death, resolved if he could procure a godly and worthy man, to resign his place to him in his life time, which accordingly he did to famous Dr Preston, whom he yet survived, and saw after him Dr Sancroft, and after him Dr Holsworth, to succed in his mastership.

He was of a very charitable disposition, insomuch as if he heard of any godly minister that was in want, he would send them forty or fifty shillings at a time.

Though he lived till he was very old, yet his sight remained very good, as may appear by this example:

A little before his death, an old servant of his came to see him, and found him reading in a book so that at the first he took no notice of her; but when she came nearer, lifting up his head, he spake to her, asking her what o'clock it was; she told him eleven. I have, said he, here got a book that I have been reading of ever since eight o'clock, for I like it very well: and yet all that time he had read without spectacles.

He lived eighteen years after the resignation of his mastership and in November 1640 resigned up his spirit unto God, being about the age of ninety four years, and was buried in St Andrew's church: Dr Richard Holsworth, then master of Emmanuel, preached his funeral sermon, and gave him a large and deserved commendation.

The Life of Mr JOHN BALL, who died Anno Christi 1640.

JOHN BALL was born about the year 1585, at Cassington, an obscure village, a mile from Hanborough, in Oxfordshire: he being set to school at Yarnton, was found so apt to learn, that the school master prevailed with his parents, though of low estate, to continue him scholar there till he was fitted for the university. God's providence, by means of friends, made way for his placing in Brazen nose college in Oxford, where he improved very much in the knowlege of the arts, and he proved a quick disputant.

When he was batchellor of arts, wanting means for his maintainance to continue longer in the university, he accepted a motion made for his removal into the country, and was placed in lady Cholmley's house in Cheshire, as tutor to her children, where many other children also were taught by him. And though he came raw and unprounded in religion (as himself was wont to express it), from Oxford, yet within a short time there appeared (with the increase of his scholastical abilities) the breakings forth of the power of godliness in his conversation, unto them who were most religious and judicious there, who thereupon took him into their society, for mutual edification in the ways of God's fear: whereas there was a great scarcity of godly and painful preachers in that corner of the country, in those times, he did much frequent the ministry of reverend Mr John Ford, whereby he was not a little edified.

He had few books, and therefore perused the more seriously such as he had under-hand. Calvin's life, published by Beza, and his commentary upon the psalms, made deep impressions upon his spirit.

Growing into acquaintance with the most godly people in those parts, who much lamented the evils of the times, he often associated with them, in keeping private days of fasting and prayer. Himself, with some other Christians, were often convented to Chester, and much troubled there, for keeping a fast on ascension day, their fault being aggravated by the bishop and his officers, because they fasted upon that holy day.

As he took not up any opinion or practice till he had well weighed it, so was he not much moved by any trouble which assaulted him in his way. When others judged him ripe for the ministry, he was not hasty in adventuring upon that calling, because he was sensible of the weight thereof, and also desirous to satisfy his conscience concerning the way of entrance by episcopal subscription: and upon the serious studying of the points in controversy, betwixt the bishops and non-conformists, he was dissatisfied to yield unto that subscription which was then strictly commanded.

Some conflicts he had with the then bishop of Chester, about non conformity; but though he looked upon a bishop in those times as a formidable creature, yet he came off unshaken.

Having resolved upon the encouragement given by judicious divines, to enter into the ministry, when God should make a fair way for his admission, without subscription, by the intercession of friends, he, with Mr Julines Herring, (who afterwards was famous for the work of the Lord in Salop), were made ministers by an Irish bishop, being occasionally in London, with freedom from the forementioned snare.

About the year 1610, he was called to be minister at Whitmore, a small village near unto Newcastle in Staffordshire, where he was entertained into the house of Edward Mainwayring, esq; a pious and much esteemed gentleman.

Here he married a godly wife, whom God had provided as an help meet for him, (he himself being always a meer scholar, neither much minding nor intermedding in worldly affairs, beyond the bounds of his calling) by whom he had six sons and one daughter. Six of his children were born unto him while he continued in Mr Mainwraying's family, where he found much love, and did much service; for every evening he expounded a portion of scripture, which was read in course, and many mornings also was helpful in catechising of the family. Hither many ministers and others had often recourse unto him for counsel, where they were always friendly entertained; and the Lord blessed that family very much, which doth still shew much kindness unto the children of this good man.

Afterwards he removed, with his own family, unto an house which Mr Mainwayring had built for him, where he had his seventh and last child born to him, and where he dwelt till his death.

He was a great lover of learning, and therefore laid out, in the first years of his ministry, all the money which he could spare, from necessary expences, in buying good books, with which he was so well acquainted (having both a quick understanding and strong memory) that he could readily give an account of all passages most remarkable in them.

He had so well studied Bellarmine's controversies, that it is scarcely credible what relation he could make ex tempore of them, from point to point; and shew from particular to particular, where the fallacy and the weakness of his his arguments did appear: And the like might be truly atteſted in reference unto the Arminian diſputes and the other church controverſies, both in former and latter times.

It was his cuſtom to read over a book, when once he undertook it; and no man could be more cautious in entertaining opinions without much mature conſideration, having well weighed all arguments produced on both ſides, both for and againſt them; and wherein his apprehenſions were different from his brethren, he did wiſely forbear to vent them in ſuch ſort, as might occaſion any diviſion or offence.

Oh! how well had it been with England, if all other men had managed their ſtudies and practices according to this pattern? for then, ſo many ſparks (cried up as new lights) had not been kindled amongſt us, which, being blown abroad by pride and ignorance, do threaten to ſet the whole world on fire.

But, to proceed in the narrative of this worthy man's life; he was ſo enriched with knowlege, both in practical and polemical divinity; he was ſo able to interpret and reconcile difficult ſcriptures; he had ſuch dexterity in dealing with afflicted conſciences, and he was ſo well furniſhed with miniſterial gifts for preaching, prayer, and the adminiſtration of both ſacraments, that it was not eaſy to diſcover wherein he moſt excelled. His ability to counſel and comfort dejected tempted Chriſtians, was occaſioned (as himſelf would acknowlege) by his converſing with Mrs Sarah Mainwayring, wife to the gentleman in whoſe houſe he continued many years, as was before mentioned. who was much exerciſed in that kind, and was an unparallelled gentlewoman for holy tenderneſs and exactneſs in religion.

Willing he was to take every talent with which God had truſted him, as opportunity was offered; and he was a man moſt unwearied in all ways of ſervice.

As he took extraordinary paids in public, ſo did he alſo in private, eſpecially on the Lord's day. For having by way of preparation upon the Saturday in the afternoon, ſpent about two hours in his houſe, in praying and expounding ſome ſcriptures, (to which exerciſe divers did reſort) on the Sabbath morning, he expounded a portion of ſcripture in his family, (whereof many neighbours were partakers:) then he preached twice in public, read divers chapters, and catechiſed alſo in the afternoon, ſpending much time therein, (eſpecially in the ſummer ſeaſon) after the evening ſermon, he went into Mr Mainwayring's houſe (being near at hand,) where he repeated both his ſermons, and prayed; likewiſe after ſupper he had another exerciſe in his own family, equivalent to a ſermon, unto which divers well affected of the neighbourhood did repair. Theſe his great labours were the more wonderful in that they were ſo excellent and ſolid, as many miniſters and ſcholars yet living know, who did often frequent them. He taught a ſchool alſo, (both from a deſire to do good, and that he might provide the more comfortable ſubſiſtance for his family) having not only the children of poor neighbours, (for he refuſed none that were willing to learn, but of perſons of better quality ſent unto him; ſome whereof were tabled in his own houſe, and the reſt placed in the neighbourhood. Every morning of the ſix days in the week, he inſtructed his own children, and ſcholars in the principles of religion, whereby many young ones (of whom ſome are now miniſters,) were well ſeaſoned and ſetled in the grounds of godlineſs. Every night likewiſe he opened and applied ſome portion of the ſcripture, for the edification of his family.

And beſides his frequent preaching at lectures, at Madeley eſpecially, where he was the principal upholder of a weekly ſermon, and a monthly faſt, and his helpfulneſs in holy faſting and prayer elſewhere, when deſired, it was his cuſtom to ſet apart days, when freed from attendance upon his ſchool, for the ſolemn ſeeking of God, with his godly neighbours, as the neceſſities of the times did require.

He was moſt ready to communicate his learning, graces, experiences, yea, his all, for the profit of ſuch who converſed with him: the remembrance whereof is very ſmarting upon the hearts of ſome of his ſurviving friends, becauſe they made not a fuller improvement of him for their own advantage.

In the latter part of his time he had ſome ſcholars whom he inſtructed in academical learning, reading lectures to them in logic and philoſophy, and hearing them to diſpute, which often they did during his dinner time: and while he was at ſupper, other ſcholars read a piece of Greek or Latin, ſo exceeding diligent was he in husbanding the ſhreds of time, as he called them; the reſidue of the day, till very late, he ſpent in his private ſtudy.

And as he was incomparably abſtemious and moderate in the uſe of meat, drink, ſleep, and apparel, ſo he had an admirable command over his paſſions; for thoſe who moſt converſed with him never ſaw inordinate out-breaches of anger, or other affections in his converſation.

This character was given by a friend who was much with him, viz, 'That as Mr Dod did turn earth into heaven, by a ſpiritual improvement of all earthly affairs, ſo Mr Ball did reconcile earth and heaven, becauſe worldly occaſions were no diſtractions to him in his journey thither.'

He lived upon a ſmall maintainance, viz. twenty pounds per annum, for ſerving the cure at Whitmore and the keeping of one cow both ſummer and winter, by Mr Mainwayring aforeſaid, with what he got by teaching ſchool; yet he would often ſay, that he thought never man paſſed through this world with leſs care. God indeed ſtirred up ſome friends, who knew his great worth and mean outward condition, to be helpful unto him. towards whom he was always really reſpectful, requiting their love by his daily prayers, and his readineſs upon all occaſions to do ſervice unto them and theirs. Through God's ſingular bleſſing upon his yearly incomes, he lived very comfortably, was given to hoſpitality, and alſo unto liberality unto the poor, conſidering his eſtate, and left a good competency unto his wife and children: yea, ſuch was this holy man's gratitude and contentment, that he would ſay, 'I have enough, and enough,, and enough.' Whereas he went once every year into Oxfordſhire, to expreſs his dutiful reſpect unto his aged parents, he made choice of that time for his journey, that he might enjoy the benefit of Oxford act. And as his love to learned diſputations was large, ſo, by ſtrength of memory, he could give a punctual account of all the moſt conſiderable arguments urged, and anſwers returned, upon the ſeveral queſtions diſcuſſed.

And ſtill this journey was made profitable unto his Chriſtian friends, near to whoſe dwellings he travelled, by conference, his aſſiſtance in private faſts, and other exerciſes of religion.

It would be too tedious and tiring unto the reader, if relation ſhould be made of all thoſe memorable paſſages in this reverend man's life, (which his friends ſurviving do well remember) which did proclaim the high degree of holineſs with which God adorned and crowned all his other great abilities, therefore ſome few of them only ſhall be reported.

His conſtant carriage towards all who converſed with him, did ſpeak out his deep humility, for always he was apt to prefer others before himſelf: and he was never obſerved, by any reproachful ſpeeches, or behaviour; to caſt the leaſt contempt or diſcouragement upon the meaneſt Chriſtian.

He was all his life long very apprehenſive and ſenſible of the weightineſs of the miniſter's calling, ſaying, 'That no man ſhould dream of eaſe by that function;' and would often much bewail before the Lord in prayer his own inconſiderate entrance upon it. A friend being weary of teaching ſchool, and acquainting him with his purpoſe to enter into the miniſtry, Mr Ball told him, 'That he would find it a far heavier taſk to teach men than boys.' And a fellow miniſter telling him of his danger to be ſilenced by the biſhop, he returned this anſwer. 'If he ſhould ſo deal with me, I would put off my hat and thank him.'

Having experimentally poiſed the weight of the miniſter's work. he would ſay unto his non conforming brethren, when prelatical perſecution threatened to drive him out of England, 'If we be neceſſitated to tranſplant ourſelves, you ſhall preach, and I will teach ſchool' And always, when other miniſters were in company, he would endeavour earneſtly to put them upon the performance of family

family duties, as judging them to be better able than himſelf.

Such who knew this man's learning of all kinds, and rich miniſterial gifts, will admire (upon the conſideration of theſe paſſages) at the forwardneſs of illiterate mecanicks in theſe times, to intrude upon the miniſter's office And whereas the bleſſed apoſtle himſelf cried out, 'Who is ſufficient for theſe things! we may do more than gueſs what ſpirit animateth thoſe men, whoſe practices ſpeak thus; 'who is inſufficient for theſe things.'

He did lay to heart the want of laborious learning amongſt godly miniſters, becauſe ſo many neglected to acquaint themſelves throughly with the controverſies of of the times; and he thought that poſitive divinity might be beſt gained by the ſtudy of controverſy; when the main principles were firſt well drunk in. He would ſay that a ſubtle jeſuite would make wild work in many places of England, becauſe neither the people nor their miniſters had ſufficient inſight into the points of differences betwixt us and the papiſts. Now what other errors, (no whit leſs dangerous,) have for the ſame reaſons been entertained of late years, (as he foreſaw and feared) it is too notorious.

Although he himſelf was much pleaſed with ſober, profitable diſputations, yet he would ſhrink with trouble upon the appearance of their audacity, who dared to queſtion foundamentals in religion, or to ſpeak ſlightly of the matters of God. Once obſerving a man in the heat of conference, carried beyond the bounds of modeſt enquiry after the truth, he uſed theſe words with holy admiration; 'and whither will the love of arguing carry a man!

He compared many profeſſors of late times, unto young travellers, who ſo ſoon as they are mounted, begin to gallop, and do outride their fellows; but they either fall ſhort, or come late if (not lame) home.

And he called the ways of ſeparation a labyrinth, wherein men tire themſelves and grow giddy, as in amaze; but when all is done, there is no way out, but that whereby they entred.

He made it his buſineſs to raiſe and maintain high and honourable thoughts of God at all times, as himſelf would often times ſpeak of the titles of the Almighty, with much gravity and reverence, endeavouring to draw forth holy thankfulneſs in all conditions of life. Here two or three things ſhall be touched upon, to give a taſte of this good man's gracious ſpirit

He with a neighbour miniſter, having occaſion to meet at a place, where they had only bread and cheeſe to their dinner, the maſter of the houſe expreſſing trouble, that he had no better proviſion for ſo good unexpected gueſts: hereupon he ſaid, that it would coſt a man many years labour, to be truly and throughly thankful unto God for one piece of bread and cheeſe, proceeding to diſcover, moſt divinely, the many mercies which were to be acknowleged in that meal and meeting.

And whereas at that time Rochel was beſieged, and the inhabitants were in great diſtreſs through want of food, he moved a ſerious conſideration, how much bread and cheeſe with peace and fellowſhip would be valued at Rochel: yea, he ſeriouſly made his demand, whether their obligations at the preſent place and meeting, were not much greater, becauſe they in their inſtant enjoyments, had not experienced Rochel's fears and ſorrows.

At another time a dear friend relating his great danger by a fall off his horſe in a journey, and ſaying, that he never had received ſuch a deliverance. Mr Ball anſwered, yea, an hundred times, viz. 'ſo often as you have riden and not fallen; becauſe the preventing of perils is to be prized as much as our reſcuing out of them.

At a marriage feaſt, where chriſtian friends, were civily rejoicing in the good occaſion of their meeting, the many good bleſſings provided for their comfort, and in their mutual ſociety, this ſpeech came from him with much gravity; 'one thought of Jeſus Chriſt reaching the heart, is more to be valued, than all creature contentments whatſoever, tho' they ſhould be enjoyed in their fulneſs for a thouſand years without interruption.

That he might keep God's ſervants of the loweſt parts, always high in his own eſtimation, he would wiſely weigh their peculiar ſerviceableneſs in ſome kind or other, tho' they were inferiors in ſundry excellencies. Hereupon when one admiring worthy Mr Dod's holy converſation, ſaid, 'oh how well would it be if all miniſters were like unto him;' Mr Ball anſwered, the church would be quite undone if all others were like him. For tho' no man more honoured Mr Dod, (which not many years before his death he witneſſed, by liſtning unto his fatherly counſel bare headed, with his hat in his hand,) yet he knew that other men, much inferior in graces, had ſome ſpecial way of advantage to the cauſe and the people of God.

He was a zealous oppoſite to paſſionate frowardneſs, obſerving the lamentable fruits thereof, in many perſons and relations, and he had an extraordinary dexterity to calm them who were boiſterous. He would thus adviſe them, 'Put judgment into office; for affections are good followers, but bad guides. Look well to your hearts, for paſſion is the effect of pride.' And he would ſay unto them, 'You had need to get a ſtrong bit and bridle, for you ride an unruly horſe.' Obſerving one bitterly to bewail the death of a dear friend, he ſaid, 'rather labour to get good by it.'

He was wont to humble paſſionate profeſſors, who in their heat would ſpeak unadviſedly, by this poſition, he would undertake to prove, (viz) 'that a moral heathen who never heard of Chriſt, might poſſibly by watchfulneſs, ſecure himſelf from uttering one froward word all the his life long;' And therefore it was a great ſhame for Chriſtians to be worſe, who had more grace and greater helps to ſeppreſs ſin. This was one parcel of good counſel, which he commonly beſtowed in all caſes, 'Inform judgment, ſet faith on work; be of good courage.' As he uſed to be large in his prayers in behalf of the church of God, (according to the peculiar concernments thereof) both at home and abroad, ſo was he particular in minding his ſpecial friends before the Lord, and in the ſpiritual welfare of his children was ſo much upon his heart, that he daily deſired to lodge them in God's boſom; yea, he ſeldom gave thanks either before or after meat, (eſpecially towards the end of his life) without ſome touch of tendency towards his children, in reference unto whom this was one conſtant petition, 'that they might never ſeek great things for themſelves in this world.' And his own practice from his youth, proved the ſincerity of his heart in this ſuit, becauſe he never looked after, nor would entertain any motion of removing or wealth or wordly promotion, tho' his charge was great, and his eminency, both in miniſterial and ſcholaſtical gifts, with the power of godlineſs, which did ſhine in his whole converſation, gained him many friends, and rendered him in their account, a man more meet for a place of public note and reſort, than the village where he dwelt.

When the prelatical oppoſition againſt the Non-conformiſt was hot and high, he ſpake thus unto a neighbour brother; 'Be confident, that although all who are now known Non-conformiſts were dead and gone: yet God would rather raiſe ſome out of our aſhes to proteſt againſt Epiſcopacy and the ceremonies, than ſuffer that cauſe to fall unto the ground.' He would ſay, The Fathers wanted ſome of our light, but we want more of their heat.'

He was exemplarily careful to preſerve God's ordinances from pollution and contempt, and therefore did always take great pains with his people, to prepare them for the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper. In his ſermons, he was wont to tell his auditors, that their perſecuting, impoveriſhing, impriſoning, and thruſting daggers into their miniſters bodies, would not be more grievous than their unworthy communicating at the Lord's table, and their unanſwerable walking unto the ordinances of graces diſpenced amongſt them. And when parents preſented their children in the congregation to be baptized, he would very affectionately lay open their duty, preſſing ſacramental engagements home to their hearts, with ſtrong arguments and authority miniſterial; though no man was known by his friends, who more diſreliſhed the corruption in church-government, and in adminiſtrations of holy worſhip, yet he hath ſufficiently publiſhed unto the world his great diſlike of the way of ſeparation from our church aſſemblies upon ſuch pretences. Thus, he ſpake unto a friend, who had moved him to maintain our church communion againſt the the Separatiſts, 'How little am I beholding unto you, who drew me from more profitable ſtudies, to peruſe thoſe ſapleſs ſpeculations?'

He much lamented in his prayers before God, the firſt breakings out of independency in England, both in reſpect of the preſent offence, and the woful conſequences thereof, whereof he was much afraid: yea, he did very often tell his friends (both in the time of his health and laſt ſickneſs) that if God ſhould give opportunity and hopes of church reformation, that we might be eaſed of our preſent grievances, the brethren of the new ſeparation, would be found the greateſt obſtructers thereof.

His remembrance of the hiſtory of former ſeparations, (with which he was fully acquainted) and his prudential foreſight of the diducts which would neceſſarily follow from their principles, (viz. anabaptiſm, &c.) together with his wiſe inſight into the diſpoſitions of ſome perſons who then appeared therein; theſe were the grounds of his foretelling the confuſions, the ſpreading of pernicious errors, and hinderances of reformation, which we have ſince ſadly ſuffered under. Theſe reaſons of his predicti on (which is noiſed abroad) are expreſſed, leſt any ſhould imagine him to have inclined to regard injections and impulſions of the ſpirit, which ſome cry up as propheti cal. His diſtaſte whereof may be evidenced by this one inſtance, viz. being aſked by one, who much pretended unto immediate inſpirations beſides ſcripture, whether he at any time had experience thereof in his own heart? his anſwer was this, 'No, I bleſs God; and if I ſhould ever have ſuch phantaſies, I hope God would give me grace to reſiſt them.

When there was diſcourſe concerning the new, (or rather the renewed) errors, which were broached, he would ordinarily ſay, 'A good treatiſe of the ſufficiency of the ſcriptures would put an end unto theſe matters.' His exceeding love to ſtudy, and his great modeſty cauſed unwillingneſs to go far from home, or to appear public in any kind. And if the extraordinary importunity of ſome much eſteemed friends, had not conquered this averſeneſs, he would in probability never have printed any thing in his own name, or have come into the company of perſons of chief place and quality; yet God was pleaſed in both theſe ways to make him ſerviceable. For, beſides the profit which many have received from his printed books, he was happily inſtrumental by conference to preſerve ſome men of chief eſteem, (in regard of their piety, parts, and places of command) in the countries where he lived, from warping towards the ways of new ſeparation, upon the ſolicitation of ſuch who were buſy ſticklers therein.

Upon the calling of the parliament in the year 1640, ſome hopes being conceived that he might be an inſtrument of public benefit to the church, by dealing with ſome parliament-men, that (if further reformation of things wofully out of order, could not be procured), men unconformable to the ceremonies might not be thruſt out, and kept out of the miniſtry in that regard. He thereupon took a journey unto London, with his neighbour and endeared brother Mr Langley; but receiving ſmall encouragement to his hopes and endeavours of that kind, he returned home with ſorrow upon his heart, complaining of the many ſymptoms of God's diſpleaſure, which he ſaw ready to break out againſt poor England, and reſolved to do what ſervice he could in any other way.

And, being convinced, that his labours might be profitable to the church, both in the preſent and ſucceeding ages, he was reſolved to lay forth himſelf for public ſervice in any kind, as his good friends ſhould adviſe; and in purſuance hereof, he deſigned theſe three works, viz. '1. A treatiſe of the church.' 2. 'An expoſition of obſcure ſcriptures out of all the original languages.' 3. 'A more full ſyſtem of divinity by the enlarging of his catechiſm.' For all which he had much good proviſion under hand, when the Lord ſaw cauſe to put an end to his labours. And here, all thoſe muſt ſilence their hearts, (who knowing him, may be apt to judge his removal at this time to be unſeaſonable) with theſe words, (which were much in his mouth when God checked hopes by croſs providences) 'The Lord is wiſeſt: God is moſt wiſe.' Many conflicts he had with men of greateſt ſtrength, as was imagined to maintain the new paths, into which divers had ſtepped aſide. But the truth is, never was any of them able to ſtand up under his arguments. Though God was pleaſed to take him away, (whom ſome in ſcorn called The Preſbyterian champion), yet he hath raiſed up other worthies, who do ſtrenuouſly gain ſay thoſe other extravagancies.

When his nature was enfeebled by conſtant ſtudy, and great long-continued labours, he paſſed the time of his languiſhing ſickneſs, with a ſweet, humble, divine, peaceable ſpirit. He preached in public ſo long as bodily ability could bear it; and he continued to pray in his family till ſtrength failed. Now his addreſſes to God were moſt holy and heavenly, as ſwan like ſongs, the ſweeteſt at laſt. Though he ſpake not very much during his bodily decays, yet the words which he uſed were ſolid and ſavoury.

Being aſked, what he thought of himſelf, whether he ſhould now die or recover? He anſwered, 'I do not trouble myſelf about that matter.' He often bewailed the infirmities of his life, and in ſpecial, now as at former times, his inconſiderate entring upon the weighty calling of the miniſtry; but he manifeſted withal an holy child-like confidence in Chriſt, ſtill ſtrengthening his heart, after his humble mourning for ſin, with this conſideration, that the 'ſcripture mentioneth weakneſſes in the choiceſt ſaints, which were neither total hinderances to the exerciſe of their faith in Chriſt, nor to their ſalvation through grace.' This queſtion being propounded to him, what he now thought concerning his labours, part whereof were then printed, againſt the preſent ſeparation in England? He anſwered, that though he had been weary of thoſe controverſies, which hindered his going on in more profitable ſtudies, yet he did not repent of that which he had done, only he deſired God to pardon the defects, which had cleaved unto that and his other ſervices. When any mention was made before him of his great labours to do good, he would ſay, and this was a ſpeech which he much uſed, 'If the Lord were not a God pardoning ſins, I was in a miſerable condition.'

And, however he did ſay with tears, that he had too much reſpect amongſt men, and that many judged that to be in him which was not ſuch was his humility; yet friends expreſſing ardent deſires of his health, for ſervice ſake, he told them, that he could have been content to have lived longer, if the Lord had been pleaſed, that he might have been further uſeful in his place, and have born his ſhare in ſufferings with his brethren. 'For he expected a very ſharp ſtorm, though he hoped it would be but ſhort.' And he called it, 'The laſt combat which we ſhould have with antichriſt.' When towards his end, he was aſked, how he did? he would thus anſwer with a chearful countenance, 'Going to heaven apace.' And, as his converſation had for many years been in heaven, the Lord, who had ripened him for immediate communion with himſelf, took him unto himſelf, October 20. 1640, and of his age about fifty five. The materials of this narrative, concerning the pious, fruitful life of that faithful ſervant of Chriſt, Mr John Ball, were received from theſe miniſters of the goſpel, and men of known integrity, viz. Mr John Taylor of Checkly in Staffordſhire, who was his countryman, and of his moſt ancient acquaintance. Mr Thomas Langley of Middlewich in Cheſhire, who beſides his former intimateneſs, continued under his miniſtry above five years, he being taken off from the exerciſe of his own miniſtry by epiſcopal power, Mr Simeon Aſhe, of St Auſtin's, London, who, for the ſpace of many years had been his boſom friend, and from Mr George Croſſe of Clifton in Staffordſhire, who daily converſed with him for ſundry months, both before, and in the time of his laſt ſickneſs; who all of them do acknowlege themſelves obliged to God, for the ſpiritual good, gained by this their dearly reſpected, and much honoured friend and brother, who ſince his death, have been very ſenſible of their great loſs by his removal. But they and all others muſt learn to live upon divine, immutable, all-ſufficiency, when creatures do fail.

'Now the juſt ſhall live by his faith.'

The Life of Dr POTTER who died Anno Chriſti, 1642.

BARNABY POTTER was born in Weſtmorland, anno Chriſti 1578, within the barony of Kendal, and brought up at ſchool there, till he was fitted for the univerſity; thence he was ſent to queen's college in Oxford, where he was choſen, firſt a ſcholar of the houſe, then a fellow, and afterwards provoſt. Whilſt he was fellow, he was a very careful tutor to many worthy gentlemens ſons, whom he trained up in learning, but eſpecially in true religion. He was a very humble and meek man, a man of few words, a ſweet preacher, and a favourer of ſtrict profeſſors of religion. It was the faſhion and cuſtom of the fellows after dinner, to ſit or ſtand a while at the hall door, and diſcourſe uſually of divers points of religion, or of good writers, and ſometimes of other trivial matters. This man, on a certain time when he heard them talk of many trivial things, ſaid nothing, but obſerved what they ſaid; and when they had done talking, he thus beſpoke them: 'Now my maſters, will you hear all your extravagant diſcourſes? for I have ſtricly obſerved and marked what you ſaid; and he told them every whit, and they admired him for his memory.

It was his cuſtom firſt to write one part of his ſermon, and to commit it to memory preſently, and then another, ſo that he could preach with much facility, and upon a little warning. He was for a while lecturer at Abington, and at Totneſs in Devonſhire, where he was much reſpected. Then he proceeded doctor in divinity, and was preferred by ſir Edward Giles to a paſtoral charge, which knight was a worthy gentleman in his country, and often choſen a parliament man for Devon.

Dr Potter married the lady Giles her daughter, when he was doctor but of a years ſtanding. Not long after Dr Ayray, worthy provoſt of queen's college died; whereupon he was choſen to ſucceed him in the provoſtſhip, with the unanimous conſent of the fellows, when he was far from the univerſity, and never dreamed of any ſuch preferment.

He was alſo chaplain in ordinary to prince Charles, and accounted at the court the penetential preacher. When he had been provoſt about the ſpace of ten years, he reſigned his place, and went to his paſtoral charge in the country, and there reſided; yet he had not been there long, but king Charles his maſter, caſt a favourable aſpect upon him, and ſeeing he had not rewarded him for his long and faithful ſervice, he choſe him to be biſhop of Carliſle; and tho' many ſued for the place, yet he ſaid peremptorily that none but Potter ſhould have it; and ſurely his gracious maſter honoured not him ſo much as he did himſelf and that age, in the freedom of his noble and unexpected choice.

That which Nanzianzen ſaid of Baſil, may be fitly and properly ſaid of this biſhop; 'he was promoted, he did not ſteal or ſhuffle himſelf into the chair, he did not invade it, the honour ſought and followed him.' When he was biſhop, he was a conſtant preacher and performer of family duty, both evening and morning, and kept his ſervants and attendants in good order.

Being called to London, in the begining of the parliament, he made at Weſtminſter a worthy and zealous ſermon, wherein he inveighed againſt the corruptions that were crept into the church, eſpecially in reſpect of ceremonies ſo eagerly preſt by ſundry biſhops, as bowing to the altar, and ſuch like innovations. His ſermon was well approved of by the beſt; but he ſeeing the tumults that were then raiſed in London about the parliament houſe, and hearing that he himſelf was cenſured as popiſh, becauſe a biſhop, he took it grievouſly to heart, ſicken'd, and died there about the great climacterical years of his age.

He was a great favourer of zealous profeſſors, and lecturers, and therefore he was accounted by many a puritanical biſhop; and indeed, ſome at the court in king James his time, ſaid that organs would blow him out of the church.

He was well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue, and for his further progreſs therein, diſdained not to learn of one of the fellows, even when he was provoſt.

He utterly diſliked the book of ſports for recreation on the ſabbath day, and told a miniſter with whom he was acquainted, that if it were ſent down to his dioceſe, he would ſlight it and urge none of his juriſdiction to read it.

He was of a weak conſtitution of body, melancholic and lean, as being a hard ſtudent, and therefore to recreate his ſpirits he loved vocal muſic, and to this end, he ſent divers times for ſuch ſcholars in the college as could ſing well, and he would bear a part with them in his lodgings after ſupper, where they made moſt excellent melody. He was the laſt biſhop that died as a member of the parliament, and was biſhop of Carliſle ſome fourteen years.

The Life of Mr RICHARD SEDGWICK who died Anno Chriſti. 1643.

RICHARD SEDGWICK was born at eaſt Dereham, in the county of Norfolk, anno Chriſti 1574. His His father was a clothier; but by reaſon of a great loſs by fire, fell into decay. He had an uncle living in Yorkſhire, who was very rich, and of large yearly revenues, having no children; whereupon he took this Richard in his tender years home to himſelf, and put him to ſchool, with an intent to make him his heir; but God had laid up a better portion for him. His uncle and his family was prophane, hating the power of godlineſs, and wedded to games and ſports; yet even in ſuch a family God viſited him in mercy, and awakened his ſoul by working in him hearty deſires after himſelf. While the reſt of the family were at their games and dancings, he would be in a corner mourning His uncle at firſt thought his retiredneſs to have been bookiſhneſs, and therefore rebuked him gently, and called upon him to take more liberty; but at laſt perceiving the truth of the thing, began to hate him, and to deal roughly with him, and not being able to bring him to his will, caſt him out of the family, ſaying, that a Puritan ſhould never inherit his land.

Before this, his father died, and his mother being induſtrious and ſparing out of the little meanſhe had left her, maintained him at Peterhouſe in Cambridge, where he profited greatly in all kind of learning. He began the exerciſe of his miniſtry in Kent; where he being called to preach in the cathedral at Canterbury, in his ſermon touching the corruption of the prebends, and their cathedral ſervice, he ſo far diſpleaſed them, as that by threats they brought him to condeſcend, through weakneſs, to promiſe to recant, and a day for this was appointed.

Upon his return home, and his ſecond thoughts, he became very ſad, and in his perplexity took his bible and opened it, and at the firſt, lighted on that encouraging word of God to Jeremiah, Jer. i. 7, 8. 'Whatſoever I command thee thou ſhalt ſpeak; be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to deliver thee, ſaith the Lord.' By this he was ſo ſtrengthned, that he reſolved to ſtand to what he had formerly delivered, whatſoever dangers did attend him. At the time appointed, he preached again in the cathedral, having a very large auditory, both of the country and city, in which ſermon he confirmed what he had before delivered, earneſtly preſſing the prebends to reform the abuſes amongſt them. By this they were ſo offended, that they complained of him to the biſhop, and ſo perſecuted him, that he was forced to forſake his place and to retire himſelf into private, and was entertained for a time by ſir Edward Bois the elder, a man eminent for piety in thoſe days.

During his retirement, he came upon occaſion to London, and by the means of Mr Egerton, paſtor at Blackfriars, was received into the family of ſir Edward Anſon, who lived in the city during the winter, and in ſummer at Crawly in Surrey, a place deſtitute of a preaching miniſtry. In this family his encouragement was great, but his labours abundant. Every day his uſual courſe was to pray in the morning at ſix o'clock with the husbandmen, and at ten to pray with the reſt of the family, and expound a chapter, in which courſe he went through the four firſt books of Moſes. His courſe at night was after prayer, prayer, to catechiſe the family by turns, wherein he uſed no reſpect of perſons, the meaneſt not being left out, and the chiefeſt not forborn. On the Lords's day, during his abode at Crawly, he preached twice conſtantly, and after public exerciſes, called the whole family in private to render an account of what was delivered in public. In the winter, when the greateſt part of the family was at London, under an able miniſtry, he was ready to help others, and by providence, was called to improve his talent at Batterſey in Surrey. Mr Weybourne, a reverend divine, who conſtantly preached in that place, having by a fall broke his leg, and being diſabled thereby to continue his labours, deſired his aſſiſtance. At this place the people were ſo affected with his miniſtry, that they requeſted him to continue to preach among them, promiſing to ſtrain themſelves to provide him maintenance.

He had a fair call and opportunity (denying himſelf) to anſwer it, for ſir Edward Anſlow, about this time had an eſtate befallen him in Hertfordſhire, whither he reſolved to go to dwell, in which place was an able and godly miniſter; Mr Sedgwick ſeeing that by continuing in this family, he ſhould not have occaſion of exerciſing his public miniſtry, relinquiſhed fifty pounds annuity during his life, aſſured to him by this worthy knight, and accepted of this call to preach at Batterſay.

Before his departure out of this family, he married a wife of an honeſt and religious ſtock in the city of London. He had not long exerciſed his gifts at Batterſay, bringing glory to God, but the devil again raiſed up perſecution againſt him. One Mr King, church warden of the place, was offended at him, becauſe he freely reproved ſin, and boldly ſpake againſt the corruptions that were then in the church: by this man he was preſented into the commiſſaries court, and by his means cited to appear to anſwer certain articles. This was about the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, not long before the coming in of king James. Upon this citation he reſolved to appear, and came to London and being at the door of the commiſſaries houſe, Mr Egerton his faithful and reverend friend, by providence paſſing by came to him, and having ſaluted him, told him he had heard of the oppoſition made againſt him at Batterſay, and aſked him if he would accept of a call to go beyond the ſeas; his anſwer was (having returned thanks for his kindneſs) that he could not as yet reſolve him, foraſmuch as he ſtood accuſed at preſent, and was reſolved whatever came of it, to defend thoſe truths that he had publicly delivered; but yet profeſſing a willingneſs to follow providence, whitherſoever the Lord ſhould call him. Appearing before the commiſſary, he met with courteous uſage, and was friendly diſmiſſed; for at this time thoſe men feared a change to be brought in by king James.

Not long after this he was called by the merchant adventurers to be miniſter to their company beyond ſea, whither, breaking through all diſcouragements, he went. During his abode beyond the ſea at Stoade, and Hamborough (which was about the ſpace of eleven years and an half) he by the advice of the godly learned erected and eſtabliſhed diſcipline in that church. God did greatly bleſs his miniſtry, and he begat among that little company, many ſons and daughters unto God. He had communion with the Netherland Dutch church at Stoade, and at Altenon near Hamborough, and with the godly that came out of England, admitting them, being deſirous to come to the Lord's table.

In his miniſtry he was very ſearching, many coming and confeſſing thoſe things which he had never heard of, till it came out of their own mouths.

In his carriage he was affable and courteous, yet grave and awful, ſo that many durſt not for fear do thoſe things that otherwiſe they were diſpoſed to. The merchants here found the benefit, by the orderly carriage of their factors there.

Yet here the devil was not quiet, for one of the prime merchants taking exceptions againſt his impartial dealing in the miniſtry, and the order in the church, threatened, by ſuch a day, naming it, to have him over into England; but before that day came, he was ſummoned by death to another place.

He was very charitable himſelf, allowing ſomething yearly towards the maintainance of the ſuſpended miniſters here, and greatly furthered charity in others. By his direction and encouragement Mr Jones, a rich batchelor, and one of the elders of his church, bequeathed many thouſands of pounds to pious uſes, which to this day ſpeaks his praiſe.

He was eminent in ſelf denial; for being made executor by the ſaid Mr Jones, of his laſt will and teſtament, whereby he might have gained much to himſelf, he never reſted till he had cauſed him to alter his will, and to place others in his room.

Upon the diſſolving of that company of merchants, he came over into England, and being diſappointed of a place in London, intended for him by Mr Jones, he went to Monmouth in Wales, and for ſome time held the lecture ſettled there: afterwards a chappel being erected at W pping, he was called to that place, and became the firſt miniſter there. Here he abode to his death, being holy, and exemplary in his life and converſation, and abundant in labours, preaching conſtantly thrice a-week, and catechiſing on the Lord's day beſides.

The tenderneſs of his fatherly care, and love of this people, he expreſſed all the time of his living with them, but eſpecially in the time of the great ſickneſs, when, remaining with them, he preached conſtantly every Lord's day, and the faſt days, notwithſtanding all the danger he was in, the infection in that place being much ſpread, and very violent. The providence of God over him at that time was very remarkable; for although all the families round about him were infected, and his houſe adjoined to the place of burial, yet neither himſelf nor any of his family were any ways ſmitten with it.

Many were his labours in private, being much ſought unto both for counſel and comfort. What ſucceſs God gave unto his miniſtry, was evident by the many ſouls won and built up by him. He was very ſtudious, and wrote much, yet was always averſe from publiſhing any thing, though often requeſted; ſaying, that the many books that were daily ſet forth, hindered the ſtudy and reading of the holy ſcriptures. Once he committed to the preſs a catechiſm, fitted for his own congregation; and before his death had finiſhed a large tractate of the body of divinity, which ſtill lies by.

He ſought the good of all, and was a precious favour unto ſome, in whoſe hearts to this day his memory flouriſhes: he foreſaw the enſuing diſtractions with a grieved heart, and raiſed himſelf up to comfort, by contemplating the approaching time wherein Chriſt and his truth, and his ways ſhall have the pre-eminence: his judgment concerning ſome hath proved true, aſſerting often that their principles would not (if they continued in them) ſuffer them to ſit down on this ſide of Anabaptiſm: he was a friend of truth and peace, and an inſtrument of refreſhing the bowels of the poor; many ſtrangers, for his ſake, giving in largely towards their relief.

Having finiſhed his courſe, being ſpent with labours, he quietly and comfortably ended his days; and according to his laſt words, went unto his God, in the year 1643, and of his age 69, having continued his miniſtry at Wapping 26 years.

The Life of Mr JULINES HERRING, who died Anno Chriſti 1644.

JULINES HERRING was born in Flambermayre pariſh in Montgomeryſhire 1582: his father, within three years after returned with his wife and family into Coventry, where his anceſtors had been chief officers of the city, in their courſe, almoſt for the ſpace of two hundred years, and where he himſelf alſo was ſheriff and mayor, living and dying in good eſtimation there. This Julines, his ſon, having had his firſt education in Shropſhire, with Mr Perkin miniſter at More chappel, his mother's near kinſman, where he learned the principles of religion, was brought home unto Coventry, where he was trained up in learning under rev. Mr Tovey, who then was head ſchoolmaſter there.

While he was a ſchool boy, he was noted for his diligence in reading the holy ſcriptures, delighting in thoſe chapters chapters especially which treat of faith in Christ, and of repentance from sin to God. And even then in his childhood, he, with two or three of his school fellows, were so religiously disposed, that on play days they would pray together, and repeat the heads of their catechism, with the sermons they heard upon the last Lord's day, before they went to their lusory exercises. Thus this Timothy grew acquainted with God and his word, and the ways of religion, while he was a child.

Being well fitted for the university, he was sent unto Cambridge, about the fifteenth year of his age, and admitted into Sidney college, where he was studious, and a good proficient in academical learning.

When he was master of arts, coming home to his father, he preached often in Coventry, with very good approbation amongst those, who were best affected towards the ways of godliness: here he had special encouragements in the study of divinity, from Mr Humphrey Fen, famous for his ministry and non conformity at Coventry, (who in the preface to his last will and testament, made so full and so open a protestation against the hierarchy and ceremonies, that the prelatical party would not suffer it to be put among the records of the court, when the will was tendered to be proved) and his conscience was unsatisfied to enter into the ministry by episcopal subscription; but, thro' a good providence, he, with Mr John Ball, were made ministers by an Irish bishop, without that subscription.

The first place of his settled ministry was Cawk in Darbyshire, a small village, whither he was called by means of his much honoured good friend Mr Arthur Hilderſam, and where he had good encouragements from Mr Bainbridge, a gentleman there, of good estate, and estimation for religion. In this place, which was six miles from Darby, and three from Ashby de la zouch, his peace and liberty was the better preserved, because it was a peculiar, and so not subject unto episcopal visitation: here God was pleased to set a broad seal to his ministry, making him an happy instrument to build up many, who were brought to Christ by Mr Hilderſam's labours; and also to turn many others 'from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.'

At this time there was great scarcity of good preachers in those parts, whereupon people from twenty towns and villages, flocked unto Cawk chappel as doves to their windows, every Sabbath day, where more congregated, especially in summer and in afternoons, than the chappel could contain; yet standing at the windows without, they might hear the sermons preached, and scriptures read, because Mr Herring's voice was clear and strong: hither great companies came in the morning, with joyful expectation of wholesome soul provisions; here they continued all day with cheerfulness, some bringing their victuals from home with them, and others going to a three-penny ordinary, provided purposely for the refreshing of strangers; and they went from hence in the evening in companies, repeating the sermons, and singing psalms in their return home: here, amongst many others, Mr Simeon Ashe received some of his first impressions, and bents towards religion, whom Mr Herring loved from his childhood, and who lived in his heart and prayers unto his his death.

And this is a matter considerable, that few, if any, in those parts, who were hopefully brought unto God, by the ministry of Mr Hilderſam and Mr Herring, have been turned aside into the by-paths of error and separation, in these broken dividing times, but they continue sound in their judgments, and holy in their conversations, well remembering the principles whereof they were well instructed and grounded by those two worthies, their fathers in Christ.

When he had continued at Cawk about the space of eight years, he was forced from thence for non conformity by the prelatical power, being informed against by ill-affected men, who maligned the great service which he did, and envied the great respect which he had in those parts.

Before he removed from thence, the Lord provided for him a most gracious yoke-fellow, who was no discouragement, but an encouragement rather unto him always, both in his services and sufferings for Christ, and his cause: his wife was the third daughter of Mr Gellibrand, sometime preacher to the English company at Flushing in Holland, and grandchild to that man of God Mr John Oxenbridge, minister of Southam in Warwickshire, and afterwards of Bablick in Coventry, where he died; and as she came out of a godly stock, so she hath expressed, and still doth express the power of godliness, in every condition and relation of her life, to God's honour. By her he had thirteen children; and as they were happily, mutually helpful in the ways of holiness, so it was their joint care to educate their posterity in the nurture and fear of the Lord. They were taught the principles of religion from their childhood, and their tender good mother, according to their father's appointment, caused them to learn the Proverbs of Solomon by heart: neither was this gracious care in vain; for the blossoms and fruits of grace sweetly appear in their lives, to the comfort of their parents and Christian friends. And here this one thing is notable and imitable in this worthy man, in reference to his children, viz. That ever before he gave them correction, he endeavoured to convince them of their sin against God, and sought, by prayers and tears, for God's blessing upon that means for their good.

When the course of his ministry was interrupted at Cawk, and there was no hope of his peaceable continuance there, God, by means of Mr William Rowley, a wise religious man, and his faithful friend, was pleased to open a door for the more public exercise of his ministry in Shrewsbury; here he preached at Alkmare's church, every Tuesday morning, and upon the Sabbath also, so long as liberty was allowed, which sermon was at one o'clock, that neither the ministers of the town might be offended, nor other congregations emptied, by the people's flocking unto his ministry.

The sermon which he preached on the Lord's day, he repeated it the same night before supper, at the houses of Mr Edward Jones, Mr George Wright, and Mr William Rowley by course; and whereas some spies were usually sent thither, crowding in with the company, to pick quarrels, he behaved himself so prudently, and prayed always so affectionately for the king and present government, that his adversaries gave this testimony of him, viz. 'Though he be scrupulous in matters of ceremony, yet he is a loyal subject unto the king, and a true friend unto the state.

Beside the great good service which was done in Salop, by his ministry, and private conferences with Christians, in reference unto him, many other ministers had the more frequent recourse unto the town, Mr Pierson, Mr Nicols, &c. who were put upon preaching once or oftner, before they departed thence, whereby knowlege was much increased, and the power of godliness much cherished and promoted.

But Satan maligning those opportunities of service unto Christ, some envious ill affected persons, amongst whom Mr Peter Studly was the chief, were stirred up, to lay in complaints against him as a non-conformist; for such was his prudence, sweetness, and peaceableness of spirit, that other objections could not, with any colour of truth, be made against him there: hereupon Dr Morton, then the bishop of that diocess, referred him unto two neighbour ministers for satisfaction; and in pursuance of this order, Mr Herring gave in his scruples in writing, and also replied, upon their answer.

The consequence of this paper dispute was a certificate to the bishop, from the ministers, that they believed Mr Herring, from conscientious grounds, in his own apprehensions, remained unsatisfied; and the bishop himself told Mr Herring's friends, that he was satisfied in his integrity. But such were those times, that he was suspended from the use of his ministry, though, by mediation of friends, the suspension was divers times taken off, and then brought on again by persons of contrary minds and judgments.

Thus he continued in Salop for the space of seventeen years, sometimes enjoying, and sometimes wanting liberty for the exercise of his ministry in public. But when the pulpit door was shut against him, he was the more frequent in keeping private fasts, and in expounding the scriptures three times a day in his own family; by which exercise some of the neighbours were edified also.

Always

Always upon the Lord's day, whether he was at home or abroad, he frequented the ordinances of God administered in public, profeſſing thereby, as himſelf ſaid, that his practice ſhould declare his judgment againſt ſeparation from the congregations in England, though there were corruptions in them. When ſome ſeeds of ſeparation were ſcattered in Salop, by Daniel Chidley and his wife, their growth was checked by his appearing againſt them. He had many bowels towards them who were miſled in this kind, as was expreſſed by the many prayers, with tears, which he poured forth before God in their behalf. And having, upon this occaſion, ſtudied the point the more thoroughly, he would often ſay, 'It is a ſin of an high nature to un church a nation at once, that this would become the ſpring of many other fearful errors; for ſeparation will eat like a gangrene into the heart of godlineſs.' And he did pray, that they who would unchurch others might not be unchriſtianed themſelves.

When the plague was in Salop, he gave himſelf unto prayer for the town, and in particular for the perſons infected; and many from the peſt-houſes returned thanks unto him, for the ſpiritual comfort received by his prayers.

He took great delight in his ſtudies, having a very good library, and was often willing to miſs a meal, that he might the more ſatisfy himſelf in converſing with his books: he was ſeldom hungry, as himſelf was wont to ſay, while he was in his ſtudy, and thoſe who beſt knew him, could eaſily render the reaſon thereof; for he was afraid of doing God's work negligently, ſo it was his meat and drink to converſe with his God, and to do the will of his heavenly Father: and yet ſuch was his compaſſions towards afflicted conſciences, that he gave charge unto his whole family, to ſend none ſuch away till they had ſpoken with him; yea, unto them, his manner was to give full liberty of ſpeech, that they might not go away without ſome clearing and ſatisfaction.

His experience, humility, and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, was ſuch, that ſeldom any one who was troubled in ſpirit departed from him without ſome relief and comfort; whereto may be added his great faithfulneſs towards them in perplexed caſes, who opened their hearts into his boſom, for ſpiritual ſatisfaction.

When he was not allowed liberty to preach in public at home, he was willing to beſtow his pains abroad; and every where he in his miniſtry proved himſelf a ſolid well ſtudied divine, 'a workman who needed not to be aſhamed. It may be truly affirmed concerning him, that when he was in journeys, he imitated the Lord Chriſt his maſter, 'who went about doing good:' for in the families whither he came, if there was not opportunity of more public employment, wherein he might appear with ſafety in thoſe prelatical times, he was always ready by prayer and expoſition of ſcripture, to be ſerviceable unto the ſouls of ſuch who deſired to improve him.

He was a man of an ingenious and cheerful ſpirit, yet very grave and inoffenſive; yea, the lightſomeneſs of his behaviour being accompanied with holineſs and humility, did make his ſerious ſervices the more acceptable, and more taking upon the hearts of thoſe who converſed with him.

Amongſt many other rare gifts, with which God had enriched him, this did ſhine forth brightly unto all them who were acquainted with his way, in performing family duties, whether in his own houſe, or elſewhere, viz. That he would always moſt aptly and affectionately enlarge himſelf upon the ſermon lately heard, or the chapter read, by confeſſion, complaint, petition, thankſgiving, &c. unto the great advantage of them who joined with him in that exerciſe.

He was indeed a man made up of love and meekneſs, for the diſcovery whereof take two inſtances, which will tell the reader that he was dove like, without gall. The one is this; Dr Lamb having broken his leg by a fall, was brought into the ſame inn in Northamptonſhire, where Mr Herring had taken up his lodging, being in a journey; and that night he prayed very affectionately for him, tho' Dr Lamb was a notorious violent perſecutor of non-conformiſts, both miniſters and people; yea, though he had been a bitter oppoſite againſt Mr Herring particularly. He being aſked the reaſon, why he expreſſed ſo much reſpect towards ſo unworthy a man? returned this anſwer, 'The greater enemy he is to the church, the more need he hath of prayers.' And then wiſhed thoſe who were with him, to prove themſelves Chriſt's diſciples, by loving their enemies, and by praying for their perſecutors. The other inſtance is this, viz. Underſtanding the archbiſhop ſaid to ſome of his friends, petitioners for the liberty of his miniſtry, 'I will pickle up that Herring of Shrewſbury;' he uſed theſe words, 'If he will abuſe his power, let it teach Chriſtians the more to uſe their prayers:' and then he prayed, that the non-conformiſts enemies might, by obſervation, know that they have a good God to truſt unto, when trampled upon by ill-diſpoſed men.

He was a conſtant mighty wreſtler with the Almighty in prayers for England, that the goſpel might not be removed, but that the kingdom of Chriſt, might be here advanced more and more. He much feared that bad times would overtake this nation; and at a conference about the affairs of England, he uſed theſe words: 'God's rod (I much fear) will be home-bred war in the ſtate, and errors and hereſies in the church, with God's viſible departure from us.'

When all hope of regaining the liberty of his miniſtry in Shrewſbury was quite gone, and therefore his continuance there, in many regards, was judged inexpedient; he removed with his wife, and ſuch of his family who were not diſpoſed of elſewhere, unto Wrenbury in Cheſhire, where he ſojourned with his wife's dear ſiſter Mrs Nicolls; a godly woman, the widow of worthy Mr Robert Nicolls, who had been very famous in thoſe parts, both for his labours and great abilities, of whom this true character may be given; 'He was a man who had a clear head and a tender heart, who led an holy life, and abounded in the work of the Lord.' Here Mr Herring lived privately and comfortably under the miniſtry of his good friend Mr William Peartree, doing what ſervice he could, by comforting afflicted conſciences, and confirming the hearts of God's people in the faith of the goſpel, as opportunities were offered.

Before any further progreſs be made, in making known his call unto Amſterdam, here may ſeaſonably be inſerted the deſcription given by a rev. neighbour miniſter, which is as followeth:

'Whereas you deſire my opinion in writing, concerning that reverend and religious man of God Mr Herring, deceaſed; the truth is, I fear my pen may rather darken his honour, than my pencil can draw out his character: yet as the martyr counted it a great mercy to be caſt into priſon, if it were but to ſee the face of that bleſſed angel of God Mr Bradford; ſo I have looked on it as no ſmall happineſs, that the Lord, in his providence, did caſt me into theſe parts, to ſee the face, and hear the voice of Mr Herring, that bleſſed angel of a church in Salop. And I bleſs God, that I had ſome intimate acquaintance with him, and knew his doctrine, manner of life, &c. as Timothy did Paul's, 2 Tim. iii. 10. and I ſhould wrong him if I ſhould with-hold this juſt teſtimony: he was one of whom the world was not worthy, a meſſenger, one of a thouſand, a faithful miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt; a Boanerges, a ſon of thunder, to brawny hearted ſinners; a Barnabas, a ſon of conſolation to broken hearted ſinners

As ſweet a grace he had in elocution as ever I heard man in the pulpit, whoſe gift of utterance did ſet a fair gloſs on all his holy ſermons; another Appollos, eloquent and mighty in the ſcriptures; and you know the common ſaying, Bonus textualis, bonus theologus. His ſermons preached in the congregation, were printed in his converſation, 'In doctrine, ſhewing incorruptneſs, gravity, ſincerity,' for he was a pious and learned divine, 'and in life ſhewing himſelf a pattern of good works,' free from viſible blame; ſaving human unavoidable infirmities, none could ſay (juſtly) black was his eye. He was endued with an admirable gift of prayer, and was frequently employed in days of private humiliation, even then, when meetings of that kind were branded with the odious name of Conventicles: yet the perils, to which he rendered himſelf obnoxious, could not ſtave him off from opening his window, with Daniel, towards Jeruſalem. He was very fruitful in conference, diſcreet in carriage, and cheerful and couragious in his ſufferings, of which this good old non conformiſt had his ſhare. And when every door was barr'd, and no hope left to enjoy his public liberty, he left the land of his nativity, and, on a clear call, went into the Netherlands where, after ſome years ſpent in the work of the Lord, this bright ſtar did ſet, to the no little ſorrow of his dear Chriſtian friends,' &c.

This faithful ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt had many invitations into New England, but received no ſatisfaction in his ſpirit to tranſplant himſelf thither.

Afterwards, in the latter end of the year 1636, he was propounded by ſome friends unto Mr Rulice, who was ſent from the Engliſh reformed church in Amſterdam unto London, to provide a miniſter to ſucceed Mr John Paget, as a man moſt meet to undertake that place; for the caſe there was this, viz. 'Mr John Paget, whoſe works praiſe him in the gate, being, through old age, rendered unable to uphold his wonted work in that reformed congregation, was eaſed of his paſtoral attendance there, (though the lords of the city, according to their commendable cuſtom, continued his competent maintainance till his death) therefore Mr Rulice, his colleague, was employed to find out an aſſiſtant.

This motion made known to Mr Herring, was the rather hearkened unto, becauſe his ſuſpenſion from preaching was a burthen to his active ſpirit, and he eſpied no ground of hope, that he ſhould ever be ſuffered by the prelates to enjoy his much-deſired liberty in England any more: hereupon coming up to London, after much ſeeking of God, and ſerious conſulting with godly brethren, he was perſuaded that this call came from God, and therefore might not be gain-ſaid.

Now having reſolved, in the purſuance of this providence, to leave England, amongſt other difficulties to be encountered, he was much affected with a double conflict, the one relating unto his manuſcripts, the other unto his near and much endeared friends: he had many papers and letters, which he much prized, containing both the ſpiritual breathings of gracious hearts, and matters of great concernment; and thoſe he durſt not adventure to take with him, fearing a ſearch, nor yet did he judge it ſafe to leave them, becauſe he knew not into what hands they might come; therefore, upon advice, he burnt many writings, though both then and afterwards, he did with tears think of that letter martyrdom, for ſo he called it, wherein many of the beſt thoughts of his deareſt friends were committed to the flames. If this was ſo grievous, then let the reader gueſs with what grief of heart this thought was entertained, that now he muſt leave thouſands of his precious friends, without hope of ſeeing their faces any more in the land of the living.

And truly his labours and lovely converſation had gained him multitudes of friends in every country and corner where he was known; for no man was more generally and entirely affected by all ſorts who feared God, than good Mr Herring: although it be not poſſible to give a particular account of the gentry and miniſtry, moſt eminent for religion, who highly prized and heartily loved him, yet the virtuous lady Margaret Bromley, who then dwelt at Sheriff-hales in Shropſhire, deſerves an honourable remembrance, becauſe ſhe was a conſtant and unparalleled favourer of all good miniſters and people, being both tender hearted and open handed towards ſuch who ſuffered under prelatical preſſures, and otherwiſe; and, at her houſe, the moſt famous miniſters in all neighbour countries had hearty welcomes, with manifold ſweet opportunities of ſervice unto God, and of mutual edification: beſides the frequent ſoul helps which the pariſhioners of the congregation to which ſhe was related had upon Sabbath days, for her ſake: there were few holy days, days of vacancy from worldly buſineſs, in the year, wherein they had not one ſermon at the leaſt, preached by ſome able miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt; amongſt whom Mr Pierſon, Mr Ball, Mr Herring, and Mr Nicolls (before mentioned, who died at this good lady's houſe), were of chief worth.

Oh! what pathetical bleſſings, with exhortations, encouragements, and prayers, did this worthy man of God beſtow upon this, and the families of other choice friends, before he took his laſt farewel of his dear native country. This narrative would ſwell too big, if report ſhould be made of generals only in reference unto them, who were naturally, nearly related unto himſelf and his gracious conſort, beſides ſuch who were very dear unto them both, in the ſpirit of Jeſus Chriſt.

Some who beheld the laſt greetings betwixt him and reverend Mr Ball of Whitmore, profeſs that they ſtick too deep in their breaſts to be forgotten; for after they had ſpent together well nigh one day and one night in conference, they did, like Jonathan and David, frequently fall upon one another with mutual embracings, they parted and cloſed again a third and fourth time; and when Mr Herring was on horſeback, and Mr Ball on foot, they went together, often ſhaking hands over the hedges; and upon the final ſalutation, they comforted each other with this conſideration, 'That though they ſhould never ſee one another again on earth, yet they ſhould meet in heaven.' And Mr Herring was ſo deeply affected with thoſe paſſages, that he ſaid to ſome of his company, 'Two or three more ſuch partings would hinder my journey beyond ſea;' and yet adding withal, 'Mr Ball hath conquered my paſſions.

In his paſſage out of England, he, with warm affections, and heavenly benedictions, took his leave of his own and his wife's ſiſters, with their huſbands, whoſe dwellings were in divers counties.

Thoſe two eminently worthy rev. divines, Mr Oliver Bowles, of Sutton in Bedfordſhire, and Mr Barry of Cotmor in Rutland, who had married two of his wife's gracious ſiſters, as they had brotherly reſpect in his boſom, ſo they had ſpecial viſits in his journey towards Holland. He was neceſſitated ſecretly to take ſhipping at Yarmouth, whither his brother in law, Mr Bowles, did accompany him, becauſe the then archbiſhop had given order, that no ſcholar nor miniſter ſhould paſs, without license from the council table.

Now, whereas in his journey he had often prayed, that God would yet further clear his call into Holland, by two ſpecial providences, viz. 1. 'That he might not be examined whether he was a miniſter, (for he profeſſed, that he durſt not deny his holy calling). 2. 'That God would ſtrengthen him at ſea, and grant him a comfortable voyage.' He had anſwers of ſingular grace returned in both.

He landed at Rotterdam, September 20. 1637, and went aſide from company, ſo ſoon as with conveniency he could, to bleſs the Lord for his ſafe arrival, and for all other favours vouchſafed to him, who had never before been upon the ſea.

The next day he went in a waggon to Amſterdam, and was met on the way by his dear colleague, with the elders and deacons of the church, and many of the Engliſh merchants, who expreſſed much joy for his ſafe coming unto them. By them he was accompanied to the houſe of his good friend Mr Whitaker, where he continued till his removal unto his own houſe, upon the coming over of his family into Holland.

His firſt ſermon was upon Pſal. xxiv. 1. 'The earth is the Lord's, &c. wherein he much inſiſted upon this conſideration, 'That God's children ſtill tread upon their father's ground, whitherſoever his providence doth remove them;' and he preached with ſuch ſatisfaction unto the hearts of his hearers, that thereby way was made for his future acceptance and ſervice. The week following he was preſented firſt unto the honourable lords, the magiſtrates of Amſterdam, who kindly accepted him, and gave him a gratuity towards the charges of his journey, and afterwards to the rev. Claſſis, where he was lovingly received into that ſociety, and thanks were given unto God for bringing him ſafe unto them.

Whereas it was his cuſtom to pray every night before he went into his bed, the night before a faſting day, appointed by the ſtates, to ſeek direction in their counſels, and ſucceſs upon their armies, now before Breda, he ſpake thus to his ſon who attended him, 'My heart is more fit for a thankſgiving day; and it would be ſo unto me, if God would bring over my deareſt Chriſtian, (for that was his his wife's name) thy tender mother, with her company. Come, let us pray for them.' And the next morning when he was ready to go to the congregation, he heard that his dear wife was come unto Amsterdam, by which providence his spirit being raised unto holy astonishment and admiration, he uttered these words, 'Oh! what a God do I serve! how exceeding merciful is my God to me!'

What his prudent and pious conversation was, and what high estimation he had in Amsterdam, may be understood by the testimony of Mr Rulice, written by his own hand, March 1. 1650, which is as followeth;

How acceptable and dear Mr Herring, my once rev. colleague, was to us all, church, classis, magistrates, yea, to all those who knew him, it is publicly known: how faithfully he employed those excellent gifts which God in a large measure bestowed upon him, in public, in private, in his sermon, in his advices, in consistory and classes &c. what need I mention, for all well know? For his private conversation, what sweetness and inoffensiveness yea, exemplary godliness did not he shew upon all occasions?

His sickness was lingering, his death like a sleep. As in his life, so in his sickness; and to his last breath, he shewed that his heart was truly stored with patience, faith, love to God and his people, heavenly mindedness, zeal to the honour of God, and with entire love to his wife and children.

But I must break off; I hope that reverend man, who undertakes to publish the life and death of my most dear brother and colleague, will so set it out, that it may be a spur to provoke the living to follow such a worthy pattern, and be a means of quickening many, not only to walk faithfully in the way to heaven, but also in that great function of the ministry. Thus far Mr Rulice.

The strangeness of independent brethren of England, when they came over into Holland, was a great trouble unto this real saint; and his constant prayers were, that they might neither be deceived themselves, nor do any hurt unto the government of the reformed churches: he often said, that those men had need of much caution, because the devil, in the times of purest reformation, would be a more subtil angel of light than he was in Luther's days.

When his son returned into England, he warned him to take heed of joining with any party against the presbyterial government of the reformed churches; 'For I am sure, said he, it is the government of Jesus Christ.

When the Scots first came into England, it was his constant and affectionate prayer, that they might be instruments of much good, but of no blood nor division between the two nations.

He was one of God's special remembrancers in behalf of England, begging fervently that the lords and commons in parliament might be preserved from the two destructive rocks of pride and self interests. He poured out his soul before the Almighty, that he would appear for the non-conformists cause in England, and set up the presbyterial government, according to the scripture rules: he often professed himself to be no enemy unto the persons of bishops, but an opposite to their pride and prelatical rule.

When news came unto him of the battel at Edge-hill, thus he spake with tears, 'O Lord! wilt thou write England's reformation in red letters of her own blood; yet preserve thine own people, and maintain thine own cause, for Jesus Christ's sake.'

He greatly bewailed the obstructing of church reformation in England, by them who professed themselves zealous for reformation; and it was no small offence unto him to hear of the letters which came from some independents in London into Holland, wherein falsehoods were reported, to the reproach of some presbyterians, his known godly friends in England.

He was a true Nathaniel indeed, 'in whose spirit there was no guile;' and therefore all falsehood and unworthy jugglings were an abomination to his heart. There was an holy harmoniousness, in his whole conversation; his life was a well spun thread from the beginning to the end, and tended much to the honour of his profession and particular calling. Although he walked exactly with God, and maintained the comfort of constant peace with him, yet satan was suffered to give him one furious assault the night before he died, as was perceived by those who were then with him; for rising upon his knees, with his hands lifted up, he spake these words: 'He is overcome, overcome, through the strength of my Lord and only Saviour Jesus, unto whom I am now going to keep a Sabbath in glory.' And next morning, March 28. 1644, being the Sabbath day, (about the time when he was wont to go unto the ministerial work in the public congregation), and the sixty-second year of his life, he was taken from his labours into rest, unto the spirits of just men made perfect in Heaven, where he shall sing Hallelujahs for evermore.

The Life of Mr JOHN DOD, who died Anno Christi 1645.

JOHN DOD was born in Cheshire, at a town called Shotlidge, bordering on Wales, not far from Malpas. His parents had a convenient estate, worth a hundred merks a year, which went to the eldest brother. This John was the youngest of seventeen, and much beloved of his parents. He was sent to school to West Chester, and when he was about fourteen years old, he was disposed of to Jesus-college in Cambridge, where (though he had little acquaintance) yet the Lord prospering his studies, he was chosen first scholar, and after fellow; in that college he there remained near sixteen years. The manner of his conversion was thus.

The steward or butcher of the college, accused him to the master, for the non payment of a considerable sum of money due for one of his pupils, which Mr Dod had truly paid, but he forgot to set it down. Hereupon there was a vehement contest betwixt them about this business, and the vexation of mind that he should be accounted a defrauder, did so trouble Mr Dod, that he fell into a fever, and was dangerously sick: yet all this while he was but in a natural estate. For, though he had some good skill in the theoric part of divinity, yet he was without any application; and his affliction was this, that he should be blamed for that, which he from the law and light of nature hated. All his sorrow as yet was but worldly sorrow; and as himself says, he neither did, nor could tell how to pray. At length the Lord put into his heart that scripture, Rom. vii. 'The law is spiritual but I am carnal, and sold under sin;' and presently his sins came upon him like armed men, and the tide of his thoughts was turned, and he left musing how he was wronged, and seriously considered how he had offended God, and he betook himself to great humiliation, and earnestly besought the Lord for pardon and peace in Jesus Christ. Yet for some time he could find no comfort, but going on to seek the Lord, there follows after much humiliation, much consolation, and the Lord sealed to him, that his sins were washed away with the blood of Christ. Then did he desire his accuser to come unto him, that though he had accounted him to be his great enemy, yet now he acknowleged him to be his good friend, for that he was a means to bring him unto God. And afterwards it so fell out, by God's good providence, that it came to this man's remembrance that Mr Dod had paid him the money, and he was very sorrowful for the wrong which he had done him, and did him all the right he could for the healing of his name; and Mr Dod said, that he had not a more faithful friend in the college, during his abode there, than this man proved.

When he was some years standing master of arts, he was appointed to oppose in the philosophy act at the commencement, which he did with great approbation, insomuch as it was desired, that he should dispute again the next commencement, but that he avoided. When he preached his first sermon in the university, he had bestowed much pains about it, binding himself to words and phrases; but in his sermon he was at a nonplus, whereupon he resolved afterwards never to pen his sermon verbatim, but his usual manner was to write only the analysis of his text, the proofs of scripture for the doctrines, with the reasons and uses, and so leaving the rest to meditation, in which course he never found defect. And whereas Dr Fulk

Fulk, Dr Chaderton, Dr Whitaker, and ſome others had their frequent meeting to expound the ſcriptures, and therein they choſe the epiſtle to the Hebrews, they were pleaſed from their loving reſpect to Mr Dod to take in him amongſt them.

While he continued fellow of Jeſus college, by the importunity of ſome godly people of Ely, he went weekly, and preached amongſt them in that city, where the Lord gave a great bleſſing to his miniſtry. His removal from Cambridg to Hanwel in Oxfordſhire, was thus occaſioned; Mr Cope, afterwards Sir Anthony Cope, a man of emin ent note, who was much wrought upon by Mr Dod's miniſtry, ſent a letter to Dr Chaderton, to provide him a miniſter for Hanwel which was then vacant. Dr Chaderton moved Mr Dod to go to the place, and after he had been a while, and preached ſeveral ſermons by the deſire and conſent of the people, and by the approbation of the neighbour miniſters who had heard him, he was ſettled as their paſtor. While he was at Hanwel, he preached twice every Sabbath, catechiſing alſo in the afternoon and kept a lecture alſo on the Wedneſday conſtantly, and beſides this, he was one of the five miniſters who held up the lecture at Banbury. He gave himſelf much to faſting and prayer, and as his ſeed time was painful, ſo his harveſt was gainful, hundreds of ſouls being converted by his miniſtry. He was given to hoſpitality delighting therein, keeping a conſtant table on the Sabbath, and on the Wedneſdays lecture; upon which days he had not under eight or twelve perſons commonly dining with him, and he ſpent the time amongſt them in ſpiritual exhortations and conference.

He was about thirty years old when he came to Hanwel, and continued there about twenty years, where he had twelve children by his dear wife, formerly Anne Bound, daughter in-law to the worthy ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, Mr Greenham of Draighton near Cambridge, and daughter to Dr Bound, ſhe was one that truly feared God, and after her decaſe, by the perſuaſion of ſome friends, he took to wife Mrs Cleiton, who then living at Stratford-Bowe; ſhe alſo was a godly woman, and he was contracted to her by Mr Egerton of Black Friars, and married by his ancient and loving friend Dr Gouge.

But to return back again to Hanwel, it pleaſed the Lord to give a great bleſſing to his miniſtry in that place; yet he had much trouble from the envy of ſome miniſters that lived about him, who, though they ſeldom preached themſelves, yet they would not ſuffer that their people ſhould go from them, and hence he was frequently queſtioned in the biſhops court. And, beſides this, though ſome of Hanwel were very courteous and kind, yet there were ſome others who were glad to get from him what they could, thinking that that which he had was too much.

Upon a time, Mr Dod took a journey to Draighton, to bemoan himſelf to his father in law Mr Greenham, by reaſon of his croſſes and hard uſage, Mr Greenham heard him what he could ſay, and when he had done anſwered him thus: 'Son, ſon, when affliction lyeth heavy, ſin lyeth light. This deſerves the rather to be remembered, becauſe Mr Dod uſed often to bleſs God for it, ſaying alſo, that if Mr Greenham had bemoaned him, which he expected, he had done him hurt; and he forgot not this ſpeech in his old age, but made excellent uſe of it for himſelf and others.

He was ſuſpended from his miniſtry at Hanwel by Dr Bridges, biſhop of Oxford. And, ſuſpecting what would follow, the Sabbath before he went to the viſitation, he gave his hearers a farewel ſermon out of that text, 'I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheep ſhall be ſcattered;' the people did attend unto him with ſad countenances, and weeping eyes. Being thus driven from Hanwel, he preached at Fenni compton in Warwickſhire, where he had but ſmall means, but he was deſirous to be doing good. From thence he had a fair call unto Cannons-aſhby in Northamptonſhire, where he lived quietly divers years, preached over the whole propheſy of Daniel, with ſome other ſcriptures, having much kindneſs from Sir Eraſmus Dryden, in whom there was a rare mixture of piety and learning, and good affection for Mr Dod. He was ſilenced from preaching at Aſhby, upon a complaint made againſt him by Biſhop Neal to king James, who commanded arch-biſhop Abbot to ſilence him. Then he ceaſed for ſome time to preach publicly, yet in regard of his heavenly gift in conference, he might have been ſaid daily to preach privately; he was in his element when he was diſcourſing of heavenly things. And God in goodneſs ſo ordered it, that when he was reſtrained from public preaching, yet himſelf conceived, that at that time his life was no leſs profitable, than it had been in former times.

He had much employment in comforting ſuch as were wounded in their ſpirits, being ſent for, not only nigh at hand, but alſo into remote countries.

There was a gentlewoman, who had a great worldly eſtate, and a loving huſband, but ſhe was ſo ſadly aſſaulted with tentations, that ſhe often attempted to make away with herſelf. Mr Dod was ſent for to come to her, and the Lord ſo bleſſed his counſels, exhortations and prayers, that ſhe did not only recover out of her anguiſh of ſpirit, but ſhe was afterwards taken notice of for her ſingular piety; and the Lord ſo ordered, that this affliction was not only the means of her converſion, but alſo of her huſband's, ſo that both of them were a great mercy in the country where they lived, promoting religion according to their power, entertaining and cheriſhing godly people: ſhe lived divers years quieted in her heart, and was rich in good works; and when ſhe lay on her death bed, Mr Dod was ſent for to her again, who ſpake of heaven, and to fit her for that glory; ſhe told him, that ſhe felt the comforts of God, and that ſhe could as hardly at that time forbear ſinging, as formerly in child-bearing ſhe could forbear crying, and ſhortly after ſhe died.

There was a gentleman related to a noble family, ſo perplexed in his mind, that he hath been known in hard froſts to go barefooted, that the pain of his feet might divert his thoughts. Mr Dod was ſent for to him, who was his ſpiritual phyſician to heal him.

It would be long to inſiſt on all particulars of this nature, the Lord having made him a happy inſtrument for the good of many.

When he had ſpent ſome years in this kind of ſervice, by the care and induſtry of Mr Richard Knightly of Preſton (a worthy patriot,) after the death of king James, his liberty was procured for preaching again publicly, and then he was ſettled at Fauſley, where he preached twice every Lord's day. There he went over the goſpel of John, the epiſtle to the Coloſſians, and other ſcriptures.

He was much given to hoſpitality at Fauſley, as he had formerly been at Hanwel, ſo that there were ſcarce any ſabbath in the year, in which he did not dine both poor and rich, commonly three or four poor perſons, beſides thoſe that came from other places to hear him. He had ſo large an heart, that upon occaſion he had given to ſome three ſhillings, to ſome ten ſhillings, to ſome twenty ſhillings; and when the poor came to buy butter or cheeſe, he would command his maid to take no money of them.

At Fauſley he had quietneſs from the courts, as alſo at Aſhby; for in neither of thoſe places was there any church wardens. He was beholden at Fauſley, to the right worſhipful family of the Knightleys, where his bones were laid.

He uſed to bear croſſes, with much patience and meekneſs, being wont to ſay, that ſanctified afflictions were great promotions, quoting that of the apoſtle Peter. 1 Pet. i. 7. dokimion piſteos &c. is much more precious than gold, which he conceived to ſignifie the affliction that trieth faith, and that the word ſhould be rendered exploratorium rather than exploratio.

He always expected troubles, and prepared himſelf for them, and put this difference between the affliction, for which we are provided and others; that the one are but blows on the harneſs, but the other are blows on the fleſh.

Upon a time when an affliction was upon him, which went to his very heart, and in the expectation whereof he wept; yet when he ſaw that it was the will of God that it ſhould be ſo, he ſaid to one whom he loved. 'I will go and bleſs God, for I believe this ſhall be ſet for good.

He gave himſelf much to faſting and prayer, and when he

he faſted, his cuſtom was to abſtain from the dinner of the day before, to the ſupper of the day after. His diſeaſes till he was above threeſcore, were only fevers, and theſe for the moſt part high and violent. In the ſixty third year of his age, he had a fever in which there was ſmall hope of life. Dr Oxenbridge was his phyſician, who waiting for the breathing out of the diſeaſe by ſweating, (in which at laſt he had his deſire) he came to Mr Dod, and in the preſence of divers, ſaid unto him; now I have hope of your recovery:' to which Mr Dod anſwered, 'You think to comfort me by this, but you make my heart ſad; it is as if you ſhould tell one who had been ſore weather beaten on the ſea, and conceiving he was arrived at the haven, where his ſoul longed to be, that he muſt come back again to be toſſed with new winds and waves.'

In his greateſt health and proſperity, he would ſpeak how he deſired to be diſſolved. Upon a time, a gentleman blamed him for it, ſaying, he liked not ſervants who would have their wages before they had done their work; but he ſeemed to be conſtant in this deſire, alledging theſe reaſons among others, that God had given him a ſettled aſſurance of heaven, and a ſight of the excellency of heaven, and that the earth was but a priſon, and heaven the palace; and there was perfect holineſs and happineſs.

He took all occaſions to do good; when he was in company, by godly ſpeeches, ſeaſoning thoſe which came to him, that unleſs it were their own fault, they might be the better for him. Being invited to a great feaſt where there were ſundry gentlemen, and ſome of them began to ſwear, he ſtop'd them by diſcourſing of the greatneſs of that ſin; and that he might not burden their memories, he quoted three chapters, every one was the firſt: as the the firſt of Zachary, the firſt of Matthew, and the firſt of James, and he opened thoſe ſcriptures in ſuch ſort that they were all huſhed, and did not again offend in that kind while he was preſent amongſt them.

The word of God was his great delight, his meditation was of it in the night, and his diſcourſe in the day. When thoſe that were with him were ſpeaking of earthly things, he would find out ſome way to bring in heavenly. When he could not ſleep in the night, he would ſay, that the meditation of the word was ſweeter to him than ſleep. When he had preached twice on the ſabbath, and was a-weary, yet to thoſe that came to him, he would go on afreſh in holy diſcourſe; and the comforts which he found in his ſoul, made him ſometimes forget his body, that he hath been ſpeaking till he was ready to faint.

His eminency was in frequency, aptneſs, freeneſs, and largeneſs of godly diſcourſe; in which reſpect it may be ſaid of him, that in the country where he lived, none were known who therein were equal to him. But he was inter omnes, velut inter ignes luna minores.

He was very merciful himſelf, and to move parents that were rich to mercy, he would ſay thus; 'You are caring and contriving to lay up for your children, but lay up for your ſelves a good foundation againſt the time to come, being rich in good works; you will lay up treaſure in the earth, which is an unſafe place; lay up treaſures in heaven, that is the ſure and ſafe place.'

He loved and honoured thoſe that feared God, though in point of ſubſcription and ceremonies they were not of his judgment; and as he ſowed, ſo he reaped. He was full of love himſelf, and greatly beloved of others. Dr Preſton whom good men loved for his excellent piety and learning, was a faithful friend of Mr Dod's, and often entertained him at his chamber, and eſteemed much of him for his ſpiritualneſs in conference and converſation, and for his ability to open ſcripture, and to comfort troubled ſpirits. When the doctor's conſumption was upon him, which put an end to his life, he came to Maſter Richard Knightleys at Preſton in Northamptonſhire, which was but a mile from Fauſley, where Mr Dod had his abode, and deſired him to ſpeak to him of death and heaven, and heard him with patience and thankfulneſs. Maſter Dod prayed by him when he lay a dying, and preached his funeral ſermon.

Alſo Maſter Throgmorton, a pious and painful preacher of the word; an approved good man, dying the ſame year of a conſumption, came to Aſhby not far from Fauſley, to have the help of Maſter Dod's comforts and counſels. He was oppreſſed with melancholy, and a little before he gave up his ſoul to Chriſt, he asked Mr Dod, 'What will you ſay of him that is going out of the world, and can find no comfort?' To whom he anſwered; 'What will you ſay of our Saviour Chriſt, who when he was going out of the world found no comfort, but cried out, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?'

This ſpeech refreſhed Mr Throgmorton, and within a little ſpace of time after this, he went to his heavenly inheritance.

Mr Dod, as he was of a weaned diſpoſition from the world himſelf, ſo he laboured to wean others. He put this difference between rich chriſtians and poor, that for poor chriſtians their father kept the purſe, but the rich chriſtians kept the purſe in their own hands. But it might oftner fall out, and did; therefore the purſe was better in the father's hand than in the chriſtians.

He was wont to compare wicked men to waves of the ſea; thoſe which were of a great eſtate, were great waves; thoſe which were of ſmall eſtate, were ſmall waves, but all were reſtleſs as waves.

To a friend of his that was raiſed from a meanes eſtate to worldly greatneſs, he ſent word, that this was but as if he ſhould go out of a boat into a barge or ſhip; but there ought to be a ſerious and godly remembrance, that while we are in this world, we are upon the ſea.

He often repeated this, that nothing could hurt us but our own ſins; and they ſhould not hurt us, if we truly repented of them; and nothing could do us good but God's favour, and that we ſhould be ſure of, if we unfeignedly ſought it. Speaking of David's penning the li. Pſalm after his murder and adultery, he put this gloſs upon it, that hearty and true repentance ſhall have cauſe to praiſe the Lord for his pardoning mercy.

He ſaid, afflictions were God's potions, which we might ſweeten by faith and faithful prayer, but we for the moſt part made them bitter, putting into God's cup the ill ingredients of our own impatience and unbelief. He gave this reaſon why many of God's people lived uncomfortably, for that they ſhut their ear againſt what God ſaid, where they ſhould open it; and they opened their ear to what their carnal reaſon, and ſatan, and the world ſaid, where they ſhould ſhut it. But, ſaid he, the Pſalmiſt was wiſer, Pſal xcv. 8. He would hear none of them all: 'I will hear what the Lord God will ſpeak.'

His preaching was ſearching; and when ſome did ſuppoſe that he had informers and ſpies, becauſe he came ſo cloſe to them, he anſwered; that the word of God was ſearching, and that if he was ſhut up in a dark vault, where none could come at him, yet allow him but a bible and a candle, and he ſhould preach as he did.

He had an excellent gift in ſimilitudes, which did flow freely and frequently from him, as all thoſe knew, who either heard him preach publicly, or diſcourſe privately. He called death the friend of grace, though it were the enemy of nature: and whereas the word, and ſacraments, and prayer, do but weaken ſin, death kills it. Speaking of prayer, he ſaid, a man was never in a hard condition, unleſs he had a hard heart, and could not pray.

Having preached out of that text, 'O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt;' he invited ſome women to dinner, and told them it was a uſual ſaying, let 'a woman have her will, and then ſhe would be quiet.' Now the way for a woman to have her will, is to have a ſtrong faith, and to pray as the woman in the goſpel did.

Upon a time when he had preached long, ſo that it was ſomewhat late before he went to dinner, he ſaid, you ſhall have ſome gentlemen will follow hounds from ſeven in the morning, till four or five in the afternoon, becauſe they love the cry of dogs, which to me was unpleaſant hearing; ſo if we love the word, we ſhould be content tho' the miniſter ſtood above his hour. And he added, methinks it is much better to hear a miniſter preach, than a kennel of hounds to bark. Speaking of recreation, he ſaid, he marvelled what the vocation of many was, who were ſo eager for recreation. And if we ſhould come into a houſe, and ſee many phyſic boxes and glaſſes, we would conclude ſome body is ſick; ſo when we ſee hounds, and hawks, and cards, and dice, we may fear there is ſome ſick ſoul in that family.

He told ſome friends, that if he were to paſs ſentence who was a rich man, he would not look into his purſe or cheſt to ſee how much gold he had laid up, but look unto his heart what promiſes were treaſured up there. For we count him rich that is rich in bonds, and the pleading of the promiſes in prayer, is ſuing of the bonds.

Speaking to a miniſter who was to go to a place where there was but ſmall means, he told him, that his care ſhould be to preach, and do good ſervice, and then God would provide for him. When he preached at Fauſley, and was much reſorted unto, as it was with him in other places, he told a godly man of his acquaintance, that if the country knew ſo much by him, as he knew by himſelf, they would not have him in ſo much admiration.

Speaking about going to law, his opinion was, that it was better to buy love than law. For one might have a great deal of love for a little, whereas he could have but a little law for a great deal. He would frequently ſay, that was well, which ended everlaſtingly well; and that was ill, which ended everlaſtingly ill: and that a man was never undone till he was in hell.

This was a ſpeech which he often uſed, that if it were lawful to envy any, he would envy thoſe that turned to God in youth, whereby they eſcaped much ſin and ſorrow, and were like unto Jacob, that ſtole the bleſſing betimes.

This was a remarkable paſſage of providence, that upon a time when it was late at night, it came unto his mind, that he muſt ſee a friend of his, ſome two miles off; he had buſineſs, and would have put it off, but his thoughts were reſtleſs; whereupon he went, and when he came to the place, all the family were in bed, but only his friend, who was eſteemed truly godly, but at that time was overwhelmed with tentations; the occaſion whereof was, ſome cruelty offered to his children. Mr Dod knew nothing, either of the tentation or occaſion of it: but knocking at the door, his friend opened the door to him, to whom he ſaid, I am come to you, I know not why myſelf, but I was reſtleſs in my ſpirit until I had done it. To whom his friend anſwered, you know not why you came, but God knew why he ſent you; and withal pulled out a halter, wherewith he had intended ſelf murder at that time, which by God's goodneſs, was by this means prevented.

Speaking of loſing for Chriſt, he teſtified from his own experience, that for the loſs of one carnal brother he had two hundred ſpiritual brethren.

Before he was married, he could not maintain himſelf, and thereupon he was thinking, how he ſhould maintain a wife and children, his living not being great; but looking out of his ſtudy window, he ſaw a hen and chickens ſcratching for their living, and he conſidered thus with himſelf, the hen did but live before, and had nothing to ſpare, and now ſhe hath as much with that great family.

When he ſaw a Chriſtian to look ſad, he would uſe that ſpeech which Jonadab did to Amnon, 'Art not thou a king's ſon?' He would ſay to thoſe that complained of loſſes and croſſes, that which Eliphaz did to Job, 'Do the conſolations of God ſeem ſmall to you?' God hath taken away your children, your goods, but he hath not taken away himſelf, nor Chriſt, nor his ſpirit, nor heaven nor eternal life.

He uſed to inſtruct chriſtians how they ſhould never have a great affliction, nor long, and that was by looking upon things which were not ſeen, which are eternal, 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18. What can be great to him that counts the world nothing? and what can be long to him that thinks his life but a ſpan long.

To perſwade them that are chriſtians, not to return railing for railing, he would ſay; that if a dog bark at a ſheep, a ſheep will not bark at a dog.

In theſe times of war, at the firſt beginning of them, when many well affected people came to him, being affrighted with the cavaliers, he encouraged them, uſing this ſpeech, that if a houſe were full of rods, what need the child fear, when none of them could move without their father's hand; and the Lord was a loving father; ſtate and life and all was in his diſpoſing. When afterwards the ſoldiers came to his houſe, and threatned to knock him on the head, he anſwered with confidence, that if they did, they ſhould ſend him to heaven, whom he longed to be, but they could do nothing except God gave leave. They broke open his cheſts and cupboards, and plundred him of his goods; but he ſaid to a friend of his, that he would not do them that honour to ſay they had taken ought from him, but it was the Lord's, alluding that of Job, who when he was ſpoiled by the Chaldeans and the Sabeans, yet he did not ſo much as name the inſtruments, 'But the Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away, bleſſed be the name of the Lord.

At length they came to him, when through weakneſs he was unable not only to ſtir out of his chamber, but alſo out of his bed; they cut the curtains of his bed, and pulled away the pillowbeers from under his head, aſking him whether he could ſpeak Latin, in all which loſſes, which were great, he never uttered one word of impatience. In his ſickneſs, when extreme pain was upon him, as ſoon as the fit was over, he would ſay to his maid ſervant that attended him; O think well of God for it, for it is moſt juſtly and wiſely done, whatſoever he ſendeth or doeth. When his ſervants came to viſit him in the morning, he would ſay, have ye been with God to bleſs him for your ſleep this night? he might have made your bed your grave.

He would often ſay in his ſickneſs, 'I am not afraid to look death in the face; I can ſay, death where is thy ſting? death cannot hurt me. He ſpake how death was a ſweet ſleep to a chriſtian; adding that if parents ſhould tell little children, who had played all the day, that they muſt go to bed, they would be ready to cry; but a labouring man is glad when night comes that he might go to reſt, ſo wicked men, death is unwelcome unto them; but a child of God who hath laboured and ſuffered, is glad when death cometh, that he may reſt from his labours.

When he had been long ſpeaking to thoſe who came to him, and uſed to aſk him queſtions, and hath been perſwaded to ſpare himſelf, he would ſay, hear but this one thing more, it may be I ſhall never ſpeak to you again; but if it ſhould be ſo, 'Bleſſed is the ſervant whom his Lord when he cometh ſhall find ſo doing.' Hearken to a few words more; God hath heard all the words we have ſpoken, and conſidered with what hearts and affections we have ſpoken them.

He uſed to compare rebukes uttered in paſſion to ſcalding potions, which the patient could not take down, and his opinion was, that if he would do good unto others, we ſhould labour for meekneſs of wiſdom, whereby we ſhall be enabled to uſe ſoft words and hard arguments.

He allowed to huſbands and wives only one contention; which was this, who ſhould love one another beſt; and adviſed them, that when either of them were in paſſion, they ſhould not anſwer paſſions with paſſions, but with compaſſions.

He was very plain and familiar both in preaching and conference, yet very ſpiritual, and performed all with much gravity.

The chief things he ſought God for, in his frequent ſecret faſtings and prayers, (as himſelf ſaid) were the knowledge of the ſcriptures, and a bleſſing upon his miniſtry, in both which God anſwered him abundantly.

As for the ſcriptures, God had ſo enlightned him, that he was able to give account of the drift and ſcope of the ſpirit of God in the greateſt part of them, with great clearneſs, and to open them in ſuch as proved very effectual, for the bringing of ſcripture light into ſimple men's underſtanding, who were not able to reach the obſcure and ſcholaſtick interpretations of many.

His manner was to compare ſcripture with ſcripture, ſeldom naming the diſſenters; and but ſparingly different readings, but making out the truth poſitively, or by neceſſary conſequence.

In preaching, he uſually took ſome portion of ſcripture in order before him, opening a verſe or two, or more at a time, firſt clearing the drift and connection, then giving the ſenſe and interpretation briefly, but very plainly, not leaving the text until he had made it plain to the meaneſt capacity; then raiſing thoſe doctrines that were moſt agreeable to the mind and meaning of the ſpirit of God in that text, clearing and exemplifying his points excellently out of the word, opening his proofs, (not multiplying particulars for oppreſſing memory), not dwelling ſo long as to make all truth run through a few texts: he ſpake moſt largely, and very home in application, mightily convincing and diving into mens hearts and conſciences, and leaving them little or nothing to object againſt it: he took great care to ſpeak to the meaneſt capacity, and to feed the lambs; ſaying, he muſt ſtoop to the meaneſt capacity, and if he could teach them, others might help themſelves.

He could not endure that miniſters ſhould uſe hard and unuſual Engliſh: he ſaid, that moſt miniſters in England ſhot over the heads of their hearers.

He did not ſtrive to ſpeak all that might be ſaid to a point, not to ſhew variety, but to ſpeak to the heart: he would ſay, that there were many tricks and devices that ſome men uſed in preaching, but they ſeldom did good: the pure goſpel, and that preaching which the world counts fooliſhneſs, was that that works moſt kindly.

He was very evangelical, ſtriving firſt to make men ſee their loſt condition clearly, and to be convinced of it, ſaying, Senſe of miſery was a good ſtep to the remedy; and then, largely and excellently opening the promiſes, and the grace of God in Chriſt, according to the goſpel, looking at that as the moſt effectual preaching. Some, ſays he, labour ſtill to keep men under terrors, and load them with threatenings, &c. leſt they ſhould not be humbled enough; but the goſpel works true humiliation, not the law; it ariſes from ſenſe of ſin and miſery, joined with hope of mercy. The damned have terror and ſenſe of miſery enough, but that did not humble them.

He deſired to ſpeak diſtinctly, not giving the childrens bread to dogs, but to diſcover hypocriſy and ſincerity, by lively characters and ſigns; but yet with great tenderneſs to babes in Chriſt, ſtriving to diſcover a babe from an hypocrite.

He was excellent for practical divinity, and living by faith, as to ſpirituals and temporals, and ſelf denial; and very conſolatory, rendering religion the moſt ſweet and comfortable life, notwithſtanding ſufferings.

He uſed to preſs much after the ſeeking of ſpiritual illumination, in hearing and reading, &c. and divine aſſiſtance in religious duties, not contenting ourſelves with the uſe of parts and accompliſhments, or grace received, but to look higher, ſaying, David that could preach excellently, and had Nathan and Gad the prophets alſo to preach, yet cries out for teaching; thereby ſhewing, that all that teaching would not do, unleſs God teach alſo. And David cries, 'Open mine eyes;' he had the light without, but he muſt have light within, viz. ſight, elſe he could not 'ſee the wonders of the law,' though he had the law.

He uſed to preſs much to meekneſs, and a ſweet diſpoſition to affability, charity, and cheerfulneſs, not to be rigid, ſour, tart, nor ſad, leſt the world ſhould think that we ſerved an hard maſter.

Being above eighty years old, his pains were very great, yet not painful to him, he preached almoſt all day long, yet ſaid, it was no great matter to pay money when one had it, all the labour was to get it: he opened a chapter, and prayed in his family, after he preached twice in public, and in the interim diſcourſed all dinner time, but eat very little: he brought in many with him to dinner, beſides his four or ſix conſtant widows; if his wife began to doubt of her proviſion at ſight of ſo many, he would ſay, 'Better want meat than good company; but there is ſomething in the houſe, though cold; this is not a day to feaſt the bodies but ſouls.' At firſt ſitting down he would bid them help themſelves, and one another, and ſee that none want. Let me, ſaid he, bid you but once, for I would not ſpeak a vain word to day. After both ſermons the houſe would be filled, and he being ſet in his chair, uſed to ſay, if any have a good queſtion, or a hard place of ſcripture to open, let them ſay on; and when he was faint, he would call for a ſmall glaſs of wine and beer mixed, and then to it again till night.

He was excellent in preaching occaſionally from the creatures, as he walked or rode.

His miniſtry was ſo ſpiritual, and yet ſo plain, that poor ſimple people that never knew what religion meant, when they had gone to hear him, could not chuſe but talk of his ſermon.

It mightily affected poor creatures to hear the myſteries of God, by his excellent ſkill that way, brought down to their own language and dialect.

He was ſo holy and ſpiritual, both in life and doctrine, that he ſilenced even deſperate and deviliſh oppoſers of religion. It was a diſcredit for any to ſpeak evil of him, becauſe it muſt needs expreſs much malice; and all men moſt generally, in his latter time at leaſt, honoured him.

He was very ſucceſsful in making peace, though between deſperate and almoſt implacable adverſaries, and ſome of them wicked, mightily convinced them with goſpel arguments, to the overcoming and quieting of their ſpirits.

He would anſwer any queſtions propounded, that were but fit for a divine to ſpeak to; yet ſhewing his approbation or diſlike of the queſtion, according to the honeſty and ſpiritualneſs, or curioſity and lightneſs of it.

When mean inferior people came to ſpeak with him, if he was walking in the church, where he uſed moſt to ſtudy, that he might have room to walk in, (being troubled with the ſtone) or elſewhere; if he thought them baſhful he would meet them, and ſay, Would you ſpeak with me? And when he found them unable to ſtate their queſtion, he would help them out with it, taking care to find the ſore; but would anſwer and deal ſo compaſſionately and tenderly, as not to diſcourage the pooreſt ſoul from coming again to him.

If any queſtioned him about ceremonies, about which many then ſuffered, he was very wary in dealing, not ſhy in ſpeaking his judgment; but careful of adviſing them according to their ſtrength: he would bid them take heed of being led, merely by the imitation of any body, or other mens arguments, but look to their ſcripture light, and ſee what arguments they had to bear them out; and whether they could ſuffer alone in that cauſe, if they ſhould ſurvive their patterns: he would not have them make a buſineſs about leſſer things, and then fall off from what they began to profeſs.

Being to adviſe a young man in his choice of a yoke-fellow, he bad him look principally after godlineſs. Men talk of a portion, grace is the beſt portion. 'The wiſe woman buildeth up the houſe, viz. the godly, &c. Not the rich. Some uſe to ſay, There is a portion and civility, and we will hope for grace; but, ſaith he, rather make ſure grace, and hope for riches; there's far greater reaſon for it; 'for godlineſs hath the promiſe,' riches hath none. A ſon or daughter of God ſhall be provided for.

He would ſay, he that could anſwer two queſtions well, might have comfort in any place or condition, viz. Who am I? and what do I here? am I a child of God? and am I in my calling or way? 'He hath given his angels charge to keep thee in all thy ways.

And that the knowlege of two things would make one willing to ſuffer or die, viz. What heaven is; and that it is mine. I (ſaid one) if a man were ſure. To whom he anſwered, Truly aſſurance is to be had, and what have we been doing all this while?

He uſed to ſay, they that hope to go to heaven (as moſt do) and had not good evidence for it, were like a man, that paſſing by a great houſe and eſtate would ſay, 'This is mine;' but being bid to ſhew his title, would ſay, ſome body muſt have it, and why not I? Such is moſt mens title for heaven.

During the time of his laſt ſickneſs, it pleaſed the Lord to try him by grievous pains, moſt bitter and ſharp, of the ſtrangury; but when he had any intermiſſions, he was breathing out ſuch ſpeeches, as tended to the praiſe of God, and to the edification of thoſe that heard him. He ſlept little all the night or day, long before his death; in all which time he employed his attendants which were about him, to read the ſcriptures, which he expounded to them.

And when his ſtrength was ſpent in ſpeaking, he retired himſelf to prayer and meditation. When he felt his pains returning, he would entreat thoſe that were about him, to pray to God for him, either to give him deliverance or patience.

His tentations a little before his death, and his wreſtlings with Satan were great; ſo were his victories. He ſpake to one that did watch with him all night, about two o'clock in the morning, that he had been wreſtling with Satan all that night, who accuſed him that he neither preached nor prayed, nor performed any duty as he ſhould have done, for manner or for end; but he ſaid, I have anſwered him from the example of the prodigal and the publican.

His faith and patience were increaſed and perfected by his ſufferings. he longed and thirſted to be with Chriſt, which words he often utterred. One of his laſt ſpeeches was this, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, he ſighed and ſaid, 'I deſire to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt.'

His pains left him not an hour before his death, his ſpeech alſo then leaving him; he could not eat nor drink for two days before his death. And ſo quietly and patiently he ended his life, making a happy change, being fourſcore and ſixteen years old, 1645.

The Life of Mr ROBERT BALSAM, who died Anno Chriſti 1647.

ROBERT BALSAM was born at Shipton Montague, in the county of Somerſet. Having ſpent ſome years in Newhall in Oxford, upon his removal thence, he was entertained by Mr Bernard of Batcomb, in the aforeſaid county, to teach ſchool, and preach ſometimes as his aſſiſtant, under whom he greatly improved his abilities for preaching.

Upon the death of Mr Bernard, preaching occaſionally at a neighbour village called Stoke, among a company of poor untaught people, one that lived thereabouts told him, that if ſuch a miniſter ſhould come and preach among that people, where there was ſo ſmall encouragement, he ſhould think that God had a great work to do upon them: here upon Mr Balſam promiſed to be their miniſter, where he enjoyed about forty pounds a-year. The ſucceſs of his miniſtry there was very great, inſomuch that he had been heard ſay, that there were but few ſermons that he preached there, but he had intelligence that ſome one or other were converted by them.
